while they were alive, and hereby were much alarmed and diſturbed. But this notion was not only falſe, but of very bad tendency; and therefore the Apoſtle, with much earneſtneſs, corrects the miſtake in a ſecond Epiſtle, ch. ii. 1, &c. where he plainly declares that he did not believe the coming of the Lord was at hand; and that he knew by the ſpirit of prophecy, that before the coming of the Lord, there would be a falling away, or great apoſtaſy in the Chriſtian church, and that the man of ſin would appear, and erect a ſpiritual Anti-chriſtian tyranny in the temple, or church of God. Moſt certainly the Apoſtle knew that the coming of Chriſt would not be till ſeveral ages after the time in which he lived: And no doubt all the Apoſtles knew this as well as he. And yet he, and the other Apoſtles, always ſpeak as if the coming of Chriſt, and the day of the Lord, the day of judgement, was near at hand; and accordingly exhort Chriſtians to watch, and to keep themſelves in readineſs, that they might not be ſurpriſed by it; as in the preſent paſſage, Phil. iv. 5. 1 Theſſ. v. 2. Heb. x. 37. James v. 7—9. 1 Pet. iv. 7. 2 Pet. iii. 10, 11, 12 Our bleſſed Lord alſo knew very well that he ſhould not come while that generation to whom he preached, was alive: And yet he exhorts that generation to watch and have all things in readineſs, that they might not be ſurpriſed by his coming; Matth. xxiv. 42, &c. xxv. 13. Mark xiii. 33, &c. Luke xxi. 34, &c. and after his aſcenſion, Rev. xxii. 7, 12, 20. This is the current language and ſenſe of our Lord and his Apoſtles. They repreſent his coming as at hand,—as drawing nigh, and admoniſh their hearers to watch, leſt his coming ſhould find them unprepared; though they knew his coming would not be till many ages after theſe perſons whom they ſo exhorted were dead, and in their graves. But how ſhall we reconcile this ſeeming inconſiſtency?—Thus:—"The time of our Lord's coming coincides, or happens at the ſame time with the time of our death; how near to, or how far ſoever from his coming we happen to die." To confirm this propoſition, we need advance but one argument, out of more that might be produced; It is this: Certainly our Chriſtian courſe [of preparatory duties, ſufferings, fighting, watching, patience, &c.] ends when we die: But Chriſt comes when our Chriſtian courſe ends; or, our Chriſtian courſe in this life, terminates in the coming of Chriſt. This is evident from the following texts: 1 Cor. i. 8. Philip. i. 6, 10. 1 Theſſ. iii. 13. v. 23. 2 Theſſ. i. 7. 1 Tim. vi. 11—15. 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. James v. 7. 1 Pet. i. 5, 13. 2 Pet. iii. 11, 12. and Rev. ii. 25. iii. 11. In ſhort, throughout the New Teſtament, we are never exhorted to prepare for death, but always for the coming of our Lord, &c. From all which it appears, that the end of our Chriſtian courſe, and conſequently of our preſent life, is the coming of our Lord; when we ſhall receive the ſalvation, the crown of righteouſneſs, which he will give to them that love his appearing.—An aweful, important, awakening truth! of great weight and force in religion; infinitely worthy of our moſt ſerious conſideration every day and hour of our life! It is indeed the grand view and power of the Goſpel; though there is reaſon to fear that but few Chriſtians underſtand, or duly lay it to heart. That which is here called our ſalvation, is in Jude, ver. 3. termed the common ſalvation; that is, that ſalvation or reſt, which we have all a promiſe left of obtaining, as all the Iſraelites had a promiſe left of entering into the land of Canaan, even they who fell ſhort through unbelief, Heb. iv. 1, 2. The Apoſtle is ſpeaking to thoſe who either actually did, or might poſſibly walk in rioting and drunkenneſs, &c. ver. 13. And yet, when he ſaith our ſalvation, he plainly allows them an intereſt in the Goſpel ſalvation. Which ſeems hardly to be underſtood otherwiſe than thus:—As they profeſſed the Goſpel, the ſins of their heathen ſtate were pardoned, and a promiſe was given them of ſalvation, or of eternal life. But this promiſe was intended to be a motive to all holineſs and obedience, which if it had its proper effect, would ſecure their final and eternal ſalvation; but if not, they would fall ſhort, and ſink into eternal deſtruction. And thus the Goſpel ſalvation is alſo our ſalvation; or thus all profeſſed Chriſtians at this day are alſo intereſted in it. The beautiful and lively metaphor in ver. 11, 12. is very obſervable. This preſent, imperfect ſtate of trial, he compares to the night; and the ſalvation and glory we all have in proſpect, to the day: He ſuppoſes Chriſtians may be aſleep, negligent of their moſt important concerns, or immerſed in ſenſuality: As the Apoſtle therefore of Chriſt, and a preacher of the Goſpel, he knocks at the chamber-door, and calls to them, "It is high time to awake out of ſleep; the day appears, the glorious day of your everlaſting ſalvation. Awake, awake! throw off the looſe clothes which cover you in the night, and in which it is unſeemly to appear before men; and put on that comely dreſs, which is agreeable to the day, and gives a decent and honourable appearance in the world:" Meaning that diſpoſition and converſation which is agreeable to the Goſpel, lovely in the eyes of mankind, and which fits us to appear among the bleſſed, in the realms of light. See Taylor.

Ver. 12. The armour of light] Beza obſerves very juſtly, that the ſenſe of οπλα, armour, is very extenſive, and comprehends any accoutrements of the body. Hence it evidently ſignifies dreſs; and the Apoſtle's meaning will be obſcured, if it is not ſo tranſlated. "Put on the dreſs and ornaments of that virtue and holineſs, which is ſuitable to the heavenly light of the Goſpel." See Taylor, and Locke.

Ver. 13. Let us walk honeſtly] 'Ευσχημόνως, honourably, or gracefully. Dr. Milner renders the paſſage, Let us walk with a grace. The word for chambering, is κοίταις, which Leigh explains of lying long in bed. It implies effeminacy and luxury of that kind. The word ἀσελγεία, rendered wantonneſs, properly ſignifies a ſoft and diſſolute manner of life, attended with an affected delicacy, very detrimental to that reſolution, which is ſo neceſſary an ingredient in the character of one who would approve himſelf a good ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt. The general meaning may be, "Do not indulge any intemperate lewd converſation among your heathen acquaintance, nor any ſtrife and envy againſt your Chriſtian brethren." See Doddridge, Stockius, and Milner's "Fading Flowers of Life." p. 38.

Ver. 14. Put ye on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt] A ſtrong expreſſion for endeavouring to be clothed with all the virtues and graces which compoſe his character. It is obſervable the Apoſtle does not ſay, "Put on purity, ſobriety, benevolence, &c." But he in effect ſays all at once, in ſaying, Put ye on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Plutarch tells us concerning the kings of Perſia, That on the coronation day they put on a robe which the firſt Cyrus wore before he was king, to remind them of imitating his exemplary temper and behaviour. Dr. Hammond renders the laſt clauſe of this verſe very well, "Take care your providence for the fleſh do not turn into covetouſneſs, or irregular deſires;" for it is literally, Make not proviſion for the fleſh unto covetouſneſs. See Plutarch's Life of Artaxerxes, and Hammond.

Chap. XIV. Ver. 1.] By Aquila and Priſcilla, who were come from Rome, and with whom St. Paul was familiar for a conſiderable time, (Acts xviii. 2, 3.) or by ſome other hand, the Apoſtle had a particular account of the ſtate of the Chriſtian church at Rome, and was informed that there was no good agreement between the Jewiſh and Gentile converts about meats and days. The Jewiſh Chriſtian retaining a veneration for the laws of Moſes, abſtained from certain meats, and was obſervant of certain days; while the Gentile, underſtanding that the Chriſtian religion laid him under no obligations to ſuch ceremonial points, had no regard to either. The Jew cenſured the Gentile as a latitudinarian, little better than a mere heathen, and likely to relapſe into idolatry. The Gentile cenſured the Jew, as a man of narrow, ſuperſtitious principles, and defective in the faith of the Goſpel. The Apoſtle exhorts, that in ſuch things as are not eſſential to religion, and in which both parties, in their different way of thinking, might have an honeſt meaning and ſerious regard to God, difference of ſentiments might not hinder Chriſtian fellowſhip and love; but that they would mutually forbear each other, make candid allowances, and eſpecially not carry any Goſpel liberties ſo far, as to diſguſt a weak brother or Jewiſh Chriſtian againſt the Goſpel itſelf, and tempt him to renounce Chriſtianity. His rules and exhortations are ſtill of great uſe, and happy would the Chriſtian world be, if they were more generally practiſed By him that is weak in the faith, is meant the Jew, who the Apoſtle knew aſſuredly was in the wrong; yet he uſes him very tenderly, and avoids ſaying any thing of him that was harſh and overbearing, and only repreſents him as weak in the faith. The reception here ſpoken of is, "the receiving into familiar and ordinary converſation," as is evident from ch. xv. 7. where the Apoſtle directing them to receive one another mutually, uſes the ſame word προσλαμβάνεσθε. "Live together in a free and friendly manner, the weak with the ſtrong, and the ſtrong with the weak, without any regard to the differences among you about the lawfulneſs of any indifferent thing." Doubtful diſputations imply "debates and diſtinctions about matters in doubt between you." Dr. Whitby explains διακρίσεις of diſcriminating perſons, according to their inward thoughts and reaſonings on theſe heads. Dr. Waterland's manuſcript note is, Receive ye, without making differences for opinions:—without diving or prying curiouſly into their private ſentiments. An anonymous critic propoſes to read the paſſage εἰς διακρίσεις ΔΙΑ λογισμων; to contentions, by diſputation; and ſo he would alſo read

2 For one believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs.

3 Let not him that eateth deſpiſe him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not, judge him that eateth: for God hath received him.

4 Who art thou that judgeſt another man's ſervant? to his own maſter he ſtandeth or falleth. Yea, he ſhall be holden up: for God is able to make him ſtand.

5 One man eſteemeth one day above another: another eſteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully perſuaded in his own mind.

6 He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks.

7 For none of us liveth to himſelf, and no man dieth to himſelf.

8 For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's.

9 For to this end Chriſt both died, and roſe, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living.

10 But why doſt thou judge thy brother? or why doſt thou ſet at nought thy brother? for we ſhall all ſtand before the judgement-ſeat of Chriſt.

11 For it is written, As I live, ſaith the Lord, every knee ſhall bow to me, and every tongue ſhall confeſs to God.

12 So then every one of us ſhall give account of himſelf to God.

13 Let us not therefore judge one another any more: but judge this rather, that no

James ii. 4. Dr. Doddridge, remarking upon this verſe the ſtrength of the Apoſtle's reaſoning in favour of candour and mutual condeſcenſion, obſerves with the true ſpirit of that candour he has ſo ſtrongly enforced, "that when it ſhall pleaſe God to awaken in the governors of eſtabliſhed proteſtant churches ſuch a ſpirit of moderation and goodneſs, joined with a true zeal for religion, as to leave certain things in that natural ſtate of indifference in which almoſt all ſenſible men confeſs it is beſt they ſhould be left, many ſeparations will ceaſe of courſe, and the healers of ſuch breaches will do a noble ſervice to their country, be honoured by all who love Chriſtianity, and amply rewarded by the great head of the church."

Ver. 2. Eateth herbs] Some of the Jews uſed to eat no fleſh at all, and others looked upon it as a very high pitch of virtue to abſtain from it in Gentile countries, and to ſubſiſt intirely on vegetables, from an apprehenſion that the fleſh ſold in the ſhambles might have been offered to idols, or at leaſt have contracted ſome ceremonial pollution. See Dan. i. 8—16. Poſſibly ſome of theſe Jewiſh converts might have been of the ſect of the Eſſenes, who were peculiarly ſtrict on this head, inſomuch that they abſtained not only from fleſh, but from fruit. See Whitby and Doddridge.

Ver. 3. Let not him that eateth, deſpiſe, &c.] By him that eateth, St. Paul ſeems to mean the Gentiles, who were leſs ſcrupulous in the uſe of indifferent things; and by him that eateth not, the Jews, who made great diſtinction of meats, and drinks, and days, and placed in them a great, and as they thought neceſſary part of the worſhip of the true God. To the Gentiles the Apoſtle gives this caution, that they ſhould not contemn the Jews as weak, narrow-minded men, who laid ſo much ſtreſs on matters of ſuch ſmall moment, and thought religion ſo much concerned in thoſe indifferent things. On the other ſide, he exhorts the Jews not to judge that thoſe who neglected the Jewiſh obſervances of meats and days were ſtill heathens, or would ſoon apoſtatize to heatheniſm again: for he reaſons, that God had received them into his family, and that they had no authority to judge whether they were of that family, or would continue ſo: "That, ſays he, belongs only to the Maſter of the family; but notwithſtanding your cenſure or hard thoughts of them, they will not apoſtatize; for God is able to continue them in his family, notwithſtanding you ſuſpect from their free uſe of things indifferent, that they incline too much, or approach too near to Gentiliſm." See Locke.

Ver. 4. Standeth or falleth, &c.] Falleth is here uſed in the deſtructive ſenſe, and ſignifies being totally caſt off. Comp. ch. xi. 11, 12. For the ſenſe of able, ſee on ch. i. 16. Dr. Whitby explains the laſt clauſe of God's convincing the Jewiſh converts in general of the indifference of the Moſaic ritual, by putting a ſpeedy period to the very poſſibility of obſerving it, in the deſtruction at Jeruſalem; which would have a peculiar efficacy to wean mens minds from an attachment to it, when conſidered in connection with Chriſt's predictions of that event. But a more extenſive interpretation of the paſſage is both more obvious, and leſs liable to objection, "Let me tell you, he ſhall be continued in God's favour, and eſtabliſhed as a true member of his family; for it is not only conſiſtent with the honour of God, but it is his good pleaſure that he ſhould be continued and eſtabliſhed, notwithſtanding his neglect of the ritual law." See Taylor, Whitby, and Doddridge.

Ver. 5. One man eſteemeth one day, &c.] The Apoſtle having, in the foregoing verſe, uſed κρίνων ἀλλότριον οἰκέτην, for judging any one to be or not to be another man's ſervant,—ſeems here to continue the uſe of the word κρίνειν in the ſame ſignification; that is, for judging a day to be more particularly God's. Criticks have obſerved, that the word πληροφορείσθω, rendered fully perſuaded, is moſt properly applied to a ſhip, which is carried on by the wind and tide, with all its ſails ſpread to forward it, and nothing to obſtruct its courſe. So that the meaning is, "Let him go on in his own way, without impediment:—Let every man enjoy his own ſentiments freely." See Raphelius, Doddridge, and Bennet's Appendix to his Irenicum, p. 120, &c.

Ver. 7—9. For none of us liveth to himſelf, &c.] None of us, that is, "none of us Chriſtians, ought to live, &c." The Apoſtle's argument ſtands thus: "According to the principles of true religion, and of the Chriſtian religion in particular, we are not our own; neither are we to live to ourſelves, as if we were our own lords and proprietors, and had no other rule but our own will and pleaſure. No; we are all Chriſt's; we are his diſciples and ſubjects, and His will ſhould be the rule of our conſciences and conduct. As therefore we ſhould not make our own wills or ſentiments a rule to ourſelves, much leſs ſhould we make them a rule to others; as if they were to live to us, or, like ſervants, pay us obedience: for we can neither ſave ourſelves nor them. At the time of death we do not fall into our own hands, as if we had power to raiſe ourſelves to life again at the laſt day; but we die into the hands of Chriſt, and it is he alone to whom God hath given power to bring us to life again. Conſequently, it is the duty of every one of us to approve ourſelves to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and therefore we may ſafely leave every one to do what he ſincerely thinks is moſt pleaſing to him, without endangering our own ſalvation, or that of a Chriſtian brother. For aſſuredly all is well, both with him and us, in life and death, if both ſeriouſly endeavour to regulate their actions by the will of Chriſt. See Locke and Taylor.

Ver. 8. We are the Lord's] Theſe words give an eaſy interpretation to the phraſes of eating and living, &c. to the Lord; for they make them plainly to refer to what the Apoſtle had ſaid at the latter end of ver. 3. for God hath received him: ſignifying, that God had received all thoſe who profeſſed the Goſpel, and had given their names up to Jeſus Chriſt, into his family, and thus made them his domeſtics; and therefore we ſhould not judge of or cenſure one another, for that every Chriſtian was the Lord's domeſtic, appropriated to him as his menial ſervant; ſo that all he did in that ſtate was to be looked upon as done to the Lord, and not be accounted for to any one elſe. Locke.

Ver. 9. Might be the Lord] This muſt be ſo underſtood here as to agree with the foregoing verſe: There it was, "We, that is, we Chriſtians, whether we live or die, are the Lord's propriety: for the Lord died and roſe again, that we, whether living or dying, ſhould be his." Locke.

Ver. 10. But why doſt thou judge thy brother, &c.] The ſuperſtitious are prone to judge, and thoſe who are not ſuperſtitious are prone to deſpiſe. Heylin.

Ver. 13. Let us not therefore judge] He had before reproved the weak for cenſuring the ſtrong in the uſe of their liberty: He comes now to reſtrain the ſtrong from offending the weak, by a too free uſe of their liberty, in not forbearing the uſe of it, where it might give offence to the weak. The word rendered judge has two different ſenſes, and ſeems to be uſed in both in this verſe. In the firſt place, it ſignifies to cenſure and condemn; in the other, to determine, as a matter of importance. See Hammond. Locke, and Raphelius. Some critics are for omitting the word Σκάνδαλον, rendered an occ to fall, as it ſeems only an interpretation of the former word. It is omitted by the Syriac; but ſee Wetſtein, and ver. 21. Some man put a ſtumbling-block, or an occaſion to fall in his brother's way.

14 I know, and am perſuaded by the Lord Jeſus, that there is nothing unclean of itſelf: but to him that eſteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean.

15 But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkeſt thou not charitably. Deſtroy not him with thy meat, for whom Chriſt died.

16 Let not then your good be evil ſpoken of:

17 For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteouſneſs, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghoſt:

18 For he that in theſe things ſerveth Chriſt, is acceptable to God, and approved of men.

19 Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another.

20 For meat deſtroy not the work of God. All things indeed are pure; but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence.

21 It is good neither to eat fleſh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother ſtumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.

22 Haſt thou faith? have it to thyſelf before God. Happy is he that condemneth not himſelf in that thing which he alloweth.

23 And he that doubteth is damned if he eat, becauſe he eateth not of faith: for whatſoever is not of faith is ſin.

CHAP. XV.

The ſtrong muſt bear with the weak. We may not pleaſe ourſelves, for Chriſt did not ſo; but receive one the other, as Chriſt did us all, both Jews, and Gentiles. Paul excuſeth his writing, promiſeth to ſee them, and requeſteth their prayers.

WE then that are ſtrong, ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to pleaſe ourſelves.

2 Let every one of us pleaſe his neighbour for his good to edification.

3 For even Chriſt pleaſed not himſelf; but as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee, fell on me.

that σκανδαλον ſignifies properly "a piece of wood that ſupports a trap, which falls on its being moved;" and ſo may with peculiar propriety ſignify whatever may be the occaſion of enſnaring another, and drawing him into ſin and miſchief.

Ver. 15. But if thy brother be grieved] If then thy brother be offended with thy meat, thou walkeſt no longer charitably. Wat. It appears from hence, that grieving a perſon does not ſignify merely putting him out of humour, but leading him into ſin. The grief therefore is that which ariſes from a conſciouſneſs of having acted amiſs, in conformity to the example of a perſon conſidered as ſuperior, whether in rank or genius, knowledge or piety. See Hammond, Locke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 16. Let not then your good be evil ſpoken of] "Let not your liberty, which is a good you enjoy under the Goſpel, be evil ſpoken of." See 1 Cor. x. 29, 30.

Ver. 17. For the kingdom of God is not meat, &c.] "The kingdom of God neither prohibits nor enjoins ſuch things as theſe, nor is it taken up with ſuch little matters; but the great deſign of it is to regulate the temper of its profeſſors, and in the moſt effectual manner to cultivate and promote righteouſneſs, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghoſt; that is, a chearful temper, ſupported by a conſciouſneſs of ſtrict integrity, eſtabliſhed on principles of univerſal love, and inſpired by the bleſſed Spirit of God." See Scot's Chriſtian life, vol. i. p. 285.

Ver. 20. The work of God] That is, a Chriſtian. See 1 Cor. ix. 1. Epheſ. ii. 10. Philip. i. 6. Deſtroying him here, and in ver. 15. is cauſing him to apoſtatize, or renounce the Chriſtian faith. Dr. Waterland reads, for the ſake of meats, &c. and inſtead of pure,—clean. See Matth. viii. 25.

Ver. 21. Is offended, or made weak] That is, drawn to the doing of any thing, of whoſe lawfulneſs not being fully perſuaded, it becomes a ſin to him. Locke.

Ver. 22. Haſt thou faith] There is no neceſſity for reading the firſt clauſe interrogatively; and it ſeems more agreeable to the ſtructure of the Greek;—Thou haſt faith: as if he had ſaid, "I own you have a right perſuaſion." Further, there is an anadiploſis in ἔχεις and ἔχε, the firſt ſignifies ſimply have, the latter hold faſt. "You have a right perſuaſion concerning your Chriſtian liberty, and I adviſe you to hold your perſuaſion ſteadfaſtly, with reſpect to yourſelf, in the ſight of God." Ἔχω, have, has frequently this emphatical ſignification. See Matth. xxv. 29. Inſtead of to thyſelf, the Greek would be more properly rendered with reſpect to,—as pertaining to; that is, "ſo far as it concerns yourſelf, hold it in the ſight of God." It is an exhortation not to keep it private to himſelf, not to ſuppreſs his ſentiments, but to retain them ſteadily, and never do or ſay any thing inconſiſtent with them: as it follows, "Happy is the man who condemns not himſelf, by doing or profeſſing any thing inconſiſtent with what he is aſſured in his own conſcience is right." The Apoſtle puts this in, that the Chriſtian Gentile might not miſtake his meaning, or imagine that he was perſuading him to be indifferent to the truth, to diſſemble it, to give it up, or act contrary to it upon ſome occaſions: This was far from the Apoſtle's intention, who only exhorts him to think charitably of a weak brother, and to abſtain from any indifferent actions which might diſguſt him, or prove a ſnare or temptation to him. Without this caution his diſcourſe would have been imperfect, and not well guarded. See Taylor. Dr. Waterland reads interrogatively, Haſt thou good confidence [in what thou doſt]?—

Ver. 23. And he that doubteth, is damned, &c.] Is convicted [of ſin] if he eat, becauſe it is not according to his belief: for whatſoever [a man doth] not according to his perſuaſion, is ſin. Wat. The word rendered doubteth, is tranſlated ſtaggered, ch. iv. 20. and is there oppoſed to ſtrong in the faith, and being fully perſuaded, as it follows in the next verſe. In reading this verſe, the emphaſis ſhould be laid upon is, ver. 22. Happy is he that condemns not himſelf in that thing which he allows, ver. 23. But he that doubts, IS condemned, &c. "He that really in his conſcience makes a difference between one ſort of food and another, is condemned by God as a ſinner, if he eat out of unbridled appetite, vain complaiſance, or weak ſhame. It muſt in ſuch a caſe be criminal, becauſe he eateth not with faith; i. e. with a full ſatisfaction in his own mind that God allows and approves the action:" for it may be laid down as a general maxim in all theſe caſes, that whatſoever is not of faith is ſin; ſince the divine authority ought to be ſo ſacred with every man, as to engage him not only to avoid what is plainly and directly contrary to it, but what he apprehends or even ſuſpects to be ſo, though that apprehenſion or ſuſpicion ſhould chance to be founded on his own ignorance or miſtake. Some copies, though as it ſeems very improperly, ſubjoin the three laſt verſes of this Epiſtle to the preſent chapter. See Locke, Doddridge, Mill, Wetſtein, Calmet, and "The caſe of a doubting conſcience," p. 169.

Chap. XV. Ver. 1. We then that are ſtrong, &c.] According to our tranſlation, one would ſuppoſe that this verſe is an inference from the latter part of the foregoing chapter:—As if it were, We therefore who are ſtrong, &c. whereas it is in the Greek, But we who are ſtrong: And it ſtands in immediate connection with the laſt verſe of the former chapter, by way of oppoſition, thus: "The weak brother, who puts a difference between meats, is condemned if he eateth without obſerving a diſtinction. But we who are ſtrong,—meaning the Gentile Chriſtians,—are ſo far from being condemned if we bear the infirmities of the weak, that we are bound in duty to do it." Therefore theſe two verſes cannot be ſeparated without deſtroying the ſenſe. To pleaſe ourſelves, ſignifies, to follow our own humours. See Locke, Heylin, and the laſt note.

Ver. 3. As it is written] In Pſ. lxix. 9. That this pſalm was undoubtedly ſpoken of the Meſſiah, we learn from ver. 22. applied to Chriſt John xix. 28, 29. and from the former part of the verſe here cited; namely, The zeal of thine houſe hath conſumed me, applied to Chriſt John ii. 17. And the Jews themſelves confeſs that the things contained in this pſalm ſhall be accompliſhed in the days of 4 For whatſoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the ſcriptures might have hope.

5 Now the God of patience and conſolation grant you to be like-minded one towards another, according to Chriſt Jeſus:

6 That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

7 Wherefore receive ye one another, as Chriſt alſo received us, to the glory of God.

8 Now I ſay that Jeſus Chriſt was a miniſter of the circumciſion for the truth of God, to confirm the promiſes made unto the fathers:

9 And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy; as it is written, For this cauſe I will confeſs to thee among the Gentiles, and ſing unto thy name.

10 And again he ſaith, Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people.

11 And again, Praiſe the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him all ye people.

12 And again Eſaias ſaith, there ſhall be a root of Jeſſe, and he that ſhall riſe to reign over the Gentiles; in him ſhall the Gentiles truſt.

13 Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghoſt.

14 And I myſelf alſo am perſuaded of you, my brethren, that ye alſo are full of goodneſs, filled with all knowledge, able alſo to admoniſh one another.

15 Nevertheleſs, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you, in ſome ſort, as putting you in mind, becauſe of the grace that is given to me of God, the Meſſiah. The paſſage may be paraphraſed reſpecting our Saviour, "I have placed myſelf in a world, where I have been afflicted with the wickedneſs of mankind; which I have continually ſeen and heard about me, and which has been through the whole courſe of my life, my continual grief and burden. See Whitby, and on Pſ. lxix. 9.

Ver. 5. Grant you to be like minded] The original properly ſignifies, "To agree in an harmonious and affectionate manner;" and might be read, Grant you, or give you the ſame mutual affection, according to the example of Jeſus Chriſt. See Raphelius, and Gal. iv. 28. 1 Pet. i. 15. Epheſ. iv. 24.

Ver. 6. That ye may with one mind, &c.] It does not appear how this can be otherwiſe underſtood, than of public worſhip; and it ſhows that glorifying, or praiſing God for his grace in Chriſt Jeſus, is a principal part of Chriſtian worſhip, in which all ſhould join, with one mind and one mouth. Taylor.

Ver. 7. Wherefore receive ye one another] This cannot mean, "Receive one another into church communion;" for there is no appearance that the convert Jews and Gentiles ſeparated communion in Rome, on account of differences about meats, and drinks, and days. We ſhould have heard more of it from St. Paul, if there had been two ſeparate congregations; that is, two churches of Chriſtians in Rome, divided about theſe indifferent things. Beſides, directions cannot be given to private Chriſtians to receive one another in that ſenſe; therefore the receiving here, muſt be underſtood of receiving, as a man doth another into his company, converſe, and familiarity. He would have them, Jews and Gentiles, lay aſide all diſtinction, coldneſs, and reſerve, in their converſation one with another; and as domeſticks of the ſame family, live friendly and familiar, notwithſtanding their different judgements about thoſe ritual obſervances. Hence, ver. 5. he exhorts them, "Be united in friendſhip one to another; that with one heart and one voice, ye may conjointly glorify God; and receive one another with the ſame good-will that Chriſt hath received us, the Jews,—εἰς δόξαν τοῦ Θεοῦ, to the glorifying God for his truth, in fulfilling the promiſes he made to the patriarchs;—and hath received the Gentiles, to glorify God for his mercy to them: So that we have reaſon, both Jews and Gentiles, laying aſide theſe little differences about things indifferent, to join together heartily in glorifying God." The phraſe, glory of God, for glorifying God, is of the ſame kind with that uſed ch. iii. 22, and 26. where he uſes the faith of Jeſus, for believing in Jeſus. The thing to which St. Paul here exhorts them, is, to the glorifying of God with one accord; as is evident from the words immediately preceding; and what follows, ver. 9, 10, 11. is to the ſame purpoſe: ſo that there is no room to doubt that his meaning in theſe words is, "Chriſt received or took us, believing Jews, to himſelf, that we might magnify the truth of God; and took the Gentiles that believe, to himſelf, that they might magnify his mercy." See Locke, and Taylor.

Ver. 8. Now I ſay that Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] The connection of this and the next verſe ſtands properly, by only repeating the words, I ſay, at the beginning of the 9th. Now I ſay that Jeſus Chriſt was a miniſter of the circumciſion, on account of the truth of God, to confirm, or make good the promiſes given to the fathers: ver. 9. And I ſay that the Gentiles, on account of mercy, ſhould glorify God; meaning, with the approbation and concurrence of the Jews. The Gentile muſt allow the Jew a primary and eminent right to all the glory and privileges of the Goſpel; becauſe the truth of God was engaged, by the promiſes to Abraham, &c. to ſend the Meſſiah to the Jewiſh nation, to make his appearance, and to exerciſe his miniſtry among them for their ſalvation: Therefore the believing Gentile had undeniable reaſon to own and receive the believing Jew, and to join with him in the divine praiſe; ver. 5, 6. And as God had extended his mercy in Chriſt Jeſus to the believing Gentiles, how could the Jews refuſe the Gentiles a ſhare in ſolemn thankſgivings to God for ſo great a favour? Could the Jews ſtint or deny the mercy of God to the Gentile world? And if he allowed God's mercy to them in the Redeemer, muſt he not allow them to bear a part in ſolemn acknowledgements of his goodneſs; eſpecially conſidering that the Scriptures do expreſly foretel, that the Gentiles ſhould have their ſhare in this joyful work?—Accordingly, as it would be more difficult to perſuade the Jew, he lays before him ſeveral quotations from Scripture to that purpoſe. What it was that Chriſt miniſtered to the Jews, we may ſee by the like expreſſion of St. Paul applied to himſelf, ver. 16. where he calls himſelf a miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt to the Gentiles, miniſtering the Goſpel of God. See Matth. xv. 24. What is ſaid, ver. 9, 10, 11. confirms what we have obſerved upon ver. 6. namely, that praiſe and thankſgiving to God for his mercy in Jeſus Chriſt, is a principal part of Chriſtian worſhip. See Heb. xiii. 15. Locke, and Taylor.

Ver. 10. And again he ſaith, Rejoice, &c.] It would have been better to have rendered theſe words imperſonally; Again it is ſaid: For according to our verſion, it ſeems as if the words quoted in this verſe were written by the ſame perſon as thoſe in the preceding verſe; whereas the former are from the book of Pſalms, the latter from Deuteronomy. But if we omit the word rendered he ſaith, as it is omitted in the following verſes, there will be no neceſſity for any other alteration; and this omiſſion may be juſtified from obſerving, that though moſt copies do omit it in the following verſe, yet ſome retain it even there, where it might have been interpolated, as well as here. See Taylor, Diodati, and Peirce.

Ver. 12. In him ſhall the Gentiles truſt]—Hope; MS. Rather hope, ſays Mr. Locke; not that there is any material difference in the ſignification of truſt and hope, but the better to expreſs and anſwer St. Paul's way of writing; with whom it is familiar, when he hath been ſpeaking of any virtue or grace, whereof God is the Author, to call God thereupon the God of that virtue or grace. So ver. 13. he calls God the God of hope. See alſo ver. 4 and 5.

Ver. 14. And I myſelf alſo am perſuaded, &c.] In this part of the chapter the Apoſtle, with much complaiſance, apologizes for writing the letter, and for the freedom he had uſed, particularly with the Gentile part of the Chriſtians; which freedom he hoped they would place to the account of the Gentiles, ver. 14—17. He gives a general idea of the ſucceſs and courſe of his miniſtry, ver. 18—21. ſignifies his great deſire to make them a viſit at Rome, ver. 22—24. acquaints them with the journey he was going to take from Corinth to Jeruſalem, to carry a charitable collection made among the Gentile converts for the relief of the poor Chriſtians there; and deſires their prayers, that he might be delivered from the malice of the infidel Jews; and that his charitable deſign might be kindly accepted, and have its intended effect among the Chriſtian Jews, ver. 24—33. See Taylor.

Ver. 15. In ſome ſort] Ἀπὸ μέρους. Μέρος is a part of any thing, or company of men; and ἀπὸ μέρους may ſignify part of, or a party among the people to whom the Apoſtle writes, or of whom he ſpeaks; ch. xi. 25. 2 Cor. i. 14. ii. 5. That it has this ſenſe here, and ſignifies the Gentile part of the church at Rome, is the more probable, becauſe the Apoſtle aſſigns his commiſſion as the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, for the reaſon of his boldneſs in writing. I have written more boldly

16 That I ſhould be the miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt to the Gentiles, miniſtering the goſpel of God, that the offering-up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being ſanctified by the Holy Ghoſt.

17 I have therefore whereof I may glory, through Jeſus Chriſt, in thoſe things which pertain to God.

18 For I will not dare to ſpeak of any of thoſe things, which Chriſt hath not wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed,

19 Through mighty ſigns and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; ſo that from Jeruſalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the goſpel of Chriſt.

20 Yea, ſo have I ſtrived to preach the goſpel, not where Chriſt was named, leſt I ſhould build upon another man's foundation:

21 But, as it is written, To whom he was not ſpoken of, they ſhall ſee: and they that have not heard ſhall underſtand.

22 For which cauſe alſo I have been much hindered from coming to you;

23 But now, having no more place in theſe parts, and having a great deſire theſe many years to come unto you;

24 Whenſoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you: for I truſt to ſee you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if firſt I be ſomewhat filled with your company.

Ver. 16. Ch. xi. 13. Gal. ii. 7, 8, 9. 1 Tim. ii. 7. 2 Tim. i. 11. Phil. ii. 17. Or, ſacrificing. Iſai. lxvi. 20. Phil. ii. 17.—V. 17. Hebr. v. 1.—V. 18. boldly unto you, becauſe, or on account of the grace that is given to me of God, that I ſhould be the miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt to the Gentiles. Now this would be an apology only to the Gentile part of the ſociety; and therefore, to preſerve the propriety of the Apoſtle's reaſoning, we ought in this view to render ἀπὸ μέρους, with reſpect to part of you. See Taylor, and on ch. i. 5. Dr. Waterland reads,—The more freely unto you, in ſome ſort, as it were to put you in remembrance, becauſe of the office which, &c.

Ver. 16. That the offering-up of the Gentiles, &c.] This ſentiment ſeems to be taken from Iſai. lxvi. 20. The meaning is, "That the offering the Gentiles to God, as a holy ſacrifice, by my hands, may be acceptable to him; being ſanctified and ſet apart by the Holy Spirit, ſo plentifully communicated to them, in a rich variety of gifts and graces."

Ver. 17. Things which pertain to God] We have the ſame phraſe Heb. v. 1. where it ſignifies the things that were offered to God in the temple miniſtration. St. Paul, by way of alluſion, ſpeaks of the Gentiles in the foregoing verſe, as an offering to be made to God; and of himſelf, as the prieſt by whom the ſacrifice or offering was to be prepared or offered; and then here he tells them, that he had matter of glorying in this offering; that is, that he had had ſucceſs in converting the Gentiles, and bringing them to be a living, holy, and acceptable ſacrifice to God; an account whereof he gives them in the four following verſes. See Heb. ii. 17. Locke, and Raphelius.

Ver. 19. Unto Illyricum] Though it is evident from hence, that St. Paul, before the date of this Epiſtle, which was about the year 58, had preached the Goſpel in theſe regions, it is obſervable that St. Luke takes no notice hereof in the hiſtory of the Acts; where he alſo omits to mention the journey the Apoſtle took to Arabia on his firſt converſion, and ſeveral other remarkable facts referred to in the 11th chapter of the ſecond Epiſtle to the Corinthians, and elſewhere. And it is very poſſible, that the viſit to Crete, when Titus was left behind to ordain elders, (Tit. i. 5.) might be of this number. See Doddridge, Wall, and Calmet.

Ver. 20. So have I ſtrived to preach the Goſpel] So have I been ambitious, &c. Wat. The Apoſtle could not mean that he ſcorned to come after any other Chriſtian miniſter, eſpecially after what we read of his going to preach the Goſpel at Damaſcus, Antioch, and Jeruſalem. It may ſignify, that far from declining dangers and oppoſitions, which might be expected from firſt planting the Goſpel in any country, he rather felt a ſublime ambition, as the Greek word ſignifies, in making the firſt proclamation of the Goſpel in places where it had before been quite unheard of. And probably he might glance at thoſe falſe apoſtles who crept into the churches which he had planted, and endeavoured to eſtabliſh their own reputation and influence by alienating the affections of his own converts, while they built on his grand and noble foundation an edifice of wood, hay, and ſtubble. This is likewiſe a proof in favour of the Apoſtle's own ſincerity, and of the miraculouſneſs of his converſion. If his converſion, and the part he acted in conſequence of it, was an impoſture, it was ſuch an impoſture as could not be carried on by one man alone. The faith he profeſſed, and of which he became an Apoſtle, was not his own invention. With Jeſus, who was the author of it, he had never any communication, nor with his Apoſtles, except as their perſecutors. As he took on himſelf the office of an Apoſtle, it was abſolutely neceſſary for him to have a preciſe and perfect knowledge of all the facts contained in the Goſpels, ſeveral of which had only paſſed between Jeſus himſelf, and his twelve Apoſtles, and others more privately ſtill, ſo that they could be known to very few: And as the teſtimony they bore would have been different in point of fact, and many of their doctrines repugnant to his, either they muſt have been forced to ruin his credit, or he would have ruined theirs. It was therefore impoſſible for him to act this part, but in confederacy at leaſt with the Apoſtles. Such a confederacy was ſtill the more neceſſary for him, as the undertaking to preach the Goſpel did not only require an exact and particular knowledge of all it contained, but an apparent power of working miracles; for to ſuch a power all the Apoſtles appealed in proof of their miſſion, and of the doctrines they preached. He was therefore to learn of them by what ſecret arts they impoſed on the ſenſes of men, if this power was a cheat. But how could he gain theſe men to become his confederates? Was it by furiouſly perſecuting them and their brethren, as we find that he did to the moment of his converſion? Would they venture to truſt their capital enemy with all the ſecrets of their impoſture? Would they put it in his power to take away not only their lives, but the honour of their ſect which they preferred to their lives, by ſo ill-timed a confidence? Would men, ſo ſecret as not to be drawn by the moſt ſevere perſecutions to ſay one word which could tend to prove them impoſtors, confeſs themſelves ſuch to their proſecutor, in hopes of his being their accomplice? This is ſtill more impoſſible, than that he ſhould attempt to engage in the fraud without their conſent and aſſiſtance. Had he not availed himſelf of a confederacy with the Apoſtles to get at their ſecret doctrines, he might have gained a knowledge of them by pretending to preach among ſuch perſons as they had already converted: But by going to places where the Goſpel was entirely unknown, he loſt every opportunity of this kind; and though he loſt all theſe opportunities, we find no one of the Apoſtles objecting to the doctrine which he planted, as inconſiſtent with what they had received from Chriſt, and the inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt. His very ſucceſs among ſuch people was another proof of the reality of his converſion, and his divine miſſion. For among the Gentiles, who had not heard of the Goſpel, he could find no diſpoſition, no aptneſs, no bias to aid his impoſture. It is evident, that there was not any confederacy between him and them, ſtrong enough to impoſe either his doctrines or his miracles upon them, if they had been falſe. He was in no combination with their prieſts or their magiſtrates; no ſect or party among them gave him any help; all eyes were open and watchful to detect his impoſtures; all hands ready to puniſh him, as ſoon as he was detected. Had he remained in Judea, he would at leaſt have had many confederates, all the Apoſtles, all the diſciples of Chriſt, at that time pretty numerous; but in preaching to the Gentiles he was often alone, never with more than two or three companions. Was this a confederacy powerful enough to carry on ſuch a cheat in ſo many different parts of the word, againſt the united oppoſition of the magiſtrates, prieſts, philoſophers, people, all combined to detect and expoſe their frauds? Let it be alſo conſidered, that thoſe to whom the Apoſtle addreſſed himſelf, were not a groſs or ignorant people, apt to miſtake any uncommon operations of nature, or juggling tricks, for miraculous acts. The churches planted by St. Paul, were in the moſt enlightened parts of the world, among the Greeks of Aſia and Europe, among the Romans, in the midſt of ſcience, philoſophy, freedom of thought, and in an age more inquiſitively curious into the powers of nature, and leſs inclined to credit religious frauds, than any before it. Nor were they only the loweſt of the people whom he converted. Sergius Paulus the proconſul of Paphos, Eraſtus chamberlain of Corinth, and Dionyſius the Areopagite, were his proſelytes. Upon the whole it appears beyond contradiction, that his pretenſion to miracles was not aſſiſted by the diſpoſition of thoſe whom he deſigned to convert, nor by any power and confederacy to carry on and abet the cheat: What leſs then than a divine concurrence could have rendered him ſucceſsful in converting nations, which had not heard of the Goſpel till he preached it to them? See Doddridge, and Lytelton's Obſervations on the Converſion of St. Paul.

Ver. 24. Into Spain] It appears probable from hence, conſidering the principle by which St. Paul choſe to govern himſelf, of not 25 But now I go unto Jeruſalem, to miniſter unto the ſaints.

26 For it hath pleaſed them of Macedonia and Achaia, to make a certain contribution for the poor ſaints which are at Jeruſalem.

27 It hath pleaſed them verily; and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their ſpiritual things, their duty is alſo to miniſter unto them in carnal things.

28 When therefore I have performed this, and have ſealed to them this fruit, I will come by you into Spain.

29 And I am ſure that when I come unto you, I ſhall come in the fulneſs of the bleſſing of the goſpel of Chriſt.

30 Now I beſeech you, brethren, for the Lord Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye ſtrive together with me, in your prayers to God for me;

31 That I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judea; and that my ſervice which I have for Jeruſalem, may be accepted of the ſaints;

32 That I may come unto you with joy by the will of God, and may with you be refreſhed.

33 Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen.

building on another man's foundation, that no Apoſtle had as yet planted any church in Spain; which very ill agrees with the "Legend of St. James;" for according to that, he had now been fifteen years in Spain, and had erected ſeveral biſhopricks there. See Geddes's Miſcell. vol. ii. p. 221.

Ver. 25. But now I go unto Jeruſalem] He means, (as appears from ver. 26, 27.) to carry the money which he had collected among the Gentile Chriſtians in Macedonia and Achaia, for the relief of the poor Chriſtians at Jeruſalem. This was an affair which lay near his heart, and about which he had taken much pains. See 1 Cor. xvi. 1—4. 2 Cor. viii. and ix. His deſign in the buſineſs is pretty evident from 2 Cor. ix. 12, 13. where he ſaith, The adminiſtration of this ſervice, not only ſupplieth the wants of the ſaints, but is abundant alſo by many thankſgivings unto God. While, by the experience of this miniſtration, they [the Jews] glorify God for your profeſſed ſubjection unto the Goſpel of Chriſt, and for your liberal diſtribution unto them, and unto all men. The Jews were generally treated as objects of contempt and inſult, throughout the Roman empire. The Apoſtle was in hopes this liberal contribution, ſent by the Gentile Chriſtians converted by St. Paul's miniſtry, would engage the affections of the Jewiſh Chriſtians at Jeruſalem, on their part much prejudiced againſt the reception of the Gentiles into the church and covenant of God, without ſubmitting to their law. Moſt gladly would he have eſtabliſhed a ſolid coalition between the Jewiſh and Gentile converts; being ſenſible it was of great importance to the ſpreading of the Goſpel. And this was one laudable device to accompliſh the good end; namely, to procure a handſome preſent from the Gentiles to the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem; which was a probable expedient to conciliate their affection and eſteem, by affording them a pleaſing taſte of the good fruits of St. Paul's miniſtry, and giving them reaſon to believe, that their nation would be regarded and honoured, in proportion as the Goſpel ſpread in the world. I make no doubt, this is an inſtance of St. Paul's zeal and prudent endeavours to eſtabliſh a good harmony between Chriſtian Jews and Gentiles; and this ſhews, why he ſo earneſtly requeſts the prayers of the Chriſtians at Rome, that his ſervice, which he had for Jeruſalem, might be accepted of the ſaints, ver. 32, 31. It is no objection to this, that St. James, Peter, and John, had deſired St. Paul to remember the poor, or to make a collection among the Gentile converts, for the poor brethren at Jeruſalem, Gal. ii. 10. for he there tells us, that it was what he had intended to do, before they propoſed it: and probably he firſt mentioned it to the Apoſtles of the circumciſion. See Taylor.

Ver. 28. When I have performed this, &c.] Diſpatched this affair, and have ſecured to them this collection. Wat. and Doddridge.

Ver. 29. I ſhall come in the fulneſs of the bleſſing] He may be underſtood to mean here, that he ſhould be able to ſatisfy them, that the forgiveneſs of ſins was to be obtained by the Goſpel; for that he ſhews, ch. iv. 6—9. And they had as much title to it by the Goſpel, as the Jews themſelves; which was the thing he had been proving to them in this Epiſtle. See Locke; whoſe paraphraſe is, "I ſhall bring to you full ſatisfaction, concerning the bleſſedneſs which you receive by the Goſpel of Chriſt."

Ver. 30. And for the love of the Spirit] "By that love, which is the genuine fruit of the Spirit." Some would explain this of the love which the Spirit of God bears to us, or the affection which we owe to that gracious agent. The words rendered, ſtrive together with me, ſignify, "That you join your utmoſt ſtrength and fervency with mine; as thoſe do who fight and ſtruggle together in the publick games, or in the field of battle." See Elſner's Obſervat. vol. ii. page 65.

Ver. 31. That I may be delivered, &c.] How extreme their bigotry and rage was, appears from their behaviour to him, at the very time here referred to, Acts xxi,—xxiv. It was from a ſenſe of the great importance of his life to the cauſe of Chriſtianity, that he is thus urgent; elſe we may be aſſured, that he would gladly have given it up. See Phil. i. 21.

Chap. XVI. Ver. 1.] This chapter conſiſts chiefly of ſalutations. Throughout the whole Epiſtle the Apoſtle has demonſtrated his affectionate regards to the whole ſociety of Chriſtians at Rome. But it was ſtill more engaging to take a friendly notice of the principal perſons by name, adding to ſeveral of them the honourable character they deſerved, or ſome ſpecial mark of his eſteem. In the midſt of theſe expreſſions of his love, the great deſign of writing the Epiſtle, and eſtabliſhing their happineſs, recurs to his thoughts. The Jewiſh converts were exceeding zealous to reduce all profeſſors of Chriſtianity to a ſubmiſſion to the law of Moſes; and on this account not only propagated bad principles of religion, but almoſt every where broke in upon the peace and unity of the Gentile churches. This was the caſe of the churches in Galatia; but was not yet the unhappy caſe of the church at Rome. But the Apoſtle fearing it might, after all he has done in this Epiſtle to ſettle them upon the principles of pure Goſpel, throws in here a very pathetical caution againſt ſuch authors and fomenters of diviſions, ver. 17—20. He concludes, after repeated benedictions, (like one who with his whole ſoul wiſhed their higheſt felicity,) with a doxology to the only-wiſe God. See Taylor.

I commend Phebe—who is a ſervant, &c.] It might be tranſlated, who is a deaconeſs of the church at Cenchrea, a port belonging to the city of Corinth, from whence St. Paul wrote this letter. It is agreed the deacons were officers employed in diſtributing the church's ſtock among the neceſſitous. They were to be perſons of an eminent character, 1 Tim. iii. 8—11. and therefore their ſervice in the church might not conſiſt only in relieving the poor, but in viſiting the ſick, in exhorting, comforting, and teaching, as occaſion required. Corinth was a city of Greece, and according to the cuſtoms of that country, men could not well be allowed to perform thoſe good offices to the women: for men to have viſited and converſed with women, would have been counted a very great indecency, and muſt have brought a ſcandal upon the Chriſtian profeſſion; as in Greece the women were treated in a manner very different from the uſages of the weſtern parts of Europe. This appears from Cornelius Nepos, who obſerves in his preface, "A great many things in our cuſtoms are decent, which are reckoned ſcandalous among them: For which of the Romans thinks it a ſhame to take his ſpouſe to a feaſt? Or whoſe wife keeps not in the firſt room of the houſe, and converſes with company? Which is quite otherwiſe in Greece, where ſhe is never admitted to a feaſt, unleſs of relations, and always keeps in a retired part of the houſe, which is called the woman's apartment, whither no body comes, unleſs allied to her by near relation." This being the caſe, it is not improbable ſome women of cometh ſaints, and that ye aſſiſt her in whatſoever buſineſs ſhe hath need of you: for ſhe hath been a ſuccourer of many, and of myſelf alſo.

3 Greet Priſcilla and Aquila, my helpers in Jeſus Chriſt:

4 Who have for my life laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks, but alſo all the churches of the Gentiles.

5 Likewiſe greet the church that is in their houſe. Salute my well-beloved Epenetus, who is the firſt-fruits of Achaia unto Chriſt.

6 Greet Mary, who beſtowed much labour on us.

7 Salute Andronicus and Junia my kinſmen and my fellow-priſoners, who are of note among the Apoſtles, who alſo were in Chriſt before me.

8 Greet Amplias, my beloved in the Lord.

9 Salute Urbane, our helper in Chriſt, and Stachys my beloved.

10 Salute Apelles, approved in Chriſt. Salute them which are of Ariſtobulus' houſhold.

11 Salute Herodion my kinſman. Greet them that be of the houſhold of Narciſſus, which are in the Lord.

12 Salute Tryphena and Tryphoſa, who labour in the Lord. Salute the beloved Perſis, which laboured much in the Lord.

probity and good underſtanding might be choſen to attend as deaconeſſes upon their own ſex. And this cuſtom of keeping the women in a ſtate of ſeparation might occaſion, in Greece, other allowable peculiarities in religious affairs. It is certain they ſometimes exerciſed their devotions apart from their huſbands; (1 Cor. vii. 5.) and that they had ſeparate aſſemblies for religious worſhip will appear probable, if we conſider that the Apoſtle, when he is giving rules about propheſying, abſolutely enjoins ſilence to the women in the church, or public aſſembly; 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35. They were not allowed to ſpeak or propheſy there, by the commandment of the Lord, ver. 37. or ſo much as to aſk any queſtion in the public aſſembly about what was taught, but directed to conſult their huſbands at home: much leſs were they allowed to teach or uſurp authority over the men, but are expreſly ordered to learn in ſilence, with all ſubjection, 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12. And yet the Apoſtle ſuppoſes, 1 Cor. xi. 3—16, without any mark of diſapprobation, that the woman might pray and propheſy, that is, ſpeak unto others to edification, exhortation, and comfort; for that is propheſying, as the Apoſtle informs us, 1 Cor. xiv. 3. therefore propheſying is an addreſs to others, or to a company of perſons. Here then the Apoſtle gives directions about the woman's praying and propheſying in an aſſembly, or where others were preſent; and yet, in the above-quoted places, he expreſly enjoins ſilence, and forbids her ſpeaking, and conſequently propheſying in the churches.—How ſhall we bring theſe things to a conſiſtency?—Thus:—The prohibitions and injunctions, 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35. 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12. expreſly relate to thoſe aſſemblies, in which the whole church, men and women, met for the worſhip of God. In ſuch aſſemblies the women were to be in ſilence; conſequently (unleſs the Apoſtle contradict himſelf in the ſame Epiſtle, and in a matter upon which he diſcourſes largely and expreſly) thoſe aſſemblies in which women are ſuppoſed and allowed to pray and prophecy, were ſeparate meetings, which conſiſted of none but women. Of the decent appearance of women at ſuch meetings, he diſcourſes, 1 Cor. xi. 3—16. where we may obſerve there is not one word of the church,—of praying or propheſying in the church;—for he did not conſider thoſe aſſemblies of women as proper churches. Then at ver. 17. he begins to correct diſorders in their proper aſſemblies, when they came together in the church, men and women; (ver. 28.) and diſcourſeth upon this ſubject to the end of ch. xiv. In favour of this opinion, Grotius, on the verſe before us, remarks, "that in Greece there were Πρεσβυτιδες, female preſbyters, as well as deacons, for the inſtruction of their own ſex; which female preſbyters were ordained by the laying on of hands, till the council of Laodicea;" and for this he appeals to the eleventh canon of that council. This order of prieſteſſes muſt grow out of the cuſtom of women's holding ſeparate aſſemblies for their mutual inſtruction and edification. In thoſe aſſemblies they ſuppoſed they might lay aſide the veil, the token of inferiority and ſubjection, and perform their religious exerciſes uncovered, as if they were upon a par with the men. This the Apoſtle oppoſeth, and gives his reaſons 1 Cor. xi. 3—9. "But—the women might object,—we have no men among us, why ſhould we wear the badge of ſubjection, when we are among ourſelves, and therefore are to be conſidered only in relation to ourſelves?" The Apoſtle anſwers, ver. 10. You ought to have power, (that is, a veil, the ſign of the man's power or authority) upon your head, becauſe or on account of the MESSENGERS; for ſo the word Αγγελους, which we tranſlate Angels, moſt naturally and properly ſignifies; and ſo it is rendered Matth. xi. 10. Luke vii. 24, 27. ix. 52. James ii. 25. This furniſhes a hint of what the reaſon of the caſe plainly ſuggeſts, that the men, upon ſundry occaſions, eſpecially to inſpect their conduct, ſent meſſengers to thoſe female aſſemblies. If we duly reflect upon the general cuſtom of confining and reſtraining the women, even at home, in their own houſes, we need not doubt but thoſe meetings were under particular regulations; and that care would be taken to ſend proper perſons to ſee how they behaved in them; not to mention that a woman might be wanted at home, and a meſſenger might be ſent to require her attendance. However, it is eaſy to perſuade ourſelves, that acceſs to meſſengers was one of the conditions upon which the ladies held theſe religious aſſemblies; and theſe meſſengers coming in the name of their huſbands, brought, in a ſenſe, their authority along with them; on which account the women ought to obſerve a juſt decorum, as if their huſbands were preſent, ſeeing they were in effect ſtill under their eye:—The woman ought to have power upon her head, on account of the meſſengers. Mr. Locke, in his note on 1 Cor. xi. 3. ſuppoſes women were allowed to propheſy in public aſſemblies, where men were preſent; not indeed as ordinary doctors and teachers, but when their "propheſying was a ſpiritual gift, performed by the immediate and extraordinary motion and impulſe of the Holy Ghoſt." But this great commentator did not obſerve, that women are expreſly and abſolutely enjoined ſilence in the churches, by the commandment of the Lord, among the rules relative to ſpeaking in this very kind of propheſying, by revelation. See 1 Cor. xiv. 29—37. From whence, particularly from ver. 32, 33. we may conclude, that a revelation given by the Spirit of God was not attended with any ſuch extraordinary motion or impulſe, as conſtrained the perſon to ſpeak to whom it was given. With regard to the time of ſpeaking, he might uſe his diſcretion;—when he thought proper, he might begin to ſpeak, and when he pleaſed, he might hold his ſpeech, as decency and good order ſhould require. Therefore, though the Spirit of prophecy might be poured out upon a Chriſtian woman in the church; or though ſome truth might be revealed to her, yet ſhe might keep it to herſelf, and was obliged to keep it to herſelf, among the Chriſtian men, and to confer only with her huſband about it, who, it ſeems likely, might communicate it to the church, if he thought fit. See Taylor.

Ver. 3. Greet Priſcilla and Aquila] This excellent couple appear by this paſſage to have returned to Rome on the ceaſing of that edict againſt the Jews, which had driven them from thence in the reign of Claudius; Acts xviii. 2. Priſcilla ſeems to have been a woman of great note, and probably of diſtinguiſhed genius and influence; which appears not only from the manner in which ſhe is here named, but alſo from the edification which the eloquent Apollos received from her inſtructions, in concurrence with thoſe of her huſband. See Doddridge, Calmet, and Wolf.

Ver. 5. Who is the firſt fruits of Achaia] Of Aſia. Wat. and MS. It is probable that Epenetus might be converted at the ſame time with Stephanus, called alſo the firſt fruits of Achaia; 1 Cor. xvi. 15. for there is no manner of neceſſity to underſtand by that expreſſion the very firſt Chriſtian convert. Epenetus poſſibly might be one of that happy family to which this appellation is given.

Ver. 7. Andronicus and Junia]—And Junias. Wat. and MS. This liſt of names cannot be any objection to the authority of this Epiſtle: for it might be an encouragement to the perſons thus particularly mentioned; might conciliate ſome additional reſpect to them, whereby their uſefulneſs might be promoted; and would render each of them a kind of witneſs to the genuineneſs of the Epiſtle, as we may naturally ſuppoſe it was ſhewn to each of them. See Jenkins of Chriſtianity, vol. ii. p. 37. Diodati thinks, that by apoſtles here are meant the Evangeliſts; and that the meaning is, that theſe perſons were noted meſſengers of the churches; but it is more probable that they were ſome early converts who had been known and much eſteemed by the Apoſtles before the diſperſion occaſioned by the death of Stephen: and if ſo, St. Paul perhaps might once have been active in perſecuting them, and have learned their names at firſt, with an hoſtile intent of hunting them down to deſtruction. See Craddock's Apoſtol. Hiſt. Diodati, and Doddridge.

Ver. 10. Them—of Ariſtobulus's houſhold] There is no certain evidence that either Ariſtobulus, or Narciſſus, ver. 11. were Chriſtians. It ſeems moſt probable they were perſons of high rank, who had each a large family of ſlaves or domeſticks; ſome of whom being Chriſtian converts, the Apoſtle would not forget them, low as their rank was in life, when he was ſaluting his brethren in ſo particular a manner. We may obſerve what a regard the Apoſtle had for foreign churches, when he informed himſelf of the names, circumſtances, and abode of ſo many of them in Rome. See Doddridge, and L'Enfant's preface, p. 6, 7.

13 Salute Rufus, choſen in the Lord, and his mother and mine.

14 Salute Aſyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, and the brethren which are with them.

15 Salute Philologus, and Julia, Nereus, and his ſiſter, and Olympas, and all the ſaints which are with them.

16 Salute one another with an holy kiſs. The churches of Chriſt ſalute you.

17 Now I beſeech, you, brethren, mark them which cauſe diviſions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned; and avoid them.

18 For they that are ſuch ſerve not our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but their own belly; and by good words and fair ſpeeches deceive the hearts of the ſimple.

19 For your obedience is come abroad unto all men. I am glad therefore on your behalf: but yet I would have you wiſe unto that which is good, and ſimple concerning evil.

20 And the God of peace ſhall bruiſe Satan under your feet ſhortly. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you. Amen.

21 Timotheus my work-fellow, and Lucius, and Jaſon, and Soſipater my kinſmen, ſalute you.

22 I Tertius, who wrote this epiſtle, ſalute you in the Lord.

23 Gaius mine hoſt, and of the whole church, ſaluteth you. Eraſtus the chamberlain of the city ſaluteth you, and Quartus a brother.

24 The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you all. Amen.

Ver. 13. And his mother and mine] Hence ſome have thought, that Rufus was at leaſt half-brother to St. Paul; but perhaps he might in this expreſſion refer to the maternal care which this good woman had taken of him.

Ver. 15. And all the ſaints, &c.] Calvin and many others obſerve, that had St. Peter been now at Rome, he would undoubtedly have been named, ſince no one in this numerous catalogue was of a dignity and eminence by any means comparable to him;—and yet if he were not there at this time, the whole tradition of the Romiſh biſhops, as that church delivers it, fails in the moſt fundamental article of all.

Ver. 16. With an holy kiſs] The cuſtom of thus ſaluting each other was borrowed from the Jewiſh ſynagogue; and as chaſtely and prudently as it was managed, it ſeems to have been the occaſion of thoſe falſe and ſcandalous reports, which were ſo induſtriouſly propagated among the heathen, concerning the adulterous and inceſtuous practices in Chriſtian aſſemblies. On which account it ſeems to have been laid aſide very early. See Doddridge, and Vitringa De Synag.

Ver. 18. And fair ſpeeches] Ἐυλογίας, flattering forms of addreſs. We learn from hence what were the weapons which theſe falſe apoſtles oppoſed to the miracles of the true. See Tit. i. 10, 11.

Ver. 10. Shall bruiſe Satan, &c.] Satan is here put for his inſtruments;—the troublers of the church's peace. See 2 Cor. xi. 15. "God ſhall break the force and attempts of Satan upon your peace, by thoſe his inſtruments, who would engage you in quarrels and diſcords." See Locke and Taylor.

Ver. 22. I Tertius, who wrote this Epiſtle] "St. Paul ſeems not himſelf to have been very well verſed in the Greek characters. See Gal. vi. 11. and comp. 1 Cor. xvi. 21. He therefore made uſe of the hand of Silas, or as the Latins expreſs his name Tertius, who wrote what the Apoſtles dictated. Doddridge." It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that there does not ſeem any neceſſity to ſuppoſe, with the learned commentator above, that the Apoſtle employed Tertius as his amanuenſis, becauſe he was not himſelf well verſed in the Greek characters. It was the general cuſtom of thoſe times to dictate to an amanuenſis;—eſpecially with men of learning and buſineſs. An anonymous critic would read this verſe, I Tertius, who wrote this Epiſtle for the glory of the Lord, ſalute you.

Ver. 25. Now to him that is of power, &c.] This doxology is found in many copies at the end of the fourteenth chapter, as we have there obſerved. See alſo on ch. xv. 1. And in the Alexandrian MS. it is inſerted both there and here. Jerome ſays, that Marcion rejected the two laſt chapters, as contrary to his opinion; and Sir Norton Knatchbul conjectures, that, in order to prevent any ſuſpicion, as if the Epiſtle ended with the fourteenth chapter, ſome orthodox Chriſtians transferred this paſſage from thence, which he ſuppoſes to have been its true place. Dr. Mill is of the ſame opinion, and apprehends the two laſt chapters to have been added by way of poſtſcript, as the Apoſtle had time, before he ſent it away. All the other Epiſtles of St. Paul end with the benediction. When St. Paul ſays my Goſpel, he cannot be ſuppoſed, ſays Mr. Locke, to have uſed ſuch an expreſſion, unleſs he knew that what he preached had ſomething in it, which diſtinguiſhed it from what was preached by others: Which was plainly the myſtery, as he every where calls it, of God's purpoſe of taking in the Gentiles to be his people under the Meſſiah, and that without ſubjecting them to circumciſion, or the law of Moſes. This is that which he calls here the preaching of Jeſus Chriſt; for without this he did not think that Chriſt was preached to the Gentiles as he ought to be, and therefore, in ſeveral places of his Epiſtle to the Galatians, he calls it the truth, and the truth of the Goſpel; and uſes the like expreſſions to the Epheſians and Coloſſians. This is that myſtery which he is ſo much concerned that the Epheſians ſhould underſtand and adhere to firmly, and which was revealed to him according to that Goſpel, whereof he was made the miniſter, as may be ſeen at large in that Epiſtle, particularly ch. iii, vi, vii. The ſame thing he declares to the Coloſſians, particularly ch. i. 27—29. and ii. 6—8. For that he in a particular manner preached this doctrine ſo as none of the Apoſtles did, may be ſeen Acts xxi. 18—25. and xv. 6, 7. For though the other Apoſtles and elders of the church at Jeruſalem, had determined that the Gentiles ſhould only keep themſelves from things offered to idols, and from blood, &c. &c. Yet it is plain enough from what they ſay, Acts xxi. 20—24. that they taught not, nay probably did not think, what St. Paul openly declares to the Epheſians,—that the law of Moſes was aboliſhed by the death of Chriſt: (Epheſ. ii. 15.) In which, if St. Peter and St. James had been as clear as was St. Paul, St. Peter could not have incurred his reproof, as he did by his carriage mentioned Gal. ii. 12. But in all this may be ſeen the goodneſs of God both to Jews and Gentiles. See Epheſ. ii. 15. Taylor obſerves, that "the Apoſtle calls it his Goſpel, becauſe he was the man eſpecially ſingled out and commiſſioned to preach it. He might alſo call it his Goſpel, to diſtinguiſh it from that which was preached by others, who mixed law and Goſpel together. But I cannot think, with Mr. Locke, that the Apoſtle intended to diſtinguiſh it from that which Peter and James taught; who, though they were Apoſtles of the circumciſion, do not appear from either of their Epiſtles, to have held any ſentiments inconſiſtent with what St. Paul taught. St. Peter particularly wrote his Epiſtles to Gentile converts; and is as clear in giving them a full place in the church, and all the honours of the people of God, upon their faith in Chriſt, as St. Paul himſelf: Nor can we form any argument as to his ſentiments from his blameable conduct, Gal. ii. 12. for that was an error of infirmity, not of judgement. By the revelation of the myſtery, the Apoſtle means the calling of the Gentiles, as appears from the next verſe;—Now is made known to all nations, or, to all the Gentiles,—for the obedience of faith. The original, rendered ſince the world began, is χρόνοις αἰωνίοις; that is, in the ſecular times, or in the times under the law. Why the times under the law were called χρόνοι αἰώνιοι, we may find a reaſon in their jubilees, which were αἰῶνες, ſæcula, or ages; by which all the time under the law was meaſured; and ſo χρόνοι αἰώνιοι are uſed 2 Tim. i. 9. Tit. i. 2. And αἰῶνες are put for the times of the law, or the jubilees, Luke i. 70. Acts iii. 21. 1 Cor. ii. 7. and x. 2. Epheſ. iii. 9. Col. i. 26. Heb. ix. 26. God is called the Rock αἰώνων, of ages, Iſai. xxvi. 4. in the ſame ſenſe that he is called, The Rock of Iſrael, Iſai. xxx. 29. that is, the ſtrength and ſupport of the Jewiſh ſtate. So Exod. xxi. 6. εις τον αιωνα, ſignifies not as we tranſlate it, for ever, but "to the jubilee:" Which will appear, if we compare Lev. xxv. 39—41. and Exod. xxi. 2. Now that the times of the law, were the times here ſpoken of by St. Paul, ſeems plain from that which he declares to have continued a myſtery during all thoſe times; namely, God's purpoſe of taking in the Gentiles to be his people under the Meſſiah: For this could not be ſaid to be a myſtery at any other time than that, when the Jews were ſeparated to be the peculiar people of God: Before that time there was no ſuch name or idea of diſtinction as Gentiles; before the days ing of Jeſus Chriſt, (according to the revelation of the myſtery, which was kept ſecret ſince the world began,

26 But now is made manifeſt, and by the ſcriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlaſting God, made known to all nations, for the obedience of faith.)

days of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, the calling of the Iſraelites to be God's peculiar people was as much a myſtery, as the calling of the Gentiles was a myſtery afterwards. All that St. Paul inſiſts upon here, and in all the places where he mentions this myſtery, is to ſhew, that though God had declared this his purpoſe to the Jews, by the predictions of his prophets amongſt them, yet it lay concealed from their knowledge; it was a myſtery to them; they underſtood no ſuch thing: There was not any where the leaſt ſuſpicion or thought of it; till the Meſſiah being come, it was openly declared by St. Paul to the Jews and Gentiles, and made out by the writings of the prophets, which were now underſtood. See Locke, Taylor, and Burthogge's excellent pamphlet, intitled, "Chriſtianity a revealed myſtery."

Written to the Romans, &c.] The firſt verſe of this chapter juſtifies part of this note; but as the moſt ancient manuſcripts have not theſe notes, and ſome of them are plainly contrary to paſſages in the Epiſtles to which they are affixed, they are not to be eſteemed of any authority. THE
FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE
TO THE CORINTHIANS.

CHAP. I.

After his ſalutation and thankſgiving, he exhorteth them to unity, and reproveth their diſſenſions. God deſtroyeth the wiſdom of the wiſe, by the fooliſhneſs of preaching; and calleth not the wiſe, mighty, and noble, but the fooliſh, weak, and men of no account.

PAUL, called to be an apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, through the will of God, and Soſthenes our brother,

2 Unto the church of God, which is at Corinth, to them that are ſanctified in Chriſt Jeſus, called to be ſaints, with all that in every place call upon the name of Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, both theirs and ours:

Ver. 1. Col. i. 1. Acts xviii. 17.—V. 2. Jude 1. Acts xv. 9. Rom. i. 7. 2 Tim. i. 9. Acts ix. 14. 2 Tim. ii. 22. Ch. viii. 6.

CONCERNING the city of Corinth we have ſpoken in the notes on Acts xviii. 1, 2. A city no leſs famous for its luxury and vice, than for its wiſdom and elegance: But notwithſtanding the luxury of the rich, and the profligacy of the poor; notwithſtanding the pride of its wiſe men, and the prejudices of its prieſts, St. Paul, without the charms of eloquence, the advantages of philoſophy, the ſplendour of riches, the favour or concurrence of the great, planted a church amongſt them, and won them to embrace a crucified Saviour. So great was his ſucceſs, that he abode near two years in this place; but about three years after his departure, the church was over-run with great diſorders, and ſplit into various ſects and factions. This occaſioned the following Epiſtle, which was written by St. Paul juſt before his departure from Epheſus, about Eaſter, (ſee ch. v. 7, 8.) in the year of Chriſt 57, and the third of the emperor Nero. It was intended partly to correct ſome corruptions and abuſes among the Corinthians, and partly to anſwer certain queries, which they had propoſed to him. In the introduction he expreſſes his ſatisfaction at all the good he knew of them, particularly at their having the gift of the Holy Ghoſt for the confirmation of the Goſpel. ch. i. 1—9. After which, he firſt corrects their corruptions and abuſes; firſt, rebuking the ſectaries among them, and defending himſelf againſt one or more falſe teachers, who had alienated moſt of the Corinthians from him. ch. i. 10. to ch. v. Secondly, conſidering the caſe of a notorious offender, who had married his father's wife, that is, his own ſtep-mother; ordering them to excommunicate this perſon, and to acknowledge no public fornicator as a brother. ch. v. Thirdly, reproving them for their covetous and litigious temper, which cauſed them to proſecute their Chriſtian brethren before heathen courts of judicature. ch. vi. 1—9. Fourthly, cautioning them againſt fornication, a vice to which they had been extremely addicted before they were converted, (ch. vi. 10. to the end) and which ſome of them ſtill reckoned among the things indifferent; or which might be practiſed or let alone, without breach of morality. And one can ſcarce wonder at this inveterate prejudice, when informed that Corinth was ſo notorious for fornication and laſciviouſneſs, that "a Corinthian woman," among the ancients, was a ſynonimous term for "a proſtitute." The natives made the increaſe of whores one part of their prayers to their gods, and the bringing of proſtitutes into the city a part of their vows. In the next place, he anſwers certain queries which they had propoſed; and firſt, he determines ſome queſtions relating to the marriage ſtate, ch. vii. Secondly, he inſtructs them how to act with reſpect to idol offerings, ch. viii.—xi. 1. It could not be unlawful in itſelf to eat the meat which had been offered to idols; for the conſecration of fleſh or wine to an idol did not make it the property of an idol, an idol being nothing, and therefore incapable of property; but ſome Corinthians thought it lawful to go to a feaſt in the idol temples, which at the ſame time were places of reſort for lewdneſs, and to eat the ſacrifices, while praiſes were ſung to the idols: this was publickly joining in idolatry. St. Paul adviſes to abſtain even from ſuch participation as was lawful, rather than give offence to a weak brother; which he enforces by his own example, who had abſtained from many lawful things rather than create offence to the Goſpel. Thirdly, he anſwers a third query concerning the manner in which women ſhould deliver any thing in public, when called to it by a divine impulſe: ch. xi. 2—17. And here he cenſures the unuſual dreſs of both ſexes in propheſying, which expoſed them to the contempt of the Greeks, among whom the men uſually went uncovered, and the women veiled. He alſo takes occaſion here to cenſure the irregularities committed at their love feaſts, &c. and in the exerciſe of the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt. ch. xi. 18.—ch. xv. Fourthly, he aſſerts the the reſurrection of the dead, which ſome among the Corinthians doubted, and others denied. ch. xv. He then concludes with ſome directions to the Corinthian church concerning the manner of collecting alms, promiſes them a viſit, and ſalutes ſome of the members, ch. xvi. See Michaelis, Locke, Whitby, Lardner, and Calmet.

Ver. 1, 2. Paul, called, &c.] Paul, a called Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, by the will of God, and Soſthenes the brother, ver. 2. Unto, &c.—to them that have been ſanctified in Chriſt Jeſus, the called, the ſaints, with all that invoke the name of Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, in every place both theirs and ours. Wat. There is great propriety in every clauſe of the ſalutation prefixed to this Epiſtle, and particularly in St. Paul's aſſerting his high call to the office of an Apoſtle, as there were thoſe in the church of Corinth who affected to queſtion the authority of his miſſion. See on Rom. i. 1. Soſthenes was a Corinthian miniſter, who attended St. Paul in his travels; Comp. Acts xviii. 17. It was both humility and prudence in the Apoſtle thus to join his name with his own, in an Epiſtle, in which it was neceſſary to deal ſo plainly with them, and to remonſtrate againſt ſo many irregularities. See Locke, Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 2. To them that are ſanctified, &c.] This does not ſignify here, ſays Mr. Locke, thoſe whoſe lives were pure and holy; for there were many amongſt thoſe to whom he wrote who were quite otherwiſe: but ſanctified ſignifies "ſeparate from the common ſtate of mankind, to be the people of God, and to ſerve him." The heathen world had revolted from the true God, to the ſervice of idols and falſe gods, Rom. i. 18—25. The Jews, being ſeparated from this corrupted maſs to be the peculiar people of God, were called holy, Exod. xix. 5, 6. Numb. xv. 40. They being caſt off, the profeſſors of Chriſtianity were ſeparated to be the people of God, and ſo became holy, 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10. Nothing could better ſuit the candid and catholic views which St. Paul was ſo much concerned to promote in this Epiſtle, than the declaration of his good wiſhes in this verſe for every true Chriſtian upon earth, whether Jew or Gentile, learned or unlearned, Greek or barbarian. The original, which we render call upon the name of Jeſus Chriſt,—τοῖς ἐπικαλουμένοις τὸ ὄνομα, Mr. Locke renders, all that are called by the name of Jeſus Chriſt,—the Greek words being a periphraſis for Chriſtians, as is plain from the deſign of this verſe, and from a variety of proofs given by Dr. Hammond on the place. See on ch. viii. 6.

3 Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

4 I thank my God always on your behalf, for the grace of God which is given you by Jeſus Chriſt;

5 That in every thing ye are enriched by him, in all utterance, and in all knowledge;

6 Even as the teſtimony of Chriſt was confirmed in you.

7 So that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

8 Who ſhall alſo confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameleſs in the day of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

9 God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowſhip of his Son Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

10 Now I beſeech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that ye all ſpeak the ſame thing, and that there be no diviſions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the ſame mind, and in the ſame judgement.

11 For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the houſe of Chloe, that there are contentions among you.

12 Now this I ſay, that every one of you ſaith, I am of Paul; and I, of Apollos; and I, of Cephas; and I, of Chriſt.

13 Is Chriſt divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?

14 I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Criſpus and Gaius;

15 Leſt any ſhould ſay, that I had baptized in mine own name.

16 And I baptized alſo the houſhold of Stephanas: beſides, I know not whether I baptized any other.

17 For Chriſt ſent me not to baptize, but to preach the goſpel: not with wiſdom of words, leſt the croſs of Chriſt ſhould be made of none effect.

Ver. 4. For the grace of God, &c.] For the favour of God, which is vouchſafed unto you through Jeſus Chriſt. Wat.

Ver. 5. That in every thing ye are enriched] Theſe reſpectful congratulations and acknowledgments of the things in which they did really excel, had a moſt happy tendency to ſoften their minds, and to diſpoſe them the better to receive the plain reproofs he was going to give them, and which, in their circumſtances, faithful love extorted from him. Inſtead of utterance, Dr. Waterland reads ſpeech.

Ver. 6. Confirmed in you] Among you. Wat. and Doddridge. As they could not but know they had received theſe gifts by the hand of St. Paul, this expreſſion ſuggeſts a rational and tender argument to reduce them to their former affection to him, as their ſpiritual father.

Ver. 9. God is faithful] That is, "If we continue obedient, God for his part will certainly perform his promiſe faithfully."

Ver. 10.] There were great diſorders in the church of Corinth, cauſed chiefly by a faction raiſed there againſt St. Paul; the Partiſans of the faction mightily cried up aud gloried in their leader, and did all they could to diſparage St. Paul, and to leſſen him in the eſteem of the Corinthians. The Apoſtle makes it his buſineſs in the firſt part of this Epiſtle, to take off the Corinthians from ſiding with, and glorying in this pretended Apoſtle, whoſe followers and ſcholars they profeſſed themſelves to be; and to reduce them into one body, as the ſcholars of Chriſt, united in a belief of the Goſpel, which he had preached to them, and in an obedience to it, without any ſuch diſtinction of maſters and leaders, from whom they denominated themſelves. He alſo here and there intermixes a juſtification of himſelf againſt the aſperſions which were caſt upon him by his oppoſers. See 2 Cor. xi. 13—15. Many are the arguments uſed by St. Paul to break the oppoſite faction, and to put an end to all diviſions. The firſt before us, from this to ver. 16. is, that in Chriſtianity they all had but one Maſter, namely, Chriſt; and therefore were not to fall into parties denominated from diſtinct teachers, as they did in their ſchools of philoſophy. Locke.

By the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt]—Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is, and ought to be named. If any one has thought St. Paul a looſe writer, it is only becauſe he was a looſer reader. He who takes notice of the Apoſtle's deſign will find, that there is ſcarce a word or an expreſſion which he uſes, but with relation and tendency to his immediate ſubject:—As here, intending to aboliſh the names of leaders, by which they diſtinguiſhed themſelves, he beſeeches them by the name of Chriſt,—a form which we do not remember that he uſes any where elſe. Inſtead of in the ſame judgement, ſome read, in the ſame ſentiment. It was morally impoſſible, conſidering the diverſity of their educations and capacities, that they ſhould all agree in opinion; nor could the Apoſtle intend that, becauſe he does not uſe any argument to reduce them to ſuch an argument, nor ſo much as declare what that one opinion was, in which he would have them agree. The words muſt therefore expreſs that peaceful and unanimous temper which Chriſtians of different opinions may and ought to maintain towards each other; which will do a much greater honour to the Goſpel and to human nature, than the moſt perfect uniformity that can be imagined. See Locke and Doddridge.

Ver. 11. Which are of the houſe of Chloe] Grotius ſuppoſes Fortunatus and Achaicus, mentioned ch. xvi. 17. to have been her ſons. We may obſerve, that St. Paul uſes twice, in the compaſs of this and the preceding verſe, the word brethren, as a term of union and friendſhip, in order to put an end to their diviſions.

Ver. 13. Now this I ſay, &c.] I mean, that one or other of you ſays, &c. Wat. Markland, and ſome other criticks, are for leaving out the laſt words of this verſe,—And I of Chriſt; for, ſay they, all the converts of Corinth would agree in declaring they were of Chriſt, however they diſputed reſpecting their particular teachers. Chryſoſtom and Auſtin place a full ſtop at Cephas.—But the next clauſe may ſtand in oppoſition to all the others. "Some or other of you ſaith, I am of Paul, I of Apollos, and I of Cephas:—But I am of Chriſt; ver. 13. and is Chriſt divided?" See Beza, and Bengelius.

Ver. 13. Was Paul crucified for you?] As if he had ſaid, "Are your obligations to me, equal or comparable to thoſe which you are under to our common Maſter? To Him, who died for us upon the croſs?" He mentions himſelf, as it was leaſt invidious to do ſo; though the application was equally juſt as to every other inſtance. See ch, iii. 6. The word εἰς, rendered in, properly ſignifies into: So the French tranſlate it here. The phraſe βαπτισθῆναι εἰς,—to be baptized into any one's name, or into any one, means ſolemnly by that ceremony, to enter himſelf a diſciple of Him into whoſe name he was baptized; with profeſſion to receive his doctrine and rules, and ſubmit to his authority:—A very good argument here, why they ſhould be called by no one's name but Chriſt's. See Locke, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 15. Leſt any ſhould ſay, &c.] If any one ſhould object that others might do it for him, it may be anſwered that St. Paul's attendants, who ſeem to have been Timothy and Silas, (Acts xviii. 5. 2 Cor. i. 19.) were perſons of an eſtabliſhed character, ſo as to be above ſuſpicion; that baptiſm was properly adminiſtered too openly to allow of this; and that the Apoſtle herein, as it were, appealed to the baptized perſons themſelves; challenging any one of them to ſay that the ordinance was adminiſtered to him in Paul's name. See Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 16. Beſides, I know not, &c.] This expreſſion of uncertainty, as to ſuch a fact, is by no means inconſiſtent with that inſpiration wherewith the Apoſtles of our Lord were endued; which certainly was neither continual, nor reached to every accident and circumſtance in life. The office of baptiſm was probably in general aſſigned to inferiors, as requiring no extraordinary abilities, and as being attended with ſome trouble and inconvenience, eſpecially where immerſion was uſed. The proper office of an Apoſtle, was not ſo much to perform the ceremony of baptiſm with his own hands, as to attend conſtantly to the work of preaching the Goſpel. See the next verſe, Clarke, and Burnett on the 27th Article.

Ver. 17. Should be made of none effect] If the doctrine of the crucifixion of the Son of God for the ſins of men be indeed true, it is undoubtedly

18 For the preaching of the croſs is to them that periſh, fooliſhneſs; but unto us which are ſaved, it is the power of God.

19 For it is written, I will deſtroy the wiſdom of the wiſe, and will bring to nothing the underſtanding of the prudent.

20 Where is the wiſe? where is the ſcribe? where is the diſputer of this world? hath not God made fooliſh the wiſdom of this world?

21 For after that, in the wiſdom of God, the world by wiſdom knew not God, it pleaſed God by the fooliſhneſs of preaching to ſave them that believe.

22 For the Jews require a ſign, and the Greeks ſeek after wiſdom:

Ver. 18. 2 Cor. ii. 15. Ch. xv. 2. Rom. i. 16.—V. 19. Job v. 12, 13. Iſai. xxix. 14.—V. 20. Iſai. xxxiii. 18. Job xii. 17, 20, 24.—V 21. Rom. i. 20, 21, 28. See Matth. xi. 25. Luke x. 21.—V. 22. Matth. xii. 38. xvi. 1. John iv. 48.

undoubtedly a truth of the higheſt importance; and it might reaſonably be expected that a perſon who had been inſtructed in it by ſuch extraordinary methods, ſhould appear to lay the main ſtreſs of his preaching upon it. The deſign of this wonderful diſpenſation might therefore have been in a great meaſure fruſtrated, if it had been the care of the firſt preachers of it, and particularly of St. Paul, to ſtudy a vain parade of words, and to ſet off their diſcourſes with thoſe glittering ornaments, which the Grecian orators ſo often ſought, and which the Corinthians were ſo ready to affect. But, amidſt all the beautiful ſimplicity which a deep conviction of the Goſpel tended to produce, there was room left for the moſt manly and noble kind of eloquence; which therefore the Chriſtian preacher ſhould labour to make habitual to him, and of which this Apoſtle himſelf is a moſt illuſtrious example. From this verſe to ver. 31. St. Paul uſes another argument to ſtop their followers from glorying in theſe falſe Apoſtles; obſerving, that neither any advantage of extraction, nor ſkill in the learning of the Jews, nor in the philoſophy and eloquence of the Greeks, was that for which God choſe men to be preachers of the Goſpel. Thoſe whom he had made choice of, for overturning the mighty and the learned, were mean, plain, and illiterate men. See Doddridge, and Locke.

Ver. 18. For, the preaching of the croſs, &c.] "The doctrine of the croſs is a doctrine of ſuch a nature, as could not recommend itſelf by human eloquence to the imaginations of vicious and vain diſputants, ſuch as were moſt of the heathen philoſophers; but to thoſe who are ſaved,—to ſerious and well-diſpoſed perſons, who embrace truth wherever they find evidence of it, and who are more pleaſed with what improves their minds, than with the vain eloquence of the heathen oratory; to ſuch perſons the Goſpel, in its greateſt plainneſs and original ſimplicity, is the power of God,—not to amuſe men's underſtandings with needleſs ſpeculations, but to convert their wills to righteouſneſs and true holineſs." See Clarke, and Calmet.

Ver. 19, 20. For it is written, I will deſtroy, &c.] See on Iſai. xxix. 11, &c. and xxxiii. 17, 18. By the words wiſe, ſcribe, diſputer, the Apoſtle probably meant perſons moſt eminent for their learning and ſagacity, whether among Jews or Gentiles. The ſages of the latter, and the ſcribes of the former, are well known: and the diſputer of the age may include ſuch of both, as, proud of their natural ſagacity, were fond of engaging in controverſies, and fancied they could confute every adverſary. If, according to Mr. Locke's ſuppoſition, the falſe apoſtle, or chief leader of the faction againſt St. Paul, called himſelf a ſcribe, there will be a peculiar propriety in the uſe of the word here: But without that ſuppoſition, it might eaſily be underſtood by the Corinthians, who had ſo conſiderable a ſynagogue of Jews among them: See Doddridge, Locke, and Godwin's Heb. Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 6.

Ver. 21. For after that, in the wiſdom of God] There is ſome difficulty in aſcertaining the preciſe meaning of theſe words. Some underſtand it to be, "That ſince the world, in the wiſdom of God, i. e. by contemplating the works of the creation, had not by wiſdom, i. e. by the exerciſe of their reaſon, arrived to the true knowledge of God, it pleaſed God to take another method, and by the fooliſhneſs of preaching to ſave them that believe." It may ſeem ſtrange, that the preaching of the Goſpel ſhould be called the fooliſhneſs of preaching, by an Apoſtle of Chriſt. But the meaning and language of St. Paul will be accounted for, by conſidering what led him to this kind of expreſſion. The doctrine of the croſs, and of the redemption of the world by the death and paſſion of Chriſt, was received by the great pretenders to wiſdom and reaſon with ſcorn and contempt; The Greeks, ſays the Apoſtle, ſeek after wiſdom,—and Chriſt crucified, is to the Greeks fooliſhneſs. The pride of learning and philoſophy had ſo poſſeſſed the polite parts of the heathen world, that they could not ſubmit to a method of ſalvation which was above the reach of their philoſophy, and which refuſed to be tried by the diſputes and ſubtilties of the ſchools. The Apoſtle ſays, ver. 17. Chriſt ſent him to preach the Goſpel, not with the wiſdom of words. The wiſdom of the world thus diſcarded, took its revenge of the Goſpel in return, and called it the fooliſhneſs of preaching. "Be it ſo, ſays the Apoſtle; yet by this fooliſhneſs of preaching, God intends to ſave thoſe who believe: For this method is of God, and not of man; and the fooliſhneſs of God is wiſer than man." Thus we ſee what led St. Paul to uſe this expreſſion, and to call the preaching of the Goſpel the fooliſhneſs of preaching. The great and learned ſo eſteemed it, and ſo called it: The Apoſtle ſpeaks to them in their own language, and calls upon them in the text to compare their much-boaſted wiſdom with his fooliſhneſs of preaching, and to judge of them by their effects: The world by wiſdom knew not God; but the fooliſhneſs of preaching is ſalvation to every believer. The religion common to the heathen was idolatry; the knowledge of the Deity taught in the ſchools of the philoſophers, was ſuch as deprived him of his nobleſt attributes, juſtice and mercy; and theſe very philoſophers themſelves ran down with the ſtream, and not only taught that the deities of their country ſhould be worſhipped, but likewiſe inforced their doctrine by their own examples, by worſhipping them themſelves. Such was the ſtate of religion before the coming of Chriſt; philoſophy had been tried; but inſtead of holding out a light to thoſe that were in the gloom, it put out the little glimmering of light which remained. But conſider the caſe as it now ſtands, in countries where the Goſpel is preached with any degree of purity. If you go into our villages, you will find there a firm perſuaſion of the unity of God: the meaneſt of the people will tell you, that an honeſt heart only is an acceptable ſacrifice to God, and that there is no way of pleaſing him, but in doing juſtly. Let us aſk now, whence comes this change? Is it for the better or no? If it is, ſurely the preſent ſtate of the world ſhews, that the fooliſhneſs of preaching has been more effectual than the wiſdom of the world. See Sherlock's Diſc. vol. i. diſc. iv. p. 139, &c. and Acts vii. 18.

Ver. 22—22. For the Jews, &c.] Whereas the Jews require ſigns, and the Gentiles ſeek after wiſdom; ver. 23. We, nevertheleſs, preach Chriſt crucified,—and unto the Gentiles fooliſhneſs: ver. 24. But unto them that are the called, both Jews and Gentiles, &c. Wat. When we conſider how many miracles were continually wrought by and upon the firſt preachers and converts of Chriſtianity, it may ſeem an aſtoniſhing demand which the Jews are ſaid here to make. From a memorable paſſage in Joſephus,—in which he ſpeaks of an impoſtor promiſing his followers to ſhew them a ſign of their being ſet at liberty from the Roman yoke,—compared with their requiring from Chriſt, amidſt the full torrent of his miracles, a ſign from heaven, It ſeems probable that the meaning here is, "The Jews demand a ſign from heaven, to introduce a Meſſiah victorious over all their enemies." See on Matth. xii. 38. xvi. 1. The Apoſtle. ver. 23. ſays, that Chriſt crucified was to the Jews a ſtumbling-block, and to the Greeks fooliſhneſs. Now, I. The Jews were offended at Chriſt, becauſe he was not received and followed by thoſe of the moſt learning and authority among them. They were offended at him, becauſe he was not a temporal prince, and a conquerer. They were all perſuaded that the Meſſiah ſhould be a great king, under whom they ſhould rule over the Gentiles, and live in wealth and pleaſure. When, therefore, they found Chriſt was poor and deſpiſed, and died an ignominious death, and his kingdom was a ſpiritual kingdom, the croſs of Chriſt proved a ſtumbling-block to them, and they were diſpleaſed with a doctrine that ſuited neither with their prejudices nor with their inclinations. It is well known that nothing expoſed Chriſtianity more to the contempt of the Jews than the doctrine of the croſs; they therefore called Chriſt in deriſion Tolvi,—the man that was hanged, that is, on the croſs; and Chriſtians Abde Tolvi, "the diſciples of the crucified malefactor;" and by a malignant diſtortion of the Greek word Ἐυαγγελιον, they called it Aven Gelon, or "a revelation of vanity." Yet it is eaſy to ſhew that theſe objections againſt the perſon of our Saviour, were not ſufficient to excuſe their unbelief. For, though the law promiſed temporal bleſſings to the good, yet the Jews knew by long experience, that thoſe promiſes had not been fulfilled at all times, nor to all perſons. Extraordinary interpoſitions in behalf of the righteous were grown leſs frequent. They therefore had no reaſon to judge of the characters and merits of men by their ſtation and circumſtances in this life, or to imagine that fortunate and virtuous were ſynonimous terms, which implied the ſame thing. They might have found examples of good men, who had undergone much trouble, and had received here below no reward of their obedience. They might have learned from the prophets that the Meſſiah, to whom ſo much power, proſperity, and ſplendor was promiſed, was alſo to be a man of ſorrows, and acquainted with grief; that his ſoul was to be an offering for ſin; and they might have ſeen, in the ſufferings of Chriſt, and his reſurrection, the accompliſhment of thoſe irreconcileable predictions. II. The cauſes of the unbelief of the Greeks and Gentiles were ſome of them the ſame as thoſe which occaſioned the unbelief of the Jews; —a great corruption of manners, the purity of the precepts of the Goſpel, the temporal inconveniencies which attended the profeſſion of Chriſtianity, and advantages which might be ſecured by rejecting or oppoſing it; the poor appearance which Chriſt had made in the world, and his ignominious death. But yet, they ought not to have ſlighted and rejected the Goſpel upon account of the low eſtate and ſufferings of Chriſt and his Apoſtles. Their own reaſon, and ſome of their moſt approved authors might have taught them, not to value perſons according to their greatneſs and riches; nor to meaſure the favour of God by temporal happineſs, but to love and honour oppreſſed innocence. They might have remembered, that the beſt man, 23 But we preach Chriſt crucified, unto the Jews a ſtumbling-block, and unto the Greek, fooliſhneſs;

24 But unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Chriſt the power of God, and the wiſdom of God.

25 Becauſe the fooliſhneſs of God is wiſer than men; and the weakneſs of God is ſtronger than men.

26 For ye ſee your calling, brethren, how that [not many wiſe men after the fleſh, not many mighty, not many noble are called:

27 But God hath choſen the fooliſh things of the world, to confound the wiſe; and God hath choſen the weak things of the world, to confound the things which are mighty;

28 And baſe things of the world, and things which are deſpiſed, hath God choſen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are:

29 That no fleſh ſhould glory in his preſence.

30 But of him are ye in Chriſt Jeſus, who of God is made unto us wiſdom, and righteouſneſs, and ſanctification, and redemption:

31 That, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

man, and the wiſeſt philoſopher mentioned in their hiſtories, lived all his days in poverty, was expoſed to ſlander and calumny, and at laſt was accuſed by falſe witneſſes, and condemned to die by unjuſt judges. They knew that virtue ſeldom obtains the reſpect which it deſerves. They knew that virtue, though it be ſo amiable in itſelf, has a luſtre offenſive to the vicious, who will join to obſcure and miſrepreſent it, and to make it contemptible. They knew that he beſt deſerved the name of a wiſe man, who lived up to the rules of morality which he had preſcribed to others; and they ought to have admired the man, who, at the ſame time that he recommended humility to his followers, was a perfect example of all that he taught. The Gentiles could not conceive how one who ſeemed forſaken of God, ſhould reſtore men to the favour of God, and how his ſufferings ſhould be ſerviceable to that end. It is reaſonable that the divine mercy ſhould conſtantly diſplay itſelf in caſes within the reach of compaſſion. Such was the caſe of mankind; who, though ſinful, are weak; though offenders, are yet corrigible, and capable of amendment. It is alſo reaſonable that God ſhould alſo be diſpleaſed at rebellion and tranſgreſſion, and that he ſhould ſo grant his pardon, as at the ſame time to vindicate the honour of his laws. Now this he has accompliſhed in a moſt illuſtrious manner in the death of his Son, ſhewing thereby his hatred to ſin and to ſinners, in refuſing to hear them in their own name, and in beſtowing his favours only through the mediation of one who ſuffered for our offences. The paternal and tutelary deities worſhipped by the Gentiles, were dead heroes and kings; they were conſequently loth to deify one, who appeared in the low circumſtances of a carpenter's ſon, and was at laſt executed like the meaneſt ſlave. Yet they ſhould have recollected, that the inventors of arts, however low, were worſhipped by them as gods; and that the huſbandman, the gardener, the vintner, and the loweſt mechanic were enrolled among their deities. The Gentiles thought it ſtrange to aſcribe ſuch power and authority to a crucified man. But the greateſt power any one can ſhew, conſiſts in performing ſuch things as no one elſe can do, unleſs God aſſiſt him. To deſtroy the peace of mankind, and carry ruin and deſolation through populous countries, is no more than what human ſtrength and policy can effect. Many have done this who have not poſſeſſed one commendable quality. To be honoured, admired, reverenced, are advantages which may be attained without any ſupernatural aid; but no man by his riches, or the eminence of his ſtation, can deliver his brother from death. Therefore he who can heal all ſickneſſes by ſpeaking a word; who can reſtore the dead to life; who can confer the ſame power on others; who can deliver himſelf from the grave, is as much ſuperior to the rulers and heroes of this world, as the heavens are above the earth. And ſuch was our Saviour, though he was crucified; who was the author of ſalvation to thoſe who believed his doctrine, though the Greeks fooliſhly imagined that the doctrine itſelf was nothing but fooliſhneſs. See Jortin's Diſcourſes, p. 9, &c. Leigh's Critica Sacra, and Archbp. Tillotſon's Works, vol. 2.

Ver. 24, Chriſt, the power of God, and the wiſdom of God] St. Paul, in the 21ſt verſe, argues thus in general: "Since the world, by their natural parts and improvements, did not attain to a right and ſaving knowledge of God, God by the preaching of the Goſpel, which ſeems fooliſhneſs to the world, was pleaſed to communicate that knowledge to thoſe who believed." In the three following verſes, he repeats the ſame reaſoning, a little more expreſly applied, to the people he had here in view,—namely, Jews and Gentiles; and his ſenſe ſeems to be this: "Since the Jews, to make any doctrine go down with them, require extraordinary ſigns of the power of God to accompany it, and nothing will pleaſe the nice palates of the learned Greeks but wiſdom; and though our preaching of a crucified Meſſiah be a ſcandal to the Jew, and fooliſhneſs to the Greek, Yet we have what they both ſeek; for both Jew and Gentile, when they embrace the Goſpel, find the Meſſiah whom we preach to be the power of God, and the wiſdom of God." Locke.

Ver. 25. The fooliſhneſs of God is wiſer than men] As it is abſolutely impoſſible that there ſhould be either folly or weakneſs in God, ſo it is certain that the world did not in general believe there was; and conſequently theſe ſtrong phraſes muſt be uſed in a very peculiar ſenſe, and muſt mean that ſcheme which was really his, though the world, for want of underſtanding it, repreſented it as weakneſs and folly, unworthy of God. See Doddridge.

Ver. 26. Ye ſee your calling, brethren] For you ſee thoſe among you who are called. L'Enfant. "Ye ſee not many of thoſe whom the world generally eſteemed wiſe, for their being able by ſubtle diſputes, to perplex the plaineſt truths; but men of ſincerity and ſimplicity of heart, men of fair and equitable principles, univerſally charitable, and lovers of mankind, were the perſons who embraced the Goſpel of Chriſt." See Clarke and Whitby.

Ver. 28. And baſe things] And mean things. Wat. In this and the preceding verſe, though the Apoſtle makes uſe of the neuter gender, which occaſioned our tranſlators to inſert the word things; yet it is evident from the context that he means perſons; and if the word things were omitted, the ſenſe would be more plain. By the things which are not, may be underſtood the Gentiles, who were not the people of God, and were counted as nothing by the Jews. By the fooliſh and weak things, that is, by ſimple, illiterate, and mean men, God would make aſhamed the learned philoſophers and great men of the nation; but by the things which are not, he would aboliſh the things that are, as in effect he did aboliſh the Jewiſh church by the Chriſtian; taking in the Gentiles to be his people, in the place of the rejected Jews, who till then were his people. St. Paul mentions this here, not by chance, but purſuant to his main deſign, to ſtop their glorying in their falſe Apoſtle, who was a Jew, by ſhewing that whatever that head of the faction might claim under that pretence, as it is plain he did ſtand upon it, (ſee 2 Cor. xi. 21, 22.) he had not the leaſt title to any eſteem or reſpect upon that account; ſince the Jewiſh nation was laid aſide, and God had choſen the Gentiles to take their place, and to be his church and people inſtead of them. See on ch. ii. 6. Deut. xxxii. 21. Iſai. xl. 17. Locke, and Whitby.

Ver. 30. But of him are ye in Chriſt Jeſus] "For, on the whole, all we have that is worth mentioning, we receive from Chriſt; and we receive it from him as the gift of God, ſince it is of him, and his free mercy and grace, that ye are called to ſhare in the bleſſings given by Chriſt Jeſus his Son. He exhibits this bleſſed Saviour to us, and diſpoſes our hearts to accept of him; Who, amidſt our ignorance and folly, is made of God unto us a ſource of wiſdom; and through him, guilty as we are, we receive righteouſneſs; polluted as we are, we obtain ſanctification; and, enſlaved as we naturally are, to the power of luſts, and the dominion of Satan, we obtain by him compleat redemption." See Doddridge. Bos would render the words of this verſe as follows: For of him (in Chriſt Jeſus, who is made of God unto us wiſdom) ye are righteouſneſs, ſanctification, and redemption: that is, compleatly juſtified, ſanctified, and redeemed. As the converſion of the Corinthians, to whom this and the following Epiſtle are addreſſed, is a fact of a peculiar nature, and one which affords a ſtriking teſtimony to the truth of our holy religion, We ſhall here ſubjoin, inſtead of Reflections, an eſſay by a learned friend, wherein he ſhews that,

THE CONVERSION OF THE CORINTHIANS IS A STRONG PROOF OF THE TRUTH OF CHRISTIANITY.

A very maſterly writer has proved that the converſion and the apoſtleſhip of St. Paul, alone, is of itſelf a ſufficient demonſtration to prove Chriſtianity to be a divine revelation. And I cannot but think, that the converſion of the Corinthians is another ſtrong proof of the truth of our religion. We have the greateſt reaſon to believe that God did perform the promiſe which he made to this great Apoſtle, when he ſaid, I am with thee. For if we duly conſider the condition of St. Paul, the nature of the doctrine which he taught, and the manner in which he delivered it, we ſhall be ready to conclude,

CHAP. II.

He declareth that his preaching, though it bring not excellency of ſpeech, or of human wiſdom; yet conſiſteth in the power of God; and ſo far excelleth the wiſdom of this world, and human ſenſe, as that the natural man cannot underſtand it.

clude, that the ſucceſs which he had in preaching the Goſpel at Corinth, muſt be aſcribed to the divine power.

Without ſuppoſing St. Paul to be mad, (a ſuppoſition too groſs for a man of ſenſe to make) we cannot conceive how he could hope, without God's extraordinary aſſiſtance, to convince all perſons in Corinth that they were in an error. He went a ſtranger thither, unknown to any perſon there, unleſs he was before acquainted with Aquila and Priſcilla. With theſe two baniſhed Jews, who were of the ſame occupation with himſelf, he worked for his livelihood. His bodily preſence was no recommendation of him; for he himſelf acknowledges, that he was with them in weakneſs of body, and in much fear and trembling. And he has informed us, that the Corinthians did in fact object to him, that his bodily preſence was weak, and his ſpeech contemptible. What they ſaid of his perſon was true, if we may believe the ancients, who inform us that his ſtature was low, his body crooked, and his head bald. And it is not improbably conjectured by Dr. Whitby, that a ſtammering in his ſpeech, or a ſqueaking ſhrilneſs in his voice, or ſome other infirmity in his ſpeech in teaching, rendered him contemptible in the eyes of ſome of the Corinthians. He was a baſe and contemptible perſon, they ſaid, and one who lived by his labour. Nay, ſome affirmed that he was mad or beſide himſelf. He himſelf has declared, that he was made a ſpectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men; that he was laughed at for Chriſt's ſake; that he was weak, deſpiſed; that he both hungered and thirſted, was naked, buffeted, and had no certain dwelling-place; that he worked with his own hands, labouring unto wearineſs; that he was reviled, perſecuted, defamed, made as the filth of the world, and the offſcouring of all things: Was a man of St. Paul's character a likely perſon to convert the richeſt and moſt flouriſhing city in Greece, a city filled with orators, philoſophers, and baniſhed Jews; a city above all others infamous for lewdneſs? Every unprejudiced perſon, I ſhould think, will grant, that nothing can be more improbable; eſpecially if it be conſidered what kind of doctrine he taught the Corinthians.

Without having the fulleſt aſſurance that God was with him, he could never hope to perſuade the proud and vain philoſophers, who depended wholly upon human reaſon, and would admit nothing for truth but what was demonſtrable by it, to give their aſſent to the articles of our moſt holy faith. He was ſure to meet with the utmoſt oppoſition, when he endeavoured to perſuade theſe wiſe men to admit for certain truths things above their reaſon. They were ſo fully perſuaded of the ſufficiency of that reaſon, as to think they could account for every thing. A poor obſcure mechanic, therefore, a perſon who was of a nation which the reſt of mankind deſpiſed and hated, could never hope to perſuade them in a natural way, by reaſoning and diſputation, to embrace for certain truths, many points which were above the reach of human underſtanding,—ſeveral things which they had not ſo much as thought or dreamed of. When this Jewiſh tent-maker informed them, that when all mankind was concluded under ſin, and knew not how to be abſolved from the guilt of it, Our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the only-begotten Son of God, begotten of his Father before all worlds, came down from heaven, for us men, and for our ſalvation, was miraculouſly conceived, was incarnate by the Holy Ghoſt of the Virgin Mary, and was made man,—He delivered to them nothing but the truth. But theſe wiſe men knew nothing of Jeſus Chriſt, nor of the Holy Ghoſt; neither could they conceive how a man could be born of a pure virgin. St. Paul, therefore, could not have perſuaded them by any human means that all this was true; for theſe wiſe men of the world, theſe wiſe men according to the fleſh, (as the Apoſtle ſtiles them) admitted of no higher principle to judge of things by, but philoſophy, and demonſtration from the principles of natural reaſon. And therefore he muſt needs think it an impoſſible thing, without God's ſpecial aſſiſtance, to perſuade them to believe him to be God, who was born of a pure virgin; to adore him, whoſe mother was a poor Jewiſh woman eſpouſed to a carpenter; to pay divine honour to him who was a carpenter by trade; to believe him who died, and was buried, to be God bleſſed for ever; by whom all were created that are in heaven and earth, viſible and inviſible, whether they be thrones and dominions, or principalities and powers: In a word, to acknowledge him for their Lord and Maſter, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate between two thieves. Not only in St. Paul's days, but for a long time after, the doctrine of Chriſt's crucifixion was fooliſhneſs. "They account us mad, ſays Juſtin Martyr, that after the immutable and eternal God, the Father of all things, we give the ſecond place to a man that was crucified."—"It is wicked and abominable, ſaith Celſus." In the days of Lactantius, Chriſtians were reckoned a ſilly and contemptible people, for following a crucified Maſter and Leader. Arnobius acquaints us, that the Heathens ſaid, The gods were not angry with Chriſtians becauſe they worſhipped the omnipotent Deity, but becauſe in their daily prayers they adored a man that was born, and ſuffered the infamous death of the croſs, and becauſe they contended that he was God, and believed him to be yet alive. In another place he informs us, that they aſked theſe queſtions: If Chriſt was God, why did he die as a man? Who was it that was ſeen hanging upon the croſs? Who was it that died?—"The wiſe men of the world inſult over us, ſaith St. Auſtin, and aſk, where is your underſtanding, who worſhip him for a God who was crucified?" And in the days of Athanaſius, when the Gentiles were told by the Chriſtians that their images were but ſilver and gold, the work of men's hands; in oppoſition to this reproach they anſwered, that the doctrine of the croſs was fooliſhneſs. "The Greeks laugh at this myſtery as fooliſhneſs, ſays Theophylact, becauſe by faith alone, and not by ſyollogiſms and reaſonings, it is found that God was crucified." The ſame author informs us, that there were ſome unbelievers at Corinth who made a jeſt of the croſs, and ſaid, Truly it is a folly to preach a crucified God. For had he been God, he would have defended himſelf at the time of his crucifixion. But how could he riſe from the dead, who could not prevent his own death? They accounted the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead as ridiculous and abſurd a tenet as was ever held, and made it matter of their ſport and jeſt. To raiſe a body that was perfectly dead, and reſtore it to life again, was not in the power of any being in the world, they ſaid. But ſuppoſe it was poſſible, yet they did not account it a thing worthy of God to raiſe dead bodies to be united to the ſouls of good men. Their chief objection againſt the reſurrection of the fleſh, and of the body, was this; That the body was the priſon and ſepulchre of the ſoul, and that it was her puniſhment to be tied to it; that the body was the great hindrance to the knowledge of the truth, and that we could not be truly happy, till by death we were delivered from it. It was therefore judged by them, as Dr. Whitby informs us, not only an impoſſible, but even an unjuſt, unworthy thing, for God to raiſe theſe bodies, to be united to thoſe ſouls, whoſe happineſs conſiſted in being delivered from the body, and whoſe puniſhment it was to be confined to it; that being, according to their philoſophy, not to make them live, but die again. And therefore Celſus ſaith, The hope of the reſurrection of the fleſh, is the hope of worms, a filthy and abominable, and impoſſible thing, which God neither will, nor can do. He cannot do what is vile, neither will he do what is againſt nature. And Origen expreſly declares, that the doctrine of the reſurrection was a myſtery which the unbelievers laughed at, and made a jeſt of. So many, ſuch great and formidable obſtacles the Apoſtle could not but expect to meet with from the philoſophers.

And he was ſure to meet with as great oppoſition from the magiſtrates, who would ſuffer no innovation in the theology eſtabliſhed by law. Had he contented himſelf with confuting the Jews only, I believe he would have given no offence to the civil power: But when he attempted to demonſtrate the abſurdity of the religion of the Heathen, he muſt be very ſenſible that they would be greatly alarmed. How furiouſly muſt they be enraged, when he endeavoured to alter their religious rites, the ancient uſages, the agreeable and pleaſing cuſtoms of their country? What an abhorrence muſt they have of him when he taught them, that the objects of their worſhip were not Gods; that an idol was nothing in the world but a ſenſeleſs piece of matter; that though they had Gods many, and Lords many, yet there is but one God, the Father, and one Lord Jeſus Chriſt? Could any thing be more ſhocking to the Corinthians than to hear a poor mechanic affirm, that what they worſhipped were no Gods, and that they ought to admit Jeſus Chriſt for their Lord? When Plato was in Sicily, he brought himſelf into the greateſt danger by endeavouring to render virtue amiable. If a barbarian had not been more humane than the Sicilian tyrant, the philoſopher would probably have ſpent the remainder of his days in ſervitude in a ſtrange country, only for making ſome innovations in political affairs. He did not ſo much as attempt to deſtroy the Gods of Sicily, as St. Paul did thoſe of Corinth. Nay, the Apoſtle did not only affirm that what they worſhipped were no Gods, but that his countryman Jeſus, who had been crucified as a malefactor, was God bleſſed for ever. And muſt not ſuch a doctrine be highly provoking to the Corinthians?

Anaxagoras, who was the firſt of the Greeks that taught this theology,—That not the ſun, but the Creator of it, was God, was accounted an Atheiſt by a people who had made the utmoſt improvement of their parts, and was in the utmoſt danger of being ſtoned to death. The ſame Athenians expelled Protagoras of Abdera, their city, and cauſed his works to be burnt, becauſe he ſpoke, as they thought, diſreſpectfully of the Gods. They likewiſe baniſhed Diagoras, and promiſed a talent for a reward to him that ſhould ſlay him, becauſe he denied there was a God, or rather only ſet at nought the idols and falſe Gods of his time. The great Socrates, prince of the philoſophers, being ſuſpected of holding bad opinions of the Gods, was condemned to die by drinking a potion of hemlock. And if a bare ſuſpicion of innovation brought the philoſophers into ſo much danger; if perſons ſo greatly renowned for their wiſdom and underſtanding could not effect what they deſigned; can we account, in a natural way, for the ſucceſs of our Apoſtle, who was ſo far from being held in admiration, as the philoſophers whom I have mentioned were, that he was deſpiſed upon the account of his nation, his perſon, his mean occupation, and rudeneſs of ſpeech?

Plato was greatly admired by his countrymen, and very juſtly. And yet he himſelf confeſſed, that he durſt not, conſiſtent with his own ſecurity, diſcover his opinion of God to the folly of the multitude. Was it not as dangerous for St. Paul to diſcover to the Corinthians his notions, which were far more noble and exalted than thoſe of Plato?

The philoſophers and magiſtrates were not the only powerful adverſaries whom St. Paul had to encounter at Corinth. He could not but expect to meet with a very ſtrong oppoſition from the prieſts, the augurs, diviners, ſtatuaries, and many others whoſe intereſt it was that the ſuperſtitious religion of their anceſtors might be continued.

AND I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of ſpeech, or of wiſdom, declaring unto you the teſtimony of God.

Ver. 1. Ch. i. 17.

nued. All theſe would undoubtedly be as full of wrath, and raiſe as great an uproar againſt St. Paul, as Demetrius the ſilverſmith, and the workmen of like occupation did, when they heard him perſuade the people, that they are no Gods which are made with hands. In a word, a man of his good ſenſe, great penetration, foreſight, and experience, could not but expect to be accounted and treated as one who turned the world upſide down, a blaſphemer of their gods, and conſequently a ſubverter of the whole frame of their religion.

As the Apoſtle was ſure of the greateſt repugnance when he taught the Corinthians what they were to believe; ſo he muſt expect to meet with the utmoſt oppoſition when he endeavoured to perſuade them to ſet about the reformation and amendment of their lives: When he commanded them to flee fornication; when he taught them, that every other ſin that a man doth is without the pollution of the body; but he that committeth fornication ſinneth againſt and polluteth his own body; when he forbad them to eat with any brother who is a fornicator, and declared that God would pronounce the ſentence of condemnation upon whoremongers and adulterers,—He could not but foreſee, that the Corinthians would be averſe to his doctrine. "For Corinth was above all other cities, even to a proverb, infamous for fornication and laſciviouſneſs; ſo that in the language of the ancients, the words κορινθιάζειν and κορινθιάζεσθαι ſignify "to play the whore." Strabo informs us, that at Corinth there was a temple which maintained more than a thouſand conſecrated whores: And a temple in Cappadocia dedicated to Venus, was called μικρα Κορινθος, little Corinth, becauſe multitudes of women proſtituted themſelves in it. Nay, they did not only think fornication a thing indifferent in its own nature, but they even accounted inceſt lawful. It was no crime with them for a man to have his father's wife, and live adulterouſly with her in his father's lifetime; (Comp. 1 Cor. v. 1. with 2 Cor. vii. 12.) How then was it poſſible for the Apoſtle, without the help of God, to convince ſo debauched and laſcivious a people, that fornication and uncleanneſs ought not to be named among them, being crimes of a moſt deſtructive nature? Or how could he hope for ſucceſs when he informed them, that neither filthineſs, nor fooliſh talking, nor jeſting, which are not convenient, were to be named among them? Or when he acquainted them, that at the day of judgement men were to give an account of every idle word which they had ſpoken? Or when he declared, that whoſoever is angry with his brother without a cauſe, ſhall be in danger of the judgement? Or when he told them, that whoſoever looketh on a woman to luſt after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart? Laſtly, how could he in a natural way prevail upon a people, who were proud and ambitious, debauched and intemperate, revengeful and envious, contentious and litigious, to embrace a religion which taught humility, ſobriety, temperance, the forgiving of injuries, love, charity, moderation, meekneſs, and univerſal benevolence? We are all of us very ſenſible what a difficult matter it is to perſuade men to become in love with virtue, who have been long accuſtomed to a vicious courſe of life. Even perſons who know the terror of the Lord, who are fully perſuaded and do ſincerely believe, that a dreadful day will come, when they muſt give a ſtrict account of all their actions, are with great difficulty reclaimed from the error of their way, if their ſins have had the growth of many years. And if old habitual ſinners, who do really believe the Goſpel, and conſequently expect to be judged for their actions, are ſeldom, or with great difficulty, reformed; how will an unbeliever account for the Apoſtle's perſuading the Corinthians to lay aſide ſuch practices as they thought indifferent and innocent; ſuch practices, as were pleaſant and agreeable to depraved mankind? How will he account for his convincing them, that their moſt ſolemn and religious ſolemnities were the greateſt abominations.

Having ſhewn what obſtacles St. Paul muſt neceſſarily meet with at Corinth from the Gentiles; I ſhall now enquire what oppoſition he might expect from the unbelieving Jews, who inhabited this city, when he undertook that glorious work of converting them from darkneſs to light, of giving knowledge of ſalvation to them, for the remiſſion of their ſins.

When he went to Corinth the city was full of Jews, whom the emperor Claudius had expelled from Rome. They were as bitter enemies as the Gentiles to the Chriſtian religion, and the preachers of it; And they hated St. Paul much more than the reſt of the Apoſtles, becauſe all of a ſudden, from being a violent perſecutor of the diſciples of the crucified Jeſus, and making havock of his church, he gave a convincing proof of the invincible power of our Saviour, by becoming one of the moſt zealous propagators of his religion. A people ſo much prejudiced againſt him, muſt be, nay were in fact greatly incenſed, when they heard him perſuade men to worſhip God in a manner different from what their law required. What a hatred muſt they have of him who aboliſhed circumciſion? How could our Apoſtle hope for ſucceſs, in a natural way, when he preached ſuch a doctrine to a people, who had read in one of their inſpired books, that God had threatened that ſoul ſhould be cut off which neglected this rite? How, without the aſſiſtance of God, could he, who taught ſuch a doctrine, ever think of making converts of Jews, whoſe religion was ſo much corrupted at our Saviour's coming into the world, that they held "that circumciſion was of ſufficient virtue to render them accepted of God, and to preſerve them from eternal ruin: That no circumciſed perſon goes to hell, God having promiſed to deliver them from it, for the merit of circumciſion; and having told Abraham that when his children fell into tranſgreſſion and did wicked works, he would remember the odour of their foreſkins, and would be ſatisfied with their piety." They were prejudiced againſt ſeveral other doctrines he taught, which they imagined derogated from the perfection and honour of their law. Such was the doctrine of making the church Catholic, by receiving the Gentiles into the privileges of the true church, without ſubmitting to the ritual law, and not being juſtified by the works of the law, but by faith in the Meſſiah. They were prejudiced in favour of their law, as unchangeable and eternal; or as the neceſſary means of juſtifying a ſinner before God. Without the interpoſition of God, the Apoſtle could never hope to perſuade them, who had been informed in their ſacred books that the Meſſiah was to have an everlaſting kingdom, a throne for ever and ever, That he ſhould be great unto the ends of the earth, and was to abide for ever, to raiſe up the tribes of Jacob, and reſtore the preſerved of Iſrael; to have a portion divided him with the great, and to divide the ſpoil with the ſtrong; to have dominion and glory, and a kingdom; that all people, nations, and languages ſhould ſerve him; that his dominion is an everlaſting dominion, which ſhall not paſs away, and his kingdom that which ſhall not be deſtroyed: Without the divine aid, I ſay, the Apoſtle could never hope to perſuade the Jews, who expected ſuch a triumphant Meſſiah, to believe that Jeſus was the Chriſt, who had ſuffered that death, which by the law was counted execrable. The crucifixion of Chriſt, as the Apoſtle himſelf has informed us, was unto the Jews a ſtumbling-block. And in Juſtin Martyr, Trypho the Jew ſays, "Your Jeſus having by this, fallen under the extremeſt curſe of the law of God, we cannot but ſufficiently admire that you ſhould expect any good from God, who place your hopes in a man that was crucified; for our law ſtiles every one that is crucified accurſed." And Theophylact informs us, that the Jews objected; "How can he be God, who did eat and drink with publicans and harlots, and was at laſt crucified with thieves?" See on ver. 22—24.

To all that has been ſaid I may ſtill farther add, that the danger which attended the profeſſion of Chriſtianity would deter both Jew and Gentile from embracing it. A man no ſooner became a Chriſtian, than he expoſed himſelf to all the miſeries that human nature is capable of ſuffering. Had our Apoſtle therefore made uſe of all the eloquence he was maſter of, yet had not God been with him, he could not have perſuaded the Corinthians to become Chriſtians. According to Jerome, St. Paul was no orator:—"He uſes words peculiar to the Cilicians; ſome of his expreſſions are low, trivial, and vulgar; he could not expreſs his profound ſentiments in Greek, and was ignorant of the rules of grammar." We cannot however by any means ſubſcribe to this opinion of Jerome; the contrary has been often ſhewn; nor is the argument at all wanting. This famous linguiſt moreover aſſures us, that there are ſome ſoleciſms in his writings, and that he ſpoke truly when he ſaid, he was rude in ſpeech, though not in knowledge. St. Jerome does not ſpeak this to the diſparagement of St. Paul; But from hence he argues, that God was with him. The inference which this learned writer draws from theſe premiſes, is certainly valid.

But it will be objected, that his premiſes are not juſt. Be it ſo. Suppoſe our Apoſtle was a very great orator, yet he made no uſe of his eloquence in converting the Corinthians. He preached the Goſpel in the moſt plain and ſimple manner, to as wicked and debauched a people as any in the world: He delivered the moſt pure and heavenly doctrine, the ſtricteſt and ſevereſt precepts that had ever been taught mankind; and yet he confounded the mighty and the noble, and gained a victory over their orators and philoſophers. I conclude therefore that this ſucceſs muſt be attributed, not to a natural, but divine cauſe, and conſequently that the Goſpel is the word of truth. See the Chriſtian's Magazine, vol. 2.

Chap. II. Ver. 1.] As a further argument to keep them from glorying in their leaders, St. Paul tells the Corinthians, that as the preachers of the Goſpel, of God's chooſing, were mean and illiterate men, ſo the Goſpel was not to be propagated, nor men to be eſtabliſhed in the faith, by human learning and eloquence; but by the evidence it had from the revelation contained in the Old Teſtament, and from the power of God accompanying and confirming it with miracles. ver. 1—5.

I—came not with excellency of ſpeech] With the pomp of language. Doddridge. This may allude to the vain affectation of ſublimity and ſubtilty ſo common among the Greeks of that age, and very remote from the true eloquence in which our Apoſtle did ſo remarkably excel. It has been aſſerted, (as above) that the Apoſtle laboured under a great impediment in his ſpeech, from a ſtammering or a ſqueaking ſhrilneſs in his voice. Others chooſe to apply the words to his defect in oratory, and want of experience in the Greek language: both which may be looked upon as wide of the mark, and not the Apoſtle's meaning in this verſe; which can be no other than that aſſigned in the beginning of the note. It appears from hence, that he was far from taking advantage of a higher education, ſuperior learning, and greater uſe of the world, and by this conduct put himſelf upon a level with the other Apoſtles. But an impoſtor, whoſe aim had been power, would have acted a contrary part; he would have availed himſelf of all thoſe advantages; he would have extolled them as highly as poſſible; he would have ſet himſelf up, by virtue of them, as head of the ſect to which he acceded, or at leaſt of the proſelytes made by himſelf. This is no more than was done by every philoſopher who formed a ſchool; much more was it natural in one who propagated a new religion. But

2 For I determined not to know any thing among you, ſave Jeſus Chriſt, and him crucified.

3 And I was with you in weakneſs, and in fear, and in much trembling.

4 And my ſpeech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wiſdom, but in demonſtration of the Spirit, and of power:

5 That your faith ſhould not ſtand in the wiſdom of men, but in the power of God.

6 Howbeit, we ſpeak wiſdom among them that are perfect: yet not the wiſdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought:

7 But we ſpeak the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, even the hidden wiſdom which as his conduct was the reverſe, he ſhewed that he acted upon higher principles than any philoſopher, and that fame was no motive for his profeſſing himſelf a Chriſtian, and for endeavouring to make others Chriſtians likewiſe. By the teſtimony of God is meant, "what God hath revealed and teſtified in the Old Teſtament." The Apoſtle declares, that when he preached the Goſpel to the Corinthians, he made uſe of no human ſcience, no inſinuations of eloquence, no ſpeculations of philoſophy, no embelliſhments of human learning; all his arguments were, as he tells them, ver. 4. from the revelation of the Spirit of God, in the predictions of the Old Teſtament, and the miracles which he himſelf did among them; that their faith might be owing intirely to the Spirit of God, and not to the abilities and wiſdom of man. Inſtead of μαρτύριον, which we render teſtimony, ſeveral ancient MSS. read μυςήριον, myſtery. There may be ſomething ſaid in favour of this reading; for though the Apoſtle owns the doctrine of the Goſpel, dictated by the Spirit of God, to be contained in the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament, and built upon revelation; yet he every where teaches that it remained a ſecret there, not underſtood till they were led into the hidden evangelical meaning of thoſe paſſages, by the coming of Jeſus Chriſt, and by the aſſiſtance of the Spirit, in the times of the Meſſiah, and then publiſhed to the world by the preachers of the Goſpel; and therefore he calls it, eſpecially that part of it which relates to the Gentiles, almoſt every where μυςήριον, myſtery. See particularly Rom. xvi. 25, 26. Locke, Wetſtein, and lord Lyttelton on St. Paul's Converſion.

Ver. 2. For I determined not to know any thing, &c.] The word rendered to know, is uſed according to the Hebrew idiom, to cauſe to know, or to teach. St. Paul, who was himſelf a learned man, eſpecially in the Jewiſh knowledge, having told them in the foregoing chapter, that neither the Jewiſh learning nor Grecian ſciences give a man any advantage, as an inſpired teacher and miniſter of the Goſpel, He here reminds them that he made no ſhew or uſe of either of them, when he planted the Goſpel amongſt them; intimating thereby that thoſe were not the things for which their teachers were to be valued or followed. There ſeems to be a peculiar emphaſis in the expreſſion among YOU, as if the Apoſtle had ſaid, "I did not change my uſual method at Corinth; and you know with what glorius ſucceſs it was attended." The Greek of the laſt clauſe is καὶ τȣ̃τον ἐςαυρωμένον,—even that crucified perſon. The Jews and heathens evidently gave our Lord this name by way of contempt; but St. Paul declares, that inſtead of concealing this as an infamy and ſcandal, it was the main thing he inſiſted upon; as indeed all the moſt important doctrines of the Goſpel ſtand in a cloſe and natural connection with it: and no doubt but he took them in that connection; for he refers, in the courſe of theſe epiſtles, to ſeveral doctrines relating to the Father and the Holy Spirit, as what he had taught them, though not expreſly included in the doctrine of the crucifixion. See Locke, Doddridge, and Macknight.

Ver. 3. I was with you in weakneſs] St. Paul, by thus ſetting forth his own modeſt and humble behaviour amongſt them, reflects on the contrary carriage of their falſe Apoſtle; which he deſcribes at length, 2 Cor. xi. 20. See alſo Acts xviii. 6, 9.

Ver. 4. But in demonſtration of the Spirit, and of power] There were two ſorts of arguments wherewith the Apoſtle confirmed the Goſpel; the one was the revelations made concerning our Saviour by types and figures, and prophecies of him under the law; the other, miracles and miraculous gifts, accompanying the firſt preachers of the Goſpel, in the publiſhing and propagating of it. The latter of theſe St. Paul here calls power, the former he terms the Spirit; and ſo ver. 12, and 14. The things of the Spirit of God, and ſpiritual things, are things which are revealed by the Spirit of God, and not diſcoverable by our natural faculties. Locke. The archbiſhop of Cambray, inſtead of inticing words of man's wiſdom, renders the Greek Perſuaſive diſcourſes of human wiſdom.

Ver. 5. That your faith ſhould not ſtand, &c.] Their faith being built wholly on divine revelation and miracles, whereby all human abilities were ſhut out, there could be no reaſon for any of them to boaſt themſelves of their teachers, or value themſelves upon their being followers of this or that preacher; which St. Paul here obviates. See Locke.

Ver. 6. Howbeit, we ſpeak wiſdom, &c.] The next argument the Apoſtle uſes, to ſhew them that they had no reaſon to glory in their teachers, is, that the knowledge of the Goſpel was not attainable by our natural parts, however they were improved by art and philoſophy, but was wholly owing to revelation. ver. 6—16. Perfect, in this verſe, is the ſame with ſpiritual, ver. 15. One that is ſo perfectly well apprized of the divine nature and original of the Chriſtian religion, that he ſees and acknowledges it to be all a pure revelation from God, and not in the leaſt the product of human diſcovery, parts, or learning; and ſo, deriving it wholly from what God hath taught by his Spirit in the Sacred Scriptures, allows not the leaſt part of it to be aſcribed to the ſkill or abilities of men. Thus perfect is oppoſed to carnal, ch. iii. 1, 3. that is, ſuch babes in Chriſtianity, ſuch weak and miſtaken Chriſtians, that they thought the Goſpel was to be managed as human arts and ſciences amongſt men of the world, and that thoſe were better inſtructed and more in the right, who followed this maſter or teacher, rather than another; and thus, glorying in being the diſciples, one of Paul, another of Apollos, fell into diviſions and parties about it, and vaunted one over another: whereas, in the ſchool of Chriſt, all was to be built on the authority of God alone, and the revelation of his Spirit in the Sacred Scriptures. Dr. Waterland reads the clauſe, Howbeit, we teach wiſdom in things moſt excellent. See Ezra ii. 63. By the wiſdom of this world, is meant the knowledge, arts, and ſciences attainable by man's natural parts and faculties; ſuch as man's wit could find out, cultivate and improve, and ſuch as the princes of this world approve, encourage, and endeavour to propagate.—Though by ἀρχόντες τȣ̃ αἰῶνος τȣ́τȣ, may here be underſtood the princes or great men of this world, in the ordinary ſenſe of theſe words, ſays Mr. Locke; yet he that well conſiders ver. 28 of the foregoing chapter, and ver. 8 of this chapter, may find reaſon to think, that the Apoſtle here principally deſigns the rulers and great men of the Jewiſh nation. If it be objected, that there is little ground to think that St. Paul, by the wiſdom he diſowns, ſhould mean that of his own nation, which the Greeks of Corinth (whom he was writing to) had little acquaintance with, and had very little eſteem for,—I reply, that to underſtand this right, and the pertinency of it, we muſt remember, that the great deſign of St. Paul in writing to the Corinthians was, to take them off from the reſpect and eſteem that many of them had for a falſe Apoſtle who was got in among them, and had there raiſed a faction againſt St. Paul. This pretended Apoſtle, it is plain from 2 Cor. xi. 22. was a Jew, and as it ſeems, 2 Cor. v. 16, 17. valued himſelf upon that account, and poſſibly boaſted himſelf to be a man of note, either by birth, or alliance, or place, or learning among the people, who counted themſelves the holy and illuminated people of God; and therefore to have a right to ſway among theſe new heathen converts. To obviate this claim of his to any authority, St. Paul here tells the Corinthians, that the wiſdom and learning of the Jewiſh nation led them not into the knowledge of the wiſdom of God, i. e. the Goſpel revealed in the Old Teſtament; evident in this, that it was their rulers and rabbies, who, ſtiffly adhering to the notions and prejudices of their nation, had crucified Jeſus the Lord of glory, and were now themſelves, with their ſtate and religion, upon the point to be ſwept away and aboliſhed. It is to the ſame purpoſe that, 2 Cor. iv. 16—19. he tells the Corinthians, that he knows no man after the fleſh, i. e. that he acknowledges no dignity of birth, or deſcent, or outward national privileges. "The old things of the Jewiſh conſtitution are paſt and gone; whoever is in Chriſt, and entered into his kingdom, is in a new creation, wherein all things are new, all things are from God; no right, no claim, or preference derived to any one from any former inſtitution; but every one's dignity conſiſts ſolely in this, that God hath reconciled him to himſelf, not imputing his former treſpaſſes to him." Αἰὼν ȣ̔τος. which we tranſlate this world, ſeems to me to ſignify commonly, if not conſtantly, in the New Teſtament, that ſtate which during the Moſaical conſtitution, men, either Jews or Gentiles, were in, as contradiſtinguiſhed to the Evangelical ſtate or conſtitution; which is commonly called Ἀιὼν μέλλων, or ἐρχόμενος, The world to come.—Who come to nought, means, who are vaniſhing. If the wiſdom of this world, and of the princes of this world, be to be underſtood of the wiſdom and learning of the world in general, as contra-diſtinguiſhed to the doctrine of the Goſpel, then the words are added, to ſhew what folly it is for them to glory as they do in their teachers, when all that worldly wiſdom and learning, and the great men the ſupporters of it, would quickly be gone; whereas all true and laſting glory came only from Jeſus Chriſt, the Lord of glory. But if theſe words are to be underſtood of the Jews, as ſeems moſt conſonant both to the main deſign of the Epiſtle, and to St. Paul's expreſſions here, then his telling them that the princes of the Jewiſh nation are brought to nought, is to take them off from glorying in their judaizing falſe Apoſtle; ſince the authority of the rulers of that nation in matters of religion was now at an end, and they, with all their pretences, and their very conſtitution itſelf, were upon the point of being aboliſhed and ſwept away, for having rejected and crucified the Lord of Glory. See Locke.

Ver. 7. We ſpeak the wiſdom of God] The wiſdom of God is uſed here

God ordained before the world, unto our glory:

8 Which none of the princes of this world knew: for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.

9 But, as it is written, Eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him:

10 But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit ſearcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God.

11 For what man knoweth the things of a man, ſave the ſpirit of man which is in him? even ſo the things of God knoweth, no man, but the Spirit of God.

12 Now we have received, not the ſpirit of the world, but the ſpirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God.

13 Which things alſo we ſpeak, not in the words which man's wiſdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghoſt teacheth; comparing ſpiritual things with ſpiritual.

14 But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are fooliſhneſs unto him; neither can he know them, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned.

15 But he that is ſpiritual judgeth all things, yet he himſelf is judged of no man.

16 For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may inſtruct him? But we have the mind of Chriſt.

here for the doctrine of the Goſpel, coming immediately from God by the revelation of his Spirit, and in this chapter is ſet in oppoſition to all knowledge, diſcoveries, and improvements whatſoever, attainable by human induſtry, parts, and ſtudy, all which he calls the wiſdom of the world, and man's wiſdom;—Thus diſtinguiſhing the knowledge of the Goſpel, which was derived wholly from revelation, and could be had no other way, from all other knowledge whatſoever. What the Spirit of God had revealed of the Goſpel during the times of the law, was ſo little underſtood by the Jews, in whoſe ſacred writings it was contained, that it might well be called the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, i. e. declared in obſcure prophecies, and myſterious expreſſions and types. Though this be undoubtedly ſo, as appears by what the Jews both thought and did when Jeſus the Meſſiah, exactly anſwering what was foretold of him, came amongſt them, Yet by the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, wherein it was hid, though propoſed by God before the ſettling of the Jewiſh œconomy, St. Paul ſeems more particularly to mean what the Gentiles, and conſequently the Corinthians, were more peculiarly concerned in; viz. God's purpoſe of calling the Gentiles to be his people under the Meſſiah; which, though revealed in the Old Teſtament, yet was not in the leaſt underſtood till the times of the Goſpel, and the preaching of St. Paul, the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, which therefore he ſo frequently calls a myſtery. The reading and comparing Rom. xvi. 25, 26. Eph. iii. 3—9. ch. vi. 19, 20. Col. i. 26, 27. ii. 1—8. and iv. 3, 4. will give light to this. To which give me leave to obſerve upon the uſe of the word wiſdom here, that St. Paul, ſpeaking of God's calling the Gentiles, cannot, in mentioning it, forbear expreſſions of his admiration of the great and incomprehenſible wiſdom of God therein. See Eph. iii. 8, 10. Rom. xi. 33. Πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων ſignifies properly, before the ages; and I think it may be doubted whether theſe words, before the world, do exactly render the ſenſe of the place. That αἰὼν, or αἰῶνες, ſhould not be tranſlated the world, as in many places they are, I ſhall give one convincing inſtance, among many that might be brought, viz. Eph. iii. 9. compared with Col. i. 26. The words in Coloſſians are, τὸ μυςήριον τὸ ἀποκεκρυμμένον ἀπὸ αἰώνων, thus rendered in the Engliſh tranſlation, which hath been hidden from ages; but in Eph. iii. 9. a parallel place, the ſame words, τȣ̃ μυςηρίȣ τȣ̃ ἀποκεκρυμμένȣ ἀπὸ των αιώνων, are tranſlated, The myſtery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid; whereas it is plain from Col. i. 26. ἀπὸ τῶν αιωών does not ſignify the epoch or commencement of the concealment, but thoſe from whom it was concealed. It is plain the Apoſtle, in the verſe immediately preceding, and that following this which we have before us, ſpeaks of the Jews; and therefore πρὸ των αιώνων here, may be well underſtood to mean before the ages of the Jews; and ſo απ᾽ αιώνων, from the ages of the Jews, in the other two mentioned texts. Why αιῶνες, in theſe and other places, (as Luke i. 70 Acts iii. 21. and elſewhere,) ſhould be appropriated to the ages of the Jews, may be owing to their counting by ages, or jubilees. See Mr. Locke, and Dr. Burthogge's in his judicious treatiſe, "Chriſtianity a revealed Myſtery," c. ii. p. 17. Inſtead of before this world, Dr. Waterland reads before this age; and ſo ver. 8.

Ver. 8. They would not have crucified] The force of the original is, They would not by any means. Comp. Luke xxiii. 34. St. Paul, in the cloſe of the foregoing verſe, oppoſes the true glory of a Chriſtian, to the glorying which was amongſt the Corinthians in the eloquence, learning, or any other quality of their factious leaders: for in all his expreſſions he has an eye on his main purpoſe; as if he ſhould have ſaid, "Why do you make diviſions, by glorying as you do, in your different teachers? The glory to which God hath ordained us Chriſtian teachers and profeſſors, is to be expounders, preachers, and believers of thoſe revealed truths and purpoſes of God, which, though contained in the Sacred Scriptures of the Old Teſtament, were not underſtood in former ages. This is all the glory that belongs to us, the diſciples of Chriſt, who is the Lord of all power and glory, and herein has given us what far excels that whereof Jews or Gentiles had any expectations from what they gloried in." See the next verſe. Thus St. Paul takes away all matter of glorying from the falſe Apoſtle, and his factious followers among the Corinthians. See Locke, and 2 Cor. iii. 6—11.

Ver. 11. Knoweth no man] Knoweth no one. Wat. Theſe words muſt ſignify the perfect acquaintance with all the divine ſchemes and purpoſes which the Holy Spirit had, and which the Apoſtle's argument directly proves that no creature can have: ſo that in this paſſage we have a ſtrong proof of the divinity of the Spirit; and accordingly it has been urged as ſuch by all who have defended that important doctrine. See Bp. Pearſon on the Creed, and Ridley's Sermons at lady Moyer's Lectures.

Ver. 12. Now we have received] We, the true Apoſtles,—or rather I; for though he ſpeaks in the plural number, to avoid oſtentation, as they might interpret it, yet he is here juſtifying himſelf, and ſhewing the Corinthians, that none of them had reaſon to forſake and ſlight him, in order to follow and cry up their falſe apoſtle. That he ſpeaks of himſelf, is plain from the next verſe, compared with ver. 1. and ch. i. 17.—As he puts "princes of the world," ver. 6. and 8. for the rulers of the Jews, ſo here he puts ſpirit of the world for the nations of the Jews; that worldly ſpirit wherewith they interpreted the Old Teſtament, and the prophecies of the Meſſiah and his kingdom; which ſpirit, in contradiſtinction to the Spirit of God, received by the Roman converts, he calls The ſpirit of bondage, Rom. viii. 15. See Locke.

Ver. 13. Comparing ſpiritual things, &c.] Explaining, &c. Waterland, Wall, Elſner. "Comparing one part of revelation with another." It is plain, ſays Mr. Locke, that the ſpiritual things he here ſpeaks of, are unſearchable counſels of God, revealed by his Holy Spirit in the Sacred Scriptures. This expreſſion may ſerve to convince us of the great regard which we ought always to maintain for the words of Scripture; and may eſpecially teach miniſters how attentively they ſhould ſtudy its beauties, and how careful they ſhould be to make it the ſupport of their diſcourſes. Dr. Bentley propoſed a ſmall alteration in this verſe; he would have us read, inſtead of διδακτοῖς,—αδιδακτοῖς, in oppoſition to what precedes: Not the words taught by men's wiſdom, but in the UNTAUGHT words of the Spirit. See Wetſtein.

Ver. 14, 15. But the natural man, &c.] But the ſenſual man. Wat. The natural man and the ſpiritual man are oppoſed by St. Paul in theſe verſes; the one ſignifying a man who has no higher principles to build on, than thoſe of natural reaſon; the other, a man who founds his faith and religion on divine revelation. This is what appears to be meant by natural, or rather animal man,—ψυχικος,—and ſpiritual, as they ſtand oppoſed in theſe two verſes. There are ſome who ſuppoſe with Dr. Waterland, that ψυχικὸς implies ſomething further; namely, the ſenſual man, who continues under the influence of his appetites and paſſions, and is a ſtranger to the noble exerciſes and principles of the divine life. See James iii. 15. Jude, ver. 19. Locke, Owen, and the 2d volume of The Phœnix, p. 544. Inſtead of judgeth all things, Dr. Waterland, following Bos, reads, judgeth of every man.

Ver. 16. That he may inſtruct him] "Him, refers here to ſpiritual man in the former verſe, ſays Mr. Locke; for St. Paul is ſhewing, not that a natural man, and a mere philoſopher, cannot inſtruct Chriſt;—this nobody, pretending to be a Chriſtian, could imagine;—but that a man, by his bare natural parts, not knowing the mind of the Lord, could not inſtruct, could not judge, could not correct a preacher of the Goſpel, who built upon revelation as he did; and therefore it was ſure that he had the mind of Chriſt." Many interpreters, however, think it more agreeable to the conſtruction, and its

CHAP. III.

Milk is fit for children. Strife and diviſion, arguments of a fleſhly mind. He that planteth, and he that watereth, is nothing. The miniſters are God's fellow-workmen. Chriſt the only foundation. Men the temples of God, which muſt be kept holy. The wiſdom of this world is fooliſhneſs with God.

AND I, brethren, could not ſpeak unto you as unto ſpiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Chriſt.

2 I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able.

3 For ye are yet carnal: for whereas there is among you envying, and ſtrife, and diviſions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men?

4 For while one ſaith, I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos, are ye not carnal?

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, connection with what follows, by Him to underſtand GOD. This part of the Epiſtle is very artificially conducted: the Apoſtle is now aiming at the great point of eſtabliſhing his authority, which had been ſuſpected amongſt them; yet he does not directly propoſe, but obliquely inſinuate arguments againſt ſuch ſuſpicions; arguments which might poſſeſs their minds, before they were aware of what he intended to effect by them. This important remark will often preſent itſelf to the attentive reader of St. Paul's Epiſtles. See Doddridge, Guyſe, and Pyle.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. II.

It ſhould be the reſolution of every Chriſtian, and eſpecially the determination of every miniſter, to know nothing but Jeſus Chriſt, and him crucified; (ver. 2.) to eſteem this the moſt important of all knowledge, to cultivate it in their own minds, and endeavour to propagate it to others. Fraught with this divine ſcience, thoſe miniſters of the Goſpel who know leaſt of the excellency of ſpeech, and the inticing words of man's wiſdom, will do more important ſervice for the reformation of the world, and the ſalvation of ſouls, than without it the greateſt maſters of language, or adepts in philoſophy will ever be able to effect. Let the princes of this world boaſt of the knowledge and refined policy, which is ſo ſoon to periſh, (ver. 6.) by which ſo many of their ſubjects periſh, and ſometimes themſelves before their time:—In how many inſtances does it leave them to imitate the deſtructive maxims of thoſe, who, under pretence of public good, but really under the inſtigation of the baſeſt private paſſions, crucify Jeſus, the adorable Saviour,—the Lord of glory! ver. 8.

We ſhould continually pray to God to teach us more of that hidden wiſdom, which they who are truly initiated into real Chriſtianity know, and which opens upon us views and hopes beyond what eye hath ſeen, or ear heard, or it hath particularly and fully entered into the heart of man to conceive. ver. 9. There is no need we ſhould diſtinctly conceive it; it is enough that we know in the general it is what God hath prepared for them who love him. A conſideration, which may ſurely teach us to deſpiſe that which he ſo often beſtows on thoſe who hate him; on thoſe with whom he is angry every day.

Happy will it be, if that Spirit which ſearcheth all things, even the hidden things of God, ſhall give us more deeply and affectionately to know the things which are freely given us of God, and to adore that grace from which we receive it. Theſe things we learn with the higheſt advantage from the Holy Scriptures, where they are delivered in words which the Holy Ghoſt taught, ver. 12, 13. words therefore the moſt admirably adapted to expreſs thoſe ſpiritual and ſublime ideas they were intended to communicate; and in which, conſequently we learn to ſpeak of the things of God with the exacteſt propriety, and the trueſt edification.

May we be enabled ſpiritually to diſcern them, with whatever contempt they may be treated by natural, that is animal men; by thoſe who, though conceited of their rational powers, can reliſh little or nothing but what relates to this low and ſenſual life! ver. 14. Conſcious of that inward diſcerning, which diſcovers all things to us in their true light, even things of infinite importance, may we pity that undiſcerning raſhneſs of blind arrogance and pride, with which ſome who think themſelves the wiſeſt, in proportion to the degree in which they are the moſt wretched of mankind, may treat us; and not only us, but that Goſpel which is our glory and our joy. ver. 15. We have the mind of Chriſt delivered to us by his holy Apoſtles, who were intimately and miraculouſly inſtructed in it. Let us humbly receive the oracles they deliver; and whilſt others are preſuming haughtily to reſcue them, may we think ourſelves happy if, with meek ſubmiſſion to their unerring authority, we may ſit at the feet of ſuch teachers, and regulate our lives by their inſtructions!

Chap. III. Ver. 1.] The next matter of boaſting, which the faction made uſe of to give the pre-eminence and preference to their leader above St. Paul, ſeems to have been this, That their new teacher had led them farther, and given them a deeper inſight into the myſteries of the Goſpel than St. Paul had done. To take away their glorying on this account, St. Paul tells them, that they were carnal, and not capable of thoſe more advanced truths, or any thing beyond the firſt principles of Chriſtianity which he had taught them; and though another had come and watered what he had planted, yet neither planter nor waterer could aſſume to himſelf any glory from thence, becauſe it was God alone that gave the increaſe. But whatever new doctrines they might pretend to receive from their magnified new apoſtle, yet no man could lay any other foundation in a Chriſtian church, but what he (St. Paul) had laid; viz. that Jeſus is the Chriſt; and therefore there was no reaſon to glory in their teachers, becauſe upon this foundation they poſſibly might build falſe or unſound doctrines, for which they ſhould receive no thanks from God, though, continuing in the faith, they might be ſaved. Some of the hay and ſtubble which this leader brought into the church at Corinth, he ſeems particularly to point at, ch. iii. 16, 17. viz. their defiling the church by retaining, and as it may be ſuppoſed patronizing, the fornicator, who ſhould have been turned out; ch. v. 7—13. He further adds, that theſe extolled heads of their party were at beſt but men, and none of the church ought to glory in men; for even Paul, and Apollos, and Peter, and all the other preachers of the Goſpel, were for the uſe, and benefit, and glory of the church, as the church was for the glory of Chriſt. Moreover, he ſhews them that they ought not to be puffed up on account of theſe their new teachers, to the undervaluing of him, though it ſhould be true, that they had learned more from them, than from himſelf,—for theſe reaſons: 1. Becauſe all the preachers of the Goſpel are but ſtewards of the myſteries of God, and whether they have been faithful in their ſtewardſhip cannot be now known; and therefore they ought not to be ſome of them magnified and extolled, and others depreſſed and blamed by their hearers here, till Chriſt their Lord came; and then he, knowing how they have behaved themſelves in their miniſtry, will give them their due praiſes. Beſides, theſe ſtewards have nothing but what they have received, and therefore no glory belongs to them for it. 2. Becauſe if theſe leaders were (as was pretended) apoſtles, glory, and honour, and outward affluence here was not their portion, the Apoſtles being deſtined to want, contempt, and perſecution. 3. They ought not to be honoured, followed, and gloried in, as apoſtles, becauſe they had not the power of miracles, which he intended ſhortly to come and ſhew they had not. ch. iii. 1.—iv. 20. See Locke.

As unto ſpiritual] Here ſpiritual is oppoſed to carnal, as in ch. ii. 14. it is to natural or animal; ſo that here we have three ſorts of men: 1. Carnal; i. e. ſuch as are ſwayed by fleſhly paſſions and intereſts: 2. Animal; i. e. ſuch as ſeek wiſdom, or a way to happineſs, only by the ſtrength and guidance of their own natural parts, without any ſupernatural light coming from the Spirit of God;—by reaſon, without revelation;—by philoſophy, without Scripture: 3. Spiritual; i. e. ſuch as ſeek their direction to happineſs, not in the dictates of natural reaſon and philoſophy, but in the revelations of the Spirit of God in the Holy Scriptures. By babes in Chriſt, are meant ſuch, as had not their underſtandings yet fully opened to the true grounds of the Chriſtian religion, but retained a great many childiſh thoughts about it, as appeared by their diviſions,—one for the doctrine of his maſter Paul; another for that of his maſter Apollos; which, if they had been ſpiritual, that is, had looked upon the doctrine of the Goſpel to have come ſolely from the Spirit of God, and to be had only from revelation, they could not have done: For then all human mixtures of any thing derived either from Paul or Apollos, or any other man, would have been wholly excluded. But they, in theſe diviſions, profeſſed to hold their religion one from one man, and another from another; and were thereupon divided into parties. This, he tells them, was to be carnal, and to walk as men,—to be led by principles purely human; i. e. to found their religion upon men's natural parts and diſcoveries; whereas the Goſpel was wholly built upon divine revelation, and nothing elſe; and from thence alone thoſe who were ſpiritual took it. See Locke.

Ver. 2. I have fed you with milk] "You being ſuch babes, ſuch mere beginners in the divine life, I could not go ſo far as I deſired in the great doctrines of the Chriſtian religion; but was obliged to content myſelf with inſtructing you in the firſt principles, the more obvious and eaſy doctrines of it. I could not apply myſelf to you, as to ſpiritual men, who could compare ſpiritual things with ſpiritual,—one part of Scripture with another; and thereby underſtand the truths revealed by the Spirit of God, diſcerning true from falſe doctrines; good and uſeful, from evil and vain opinions. See Heb. v. 12—14. Locke, and Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, vol. i. p. 72.

Ver. 3. And walk as men?] Speaking according to man, ſignifies, ſpeaking according to the principles of natural reaſon, in contradiſtinction to revelation. See ch. ix. 8. Gal. i. 11. and ſo walking according to man, muſt here be underſtood. See on ver. 1.

Ver. 4. I am of Apollos] From this verſe, compared with ch. iv. 6. it but miniſters by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?

6 I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increaſe.

7 So then, neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God, that giveth the increaſe.

8 Now he that planteth, and he that watereth are one: and every man ſhall receive his own reward, according to his own labour.

9 For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's huſbandry, ye are God's building.

10 According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wiſe maſter-builder I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

11 For other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jeſus Chriſt.

12 Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, wood, hay, ſtubble;

13 Every man's work ſhall be made manifeſt. For the day ſhall declare it, becauſe it ſhall be revealed by fire; and the fire ſhall try every man's work, of what ſort it is.

14 If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he ſhall receive a reward.

15 If any man's work ſhall be burned, he ſhall ſuffer loſs: but he himſelf ſhall be ſaved; yet ſo, as by fire.

16 Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?

17 If any man defile the temple of God, him ſhall God deſtroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

18 Let no man deceive himſelf. If any man among you ſeemeth to be wiſe in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wiſe.

it may be no improbable conjecture, ſays Mr. Locke, that the diviſion in this church, was owing to two oppoſite parties, whereof the one adhered to St. Paul, the other ſtood up for their head, a falſe Apoſtle, who oppoſed St. Paul. For the Apollos whom St. Paul mentions here was one, as he tells us ver. 6. who came in, and watered what he had planted; that is, when St. Paul had planted a church at Corinth, this apoſtle got into it, and pretended to inſtruct them further, and boaſted of his performances amongſt them, of which St. Paul takes notice again, 2 Cor. x. 15, 16. Now the Apollos whom he here ſpeaks of, he himſelf tells us, ch. iv. 6. was another man, under that borrowed name. It is true, St. Paul in his Epiſtles to the Corinthians, generally ſpeaks of theſe his oppoſers in the plural number; but it is to be remembered, that he ſpeaks thus of himſelf alſo; which, as it was the leſs invidious way, with regard to himſelf, ſo it was the ſofter way towards his oppoſer; though he ſeems to intimate plainly, that it was one leader, who was ſet up againſt him. Others, differing in ſentiment from Mr. Locke, think it much more probable from ch. iv. 6. that St. Paul choſe to make uſe of the name of Apollos, that he might give no offence, and to ſhew that he ſhould lament and condemn any diviſion among them, though it were in favour of himſelf, or the deareſt friend he had in the world;—And they cannot think that St. Paul would have deſcribed this ſuppoſed falſe apoſtle as watering his plantation, which he rather waſted; or have ſpoken of himſelf, and that meſſenger of Satan, as one; as he does ver. 8.

Ver. 5. Who then is Paul, &c.] Some would read this and the following verſe thus: Who is Paul, and who is Apollos, but miniſters by whom ye believed?—And as the Lord gave to every man, I planted, Apollos watered, &c. See Markland on Lyſias, p. 560.

Ver. 8. Are one] This is another cogent argument againſt diviſion,—that though their labours were different, and their rewards proportionable, yet they had in the general one office, and were employed as workers-together by God, to plant the ſeeds of grace and holineſs in the ſouls of men, and to bring them to perfection. St. Paul here introduces an excellent diſcourſe of the happy conſequences of faithfulneſs in the miniſterial work, and the aweful account of it to be given up to God.—A ſubject familiar to his own mind; and ſo proper for their teachers, that if it render the Epiſtle ſomething leſs regular, it balances the account, by rendering it ſo much more uſeful. See Craddock's Apoſtol. Hiſt. p. 156.

Ver. 9. For we are labourers together with God] For we are the fellow-labourers of God. Doddridge.

Ver. 12, 15. Now if any man build, &c.] "Though no man who pretends to be a preacher of the Goſpel can build upon any other foundation than that of Jeſus Chriſt, yet you ought not to cry up your new inſtructor (who has come and built upon the foundation that I laid) for the doctrines he builds thereon, as if there were no other miniſter of the Goſpel but he; for it is poſſible that a man may build upon that true foundation wood, hay, and ſtubble, things which will not bear the teſt, when the trial by fire at the laſt day ſhall come; (ch. iv. 5.) At that day every man's work ſhall be tried, and diſcovered of what ſort it is. If what he hath taught be found good, and will ſtand the trial,—as ſilver, and gold, and precious ſtones abide in the fire, he ſhall be rewarded for his labour in the Goſpel; but if he hath introduced falſe or unſound doctrine into Chriſtianity, he ſhall be like a man, whoſe building being of wood, hay, and ſtubble, is conſumed by the fire; all his pains in building are loſt, and his works deſtroyed and gone, though he himſelf ſhould eſcape and be ſaved." Inſtead of as by fire, the Greek might be rendered more properly as through the fire. To be a brand plucked out of the burning, is well known as a proverbial expreſſion, to ſignify a narrow eſcape from extreme danger. See Zech. iii. 2. Amos iv. 11. and eſpecially Iſai. xxxiii. 11, 12. to which ſome have thought the Apoſtle here alludes. Διὰ πυρὸς is put for paſſing through the fire, as δι' ὕδατος, 1 Pet. iii. 20. ſignifies, to be ſaved from the water by paſſing through it, as the ark did. See Jude 23.—The moſt approved heathen writers uſe the phraſe in this ſenſe. Many divines have well ſhewn how far this text is from giving any ſupport to a popiſh purgatory. See Locke, L'Enfant, Whitby, Stillingfleet, and Elſner.

Ver. 16. Know ye not that ye are the temple, &c.] "I told you that ye are God's building, ver. 9. I now obſerve more than that;—Ye are the temple of God, in which his Spirit dwells." Many of the firſt ancient writers repreſent a virtuous mind as the temple of God, and ſpeak in the higheſt and ſtrongeſt terms of the obligations men are under to keep his temples inviolate and unpolluted. And if, as Mr. Locke ſuppoſes, St. Paul's chief oppoſer was a Jew, the great veneration he would of courſe have for the temple at Jeruſalem would add great weight to this argument, with reſpect to him and his followers. However, be that as it may, one cannot conceive a more forcible argument for internal purity, than this, which leads us to conſider our bodies as the temple of God, inhabited by his ever-bleſſed and moſt holy Spirit. The word rendered defile, in the next verſe, more properly ſignifies deſtroy, and ſhould be ſo read, to keep up the contraſt. See Elſner, Wetſtein, Calmet, and Oſtervald's uſeful treatiſe "on Uncleanneſs."

Ver. 17. If any man] It is not unreaſonable to think, that, by any man, St. Paul deſigns one particular man;—namely, the falſe apoſtle, who, it is probable, by the ſtrength of his party ſupporting and retaining the fornicator mentioned ch. v. in the church, had defiled it;—which may be the reaſon why St. Paul ſo often mentions fornication in this Epiſtle, and that in ſome places with particular emphaſis; as ch. v. 9. vi. 13—20. We may look upon moſt of the diſorders in this church as owing to the falſe apoſtle; which is the reaſon why St. Paul ſets himſelf ſo much againſt him in both theſe Epiſtles, and makes it almoſt the whole buſineſs of them to draw the Corinthians off from this leader; judging, as is probable, that the church could not be reformed ſo long as that perſon was in credit, and had a party among them. Locke.

Ver. 18. Let no man deceive himſelf] It was not neceſſary for St. Paul, writing to the Corinthians, who knew the matter of fact, to particularize what it was wherein the craftineſs of the perſon here mentioned had appeared: therefore it was left us to gueſs; and poſſibly we ſhall not be much out, if we take it to be the keeping the fornicator from cenſure, ſo much inſiſted on by St. Paul, ch. v. That by σοφὸς, or wiſe,—[ſeemeth to be wiſe in this world] the Apoſtle means a cunning man in buſineſs, is plain from his quotation in the next verſe, 19 For the wiſdom of this world is fooliſhneſs with God. For it is written, He taketh the wiſe in their own craftineſs.

20 And again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wiſe, that they are vain.

21 Therefore, let no man glory in men: for all things are yours:

22 Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things preſent, or things to come; all are your's;

23 And ye are Chriſt's; and Chriſt is God's.

CHAP. IV.

In what account miniſters ought to be had. We have nothing which we have not received. The apoſtles, are ſpectacles to the world, angels, and men; the filth and off-ſcouring of the world; yet are they our fathers in Chriſt, whom we ought to follow.

LET a man ſo account of us, as of the miniſters of Chriſt, and ſtewards of the myſteries of God.

2 Moreover it is required in ſtewards, that a man be found faithful.

3 But with me it is a very ſmall thing that I ſhould be judged of you, or of man's judgement: yea, I judge not mine own ſelf.

4 For I know nothing by myſelf; yet am I not hereby juſtified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord.

5 Therefore, judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come; who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkneſs, and will make manifeſt the counſels of the hearts: and then ſhall every man have praiſe of God.

verſe, where the wiſe ſpoken of are the crafty. "If any man ſeemeth to himſelf or others wiſe in worldly wiſdom, ſo as to pride himſelf in his parts and dexterity in compaſſing his purpoſe, let him renounce all this wiſdom, that he may become truly wiſe in embracing and owning no other knowledge than the ſimplicity of the Goſpel." See Locke. Some would render the latter part of this verſe, If any one be wiſe among you, let him be a fool in this world, that he may become wiſe. See Bengelius, and 1 Tim. vi. 17.

Ver. 21—23. All things are yours, &c.] How magnificently are the happy privileges of Chriſtians through Chriſt ſet forth in this noble exultation! Firſt, here is a full and vehement enumeration of particulars; and then a noble gradation, which riſes up to the heaven of heavens, and terminates in God himſelf! See Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, and Bengelius.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. III.

Who, that wiſhes for the welfare of the church of Chriſt, muſt not lament thoſe ſad remains of carnality, (ver. 1.) which are often to be found among them who have the greateſt advantages for becoming ſpiritual, while the ſame contentious principles, fermented, no doubt, by the ſame malignant enemy of the whole body, breathe in ſo many of its members, and diffuſe a kind of poiſon which at once ſwells and torments it? What envyings, and ſtrife, and factions among thoſe, who ought to join as brethren, and to know but one intereſt! ver. 3. What a deſire, in many inſtances, to increaſe the burdens of each other, inſtead of bearing them with friendly ſympathy!

May Chriſtians be cured of this diſhonourable and fatal attachment to diſtinguiſhed parties, and human names! May miniſters feel more of that generous and noble ſpirit, which this great Apoſtle expreſſes ver. 4.!—His reaſoning hath the ſame force ſtill. Miniſters are ſtill intended to be only the inſtruments of producing and eſtabliſhing faith in their hearers, and ſtill depend as entirely as ever, upon the bleſſing of God, to give the increaſe to their labours, ver. 5—7. To that may they daily look; ſenſible that they are nothing without it; and that with it their part is ſo ſmall, that they hardly deſerve to be mentioned. May their hands and hearts be more united; and, retaining a due ſenſe of the honour which God doth them, in employing them in his vineyard, and in his building, (ver. 8, 9.) May they faithfully labour, not as for themſelves, but for the great Proprietor; and till the day come, when he will remember them in full proportion to their fidelity and diligence.

With what delight may the Chriſtian ſurvey this grand inventory, ver. 21—23. and conſcious that he is Chriſt's, call all things his own! With what pleaſure ſurvey the various gifts and graces of miniſters, and conſider them as given by God for his edification! With what complacency look round on things preſent, and forward on things to come, in this connection, and call the world his own; and count not only life, but death itſelf amongſt his treaſures! Both, in their different aſpects, are made ſubſervient to the happy purpoſe of glorifying God; and ſurely, when by death we may do it more effectually, death ſhould be more welcome than life. And welcome muſt it indeed be to every believer, as the appointed means of tranſmitting him to the ſight and enjoyment of God, and the poſſeſſions of better bleſſings than Paul or Apollos could ever deſcribe, or any thing preſent, or any thing to come, in this world, could ever afford.

How ſhould theſe ſublime views elevate the Chriſtian above thoſe occaſions of contention, which, for want of aſcending to ſuch noble contemplations, are often the ſource of innumerable evils! Nor let us fail to add that other conſideration, ver. 16, 17. If we are the temples of the Holy Ghoſt; if Chriſtians indeed, we are inhabited by God,—even by his Spirit. Let this engage us to take the ſtricteſt care, neither to defile ourſelves, nor to injure our brethren; leſt, in either view, it ſhould be reſented and puniſhed by the Holy God, as a ſacrilegious prophanation.

What cauſe have we to over-value the wiſdom of this world, when we find it ſo little regarded by the all-wiſe God? (ver. 19.) Let us not be greatly concerned, if fools account our wiſdom folly, and our life madneſs. So cenſured they the prophets and Apoſtles before us; nor did our Maſter himſelf eſcape the like calumny and outrage. Happy, ſufficiently happy ſhall we be, if we approve our fidelity to Him, —if we build a wiſe ſuperſtructure on Chriſt, (ver. 11.) as the great, the only foundation.

His miniſters eſpecially ſhould be ſollicitous that they loſe not the labour of their lives, by chooſing unhappily to employ them in that which will turn to no account in the great day of his appearing. Let ſuch carefully examine their materials: ver. 10. Surely if they have ſenſes ſpiritually exerciſed, it cannot be hard to diſtinguiſh between the ſubſtantial and undoubted doctrines of Chriſtianity, which are as gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones,—and thoſe fictitious, or at beſt dubious and intricate points, which in compariſon with the former, are but wood, hay, and ſtubble. ver. 12—15. And if in urging theſe, they paſſionately inveigh againſt their brethren, and endeavour to bring them into contempt or ſuſpicion, what do they, but cement theſe combuſtible materials with ſulphur?

O let the frequent views of that laſt ſearching fire, that grand period of all, be much in our thoughts; that day, (ver. 13.) when not only the works of miniſters, but every private perſon, muſt, as it were, paſs through the flames. May we then be ſaved, not with difficulty, but with praiſe and honour! May our works, of what kind ſoever they are, abide, ſo as to be found worthy of applauſe, and through divine grace receive a diſtinguiſhed reward?

Chap. IV. Ver. 1. Let a man ſo account of us, &c.] The Apoſtle intimates, that he was ſo far from arrogating the title aſſumed by the founders of the different ſects of philoſophy, and from wiſhing to have ſcholars denominated from him, that he would have no man think higher of him, than that he was a ſervant of Chriſt; and that the myſteries he revealed were no more his, than the money which a ſteward is employed to diſtribute in alms could be called his property. He was no maſter, no proprietor; but a ſervant, and a ſteward. See Locke and Doddridge.

Ver. 3. I judge not mine own ſelf] That is, "not ſo as if my caſe were to be finally determined by my own apprehenſions concerning it."

Ver. 4. For I know nothing by myſelf] "For though I bleſs God that I am not conſcious to myſelf of any thing criminal,—of any deſigned neglect of my office, or unfaithfulneſs in my truſt; yet am I not hereby juſtified." This ſeems a gentle, but a very affecting inſinuation, that his opponents, confident as they might ſeem in their own integrity and ſafety, would do well to take greater heed that they were not impoſed upon by the deceitfulneſs of their own hearts. See Locke and Doddridge.

Ver. 6. Will bring to light, &c.] Will caſt light upon, &c. MS. This is a lively and juſt inſinuation, that under ſpecious forms his enemies concealed very dark deſigns, which would not bear the diſcoveries of that aweful day. The next paſſage alſo ſuggeſts a very ſolid argument againſt magnifying one miniſter above another; namely, that the ſecret principles of man's actions are unknown; and it is enlarged upon to very good practical purpoſes: while the Apoſtle, at the

6 And theſe things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myſelf, and to Apollos, for your ſakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up for one, againſt another.

7 For who maketh thee to differ from another? and what haſt thou, that thou didſt not receive? now if thou didſt receive it, why doſt thou glory, as if thou hadſt not received it?

8 Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God ye did reign, that we alſo might reign with you.

9 For I think that God hath ſet forth us, the apoſtles, laſt, as it were appointed to death. For we are made a ſpectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men.

10 We are fools for Chriſt's ſake, but ye are wiſe in Chriſt; we are weak, but ye are ſtrong; ye are honourable, but we are deſpiſed.

11 Even unto this preſent hour we both hunger, and thirſt, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place;

12 And labour, working with our own hands. Being reviled, we bleſs; being perſecuted, we ſuffer it;

13 Being defamed, we intreat: we are made as the filth of the world, and are the off-ſcouring of all things unto this day.

14 I write not theſe things to ſhame you, but as my beloved ſons I warn you.

15 For though ye have ten thouſand inſtructors in Chriſt, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Chriſt Jeſus I have begotten you through the goſpel.

16 Wherefore I beſeech you, be ye followers of me.

17 For this cauſe have I ſent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved ſon, and faithful in the Lord, who ſhall bring you into remembrance of my ways which be in Chriſt, as I teach every where in every church.

18 Now ſome are puffed up, as though I would not come to you.

19 But I will come to you ſhortly, if the Lord will; and will know, not the ſpeech of them which are puffed up, but the power.

the ſame time takes an opportunity of making a very ſolemn profeſſion of his own faithfulneſs, and ſhewing the boldneſs he had towards God, and his modeſty and candour to men; all which were extremely ſuitable to the general purpoſes he had in view. See Doddridge and Calmet.

Ver. 6. I have in a figure transferred, &c.] Mr. Locke and ſome others, [ſee on ch. iii. 4.] have inferred from hence, that not Paul and Apollos, but ſome other perſons were ſet up amongſt the Corinthians for heads of parties, for whoſe names the Apoſtle ſubſtituted his own, and that of his moſt intimate friend. But Witſius obſerves, that it is probable their names were uſed, among ſome others omitted, and the figure was only this, that the names of St. Paul and Apollos were uſed to ſignify themſelves, or any others ſo extolled; and when the Apoſtle would ſay, how little miniſters were in themſelves, he choſe, out of humility and prudence, rather to take ſuch freedom with himſelf, and his moſt particular friend, than with any others. Inſtead of not to think, &c. Waterland would read not to think of yourſelves above what has been here written. See Witſius's Meletem. p. 104. Elſner, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 8. Now—ye have reigned, &c.] This is a proverbial expreſſion, uſed to ſignify the moſt ſplendid and affluent circumſtances; and ſome think, when the Apoſtle adds I wiſh ye did reign, he means, "I wiſh you had the authority of princes, that you might ſhelter and accommodate us, amidſt all our diſtreſſes and afflictions." But one can hardly conceive he did wiſh each of them a prince, or that the civil power were in their hands. It ſeems much more probable, that as ſpiritual objects were familiar to his mind, he changes the idea, and alludes to the terms in the Jewiſh œconomy; in reference to which Chriſtians are called prieſts and kings, and a royal prieſthood. See 1 Pet. ii. 9. Rev. i. 6. Doddridge, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 9. That God hath ſet forth us, the Apoſtles, laſt, &c.] The Apoſtle ſeems here to refer to the Roman cuſtom of bringing forth on the theatre, in the latter part of the day, either to fight with each other, or with wild beaſts, thoſe perſons who were appointed unto certain death, and who had not that chance of eſcaping, which thoſe brought forth in the morning had. Such kind of ſpectacles were ſo common in all the provinces, that it is no wonder we ſhould find ſuch an alluſion here. The word ἀπέδειξεν, ſet forth, or exhibited, and θέατρον, a ſpectacle on the theatre, have in this connection a beautiful propriety. The whole repreſentation is indeed wonderfully pathetic and ſublime: While they conſidered evil angels and men, as beholding them with all the malignant,—and good angels and men, with all the benevolent paſſions, it might have great tendency to inſpire their minds with the moſt heroic ſentiments. See Seneca's Epiſtles, ch. vii. Reeves's Apology, vol. i. p. 237. Locke, L'Enfant, and Elſner.

Ver. 10. We are weak] "In an infirm and ſuffering ſtate." See 2 Cor. xii. 10. Surely one cannot imagine any more glorious triumph of the truth, than what was gained in theſe circumſtances; when St. Paul, with an impediment in his ſpeech, and a perſon rather contemptible than graceful, appeared in a mean, and ſometimes tattered dreſs, before perſons of the higheſt rank, and yet commanded ſuch attention, and made ſuch impreſſions. See Doddridge and Poole.

Ver. 15. As the filth of the world] The word περικαθάρματα, rendered filth, hath a force and meaning, which no one word in our language can expreſs. It was applied to thoſe poor wretches, who, being of the dregs of the people, were offered up as expiatory ſacrifices, in times of any plague or public calamity, to the infernal deities. They were brought to the place of execution with cheeſe, dried figs, and a cake in their hands; and after being beaten with rods, they were burned, and their aſhes were caſt into the ſea, with the following ſentence: "Be thou an expiation; be thou a refuſe, or off-ſcouring." It ſhould be obſerved, that the word rendered expiation in that ſentence, is the ſame which is here rendered filth by our tranſlators. See on Lev. xvi. 24. Henry More's Theolog. Works, p. 63. Ridley's Chriſtian Paſſover, p. 22. Servius in Æneid. iii. lin. 75. Hammond, Whitby, and Bos.

Ver. 14. I write not theſe things to ſhame you] See 2 Cor. xi. 20. St. Paul here (from ver. 8. to 17.) by giving an account of his own conduct, gently rebukes them for following men of a different character, and exhorts them to be followers of himſelf.

Ver. 16. Be ye followers of me] This he preſſes again, ch. xi. 1. and it is not likely that he would have propoſed himſelf over and again to them to be followed by them, had the queſtion and conteſt amongſt them been only whoſe name they ſhould have borne, his, or their new teacher's. His propoſing himſelf therefore thus to be followed, muſt be underſtood in direct oppoſition to the falſe apoſtle who miſled them, and who was not to be ſuffered to have any credit or followers amongſt them. See Locke.

Ver. 17. For this cauſe have I ſent—Timotheus] This he does to ſhew, that what he taught and preſſed them to, was not in a pique againſt his oppoſer; but to convince them that all he did at Corinth was the very ſame, and no other than what he did every where, as a faithful ſteward and miniſter of the Goſpel. See Locke and Witſius.

20 For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power.

21 What will ye? ſhall I come unto you with a rod? or in love, and in the ſpirit of meekneſs?

CHAP. V.

The inceſtuous perſon is a cauſe rather of ſhame unto them, than of rejoicing. The old leaven is to be purged out. Heinous offenders are to be ſhunned and avoided.

Ver. 20. Ch. ii. 4. 1 Theſſ. i. 5. 2 Cor. x. 2. xiii. 10.

Ver. 21. Shall I come unto you with a rod] "Uſing my Apoſtolic power for your chaſtiſement. That the Apoſtles had often a miraculous power of inflicting death and other temporal judgements, in caſe of aggravated offence, appears from other paſſages of Scripture, and is more than once referred to in theſe Epiſtles to the Corinthians. See ch. v. 5. 2 Cor. i. 23. x. 6, 8. xiii. 2, 3, 10. One cannot but admire the wiſdom of Providence in permitting ſuch oppoſition to riſe againſt St. Paul, particularly at Corinth. It gave him an opportunity of making the ſtrongeſt appeals to what they are ſuppoſed to know of his miraculous power; and had not theſe appeals been founded on the moſt certain and evident truth, inſtead of reſtoring him to their regard, as we find in fact they did, they muſt have been ſufficient of themſelves utterly to have ruined all his reputation and intereſt amongſt them, had it before been ever ſo great. See Doddridge, Hammond, Locke, and the note on ver. 1. of the next chapter.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. IV.

Nothing can be more conducive to the advantage of Chriſtianity,—and by conſequence, of the world, whoſe happineſs is ſo much concerned in its ſupport and ſucceſs, than that its preachers ſhould conſider, and their hearers remember, the nature of their office. They are not lords over God's houſhold and heritage, but miniſters of Chriſt, whoſe buſineſs it is to promote their Maſter's honour; (ver. 1, 2.) ſtewards of his myſteries, who are to endeavour both to keep and to diſpenſe them with all good fidelity. From their maſter therefore may they take all their inſtructions, and to Him let them refer all their adminiſtrations. Various judgements will be paſſed upon them; and they who will oppoſe the attempts of ſome of their brethren to introduce corruption and confuſion into his family, will have many an unkind reflection thrown upon them, and experience the ſeverity of cenſure, for a conduct which merits the juſteſt approbation. Let them, however, learn by this excellent Apoſtle, (ver. 3.) to be above the judgement of men, and to keep the judgement of the Lord in view; that they may not only be ſupported under that petulance of their fellow-ſervants, but may learn to guard againſt, what is much more dangerous,—the treachery of their own hearts, and the flattery of ſelf-love; leſt they fondly miſtake the voice of prejudice, for that of conſcience; or, in other words, the voice of an erroneous conſcience, for that of a conſcience well informed. ver. 4.

May we often recollect the narrow limits of our own knowledge, that ſo we may learn modeſty in our cenſures of each other. ver. 5, &c. He only can judge who knoweth the heart;—and there is a day approaching, which will manifeſt all its ſecrets. While others, therefore, with a pitiable mixture of arrogance and ignorance, judge one another, and judge us; let us rather be concerned to ſeek that praiſe of God, which will be held and felt by the ſoul with the higheſt rapture, and will ſilence every echo of human cenſure, or human applauſe.

If it hath pleaſed God in any reſpect to diſtinguiſh us from others, by the gifts and graces which he hath beſtowed upon us, let us humbly trace theſe diſtinctions to their true ſource; and inſtead of indulging the leaſt degree of pride on their account, let us rather be the more humble: for ſurely, the more we receive from God, the more we are indebted and obliged; and the more we are obliged to the divine goodneſs, the greater ought our ſhame and confuſion to be, that we have not anſwered thoſe obligations by more faithful care, and more conſtant gratitude.

How adorable is the efficacy of divine grace, which bore the zealous and faithful ſervants of Chriſt, through all their labours and fatigues, when they were made a ſpectacle to the world, to angels and men! ver. 9. How glorious a ſpectacle! worthy ſurely, as any thing ſince that wonderful ſcene on Calvary, of the eye of God himſelf.

How little are we to judge of the divine favour by external circumſtances, when thoſe beſt of men were of all others the moſt miſerable, farther than as their heavenly hope ſupported and animated them?—But when that is taken into the account, who would not emulate their lot, though hungry and thirſty, though naked and deſtitute, without habitation, without protector, without friends! ver. 11—13.—When we conſider their ſhare in the divine friendſhip; when we contemplate the bleſſed effects of their labours, and the glorious crown which awaits them after all their ſufferings, ſurely they muſt appear happy, in proportion to the degree in which they ſeemed miſerable, and glorious in proportion to the degree in which the world held them infamous!

That illuſtrious perſon, whoſe Epiſtles are now before us, knew not the pleaſures of domeſtic life in many of its moſt endearing relations: but God made him a ſpiritual father to multitudes; and no doubt, as he urges the conſideration upon his children in Chriſt, he felt the joy ariſing from it ſtrong in his own ſoul, when he ſaid, (ver. 15.) I have begotten you in Chriſt Jeſus by the Goſpel. Surely it ought never to have been forgotten by them; and if through the artifice of ill-deſigning men, and the remaining infirmities of their own character, it was ſometimes, and in ſome degree is forgotten now; yet undoubtedly it would be remembered by them in the heavenly world for ever, even by as many as the Lord his God has graciouſly given him. ver. 14. And if there be any remembrance there that they once grieved him, it will be an engagement to all thoſe offices of an eternal friendſhip, which the exaltation of the heavenly ſtate ſhall allow.

In the mean time, his paternal affection for them, wrought not in a fooliſh fondneſs of indulgence, which, in the language of divine wiſdom, is hating a ſon; but in the character of a prudent and faithful parent, who, deſirous that his children may be as wiſe and good as poſſible, will rather uſe the rod, than ſuffer them to be undone. ver. 21. Yet when he ſpeaks of uſing it, he ſpeaks with regret, as one who would rather chooſe to act in the ſpirit of gentleneſs, and without any mixture of ſeverity. The whole of his ſubſequent conduct to the Corinthians, as far as it may be learned from this or the following Epiſtle, bears a perfect conſiſtency with theſe expreſſions, and illuſtrates the ſincerity of them.

May God give to his miniſters more of this truly Apoſtolical Spirit, more of thoſe overflowings of holy love, attempering and attempered by that ardent zeal againſt ſin, that firm reſolution in the diſcharge of duty, which ſhone ſo brightly in the Apoſtle, and in which he ſo freely and juſtly recommends himſelf to the imitation of his children and brethren!

Chap. V.] Another means which St. Paul makes uſe of to bring off the Corinthians from their falſe apoſtle, and to ſtop their veneration of him, and their glorying in him, is by repreſenting to them the fault and diſorder which was committed in that church, by not judging and expelling the fornicator; which neglect, as may be gueſſed, was owing to that faction. 1. Becauſe it is natural for a faction to ſupport and protect an offender that is of their ſide. 2. From the great fear St. Paul was in, whether they would obey him in cenſuring the offender, as appears by the ſecond Epiſtle, which he could not fear but from the oppoſite faction: they who had preſerved their reſpect to him being ſure to follow his orders. 3. From what he ſays, ch. iv. 16. after he had told them, ver. 6. of that chapter, that they ſhould not be puffed up for any other againſt him, for ſo the whole ſcope of his diſcourſe here imports, He beſeeches them to be his followers, i. e. leaving their other guides, to follow him in puniſhing the offender. For, that we may conclude from his immediately inſiſting on it ſo earneſtly, he had in his view, when he beſeeches them to be followers of him; and conſequently that they might join with him, and take him for their leader, ch. v. 3, 4. he makes himſelf by his Spirit, as his proxy, the preſident of their aſſembly, to be convened for the puniſhing that criminal. 4. It may further be ſuſpected from what St. Paul ſays, ch. vi. 1. that the oppoſite party, to ſtop the church cenſure, pretended that this was a matter to be judged by the civil magiſtate: nay, poſſibly from what is ſaid ver. 6. of that chapter, it may be gathered, that they had got it brought before the heathen judge, or at leaſt from ver. 12. that they pleaded that what he had done was lawful, and might be juſtified before the magiſtrate: For the judging ſpoken of ch. vi. muſt be underſtood to relate to the ſame matter it does ch. v. it being a continuation of the ſame diſcourſe and argument; as is eaſy to be obſerved by any one who will read it without regarding the diviſions into chapters and verſes, whereby ordinary people (not to ſay others) are often diſturbed in reading the Holy Scripture, and hindered from obſerving the true ſenſe and coherence of it. The whole 6th chapter is ſpent in proſecuting the buſineſs of the fornicator, began in the 5th. That this is ſo, is evident from the latter end, as well as beginning of the 6th chapter: And therefore, what St. Paul ſays of lawful, ch. vi. 12. may without any violence be ſuppoſed to be ſaid in anſwer to ſome, who might have alledged in favour of the fornicator, that what he had done was lawful, and might be juſtified by the laws of the country, which he was under: why elſe ſhould St. Paul ſubjoin ſo many arguments (wherewith he concludes this 6th chapter, and the ſubject) to prove the fornication in queſtion to be by the law of the Goſpel a great ſin, and conſequently fit for a Chriſtian church to cenſure in one of its members, however it might paſs for lawful in the eſteem, and by the laws of Gentiles? There is one objection, which at firſt ſight ſeems to be a ſtrong argument againſt this ſuppoſition, that the fornication here ſpoken of was held lawful by the Gentiles of Corinth, and that poſſibly this very caſe had been brought before the magiſtrate there, and not condemned. The objection ſeems to lie in theſe words; ver. 1. There is fornication heard of amongſt you, and ſuch fornication as is not heard of amongſt the Gentiles, that one ſhould have his father's wife. But yet I conceive the words, duly conſidered, have nothing in them contrary to my ſuppoſition. To clear this I take the liberty to ſay, it cannot be thought that this man had his father's wife, whilſt by the laws of the place ſhe actually was his father's wife; for then it had been μοιχεία and adultery, and ſo the Apoſtle would have called it, which was a crime in Greece; nor could it be tolerated in any civil ſociety, that one man ſhould have the uſe of a woman, whilſt ſhe

IT is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and ſuch fornication as is not ſo much as named amongſt the Gentiles; that one ſhould have his father's wife.

2 And ye are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he that hath done this deed might be taken away from among you.

3 For I, verily, as abſent in body, but preſent in ſpirit, have judged already, as though I were preſent, concerning him that hath ſo done this deed;

4 In the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, when ye are gathered together, and my ſpirit, with the power of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt,

5 To deliver ſuch an one unto Satan, for the deſtruction of the fleſh, that the ſpirit may be ſaved in the day of the Lord Jeſus.

6 Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?

7 Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Chriſt our paſſover is ſacrificed for us:

8 Therefore let us keep the feaſt, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of ſhe was another man's wife; i. e. another man's right and poſſeſſion. The caſe therefore here ſeems to be this: The woman had parted from her huſband; which it is plain from ch. vii. 10, 11, 13. at Corinth women could do: For if by the law of that country a woman could not divorce herſelf from her huſband, the Apoſtle would have there in vain bid her not leave her huſband. But however known and allowed a practice it might be amongſt the Corinthians, for a woman to part from her huſband, yet this was the firſt time it was ever known that her huſband's own ſon ſhould marry her. This is that which the Apoſtle takes notice of in theſe words, Such a fornication as is not named amongſt the Gentiles. Such a fornication this was, ſo little known in practice amongſt them, that it was not ſo much as heard named, or ſpoken of by any of them. But whether they held it unlawful that a woman, ſo ſeparated, ſhould marry her huſband's ſon, when ſhe was looked upon to be at liberty from her former huſband, and free to marry whom ſhe pleaſed, that the Apoſtle ſays not. This indeed he declares, that by the law of Chriſt a woman's leaving her huſband, and marrying another, is unlawful, ch. vii. 11. and this woman's marrying her huſband's ſon, he declares ch. v. 1. (the place before us) to be fornication, a peculiar ſort of fornication, whatever the Corinthians or their law might determine in the caſe: And therefore, a Chriſtian church might and ought to have cenſured it within themſelves, it being an offence againſt the rule of the Goſpel, which is the law of their ſociety; and they might and ſhould have expelled this fornicator out of their ſociety, for not ſubmitting to the laws of it; notwithſtanding that the civil laws of the country, and the judgement of the heathen magiſtrate, might acquit him. Suitably hereunto it is very remarkable, that the arguments St. Paul uſes in the cloſe of this diſcourſe, ch. vi. 13—20. to prove fornication unlawful, are all drawn ſolely from the Chriſtian inſtitution, ver. 9. That our bodies are made for the Lord, ver. 13. That our bodies are members of Chriſt, ver. 15. That our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghoſt, ver. 19. That we are not our own, but bought with a price, ver. 20. All which arguments concern Chriſtians only; and there is not in all this diſcourſe againſt fornication, one word to declare it to be unlawful by the law of nature to mankind in general. That was altogether needleſs; and beſides the Apoſtle's purpoſe here, where he was teaching and exhorting Chriſtians what they were to do as Chriſtians, within their own ſociety, by the law of Chriſt; which was to be their rule, and was ſufficient to oblige them, whatever other laws the reſt of mankind obſerved, or were under. Thoſe, he profeſſes, ver. 12, 19. not to meddle with, nor to judge: For having no authority amongſt them, he leaves them to the judgement of God, under whoſe goverment they are. Theſe conſiderations afford ground to conjecture, that the faction which oppoſed St. Paul, had hindered the church of Corinth from cenſuring the fornicator; and that St. Paul ſhewing them their miſcarriage herein, aims thereby to leſſen the credit of their leader, by whoſe influence they were drawn into it. For, as ſoon as they had unanimouſly ſhewn their obedience to St. Paul in this matter, we ſee his ſeverity ceaſes, and he is all ſoftneſs and gentleneſs to the offender; 2 Cor. xi. 5—8. and he tells them in expreſs words, ver. 9. that his end in writing to them of it, was to try their obedience: To which let me add, that this ſuppoſition, though it had not all the evidence for it which it has, yet being ſuited to St. Paul's principal deſign in this Epiſtle, and helping us the better to underſtand theſe two chapters, may deſerve to be mentioned. See ch. v. 1. to vi. 20. and Locke.

Ver. 1. It is reported commonly] Whoever reads attentively 2 Cor. i. 20—ii. 11. will eaſily perceive that the laſt verſe of the preceding chapter, is an introduction to the ſevere act of diſcipline which St. Paul was going to exerciſe amongſt them, though abſent, as if he had been preſent; and therefore that verſe ought properly to begin the preſent chapter. The writers of the New Teſtament ſeem to uſe the Greek word πορνεία, which we tranſlate fornication, in the ſame ſenſe that the Hebrews do צבות, zebut, which we alſo tranſlate fornication; though it is certain both theſe words in Sacred Scripture have a larger ſenſe than the word fornication has in our language; for zebut, among the Hebrews, ſignified uncleanneſs, or any flagitious, ſcandalous crime; but more eſpecially the uncleanneſs of unlawful copulation and idolatry; and not preciſely fornication in our ſenſe of the word, that is, the unlawful mixture of an unmarried couple. That the inter-marrying of a ſon-in-law and a mother-in-law was not prohibited by the laws of the Roman empire, may be ſeen in Tully; but yet it was looked on as ſo ſcandalous and infamous, that it had never any countenance from practice. Tully's words in his oration, Pro Clutentio, are ſtrikingly agreeable to the preſent caſe, "Nubit genero ſocrus nullis hoſpitiis, nullis auctoribus, O ſcelus incredibile, et præter hanc unam, in omni vita inauditum!" Dr. Whitby thinks that the ſcandalous ſtories which were generally told among the heathens of the inceſtuous practices of the primitive Chriſtians, had their original from the miſrepreſentation of the fact mentioned in this verſe. See on Acts xv. 19, &c. Locke, Hammond, Whitby, and Grotius de Jure B. and P. lib. ii. c. 5. Inſtead of, As is not ſo much as named, &c. reads after Elſner, As is not mentiontd with commendation even, &c.

Ver. 2. And ye are puffed up, &c.] And yet ye are elated, inſtead of mourning, as ye ought to do, in order to the expulſion of him who hath committed this. At that time the church uſed publick humiliations, with faſting and tears, when they paſſed a ſentence of excommunication. Heylin.

Ver. 3. But preſent in ſpirit] Some think this refers to an extraordinary gift which St. Paul had of diſcerning clearly and circumſtantially what was done at a diſtance. Comp. Coloſſ. ii. 5. 2 Kings v. 26. ch. vi. 12. and Dr. Benſon's Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 16.

Ver. 4, 5. In the name of our Cord Jeſus Chriſt] That ye, being gathered together in the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and my Spirit, with the power of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, ver. 5. do deliver ſuch a one to Satan, &c. Some think, that as Satan is conſidered as the head of all who are not under Chriſt, as their head, (that is, in the church of Chriſt) every one who was cut off from the church muſt of courſe be delivered over to Satan; but it ſeems much more reaſonable to believe, that this refers to the infliction of ſome bodily pains or diſeaſes, in which Satan might act as the inſtrument of divine juſtice. Comp. 1 Tim. i. 20. And this was for the deſtruction of the fleſh; not directly of the fleſhly principle, for in that ſenſe it could not be oppoſed to the ſaving the ſpirit in the day of the Lord. But probably this was for the emaciating and enfeebling the powers of animal nature;—"that his body may be afflicted and brought down, and thus the man led to true repentance and humiliation, that ſo his ſoul may be ſaved in the laſt day. See Doddridge, Locke, and Eraſmus.

Ver. 6. Your glorying is not good] L'Enfant would read this interrogatively,—Have you not a fine ſubject for boaſting?—Glorying or boaſting is throughout the beginning of this Epiſtle ſpoken of the preference they gave to their new leader, in oppoſition to St. Paul. See L'Enfant, Locke, and 2 Cor. xii. 21.

Ver. 7. Purge out therefore the old leaven] The Apoſtle continues the figure from unleavened bread, ver. 6. with a particular view to the Jewiſh paſſover, in which it was forbidden. "As therefore it was the manner of the Jews at their paſſover, eſpecially on the day of preparation, to ſearch diligently if the leaſt morſel of leavened bread were left in their houſes, and carefully to remove it all,—in like manner do you alſo put away this inceſtuous perſon, and every other contagious evil; commencing a people pure and uncorrupt, in order to your due celebration of the Chriſtian paſſover;—for even Chriſt our paſſover is ſacrificed for us. We have a feſtival to keep, as well as the Jews; a paſchal lamb was ſlain and ſacrificed for our redemption, of which the lamb offered under the law for the deliverance from Egypt was but a type; and their flight out of that houſe of bondage was but a typical repreſentation of our haſtening out of the more cruel bondage of ſin." It is probable that this Epiſtle was written near the feſtival of Eaſter: See ch. xvi. 8. where the Apoſtle ſays he ſhall ſtay at Epheſus, where he then was, till pentecoſt. See Bp. Lavington's ſermon "On the nature and uſe of a type," Ridley's Sermons on the Chriſtian paſſover, and Heylin.

malice and wickedneſs; but with the unleavened bread of ſincerity and truth.

9 I wrote unto you in an epiſtle, not to company with fornicators;

10 Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; for then muſt ye needs go out of the world.

11 But now I have written unto you, not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with ſuch an one, no not to eat.

12 For what have I to do to judge them alſo that are without? do not ye judge them that are within?

13 But them that are without, God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourſelves that wicked perſon.

CHAP. VI.

The Corinthians muſt not vex their brethren, in going to law with them; eſpecially before infidels. The unrighteous ſhall not inherit the kingdom of God. Our bodies are the members of Chriſt, and temples of the Holy Ghoſt: they muſt not therefore be defiled.

DARE any of you, having a matter againſt another, go to law before the unjuſt, and not before the ſaints?

2 Do ye not know that the ſaints ſhall judge the world? and if the world ſhall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the ſmalleſt matters?

3 Know ye not that we ſhall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?

4 If then ye have judgements of things pertaining to this life, ſet them to judge, who are leaſt eſteemed in the church.

5 I ſpeak to your ſhame. Is it ſo, that there is not a wiſe man amongſt you? no, not one that ſhall be able to judge between his brethren?

Inſtead of fornicators, in this and the following verſes, ſome very properly render the original word πόρνοι, by leud perſons, as it is plain the Apoſtle intended the word ſhould be taken in that extent: his argument concluding yet more ſtrongly againſt ſome other ſpecies of lewdneſs, than againſt what is called ſimple fornication, deteſtable as that is. See on ver. 1.

Ver. 12. For what have I to do, &c.] Have I any thing to do to judge thoſe which are without? No. Judge ye them that are within; ver. 13. (But thoſe that are without God judgeth) and ye ſhall take away THE EVIL from among you. See Deut xiii. 5. xvii. 7. In the words thoſe that are without, Dr. Whitby thinks there is an oblique reference to the mother-in-law of the inceſtuous perſon, who was an heathen; which, from the Apoſtle's giving no direction concerning her, is not improbable. However, the views of the Apoſtle in this clauſe, if they took in this particular, ſeem to have been ſtill more extenſive. "Thoſe who are without the pale of the Chriſtian church, God judgeth; and he will find a way, ſooner or later, to teſtify his aweful diſpleaſure againſt them, for crimes which they have committed againſt the law of nature, and that acquaintance with it, which he knows they actually had, or might have attained."

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. V.

This chapter contains a very important doctrine,—the neceſſity of diſcipline in the church, and eſpecially that part of diſcipline which conſiſts of excommunication. St. Paul reproves the Corinthians for not removing the inceſtuous perſon from among them; which teaches us, that when perſons who call themſelves Chriſtians, fall into ſins which diſhonour the religion of Jeſus Chriſt, the whole church ought to mourn for it, and ſhould not ſuffer thoſe perſons to remain in her communion, but to chaſe from it ſuch as are its reproach and ſcandal.

St. Paul moſt expreſly declares, that we ought not to acknowledge for brethren, for Chriſtians, the unclean, unjuſt, ſlanderous, drunkards, or other ſcandalous and avowed ſinners; nor to have any familiar dealings with them. This is the law of Chriſt; this is what the Apoſtles have commanded in his name; this is the rule appointed by them in all churches, for the honour of the Chriſtian religion, and the ſaving the ſinners themſelves, as well as to prevent their evil examples from corrupting other members of the church; and this is what the firſt Chriſtians religiouſly practiſed: On which account we are forced to own, that the church is not now governed as it ought to be, ſince this kind of excommunication is exerciſed hardly any where; Neverthele∫s, the duty of all true Chriſtians is, to avoid as far as poſſible all correſpondence with wicked men, and to diſtinguiſh themſelves from them by an holy and exemplary life; nor ſhould we ever vainly imagine, that being joined in communion with a Chriſtian church, can excuſe the guilt of immoral and ſcandalous practices, for which the wrath of God comes even upon the children of diſobedience among the heathen.

God will have his time to judge them that are without; and not only "Chriſtians at large," as ſome may fondly, and perhaps profanely be ready to call themſelves, but Mahometans and pagans too will find articles like theſe ſitting upon their ſouls with a dreadful weight; and, if ſincere repentance do not make way for pardon, plunging them into the loweſt abyſs of miſery;—into a ſtate of everlaſting ſeparation from the bleſſed God, and all his holy and acceptable ſervants.

Chap. VI. Ver. 1. Before the unjuſt, and not before the ſaints] By the ſaints, are meant the Chriſtians; by the unjuſt, the heathens. The heathen judges, as St. Paul here in effect declares, were generally unjuſt; Chriſtians were generally good, righteous, and holy men: There might be exceptions on each ſide, but the Apoſtle's argument turns on what might commonly be ſuppoſed: the ſaints who are to judge angels, are not merely profeſſing Chriſtians. See Locke, Doddridge, and Whitby.

Ver. 3. Know ye not that we ſhall judge angels?] "Even the fallen angels themſelves, who, notwithſtanding all their malignity and pride, ſhall be brought to that tribunal, at which you, having glorioully paſſed your own trial, ſhall be ſeated with Chriſt, your victorious Lord; when by his righteous ſentence he ſhall ſend theſe rebellious ſpirits to that flaming priſon, which divine juſtice hath prepared for them." Had the Apoſtle, as Dr. Whitby and others ſuppoſe, referred to the power which many Chriſtians had of driving out demons from thoſe who were poſſeſſed by them, he would not have ſpoken of this as a future thing; nor can we ſuppoſe it to have been common to all Chriſtians, nor would it have afforded an argument equally forcible with that, which the interpretation we have given ſuggeſts. There ſeems a peculiar dignity and propriety in this determination of the great God, that when the devils, who are expreſly ſaid to be reſerved in chains of darkneſs, to the judgement of the great day, ſhall be condemned; the ſaints, being raiſed to the ſeats of glory which theſe wicked ſpirits have forfeited and loſt, ſhould affix in that ſentence, which ſhall diſplay the victory of Chriſt over them in theſe his ſervants, once their captives; and will, no doubt, render the ſentence itſelf yet more intolerable to creatures of ſuch malignity and pride. See Locke, Whitby, Doddridge, and Reynolds "of angels," p. 183.

Ver. 4. If then ye have judgements] If therefore you have controverſies relating to affairs of this life, do you ſet them to judge, who are of no eſteem in the church;—i. e. the heathen magiſtrates. Some criticks ſay that κριτήρια, rendered judgements, like δικαστήρια, ſignify judicial courts, not cauſes; and they would render the paſſage thus: Appoint ſecular judicatories, if you have in the church this contemptible ſort of men, who are ſo ready to go to law, ver. 7. But the firſt interpretation ſeems preferable. See Bp. Overall, Camerarius, Knatchbul, Limborch, and Elſner. Mr. Locke obſerves, that there was amongſt the Jews Conceſſus triumviralis authenticus, who had authority, and could hear and determine cauſes, ex officio; there was another conceſſus triumviralis choſen by the parties. Theſe, though they were not authentic, yet could judge and determine the cauſes referred to them; and theſe were they whom St. Paul calls here τοὺς ἐξουθενημένους, judices non authenticos; that is, "Referees choſen by the parties." That he does not mean by the original thoſe who are leaſt eſteemed, is plain from the next verſe.

Ver. 5. A wiſe man] If St. Paul uſes this word in the ſenſe of the ſynagogue

6 But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers.

7 Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, becauſe ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather ſuffer yourſelves to be defrauded?

8 Nay, ye do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren.

9 Know ye not that the unrighteous ſhall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abuſers of themſelves with mankind.

10 Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, ſhall inherit the kingdom of God.

11 And ſuch were ſome of you: but ye are waſhed, but ye are ſanctified, but ye are juſtified in the name of the Lord Jeſus, and by the Spirit of our God.

12 All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any.

13 Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats: but God ſhall deſtroy both it and them. Now the body is not for fornication, but for the Lord; and the Lord for the body.

14 And God hath both raiſed up the Lord, and will alſo raiſe up us by his own power.

15 Know ye not, that your bodies are the members of Chriſt? ſhall I then take the members of Chriſt, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid!

ſynagogue, it ſignifies a rabbi, or one ordained, and ſo capacitated to be a judge; for ſuch were called wiſe men. If in the ſenſe of the Greek ſchools, then it ſignifies a man of learning, ſtudy, and parts. If it be taken in the latter ſenſe, it may ſeem to be uſed with ſome reflection on their pretences to wiſdom. Locke.

Ver. 6. Brother goeth to law with brother] Joſephus obſerves, that the Romans, who were now maſters of Corinth, permitted the Jews in foreign countries to decide private affairs, where nothing capital was in queſtion, among themſelves; and from hence may be argued the juſtice of this rebuke of St. Paul, as there is no room to doubt but Chriſtians might have the ſame privilege, as they were looked upon as a Jewiſh ſect: Excluſive of that, however, they might doubtleſs by mutual conſent have choſen their brethren as referees. See Lardner's Credibil. vol. i. p. 165. and on ver. 4.

Ver 8. Nay, you do wrong] That the wrong here ſpoken of was the fornicator's taking and keeping his father's wife, the words of St. Paul, 2 Cor. vii. 12. inſtancing this very wrong, are a ſufficient evidence; and it is not wholly improbable there had been ſome hearing of this matter before a heathen judge, or at leaſt that this had been talked of; which, if ſuppoſed, will give a great light to this whole paſſage, and ſeveral others in this Epiſtle; for St. Paul's argument, ch. v. 12, 13. ch. vi. 1, 2, 3, &c. runs plainly thus, coherent and eaſy to be underſtood, if it ſtood together as it ought, without the diviſion into two chapters. "You have a power to judge thoſe who are of your church, therefore put away from among you that fornicator. You do ill to let the caſe come before an heathen magiſtrate;—Are you, who are to judge the world, and angels, not worthy to judge ſuch a matter as this?" Locke.

Ver. 11. But ye are waſhed] "You are not only baptized, but divine grace has made a happy change in your ſtate and temper, and you are purified and renewed, as well as diſcharged from the condemnation to which you were juſtly obnoxious, in the name of the Lord Jeſus, and by the Spirit of him, whom we are now taught, through that common Saviour, to call with complacency our God." See Heb. ix. 10—23. ch. x. 10 and 18. compared.

Ver. 12. All things are lawful unto me] Are all things lawful for me?—However, all things are not expedient. Are all things lawful for me?—However, I will not be a ſlave to any. Heylin; Who obſerves, that St. Paul here begins an anſwer to ſome, who would defend fornication under the notion of Chriſtian liberty. St. Paul, ſays Mr. Locke, having upon occaſion of injuſtice amongſt them, particularly in the matter of the fornicator, warned them againſt that and other ſins which exclude men from ſalvation, he here reſumes his former argument about fornication, and by his reaſoning it looks as if ſome among them had pleaded that fornication was lawful. To which he anſwers, that granting it to be ſo, yet the lawfulneſs of all wholeſome food reached not the caſe of fornication; and ſhews by ſeveral inſtances, (as particularly the degrading the body ,and making what in a Chriſtian is the member of Chriſt, the member of an harlot) that fornication upon ſeveral accounts might be ſo unſuitable to the ſtate of a Chriſtian man, that a Chriſtian ſociety might have reaſon to animadvert upon a fornicator, though fornication might paſs for an indifferent action in other men. Expedient and brought under power, in this verſe, ſeem to refer to the two parts of the next. The firſt of them to eating, in the firſt part of that verſe, and the latter of them to fornication, in the latter part. To make this the more intelligible, it may be fit to remark, that St. Paul here ſeems to obviate ſuch a ſort of reaſoning as this, in behalf of the fornicator. "All ſorts of meats are lawful to Chriſtians, who are ſet free from the law of Moſes; and why are they not ſo with regard to women, who are at their own diſpoſals?"—To which the Apoſtle replies, "Though my belly was made only for eating, and all ſorts of meats were made to be eaten, and ſo are lawful for me; yet will I abſtain from what is lawful, if it be not convenient for me, though my belly will be certain to receive no prejudice by it which will affect it in the other world, ſince God will there put an end to the belly, and all uſe of food. But as to the body of a Chriſtian, the caſe is quite otherwiſe; that was not made for the enjoyment of women, but for a much nobler end,—to be a member of Chriſt's body, and ſo ſhall laſt for ever, and not be deſtroyed, as the belly ſhall be. Therefore, ſuppoſing fornication to be lawful in itſelf, I will not ſo debaſe and ſubject my body, and do it that prejudice, as to take that which is a member of Chriſt, and make it the member of an harlot:—this ought to be had in deteſtation of all Chriſtians." The context is ſo plain in this caſe, that interpreters allow St. Paul to be diſcourſing here upon a ſuppoſition of the lawfulneſs of fornication. Nor will it appear at all ſtrange that he does ſo, if we conſider the argument he is upon. He is here convincing the Corinthians, that though fornication were to them an indifferent thing, and were not condemned in their country, more than eating any ſort of meat; yet there might be reaſons why a Chriſtian ſociety might puniſh it in their own members by church cenſures, and expulſion of the guilty. Conformably to which, we ſee in what follows here, that all the Apoſtle's argument againſt fornication are brought from the incongruity it hath with the ſtate of a Chriſtian, as a Chriſtian; but nothing is ſaid againſt it as a fault in a man, as a man; no plea uſed that it is a ſin in all men by the law of nature. A Chriſtian ſociety, without entering into that inquiry, or going ſo far as that, had reaſon to condemn and cenſure it, as not comporting with the dignity and principles of that religion, which was the foundation of their ſociety. Locke.

Ver. 14. By his own power] Διὰ της δυνάμεως αὐτȣ̃. The context and deſign of St. Paul ſtrongly incline one to take διὰ here to ſignify to, and not by, as it does 2 Pet. i. 3. St. Paul is here proving to the Corinthian converts that they have a power to judge. He tells them that they ſhall judge the world, ver 2, and 3. and for their not judging he blames them; telling them it is a leſſening to them not to exerciſe this power; ver. 7. And he gives a reaſon for it in this verſe, namely, that Chriſt is raiſed up to the power of God, and ſo ſhall they be. Unleſs it be taken in this ſenſe, the preſent verſe ſeems to ſtand alone; for what connection has the mention of the reſurrection, in the ordinary ſenſe of this verſe with what the Apoſtle is ſaying here,—but raiſing us up with bodies to be members of his glorious body, and to partake of his power in judging the world? This adds a great honour and dignity to our bodies, and is a reaſon why we ſhould not debaſe them into the members of an harlot. Theſe words alſo give a reaſon for his ſaying, that he would not be brought under the power of any thing, ver. 12. "Shall I, whoſe body is a member of Chriſt, and ſhall be raiſed to the power which He has now in heaven, ſuffer my body to be a member, and under the power of an harlot!—That I will never do, let fornication in itſelf be judged by you ever ſo lawful." If this be not the meaning of St. Paul, to what purpoſe is it that he ſo expreſly declares, that the belly and meat ſhall be deſtroyed,—and does ſo manifeſtly put an oppoſition between the body and the belly, ver. 13? See Locke and Elſner.

joined to an harlot, is one body? for Two (ſaith he) ſhall be one fleſh.

17 But he that is joined unto the Lord, is one ſpirit.

18 Flee fornication: Every ſin that a man doeth, is without the body; but he that committeth fornication, ſinneth againſt his own body.

19 What, know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghoſt, which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own?

20 For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your ſpirit, which are God's.

CHAP. VII.

He treateth of marriage, ſhewing it to be a remedy againſt fornication; and that the bond thereof ought not lightly to be diſſolved. Every man muſt be content with his vocation. Virginity wherefore to be embraced: And for what reſpects we may either marry, or abſtain from marrying.

NOW concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me: It is good for a man not to touch a woman.

2 Nevertheleſs, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own huſband.

3 Let the huſband render unto the wife due benevolence: and likewiſe alſo the wife unto the huſband.

4 The wife hath not power of her own body, but the huſband: and likewiſe alſo the huſband hath not power of his own body, but the wife.

5 Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with conſent for a time, that ye may

Ver. 18. Every ſin, &c.]—" Every other ſin which a man practiſes is without the body; its effects fall not ſo directly upon the body, but often more immediately upon the mind; but he that committeth whoredom, or any kind of lewdneſs, ſinneth particularly againſt his own body; not only polluting and debaſing it, by making it one with ſo infamous a creature, but perhaps infecting and enfeebling, waſting and conſuming it, which theſe vices, when grown habitual and frequent, have an apparent tendency to effect." It would be unreaſonable to inſiſt on the moſt rigorous interpretation of the words, Every ſin that a man doth, &c. but the general ſenſe, as given in the paraphraſe, is plain and true; and probably, on the whole, there is no other ſin by which the body receives equal detriment, conſidering not only its nature, but how much it has prevailed. A fine paſſage of Xenophon will illuſtrate what is ſaid in this verſe;—wherein Socrates is repreſented as declaring, " that intemperate and luſtful perſons hurt themſelves far more than any others; whereas other ſinners ſecure ſome profit to themſelves, though they are injurious to others." See Doddridge, Raphelius, and Grotius.

Ver. 19. What! know ye not, &c.] This queſtion is repeated ſix times in this chapter, and ſeems to carry with it a very ſtrong irony on their pretence to extraordinary wiſdom. See ch. iv. 10. Locke, Wetſtein, and Cicero. de Leg. lib. i. ad fin.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VI.

How great a reproach do we bring on our Chriſtian profeſſion by ſo immoderate an attachment to our ſecular intereſts! How much does the family of our common father ſuffer, while brother goes to law with brother!—What are theſe little intereſts of mortal life, that the heirs of ſalvation, by whom angels are to be judged, ſhould wrangle about them, and for the ſake of them do wrong, and that even to their brethren! ver. 1—8. Men had need, where ſuch a temper prevails, to examine themſelves, and take heed that they be not deceived; for though good men may fall into ſome degrees of this evil, through negligence, miſtake, or the infirmities of our common nature; yet certainly it looks too much like the character of thoſe, concerning whom the Apoſtle teſtifies, that they ſhould not inherit the kingdom of God ver. 9, 10.

We may obſerve, that in the catalogue here given are contained, not only the moſt infamous and enormous offenders, but ſome who perhaps may be tempted, becauſe of their freedom from flagitious crimes, to think much better of themſelves than they ought. We find here the effeminate and covetous, the revilers and extortioners, ranked with adulterers and fornicators, with thieves and drunkards, with idolaters and Sodomites. We can never be ſecure from danger of falling into the greateſt ſins, till we learn to guard againſt the leaſt; or rather till we think no evil ſmall, viewing every ſin in its contradiction to the nature of God, and in the ſad aſpect it wears with regard to an eternal ſtate.

But how ſtriking is it to reflect, that when the Apoſtle is ſpeaking of perſons of ſuch infamous character, he ſhould be able to add, in his addreſs to his Chriſtian brethren at Corinth, (ver. 11.) and ſuch were ſome of you! Who muſt not adore the riches and ſovereignty of divine grace?—Were ſuch as theſe the beſt of the heathen world?—Were ſuch as theſe prepared by their diſtinguiſhed virtues to receive further aſſiſtance?—Let us pay our homage to the all conquering grace of God; and let the greateſt ſinners learn from hence not to deſpair of ſalvation, when made ſincerely deſirous of being waſhed and ſanctified, as well as juſtified in the name of our Lord Jeſus, and by the Spirit of our God.

It is that name, it is that Spirit alone, which accompliſhes wonders like theſe; and bleſſed be God, all the wonders of this kind were not exhauſted in thoſe early ages; but ſome have been reſerved for us, on whom the end of the world is come. The Goſpel hath exerted its triumphs in our own days, and they ſhall be renewed in thoſe of our children: only let none from hence preſume to turn the grace of God into wantonneſs, leſt inſtead of being among the few who are made trophies of the divine mercy, they ſhould periſh with the multitude of the ungodly world.

With what incomparable advantages doth our holy religion, in this reſpect peculiarly excellent, enforce all the leſſons of moral virtue which it teaches!—With what holy diſdain ſhould we look on the baits of ſenſe, and the pollutions which are in the world through luſt, if we ſeriouſly and often reflected on theſe two things,—that our bodies are the members of Chriſt, and that they are the temples of the Holy Ghoſt!—It ſhould be our unwearied care, as it will be our peculiar happineſs, that they may not only nominally, but really be ſuch; that by a living faith we may be united to the Lord, ſo as to become one ſpirit with him; animated by that Spirit which reſides in him, and dwells in all who are truly his. ver. 15—19.

Whenever we are tempted to alienate ourſelves from the ſervice of God, we ſhould reflect upon the price with which we are bought; ver. 20. That great, that important price, which we ſhould never think of, but with ſecret ſhame, as well as with love and admiration. O Lord! haſt thou paid ſuch a ranſom for me, and ſhall I act as if I thought even this not enough?—as if thou hadſt acquired only a partial and imperfect right to me, and I might divide myſelf between thee and ſtrangers, between thee and thine enemies?—Oh may I be intirely thine, and make it the buſineſs of the lateſt day and hour of my life, to glorify thee with my body, and with my ſpirit, which are and ought to be for ever thine!

Chap. VII. Ver. 1.] The chief buſineſs of the foregoing chapter we have ſeen to be, the leſſening the credit of the falſe Apoſtle, and the extinguiſhing that faction. What follows is in anſwer to ſome queſtions they had propoſed to St. Paul. This chapter contains conjugal matters; wherein he diſſuades from marriage thoſe who have the gift of continence, conſidering the preſent unſettled ſtate of the Chriſtian converts. Next, he teaches that converts ought not to forſake their unconverted mates, inaſmuch as Chriſtianity changes nothing in men's civil eſtate, but leaves them under the ſame obligations they were tied by before. And laſt of all, he lays down directions about giving or not giving their daughters in marriage. Locke.

Ver. 3. Due benevolence] What is due. Wells. Benevolence here ſignifies that complacency and compliance which every married couple ought to have for each other, with reſpect to their mutual ſatiſfaction. Locke.

Ver. 4. Alſo the huſband hath not power, &c.] The woman, who in all other rights is inferior, has here the ſame power given her over the man's body, that the man has over hers. The reaſon whereof is plain;—becauſe, if ſhe had not her man when ſhe had need of him, as well as the man his woman when he had need of her, marriage would be no remedy againſt fornication.

Ver. 5. Defraud ye not one another] " Do not in this matter be wanting one to another, unleſs it be by mutual conſent for a ſhort time, that you may wholly attend to acts of devotion, when you fall upon ſome ſolemn occaſion: and when this time of ſolemn devotion is over, return to your former freedom and conjugal ſociety; leſt the devil, taking advantage of your inability to contain, ſhould tempt you to a violation of the marriage bed."

give yourſelves to faſting and prayer; and come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency.

6 But I ſpeak this by permiſſion, and not of commandment.

7 For I would that all men were even as I myſelf. But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that.

8 I ſay therefore to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I.

9 But if they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn.

10 And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her huſband:

11 But and if ſhe depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her huſband: And let not the huſband put away his wife.

12 But to the reſt ſpeak I, not the Lord; If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and ſhe be pleaſed to dwell with him, let him not put her away.

13 And the woman which hath an huſband that believeth not, and if he be pleaſed to dwell with her, let her not leave him:

14 For the unbelieving huſband is ſanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is ſanctified by the huſband: elſe were your children unclean; but now are they holy.

15 But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a ſiſter is not under bondage in ſuch caſes: but God hath called us to peace.

16 For what knoweſt thou, O wife, whether thou ſhalt ſave thy huſband? or how knoweſt thou, O man, whether thou ſhalt ſave thy wife?

17 But, as God hath diſtributed to every man, as the Lord hath called every one, ſo let him walk. And ſo ordain I in all churches.

Ver. 6. But I ſpeak this by permiſſion] "You will obſerve, that I ſay this by permiſſion from Chriſt; but not by any expreſs command which he gave in perſon in the days of his fleſh, or gives by the inſpiration and ſuggeſtion of his Spirit now;—by which inſpiration you may conclude I am guided, when I throw in no ſuch precautions as theſe." See Craddock, and Doddridge's Diſſertation on the Inſpiration of the New Teſtament, p. 30, &c. For a good explanation of the phraſe ἀπ' ἑαυτȣ̃, of or from myſelf, John xvi. 13, &c. See "The Doctrine of the Trinity, as deduced by the Light of Reaſon, &c." p. 93.

Ver. 7. For I would that all men, &c.] "As for the main queſtion we are now upon, I could wiſh that all men were in this reſpect even as myſelf; that all Chriſtians could as eaſily bear the ſeverities of a ſingle life, in the preſent circumſtances, and exerciſe as reſolute command over their natural deſires." Common ſenſe requires us thus to limit the Apoſtle's expreſſion; for it would be a moſt flagrant abſurdity to ſuppoſe that St. Paul wiſhed marriage might intirely ceaſe. It ſhews therefore how unfair and improper it is in various caſes to ſtrain the Apoſtle's words to the utmoſt rigour, as if he perpetually uſed the moſt critical exactneſs. But indeed, ch. ix. 32. is ſo full an inſtance to the contrary, that it is not neceſſary to multiply remarks of this kind. See Doddridge, and Whitby.

Ver. 10. And unto the married I command, &c.] Command not I, but the Lord. MS. The tranſlation publiſhed by the Engliſh jeſuits at Bourdeaux has it, To thoſe who are united in the ſacrament of marriage; which we mention as one inſtance ſelected from a number, of the diſhoneſty of that tranſlation, and of the ſubtilty of the tranſlators.

Ver. 12. But to the reſt ſpeak I, &c.] "I have reminded you of the deciſion of Chriſt, with reſpect to the affair of divorce; now, as to the reſt of the perſons and caſes to which I ſhall addreſs myſelf, it is to be obſerved that I ſpeak according to what duty or prudence ſeems on the whole to require; and it is not to be conſidered, as if it were immediately ſpoken by the Lord." See on ver. 6.

Ver. 13. Let her not leave him] The Greek word being the ſame both in this and the 12th verſe, though it be rendered put away in that, and leave in this, and being directed both to the man and woman, ſeems to intimate the ſame power, and ſame act of diſmiſſing in both; and conſequently it ſhould have been rendered put away in both places: It has been obſerved on Mark xii. 10. that in theſe countries, in the Apoſtle's days, the wives aſſumed a power of divorce, as well as the huſbands. See Locke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 14. Is ſanctified] The words ſanctified, holy, and unclean, are uſed here by the Apoſtle in the Jewiſh ſenſe. The Jews called all that were Jews holy, and all others unclean. Thus proles genita extra ſanctitatem, was, "a child begot by parents, while they where yet heathens." Genita intra ſanctitatem, was, "a child begot by parents after they were proſelytes." St. Paul transfers this way of ſpeaking from the Jewiſh into the Chriſtian church; calling all that are of the Chriſtian church ſaints or holy; by which reaſon all that were out of it were eſteemed unclean: See on ch. i. 2. The meaning of this verſe is as follows: "For, in ſuch a caſe as this, the unbelieving huſband is ſo ſanctified to the wife, and the unbelieving wife is ſo ſanctified to the huſband, that their matrimonial converſe is as lawful, as if they were both of the ſame faith; otherwiſe your children, in theſe mixed caſes, were unclean, and muſt be looked upon as unfit to be admitted to thoſe peculiar ordinances, by which the ſeed of God's people are diſtinguiſhed: But now they are confeſſedly holy, and are as readily admitted to baptiſm in all our churches, as if both the parents were Chriſtians; ſo that the caſe, you ſee, is in effect decided by this prevailing practice." This one paſſage is of great force to eſtabliſh the uſe of infant baptiſm, and prove it even an apoſtolical practice; and this is the ſenſe in which the ancient Chriſtians underſtood and explained the text; and other expoſitions have this inconſiſtency, that they make St. Paul call an infidel man or woman ſanctified, even while they continue infidels. To call baptiſm, or a converſion to Chriſtianity, ſanctification, is common in the Scriptures, and among the ancients. Should thoſe who are againſt infant baptiſm think this explication to be a modern invention, merely to ſupport a ſyſtem, the commentaries of Pelagius, St. Auſtin, and others who lived long before the riſe of the ſect of anabaptiſts, will be a ſufficient refutation of ſuch a ſuſpicion. Should it be ſuppoſed that holy ſignifies legitimate, and that unclean denotes illegitimate or baſtards, Not to urge that this ſenſe of the phraſe is not warranted by Scripture,—the argument will not bear it: For it would be reaſoning in a circle, and proving a thing by itſelf, to ſay that the cohabitation of the parents was lawful, becauſe the children were not baſtards; Whereas all who thought the cohabitation of the parents to be unlawful, muſt of courſe eſteem the children to be baſtards. See Locke, Hammond, Bingham's Antiq. Wall on infant baptiſm, part i. ch. 19. and Elſner, vol. ii. p. 94.

Ver. 15. But if the unbelieving depart, &c.] In Matth. v. 32. only one juſt cauſe of divorce is acknowledged, but here the Apoſtle plainly allows another; viz. malicious and obſtinate deſertion in either of the parties; and that becauſe it is wholly inconſiſtent with the purpoſes of marriage. We muſt therefore ſuppoſe that our Lord, in the paſſage above, ſpeaks of the cauſes of divorce commonly ſaid to be comprehended under the term uncleanneſs in the law; and declares that none of them will juſtify a man's divorcing his wife, except fornication. His doctrine concerning this matter is, That if the cauſe of a divorce be juſt, the innocent party is freed from the bond of marriage, ſo as to be at liberty to marry again. But if the divorce be made without a juſt cauſe, the marriage ſtill ſubſiſts; and conſequently both parties, the innocent as well as the guilty, thus divorced, commit adultery if they marry. This deciſion, though perfectly equitable with reſpect to the offending party, may ſeem to bear hard upon the innocent, who is excluded from the benefit of marriage for the other's fault. But it is one of thoſe inconveniences which ariſe from good regulations through the infirmity of human nature, and which, in the preſent circumſtances, cannot be remedied. See Macknight.

Ver. 17. As God hath diſtributed, &c.] As ὡς does not ſignify here the manner of calling, but the ſtate and condition of life the perſon was in when called; and therefore οὕτω, ſo, muſt ſignify the ſame too, as the next verſe proves,—Beza obſerves that from this verſe to the end of ver. 24. ſhould be placed after ver. 40. which would bring together the whole which is ſaid of marriage; and the doctrine concerning the indifference of circumciſion, would naturally introduce that of things offered to idols. See Beza, Hammond, and Wetſtein.

18 Is any man called, being circumciſed? let him not become uncircumciſed. Is any called in uncircumciſion? let him not become circumciſed.

19 Circumciſion is nothing, and uncircumciſion is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God.

20 Let every man abide in the ſame calling wherein he was called.

21 Art thou called being a ſervant? care not for it; but if thou mayeſt be made free, uſe it rather.

22 For he that is called in the Lord, being a ſervant, is the Lord's free man: likewiſe alſo he that is called, being free, is Chriſt's ſervant.

23 Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the ſervants of men.

24 Brethren, let every man wherein he is called, therein abide with God.

25 Now concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgement, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful.

26 I ſuppoſe therefore, that this is good for the preſent diſtreſs, I ſay, that it is good for a man ſo to be.

27 Art thou bound unto a wife? ſeek not to be looſed. Art thou looſed from a wife? ſeek not a wife.

28 But and if thou marry, thou haſt not ſinned; and if a virgin marry, ſhe hath not ſinned. Nevertheleſs, ſuch ſhall have trouble in the fleſh: but I ſpare you.

29 But this I ſay, brethren, the time is ſhort. It remaineth, that both they that have wives be as though they had none;

30 And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they poſſeſſed not;

31 And they that uſe this world, as not

Rom. xiii. 11. 1 Pet. iv. 7. 2 Pet. iii. 8, 9.

Ver. 18. Is any man called, being circumciſed?] This is a very pertinent digreſſion, as it ſo directly contradicts the notion which prevailed among the Jews, that embracing the true religion diſſolved all the relations which had before been contracted; whereas the Apoſtle here declares, that the Goſpel left them in this reſpect juſt as it found them; increaſing, inſtead of leſſening the obligations they were under, to a faithful and affectionate diſcharge of their correſpondent duties. The word ἐπισπάσθω has an evident relation to attempts like thoſe referred to 1 Maccab. i. 15. which it is not neceſſary more particularly to illuſtrate. See Doddridge, Hammond, and Wall.

Ver. 20. Let every man abide in the ſame calling, &c.] It is plain from what immediately follows, that this is not an abſolute command; but only ſignifies, that a man ſhould not think himſelf diſcharged by the privilege of his Chriſtian ſtate, and the franchiſes of the kingdom of Chriſt into which he was entered, from any ties or obligations he was under as a member of the civil ſociety. The thinking themſelves freed by Chriſtianity from thoſe ties, was a fault it ſeems, which thoſe Chriſtians of Corinth were very apt to run into; for St. Paul thinks it neceſſary to guard them againſt this prejudice three times in the compaſs of ſeven verſes; and in the form of a direct command, enjoins them not to change their condition or ſtate of life: Whereby he manifeſtly intends that they ſhould not change, upon a preſumption that Chriſtianity gave them a new or peculiar liberty to do ſo; for notwithſtanding the Apoſtle's poſitively bidding them to remain in the ſame condition in which they were at their converſion, it is yet certain, that it was lawful for them, as well as others, to change, where it was lawful for them to change, had they not been Chriſtians. Locke.

Ver. 21. Being a ſervant] That is, a ſlave. Uſe it rather, implies, that if a man could obtain his freedom, he might lawfully deſire it; but if he could not, he was not to look upon it as a mark of the diſpleaſure of God. The word Ἀπελεύθερος, rendered freedman, in Latin Libertus, ſignifies not ſimply a free man, but one who having been a ſlave, hath had his freedom given him by his maſter. See Locke, and Clarke.

Ver. 23. Ye are bought with a price] Have ye been redeemed from ſlavery?—Be not ye the bond-ſervants [or ſlaves] of men. Wat. Slaves were bought and ſold in the market, as cattle are, and ſo by the price paid there was a property acquired in them. This therefore is a reaſon for what the Apoſtle adviſed ver. 21. that they ſhould not be ſlaves to men, becauſe Chriſt had paid a price for them, and they belonged to him. The ſlavery he ſpeaks of is civil ſlavery; which he makes uſe of to convince the Corinthians, that the civil ties of marriage were not diſſolved by a man's becoming a Chriſtian, ſince ſlavery itſelf was not; and he tells them in general in the next verſe, that nothing in any man's civil eſtate or right is altered by his becoming a Chriſtian. See Locke. According to Dr. Whitby the meaning is, "Are you redeemed from ſervitude? Do not ſell yourſelves for ſlaves again:" To which Dr. Waterland's tranſlation is conformable. It is indeed probable, that the Apoſtle does counſel Chriſtians againſt becoming ſlaves, if it could be prevented; and with great reaſon; as it was a circumſtance which ſeemed leſs ſuitable to the dignity of the Chriſtian profeſſion, and muſt expoſe them to many incumbrances and interruptions in duty, eſpecially on the ſabbath, and other ſeaſons of religious aſſembly,—beſides the danger of being preſent at domeſtic idolatrous ſacrifices, or being ill-treated if they refuſed their compliance. The interpretation, however, ſeems objectable, becauſe the advice is unneceſſarily reſtrained thereby to thoſe ſlaves who had been redeemed; which plainly as well ſuited thoſe who had their freedom given them; and indeed ſuited all Chriſtians, who never had been ſlaves at all, and who might more eaſily have been prevailed upon by their poverty to bring themſelves into a condition, the evils and inconveniences of which they did not thoroughly know.—If a ſtate of ſlavery be ſo inconvenient for the practice, and unworthy the dignity of the Chriſtian profeſſion,—in how horrible a light muſt they ſtand, who call themſelves Chriſtians, and yet carry on an infamous traffick, in order to enſlave, and reduce to the moſt complicated diſtreſs, millions of their fellow-creatures! See Mr. Sharp's "Short account of Africa, and of the ſlave trade."

Ver. 24. Abide with God] L'Enfant explains παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ, by, in the ſight of God;—"taking care to behave in a religious and prudent manner, as under the divine inſpection." (See 2 Cor. xi. 11. Epheſ. ii. 6.) And he thinks there had been ſome diſorders at Corinth, proceeding from ſome irregular claim which Chriſtian ſlaves made to liberty, under pretence that, as Chriſtian brethren, they were equal with their maſters.

Ver. 25. Now concerning virgins] St. Paul by virgins evidently means thoſe of both ſexes, who are in a celibate ſtate. It is probable he had formerly diſſuaded them from marriage, in the preſent ſituation of the church: (See the next note.) It ſeems they were uneaſy under this, (ver. 28 and 35.) and therefore ſent ſome queſtions to St. Paul about it; In anſwer to which, from ver. 25 to 37. he gives directions to the unmarried about their marrying or not marrying; in the cloſe, ver. 38. he anſwers to parents about marrying their daughters, and then ver. 39, 40. ſpeaks of widows. When he ſays, I have no commandment of the Lord, he means, "I have no expreſs or poſitive commandment upon this ſubject, either in any of Chriſt's diſcourſes tranſmitted to us, or rather, in any immediate and perſonal revelation." Mr. Locke paraphraſes the next clauſe thus: "But I tell you my opinion as one, whom the Lord has been graciouſly pleaſed to make credible:" In which ſenſe, he obſerves, the Apoſtle elſewhere uſes πιστὸς ἄνθρωπος and πιστὸς λόγος, faithful man,—a faithful ſaying. See on ver. 37.

Ver. 26. For the preſent diſtreſs] This muſt certainly refer to the prevalence of perſecution at that time; for nothing (as we have before remarked) can be more abſurd, than to imagine that an inſpired Apoſtle would in the general diſcountenance marriage; conſidering that it was expreſly agreeable to a divine inſtitution, and of great importance to the exiſtence and happineſs of all future generations. See Locke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 29. The time is ſhort] "Is contracted within very narrow limits." The word συνεσταλμένος properly imports this, being a metaphor taken from furling, or gathering up a ſail. The Apoſtle probably ſaid this from a prophetic view of the approaching perſecution under Nero; while in its general import it may reſpect the ſhortneſs of our duration in this world; which ſhould guard us againſt too fond an attachment to any earthly relation or poſſeſſion. Some would render this clauſe, The time, as to what remains, is ſhort; when both they, &c." See L'Enfant, Hammond, Grotius, and Heylin.

Ver. 31. As not abuſing it] Καταχρώμενοι does not here ſignify abuſing in our ſenſe of the word, but intently uſing. Dr. Waterland renders abuſing it: for the faſhion of this world paſſeth away.

32 But I would have you without carefulneſs. He that is unmarried, careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may pleaſe the Lord:

33 But he that is married, careth for the things that are of the world, how he may pleaſe his wife.

34 There is difference alſo between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that ſhe may be holy, both in body and in ſpirit: but ſhe that is married, careth for the things of the world, how ſhe may pleaſe her huſband.

35 And this I ſpeak for your own profit; not that I may caſt a ſnare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without diſtraction.

36 But if any man think that he behaveth himſelf uncomely toward his virgin, if ſhe paſs the flower of her age, and need ſo require, let him do what he will, he ſinneth not: let them marry.

37 Nevertheleſs, he that ſtandeth ſtedfaſt in his heart, having no neceſſity, but hath power over his own will, and hath ſo decreed in his heart, that he will keep his virgin, doeth well.

38 So then, he that giveth her in marriage doeth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better.

39 The wife is bound by the law, as long as her huſband liveth; but if her huſband be dead, ſhe is at liberty to be married to whom ſhe will; only in the Lord.

40 But ſhe is happier if ſhe ſo abide, after my judgement: and I think alſo that I have the Spirit of God.

Ver. 31. Pſ. xxxix. 6. 1 John ii. 17.—V. 32. 1 Tim. v. 5. Gr. of the Lord, as ver. 34.—V. 34. Luke x. 40, &c.—V. 39. Rom. vii. 2.—V. 40. Ver. 25. 1 Theſſ. iv. 8.

renders it uſing: and thus it is agreeable to the form of the preceding ſentence. Thoſe that weep, as though they wept not, &c.—Thoſe that uſe this world, as though they uſed it not;—not carrying the enjoyments of it to an unbridled exceſs; for the whole ſcheme and faſhion of this world paſſes off, and is gone like a ſcene in a theatre, which preſently ſhifts; or a pageant in ſome publick proceſſion, which, how gaudily ſoever it be adorned, to ſtrike the eyes of ſpectators, is ſtill in motion, and preſently diſappears, to ſhew itſelf for a few moments to others. The reader will obſerve great elegance and beauty in this compariſon: See 1 John ii. 17. Wall, Doddridge, and Locke; who thinks that all, from the beginning of ver. 28. to the end of the preſent verſe, ſhould be looked upon as a parentheſis.

Ver. 34, 35. How ſhe may pleaſe her huſband, &c.] The Apoſtle in this text, and the counterpart to it, ſeems to declare, that ſingle perſons of either ſex have generally opportunities for devotion beyond thoſe who are married, even in the moſt peaceful times of the church; and that a diverſity of humours, both in men and women, makes it difficult for them to pleaſe each other ſo thoroughly, as is neceſſary in order to make a married life perfectly delightful. So that it intimates a counſel to ſingle people to value and improve their advantages; and to married people to watch againſt theſe things that would enſnare them, and injure their natural peace and comfort. Βρόχον, which we tranſlate ſnare in the next verſe, ſignifies a cord. which poſſibly the Apoſtle might uſe here for binding, according to the language of the Hebrew ſchool: and then his diſcourſe runs thus, "Though I have declared my opinion, that it is beſt for a virgin to remain unmarried, yet I bind it not; i. e. I do not declare it to be unlawful to marry." In the word ἔυσχημον, comely, he ſeems to intimate, that they were now in circumſtances, wherein God did as it were exact a peculiar ſeverity from all their thoughts; and that it was a time to think of the trials of martyrdom, rather than the endearments of human paſſions. Ἀπεριϛπάϛως is rendered in our tranſlation by the addition of ſeveral words. The ſentence would be rendered better, for that which is comely and decent in the Lord, without violent conſtraint. See Locke, Doddridge, and Knatchbull.

Ver. 36, 37. Toward his virgin] Παρθένον ſeems here uſed for the virgin ſtate, and not for the perſon of a virgin. Whether there be examples of the like uſe of it, ſays Mr. Locke, I know not; and therefore I propoſe it as my conjecture upon theſe grounds: Firſt, becauſe the reſolution of mind here ſpoken of muſt be in the perſon to be married, and not in the father, who has the power over the perſon concerned; for how will the father's firmneſs of mind hinder fornication in the child, who has not that firmneſs? Secondly, the neceſſity of marriage can only be judged of by the perſons themſelves. A father cannot feel the child's flames, which make the need of marriage; the perſons themſelves only know whether they burn, or have the gift of continency. Thirdly,—hath power over his own will, ver. 37. muſt either ſignify, "can govern his own deſires,—is maſter of his own will," or, "has the diſpoſal of himſelf;" that is, is free from the father's power of diſpoſing his children in marriage. But the firſt cannot be meant, becauſe it is ſufficiently expreſſed before by ſtedfaſt in his heart; and afterwards too by decreed in heart. I think the words ſhould be tranſlated, hath a power concerning his own will; i. e. concerning what he willeth: for if St. Paul meant, a power over his own will, one might think he would have expreſſed that thought, as he does ch. ix. 12. and Rom. ix. 21. without περι, or by the prepoſition ἐπι, as it is Luke ix. 1. Fourthly, becauſe if, keep his virgin had here ſignified, "keep his children from marrying," the expreſſion would have been more natural had he uſed the word τεκνα, which ſignifies both ſexes, rather than παρθένος, which belongs only to the female. If therefore παρθένος be taken abſtractedly for virginity, the 36th verſe muſt be underſtood thus: "But if any one think it a ſhame to paſs the flower of his age unmarried, and finds it neceſſary to marry, let him do as he pleaſes, he ſins not; let ſuch marry." It is certainly hard to bring theſe two verſes to the ſame ſenſe, and both of them to the deſign of the Apoſtle here, without taking the words, one or both of them, very figuratively. St. Paul ſeems to obviate an objection which might be made againſt his diſſuaſion from marriage; namely, that it might be an indecency one ſhould be guilty of, if one ſhould live unmarried paſt one's prime, and afterwards be obliged to marry: To which he anſwers, That no body ſhould abſtain, upon the account of being a Chriſtian, but thoſe who are of a ſteady reſolution, who are at their own diſpoſal, and have fully determined it in their own minds. Καλῶς, rendered well, ver. 37. ſignifies not ſimply good, but preferable, as in ver. 1. 8, 26. See Locke, Heinſius, Doddridge, and on ver. 25.—Markland, after Eſtius, propoſes to render the clauſe in the 36th verſe, and need ſo require, &c. thus: And if he thinks that there is a neceſſity that he ſhould marry, let him, &c. For they well obſerve, that it is a ſtrange conceſſion to ſay, with our verſion, that if neceſſity require, he may do what he will. See Markland on Lyſias, xxviii. 597.

Ver. 38. So then, he that giveth her in marriage, &c.] If παρθένον be taken in the ſenſe propoſed in the laſt note, it is neceſſary in this verſe to follow thoſe copies which read Γαμίζων, marriage, for ἐκγαμίζων, giving in marriage.—So then, he that marrieth, doth well; but he that marrieth not, doth better. See Locke, Mill, and Wetſtein. The MS reads as above; and inſtead of virgin, in the preceding verſes, renders virginity.

Ver. 39. Only in the Lord] "Only let her take care that ſhe marry in the Lord; and that, retaining a ſenſe of the importance of her Chriſtian obligation, ſhe do not chooſe a partner for life of a different religion from herſelf." See Doddridge and Calmet.

Ver. 40. I think alſo that I have the Spirit of God] This ſeems to glance at his adverſaries in the church, who might be of a different opinion. What he writes was to anſwer queſtions propoſed. It is very unreaſonable for any to infer from hence, that St. Paul was uncertain whether he was inſpired or not: whereas this is only a modeſt way of ſpeaking; and δοκῶ ἔχειν, I think I have, or I appear to have, often ſignifies the ſame with ἔχω, I have. REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VII.

The deciſions of the holy Apoſtle in the chapter before us are given with ſuch gravity, ſeriouſneſs, and purity, that one would hope, delicate as the ſubject of them is, they will be received without any of that unbecoming levity, which the wantonneſs of ſome minds may be ready to excite on ſuch an occaſion. It becomes us humbly to adore the divine wiſdom and goodneſs manifeſted in the formation of the firſt human pair, and in keeping up the different ſexes, through all ſucceeding ages, in ſo juſt a proportion, that every man might have his own wife, and every woman her own huſband; that the inſtinct of nature might, ſo far as it is neceſſary, be gratified without guilt, and an holy ſeed be ſought, which being trained up under proper diſcipline and inſtruction, might ſupply the waſtes which death is continually making, and be accounted to the Lord for a generation:—and that ſo virtue and religion, for the ſake of which alone it is deſirable that human creatures ſhould ſubſiſt, may be tranſmitted through every age, and earth become a nurſery for heaven. ver. 2—4.

With theſe views ſhould marriages ever be contracted, when it is

CHAP. VIII.

To abſtain from meats offered to idols. We muſt not abuſe our Chriſtian liberty to the offence of our brethren: but muſt bridle our knowledge with charity.

NOW as touching things offered unto idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth.

2 And if any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know.

3 But if any man love God, the ſame is known of him.

4 As concerning therefore the eating of thoſe things that are offered in ſacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one.

5 For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,)

6 But to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in proper they ſhould be contracted at all. ver. 5. Let none imagine the ſtate itſelf to be impure, and let it always be preſerved undefiled; all occaſion of irregular deſire being prudently guarded againſt by thoſe who have entered into it. And let all Chriſtians, in every relation, remember that the obligations of devotion are common to all, and that Chriſt and his Apoſtles ſeem to take it for granted, that we ſhall be careful to ſecure proper ſeaſons for faſting, as well as for prayer, ſo far as may be needful in order that the ſuperior authority of the mind over the body may be exerciſed and maintained, and that our petitions to the throne of grace may be offered with greater intenſeneſs, copiouſneſs, and ardour.

From the Apoſtle's reaſonings and exhortations, ver. 14. we may learn a becoming ſolicitude, to contribute as much as we poſſibly can to the Chriſtian edification of each other; and eſpecially let this be the care of the neareſt relatives in life. What can be more deſirable than that the huſband may be ſanctified by the wife, and the wife by the huſband?—May all prudent care be taken in contracting marriages, as to the religious character of the intended partner for life; and in thoſe already contracted, where this precaution has been neglected, or where the judgement formed ſeems to have been miſtaken, let all conſiderations of prudence, of religion, of affection concur to animate to a mutual care of each other's ſoul,—that moſt important effort of love, that moſt ſolid expreſſion and demonſtration of friendſhip. Nor let the improbability of ſucceſs be pleaded in excuſe for neglect, even where the attempt muſt be made by the ſubordinate ſex. A poſſibility ſhould be ſufficient encouragement; and ſurely there is room to ſay, How knoweſt thou, O wife, but thou mayeſt ſave him, whoſe ſalvation, next to thine own, muſt be moſt deſirable to thee? ver. 16.

Let us all ſtudy the duties of thoſe relations in which God hath placed us, and walk with him in our proper callings; not deſiring ſo much to exchange, as to improve them. ver. 24. His wiſe providence hath diſtributed the part; it is our wiſdom, it will be our happineſs to act in humble congruity to that diſtribution. Surely the Apoſtle could not have expreſſed in ſtronger terms his deep conviction of the ſmall importance of human diſtinctions than he here does, when, ſpeaking of what ſeems to great and generous minds the moſt miſerable lot,—even that of a ſlave, He ſays, care not for it. ver. 21. If liberty itſelf, the firſt of all temporal bleſſings, be not of ſo great importance, as that a man bleſſed with the higheſt hopes and glorious conſolations of Chriſtianity, ſhould make himſelf very ſolicitous about it,—of how much leſs importance are thoſe comparatively trifling diſtinctions, on which many lay ſo diſproportionate, ſo extravagant a ſtreſs!

Let Chriſtian ſervants [for, bleſſed be God, among us we have no ſlaves] remember their high privileges,—as the Lord's freed-men. Let Chriſtian maſters remember the reſtraint—as the Lord's ſervants: ver. 22. and let the benefits of liberty, eſpecially when conſidered in its aſpect upon religion, be ſo far valued, as not to be bartered away for any price, which the enemies of mankind may offer in exchange.

But above all, let us remember the infinite importance of maintaining the freedom of the mind from the bondage of corruption; and of keeping with all humble and chearful obſervance the commandments of God. ver. 19. While many expreſs the warmeſt zeal for circumciſion or uncircumciſion, in defence of, or in oppoſition to this or that mode or form of external worſhip, let our hearts be ſet on what is moſt vital and eſſential in religion; and we ſhall find the happieſt equivalent in the compoſure and ſatisfaction of our own ſpirit now, as well as in thoſe abundant rewards, which the Lord hath laid up for them who fear him.

In the mean time, obſerve we the humility of the excellent Apoſtle with pleaſure. When he ſpeaks of his fidelity in the miniſtry, (ver. 25.) he tells us, he obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful. Edified by ſuch an example, let us aſcribe to Chriſt the praiſe not only of our endowments, but of our virtues;—even to him, who worketh in us, both to will and to do, of his own good pleaſure.

Attentive to the affecting leſſon which the Apoſtle here gives of the ſhortneſs of time, (ver. 29.) let us ſeriouſly reflect upon the advantages and ſnares of our reſpective conditions in life, that ſo we may improve the one, and eſcape far as poſſible all injury from the other. Thoſe who are ſingle will do well to employ their leiſure for God, and to endeavour to collect ſuch a ſtock of Chriſtian experience as may ſupport them, when the duties and difficulties, the cares and ſorrows of life ſhall be multiplied. Thoſe who are married, ought with mutual tender regard to endeavour to pleaſe each other, and to render that relation into which Providence hath conducted them, as comfortable and agreeable as they may; (ver. 33, 34.) and whatever cares preſs upon their minds, or demand their attention, let them order their affairs with ſuch diſcretion, as that they may ſtill ſecure a due proportion of their time for the things of the Lord.

Should any in their conſciences be perſuaded, that, by continuing ſingle, they ſhould beſt anſwer the purpoſes of religion, and promote the good of their fellow-creatures, in conjunction with their own, Let them do it. As for thoſe who marry, whether a firſt or ſecond time, let them do it in the Lord; acting in the choice of their moſt intimate friend and companion as the ſervants of Chriſt; who are deſirous that their conduct may be approved by him, and that any avocations and interruptions in his ſervice, which may be occaſioned, even in thoſe peaceful times, by marriage, may be in ſome meaſure balanced by the united prayers, prudent counſels, and edifying converſe of thoſe, with whom they unite in this tender and indiſſoluble bond.

Chap. VIII. Ver. 1. This chapter is concerning the eating things offered to idols: wherein one may gueſs by St. Paul's anſwer that they had written to him; that they knew their Chriſtian liberty herein; that they knew that an idol was nothing, and therefore that they did well to ſhew their knowledge of the nullity of the heathen gods, and their diſregard of them, by eating promiſcuouſly, and without ſcruple, things offered to them. Upon which the deſign of the Apoſtle here ſeems to be, to take down their opinion of their knowledge, by ſhewing them, that notwithſtanding all that knowledge on which they preſumed, and with which they were puffed up; yet the eating of thoſe ſacrifices did not recommend them to God, ver. 8. and that they might ſin through want of charity, by offending their weak brother. This ſeems plainly from ver. 1, to 3, and 11, 12. to be the deſign of the Apoſtle's anſwer, and not to reſolve the caſe of eating things offered to idols in its full latitude; for then he would have proſecuted it more at large, and not have deferred the doing ſo to ch. x. where, under another head, it treats of it more particularly. See Locke; who obſerves, that to continue the thread of the Apoſtle's diſcourſe, the 7th verſe muſt be read as joined to the 1ſt. and all the reſt looked on as a parentheſis. Elſner, with many other commentators, allow that there is a parentheſis here; but they think it begins in the middle of ver. 1. and ends after the firſt clauſe of the 4th:—We all have knowledge;—we know that an idol is nothing, &c.—We know that we all have knowledge, means, "We know that we all, as Chriſtians, have that general knowledge of the vanity of thoſe fictitious deities, of which ſome are ready to boaſt as if it were an extraordinary matter, and which they are ſome times in danger of abuſing, by making it the foundation of liberties, which may be very detrimental. But let it be remembered, that knowledge often puffeth up, and is the occaſion of great ſelf-conceit and arrogance; whereas it is conſiderate love and gentle tenderneſs which edifies, and has ſuch an happy effect in building up the church of Chriſt." See Locke, Doddridge, Elſner, and Bos.

Ver. 3. The ſame is known of him] That is, approved by him. Such a man has attained the true knowledge of God, and will be ſure of his approbation and favour. Mr. Locke would render it, is made to know, or is inſtructed by him; for the Apoſtle, ſays he, though writing in Greek, yet often uſes the Greek verbs according to the Hebrew conjugations. So ch. xiii. 12. Ἐπιγνώσομαι, which properly, in the Greek, ſignifies I ſhall be known, is uſed for, I ſhall be made to know; and thus, Gal. iv. 9. Γνωσθέντες is put to ſignify being taught. See Pierce's 6th Diſſertation, and Acts x. 36.

Ver. 4. We know that an idol is nothing] This was a common aphoriſm among the Jews, to which the word אלילים, alilim, which ſignifies idols, and things of nothing, alluded. See Job xiii. 4. xiv. 12. Whitby, Hammond, Elſner, and Parkhurſt's Lexicon.

Ver. 5, 6. In heaven or in earth] The heathen had ſupreme ſovereign gods, whom they ſuppoſed eternal, remaining always in the heavens. Theſe were all θεοὶ, gods. They had beſides another order of inferior gods gods upon earth, who by the will and direction of the heavenly gods governed terreſtrial things, and were the mediators between the ſupreme heavenly gods, and men, without whom there could be no communication between them. Theſe were called in Scripture him; and one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom are all things, and we by him.

7 Howbeit, there is not in every man that knowledge: for ſome, with conſcience of the idol unto this hour, eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conſcience being weak is defiled.

8 But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither if we eat, are we the better; neither if we eat not, are we the worſe.

9 But take heed, leſt by any means this liberty of your's become a ſtumbling-block to them that are weak.

10 For if any man ſee thee, which haſt knowledge, ſit at meat in the idol's temple, ſhall not the conſcience of him which is weak be emboldened to eat thoſe things which are offered to idols;

11 And through thy knowledge ſhall the weak brother periſh, for whom Chriſt died?

12 But when ye ſin ſo againſt the brethren, and wound their weak conſcience, ye ſin againſt Chriſt.

12 Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no fleſh while the world ſtandeth, leſt I make my brother to offend.

CHAP. IX.

He ſheweth his liberty, and that the miniſter ought to live by the goſpel: yet that himſelf hath of his own accord abſtained, to be either chargeable unto them, or offenſive unto any in matters indifferent. Our life is like unto a race.

AM I not an apoſtle? am I not free? have I not ſeen Jeſus Chriſt our Lord? are not ye my work in the Lord?

Scripture Baalim, or lords, and by the Greeks Δαιμονες, or demons. To this the Apoſtle alludes here, ſaying, "Though there be, in the opinion of the heathens, gods many, that is, many ſovereign gods in heaven, and lords many, i. e. many baalim, or lords agents, and preſidents over earthly things;—yet to us Chriſtians there is but one ſovereign God the Father, of whom are all things, and to whom, as ſupreme, we are to direct all our ſervices;—and but one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom are all things that come from the Father to us, and through whom alone we find acceſs unto him." Dr. Waterland reads, But to us there is one God, &c.—and we for him. See Locke, Mede, Guyſe, Calamy's Sermons on the Trinity, p. 25, and 244. Jones's "Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity," ch. i. ſect. 3. and Waterland's Sermons on the Trinity, p. 48—53.

Ver. 7. For ſome, with conſcience, &c.] For there are ſome, who with notions ſtill remaining that the idol may have ſome efficacy upon the victim, eat of it as a real victim, and their conſcience, &c. Heylin Dr. Doddridge reads it, But ſome do, even until now, with conſciouſneſs of the idol, eat the things as ſacrificed to the idol; and ſo their conſcience, &c.

Ver. 8. Meat commendeth us not to God] Οὐ παρίστησι, ſets us not before God; that is, to be taken notice of by him. It cannot be ſuppoſed that St. Paul, in anſwer to a letter of the Corinthians, ſhould tell them, that if they ate things offered to idols, they were not the better, or if they ate not, were not the worſe, unleſs they had expreſſed ſome opinion of good in eating." Locke.

Ver. 10. Sit at meat in the idol's temple] In an idol temple. MS. Entertainments among the heathen commonly conſiſted of what had been ſacrificed to their fictitious deities; from which, however, the Chriſtians religiouſly abſtained, even when moſt rigorouſly impoſed; and no doubt the Apoſtle's deciſion here had great weight with them. Theſe feaſts were often celebrated in their temples.—As the word 'Οικοδομηθήσεται, is ſcarce to be met with elſewhere in a bad ſenſe, ſome critics propoſe ὁδοποιηθήσονται, ſhall be led to eat, &c. See Elſner, Chemnitz, and Faber.

Ver. 13. While the world ſtandeth] Εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα; that is, for ever, or "as long as I live."

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VIII.

From this ſhort, but excellent chapter, we may learn to eſtimate the true value of knowledge, and to ſee how worthleſs and dangerous it is, when, inſtead of diſcovering to us our own ignorance and weakneſs, it ſerves only to puff up the mind. We ſhould rather labour and pray for that love and charity which edifieth ourſelves and others; (ver. 1.) taking heed that we do not demonſtrate our ignorance by a high conceit of our attainments in knowledge; for nothing can more evidently ſhew how ſmall thoſe attainments are, than not to know their limits, when thoſe limits ſo ſoon meet us on what ſide ſoever we attempt to make an excurſion. Give us, O Lord, that love to thee, which is the beſt proof of our knowledge, and the ſureſt way to its higheſt improvements!

While we remember, and ſtedfaſtly adhere to the grand principle of the unity of God, we muſt not fail with one God and Father of all, to adore the one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom we exiſt; ſetting him, in our eſtimation, far above all the powers, dignities, and glories of created nature. ver. 5, 6. Belonging to ſo divine a Maſter, we ſhall certainly have emulation enough to learn and to practice the moſt generous principles of his benevolent religion. We ſhall not found our confidence on admitting and contending for, or deſpiſing and deriding this or that particular obſervance, by which, as it may happen to be circumſtanced, God is neither honoured nor diſhonoured, pleaſed nor diſpleaſed; but we ſhall ever maintain the tendereſt concern for the edification and comfort of our brethren, and guard againſt whatever might either grieve or enſnare them.

When we remember that Chriſt died for the weakeſt, as well as the ſtrongeſt, (ver. 11.) their relation to him, and his tender and compaſſionate regard for them will melt down our hearts, when ſeized with that cold inſenſibility, which alas! is too ready to prevail amongſt Chriſtians. It is Chriſt we wound, in wounding our brethren; and in ſmiting them, we ſmite Him; ver. 12.

Stay then, O man, that raſh hand, which is ſo ready in mere wantonneſs to do miſchief; and be willing to deny thyſelf in thy deſire for ever ſo long a time, rather than by thy indulgence to diſhonour God, and injure others. This is the excellent leſſon which the candid, the benevolent St. Paul often inculcates, (ſee ver. 13.) and of which he himſelf was a ſhining example: But O how low are multitudes of Chriſtians, multitudes of miniſters fallen, when they cannot deny themſelves in what is unneceſſary, and even unlawful, where either intereſt or pleaſure ſolicit the gratification!

Chap. IX. Ver. 1.] St. Paul had preached the Goſpel at Corinth about two years, in all which time he had taken nothing of them, 2 Cor. xi. 7—9. This, by ſome of the oppoſite faction, and particularly, as we may ſuppoſe, by their leader, was made uſe of to call in queſtion his Apoſtleſhip, 2 Cor. xi. 5, 6. For why, if he were an Apoſtle, ſhould he not uſe the power of an Apoſtle, to demand maintenance where he preached. In this ſection St. Paul vindicates his apoſtleſhip; and in anſwer to theſe enquirers gives the reaſon why, though he had a right to maintenance, yet he preached gratis to the Corinthians. "My anſwer, ſays he, to theſe inquiſitors, is, that though, as being an Apoſtle, I know that I have right to maintenance, as well as Peter, or any other of the Apoſtles, who all have a right, as is evident from reaſon and from Scripture;—yet I neither have, nor ſhall make uſe of my privilege amongſt you, for fear that if it coſt you any thing, that ſhould hinder the effect of my preaching.—I would neglect nothing that might promote the Goſpel. I do not content myſelf with doing barely what is my duty, for by my extraordinary call and commiſſion, it is now incumbent on me to preach the Goſpel; but I endeavour to excel in my miniſtry, and not to execute my commiſſion overtly, and juſt enough to ſerve the turn. For if thoſe who in the Agoniſtick games, aiming at victory to obtain only a corruptible crown, deny themſelves in eating and drinking, and other pleaſures; how much more does the eternal crown of glory deſerve that we ſhould do our utmoſt to obtain it? To be as careful in not indulging our bodies, in denying our pleaſures, in doing every thing we can in order to get it, as if there were but one that ſhould have it? Wonder not therefore, if I, having this in view, neglect my body, and thoſe outward conveniencies, which, as an Apoſtle, ſent to preach the Goſpel, I might claim, and make uſe of: Wonder not that I prefer the propagating of the Goſpel, and making of converts, to all care and regard of myſelf." This ſeems the deſign of the Apoſtle, and will give light to the following chapter. See Locke.

Am I not free?] "Am I not at liberty, as much as any other of the Apoſtles, to make uſe of the privileges due to that office?" It was a law amongſt the Jews, not to receive alms from the Gentiles. Dr. Waterland, tranſpoſing the words, reads, Am I not free? Am I not an Apoſtle?—It was neceſſary, in order to St. Paul's being an Apoſtle, and a witneſs of the reſurrection, that he ſhould have ſeen Jeſus Chriſt. See Acts xxii. 14, 15. xxvi. 16. 1 Cor. xv. 18.

2 If I be not an Apoſtle unto others, yet doubtleſs, I am to you: for the ſeal of mine apoſtleſhip are ye in the Lord.

3 Mine anſwer to them that do examine me, is this,

4 Have we not power to eat and to drink?

5 Have we not power to lead about a ſiſter, a wife, as well as other apoſtles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas?

6 Or I only and Barnabas, have not we power to forbear working?

7 Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock?

8 Say I theſe things as a man? or ſaith not the law the ſame alſo?

9 For it is written in the law of Moſes, Thou ſhalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen?

10 Or ſaith he it altogether for our ſakes? for our ſakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth ſhould plow in hope; and that he that threſheth in hope, ſhould be partaker of his hope.

11 If we have ſown unto you ſpiritual things, is it a great thing if we ſhall reap your carnal things?

12 If others be partakers of this power over you, are not we rather? Nevertheleſs, we have not uſed this power; but ſuffer all things, leſt we ſhould hinder the goſpel of Chriſt.

13 Do ye not know that they which miniſter about holy things, live of the things of the temple? and they which wait at the altar, are partakers with the altar?

14 Even ſo hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the goſpel ſhould live of the goſpel.

15 But I have uſed none of theſe things. Neither have I written theſe things, that it ſhould be ſo done unto me: for it were better for me to die, than that any man ſhould make my glorying void.

16 For though I preach the goſpel, I have nothing to glory of: for neceſſity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me if I preach not the goſpel!

17 For if I do this thing willingly, I have a reward: but if againſt my will, a diſpenſation of the goſpel is committed unto me.

18 What is my reward then? Verily, that when I preach the goſpel, I may make the goſpel of Chriſt without charge, that I abuſe not my power in the goſpel.

19 For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myſelf ſervant unto all, that I might gain the more.

20 And unto the Jews, I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them

Ver. 2. For the ſeal of mine apoſtleſhip are ye] "Your converſion to Chriſtianity, is as it were a ſeal ſet to it, to make good the truth of my apoſtleſhip."

Ver. 5. To lead about a ſiſter, a wife] A Chriſtian woman, or wife. Wat. It is very improbable that the Apoſtle would have carried about with him in theſe ſacred peregrinations, a woman to whom he was not married; ſo that the anſwer which the Papiſts generally make to the argument often brought from theſe words in favour of a married clergy, is abſolutely unconcluſive: As there were no inns in thoſe parts, ſtrangers could not be accommodated with neceſſaries, unleſs they had ſome attendant to provide for them. This made it neceſſary for them to be accompanied with ſome female. The diſjunctive between the Apoſtles and the brethren of the Lord, is a proof that James, biſhop of Jeruſalem, and Jude, our Lord's brethren, were not of the number of the Apoſtles. The laſt clauſe of this verſe, And Cephas, is important; both as it declares in effect that St. Peter continued to live with his wife after he became an Apoſtle, and alſo that St. Peter had no rights as an Apoſtle, which were not common to St. Paul.—A remark utterly ſubverſive of popery, if traced to its obvious conſequences. See Locke, Doddridge, and Wall.

Ver. 6. Or I only, and Barnabas] From this expreſſion one would think that the Judaizing Chriſtians, who were the main cauſe of St. Paul's uneaſineſs in this reſpect, had a peculiar ſpleen againſt theſe two Apoſtles of the uncircumciſion; who were ſo inſtrumental in procuring and publiſhing the Jeruſalem decree, which determined the controverſy ſo directly in favour of the believing Gentiles. It ſeems probable from ver. 12. that Barnabas ſupported himſelf by the labour of his hands when at Corinth, as well as St. Paul. See Wall, Whitby, and Calmet.

Ver. 9. Thou ſhalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox] See on Deut. xxv. 4. and Raphelius on the place.

Ver. 10. Altogether] On the whole. MS. It cannot be thought that God had no regard at all to the brute creatures, in ſuch precepts as theſe; and therefore it is better (with the MS.) to render παντως, by on the whole, than entirely, or altogether; though that ſenſe is more frequent. See Mintert, and Vigerus.

Ver. 12. Partakers of this power] "Inſtead of της ἐξουσίας, I ſhould incline to read της ουσιας, ſays Mr. Locke, if there be, as Voſſius informs us, any MSS to authorize it; and then the words will run thus: If any partake of your ſubſtance. This better ſuits the foregoing words, and needs not the addition of the word this to be inſerted in the tranſlation, which with difficulty enough makes it refer to a power, he was not here ſpeaking of, and which ſtands eight verſes off. Beſides, in theſe words St. Paul ſeems to glance at what they ſuffered from the falſe Apoſtle, who did not only pretend to power of maintenance, but actually devoured them. See 2 Cor. xi. 20. It may, however, be proper juſt to obſerve, that Matth. x. 1. John xvii. 2. and many other places prove, that ἐξουσίας ὑμῶν may properly be rendered a power over you. The Corinthians, conſidering the low rate at which Socrates taught, might have been induced to think that St. Paul was not wholly diſintereſted in his miſſion, if he had claimed a maintenance for his inſtruction; and this very ſuſpicion might have been prejudicial to the Goſpel in thoſe parts. From the conduct of the Apoſtle here, and the other Apoſtles in other places, particularly among the Macedonian churches, we may conclude, that he might ſee ſome circumſtances, which determined him to decline accepting any ſubſiſtance from the Corinthians, while he reſided amongſt them. See Locke, Doddridge, and Pyle.

Ver. 14. Should live of the Goſpel] That man might be ſaid to live on the Goſpel, who was maintained for preaching it; as He might be ſaid to live on the temple, who was ſupported out of its income for miniſtering there. See Mede's Diatrib. on the place.

Ver. 17, 18. But if againſt my will, &c.] But if I do it merely becauſe I am obliged to it, I only diſcharge an office which is committed to me: ver. 18. For what then ſhall I be rewarded?—It is for this, that preaching the Goſpel of Chriſt, I preach it gratis; and do not inſiſt upon [or uſe] a claim, which the Goſpel itſelf gives me. See Heylin, Wall, ch. ii. 12. and vii. 31. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt clauſe,—That I uſe not the power I have in the Goſpel.

Ver. 19. Servant unto all] This is very emphatical, and intimates that he acted with as ſelf-denying a regard to their intereſts, and as much caution not to offend them, as if he were abſolutely in their power,—as a ſlave is in that of his maſter. See Doddridge.

Ver. 20. To the Jews I became as a Jew, &c.] For an illuſtration of this, ſee Acts xvi. 3. xxi. 21, &c. which inſtances were undoubtedly that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law.

21 To them that are without law, as without law, (being not without law to God, but under the law to Chriſt,) that I might gain them that are without law.

22 To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak: I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means ſave ſome.

23 And this I do for the goſpel's ſake, that I might be partaker thereof with you.

24 Know ye not that they which run in a race, run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain.

25 And every man that ſtriveth for the maſtery, is temperate in all things. Now, they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible.

26 I therefore ſo run, not as uncertainly; ſo fight I, not as one that beateth the air:

27 But I keep under my body, and bring it into ſubjection: leſt that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myſelf ſhould be a caſt-away.

doubtedly a ſpecimen of many more of the like kind. As under the law, in the next clauſe, can only ſignify that he voluntarily complied with it as an indifferent thing; but it cannot by any means imply, that he declared ſuch obſervances neceſſary, or refuſed to converſe with any who would not conform to them: for this was the very diſſimulation which with ſo generous a freedom he condemned in St. Peter, Gal. ii. 14, &c. See Doddridge, Calmet, and Whitby. Dr. Waterland, following many MSS, verſions, and fathers, reads, —To thoſe under the law, (not being myſelf under the law) that I might gain them that are under the law. Wetſtein and Bengelius.

Ver. 21. That I might gain them that are without law] This refers to the Gentiles not yet converted to Chriſtianity.

Ver. 22. I am made all things] I have become, &c. Wat.

Ver. 23. That I might be partaker, &c.] That I may ſhare in its benefits. Heylin. There is nothing for with you in the original. The words ſeem to refer to the ſatisfaction which St. Paul found, in imparting the invaluable and inexhauſtible bleſſings of the Goſpel to all around him;—a ſentiment moſt ſuitable to his character and office.

Ver. 24. They which run in a race, &c.] The Apoſtle here refers to the Iſthmian games, ſo called from their being celebrated on the Corinthian Iſthmus, or the neck of land which joins Peloponneſus to the continent. They are ſuppoſed to have been inſtituted in honour of Palæmon, or Melicertes, and Neptune. They were obſerved every third year, or rather every fifth, and held both ſacred and inviolable. When Corinth was ſacked and totally deſtroyed by Mummius the Roman general, they were not diſcontinued, but the care of them was committed to the Sicyonians, till the rebuilding of the city, and then it was reſtored to the inhabitants. The ſports which compoſed theſe games were running, wreſtling, boxing, and other athletic exerciſes. The Apoſtle alludes here to the ſtadium or foot-race, in which there was but one prize for the victor; though in ſome of the games there were ſeveral prizes of different value. Nothing can be more forcible and emphatical than the argument which the Apoſtle draws from this compariſon; the full force of which, whoever would ſee, will do well to read Mr. Weſt's excellent Diſſertation on the Olympic Games, particularly, ch. vi. and vii. and the concluſion. We here ſubjoin his tranſlation and brief paraphraſe of the whole paſſage before us: "Know ye not that they, who run in the ſtadium, or foot-race, run all, and yet but one receiveth the prize?—So run therefore, that ye may obtain. Moreover, every one that contendeth in the games, is temperate in all things. They, indeed, that they may obtain a corruptible crown; but we, an incorruptible. Wherefore, I for my part ſo run, as not to paſs undiſtinguiſhed; ſo fight, not as beating the air, (i. e. practiſing in a feigned combat, without an adverſary,) but I bruiſe and mortify my body, and bring it under ſubjection; leſt, after ſerving as a herald to others, (by introducing them into the Chriſtian ſtadium) I myſelf ſhould come off without honour and approbation."

Ver. 25. Is temperate in all things] Whoever conſiders, on the one hand, to what great ſelf-denial in the articles of food, ſleep, and every other ſenſual indulgence they who were to contend in the games were obliged; and on the other, of how great importance it is, that the youth of a community ſhould be formed to a manly taſte, and reſolute ſelf-government, will ſee the great national prudence of the Greeks, in the inſtitution and ſupport of theſe games: to which it is very probable their remarkable valour, and ſucceſs in war, during the beſt days of their ſeveral republics, might in a conſiderable degree be owing. In the words a corruptible crown, the Apoſtle alludes to the garland of leaves, which ſoon withered and periſhed, and which was the only reward of the contenders in theſe games. In the Olympic games, ſacred to Jupiter, the crown was of wild olive; in the Pythian, ſacred to Apollo, it was of laurel; in the Iſthmian or Corinthian, it was of pine-tree; and in the Nemæan, of parſley: But concerning theſe particulars, as well as the remarkable temperance alluded to above, we refer to Mr. Weſt, and to Elſner on the place.

Ver. 26. I—run, not as uncertainly] The ſtadia, or courſes of the Greeks were like the courſes of our horſe-races, marked with poſts and other ſigns, that ſhewed the racer which way he was to run, and of which he could not be ignorant; And the word rendered uncertainly, is often uſed for ignorantly. It may alſo refer to the certainty of obtaining the prize, on condition of obſerving the laws of the courſe; and our tranſlation may be very well underſtood in that ſenſe. The word may have another ſenſe, which will refer to the ſpectators, who would not paſs by the victorious runner without diſtinction and notice. "I run, not as one who is to paſs undiſtinguiſhed; but, knowing what eyes are upon me, and ſolicitous to gain the approbation of my judge, and attending with diligence to the boundaries which are marked out, I exert myſelf to the utmoſt." In order to acquire a greater agility and dexterity, it was uſual for thoſe who intended to box in the games, to exerciſe themſelves with the gauntlet, and to fling their arms about, as if they were engaging with a real combatant. This was called beating the air. Hence it came to be a proverbial expreſſion for a man's miſſing his blow, when he aimed at his enemy; which ſeems to be the meaning of the Apoſtle, who does not confine himſelf abſolutely to a ſingle branch of conteſt in theſe games. See Hammond, Doddridge, Elſner, Weſt, and on ver. 24.

Ver. 27. But I keep under my body] Ὑπωπιάζω, rendered I keep under, ſignifies properly to ſtrike on the face, as the boxers did; and particularly on that part under the eyes, which they eſpecially aimed at. Hence it often ſignifies a livid tumour on that part, and ſometimes is proverbially uſed for a face terribly bruiſed, and disfigured, like that of a boxer juſt come from the combat. The Apoſtle hereby intimates, that he made uſe of the greateſt rigour and ſeverity to ſubject his appetites to the dominion of reaſon and grace. The word Δουλαγωγω, rendered bring into ſubjection, is borrowed from another kind of competitors in the Iſthmian games,—the wreſtlers; and alludes to their practice of giving their adverſary a fall, ſo as to ſecure the victory. The Apoſtle from hence ſhews himſelf to be ſo far from uſing his Chriſtian liberty to its full extent, that he ſubdued himſelf, and abſtained from many things which he might have lawfully enjoyed, and endured many hardſhips, from which he might have been exempted, in order to acquire the crown or reward, which can never fall to the lot of the indolent.—Κηρύξας, rendered preached, expreſſes the office of an herald at the Iſthmian games; who from a ſcaffold, or ſome eminence, proclaimed the conditions of the games, diſplayed the prizes, exhorted the combatants, awakened the emulation and reſolution of thoſe who were to contend, declared the terms of the conteſt, and pronounced the names of the victors. The Apoſtle, however, intimates, that there was this peculiar circumſtance attending the Chriſtian conteſt, that the perſon who proclaimed its laws and rewards to others, was alſo to engage himſelf; and that there would be a peculiar infamy and miſery, in miſcarrying in ſuch circumſtances. Some critics, inſtead of ἄλλοις, to others, would read ἄλλους, and tranſlate thus:—leſt while I proclaim others conquerors, I myſelf ſhould be rejected. Αδόκιμος rendered caſt away, or rejected, ſignifies one who is diſapproved of by the judge of the games, as not having fairly deſerved the prize. Hence the word ſignifies to miſcarry, and loſe what is contended for. See Rom. i. 28. Hammond, Bos, Elſner, Faber's Agoniſt. lib. iii. c. 14. and R. Bentley, apud Wetſtein.

REFLECTIONS ON THE CHRISTIAN RACE AND CROWN. Ver. 24—27.

To quicken us in the purſuit of our heavenly reward, it may be proper, firſt, to enforce the Apoſtle's argument, which repreſents the excellence of it; and, ſecondly, to remember the methods he both practiſed and preſcribed for the obtaining it.

The motives taken from his words before us may be two,—the value of the crown,—and the poſſibility of obtaining it; and a little reflection upon each might ſuffice for the anſwering his purpoſe, did but men bring along with them a diſpoſition to let any arguments in this cauſe have their full force upon them.

The compariſon here brought lies between one crown and another; (ver. 25.) both looked upon as an ample recompence for the pains taken to obtain them; but with this difference, that in reality the value of the one is imaginary, and depends upon common eſtimation only; that of the other is intrinſic and ſubſtantial, and commonly rated as much lower, as the former is higher than it de-

Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye ſhould be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all paſſed through the ſea;

Ver. 1. Exod. xiii. 21. Numb. ix. 18. Deut. i. 33. Neh. ix. 12, 19. Pſ. lxxviii. 14. Exod. xiv. 22. Joſh. iv. 23.

ſerves to be, and that, as upon other accounts, ſo particularly becauſe admitting (in compliance with the miſtaken notions of the world) that each is a good one; yet, when taken at the very beſt, it is evident the one can be but ſhort and periſhing,—whereas the other is fixed and everlaſting;—the one a corruptible crown, the other an incorruptible.

Of the former, the corruptible ſort,—are plainly all thoſe advantages of the preſent world, for which mankind ſo eagerly contend: they are fickle and fugitive; not only allayed by numberleſs abatements, which check our delights, and diſturb our enjoyment, while we continue in poſſeſſion of them; not only expoſed to infinite accidents, perpetually conſpiring to deprive us of them; but, like the garlands here alluded to by St. Paul, which wither of themſelves; in their own nature tranſient and fading, and ſuch as it is not poſſible for the utmoſt art and care to preſerve.—To ſpend time in proving this by deſcending to particulars, is needleſs: experience and common ſenſe have done it amply to our hands, and we may appeal to any man alive, whether this be not the caſe of all the moſt envied temporal privileges and conveniences of human nature.

Yet theſe are the prizes for which we ſee ſo much buſtling and ſtruggle in the world around us; theſe are the things upon which men think all the expence and hardſhips of long inſtruction and ſevere education in youth,—all the toil and danger of ripe and vigorous age,—laborious days and reſtleſs nights,—compaſſings of ſea and land,—the caprice of courts,—the fatigues of camps, the trial of every element and climate;—in a word, eaſe, ſafety, health,—peace of body, and life, and too often conſcience and the immortal ſoul,—wiſely laid out and employed.—Things they are indeed, which have their comforts, when ſought and uſed in due place and proportion; but when purſued and loved inordinately, they deſtroy the very purpoſes they ſhould ſerve, they are therefore moſt improper to be made the chief aim and end of living, and utterly unworthy even of a ſmall part of that, which the generality of people are content to do and to ſuffer for them.

But there is another diſcouragement behind, which, added to the former, one would imagine muſt damp the vehemence of theſe purſuits;—It is not the difficulty only, but the great uncertainty of compaſſing the prize they aim at. The numberleſs diſappointments of mens expectations ſufficiently demonſtrate the fact, and might be a ſuitable check to their avidity, if any could avail;—nay, and thus our own reaſon will tell us it muſt be, where the advantage aimed at hath ſo many ſeekers; where there is not enough in the things ſought to ſatisfy all; where of thoſe pretenders the gain of one muſt, generally ſpeaking, be the diminution of another; and conſequently, where every candidate finds it neceſſary for his private intereſt to outſtrip, or to hinder them ever from making good their point, in order to ſecure and carry his own.

Such is the condition even of the beſt of thoſe things, to which we can ſuppoſe the corruptible crown here mentioned is capable of being applied:—the riches,—the honours, the pleaſures of this life. The happineſs and rewards of another, manifeſtly intended by the crown incorruptible, are great beyond expreſſion, and their inconceivable excellence renders it impoſſible to give them a full or worthy repreſentation. It may well ſuffice to obſerve, that the Apoſtle ſets theſe in direct oppoſition to, and that they are in every particular juſt the reverſe of the other.—A crown indeed,—as that denotes the higheſt honour, the greateſt affluence, the firmeſt ſecurity; the only crown, whoſe ſplendor does not deceive with falſe ideas, as having no weight of cares to make it burdenſome, no dangers to allay its glory, but all bright, ſtable, and permanent.

This crown, beſides its own value, is the more worth our ſtriving for, becauſe it is not like all others, peculiar to ſome one, excluſive of the reſt who contend for and aſpire after it; but capable of being attained by every one who ſeeks it: ſufficient to anſwer, nay, infinitely to exceed the largeſt wiſhes and expectations of them all; and ſo far from leſſening the fruition to ourſelves, by having partners in the bliſs; that as no ſingle perſon's endeavours ſhall meet diſappointment, who ſeeks it regularly, ſo the more zealouſly each labours to promote the happineſs of his brethren, the more effectually he eſtabliſhes and aggrandizes his own. And this is a happineſs not only exquiſite in degree, and in its nature pure, ſatisfactory, and truly excellent; but for its duration, everlaſting, always growing, always freſh; liable to no interruption, no abatement, no decay; a joy which no man can, a joy which God who gives it never will take from us.

It is not perhaps eaſy to think of a more powerful incitement to quicken our purſuits after heavenly things, than the putting us in mind how we uſually behave ourſelves when we have earthly advantages in view. For, alas! what excuſe can be found for a folly, which overlooks and ſlights a treaſure certainly attainable, real, perfect, and ever-during, and lays out the whole of our time and pains upon ſhadows and bubbles;—things in campariſon empty and imaginary, often ſought in vain, deceitful when found, not worth our keeping when poſſeſſed, and not poſſible to be kept long, were we never ſo deſirous to retain them?

The Apoſtle, by comparing the Chriſtian's duty to a race, doubtleſs intended to inſinuate what vigour, what regularity, and what perſeverance is expected from us: and in regard the prize is given by the maſter of the race, this ſhews us the equity of ſubmitting to his terms, the neceſſity of running in the way he hath drawn out for us, and not making to ourſelves paths of our own deſiring. This reſemblance alſo teaches us the obligation we are under to hold on our courſe with reſolution, ſince nothing leſs than coming up to the goal can crown our endeavours.

How happy would it be for us, if the importance of the metaphor before us were conſidered as it ought to be! Men would not then, as Iſaiah expreſſes it, ſpend their money for that which is not bread, and their labour for that which ſatisfieth not. They would not make religion a thing by the bye, and allow it ſo few, ſo very few even of their leiſure hours;—ſo many fewer than they give even to the diverſions and impertinencies of the world. They would not ſuffer the pains and expence they are content to be at upon the occaſions and vanities of this life, ſo greatly to exceed thoſe ſcanty droppings ſo hardly extorted from an over-grown treaſure, to works of piety and charity. In a word, they would not appear ſo extremely ſolicitous about trifles; ſuch prudent managers in affairs of little conſequence, and ſo wretchedly cold and careleſs, languid and unthinking in their main, their eternal, their only concern.

Did they reflect at all, their own example would reproach them into better ſenſe; their very pleaſures would awaken a remembrance of their duty; and every temporal race would expoſe the abſurdity of exerting all their powers to win a poor deſpicable prize, and of ſitting ſtill with their hands folded, when engaged in a courſe, whoſe end and prize is an immortal crown of glory.

From the figure uſed by the Apoſtle, we alſo learn, that it is the maſter's and judge's part to preſcribe, and the runner's to ſubmit and comply with the rules of the race. For want of this reflection, how is the face of the Chriſtian world deformed with pernicious errors, wild enthuſiaſms, frivolous ſuperſtitions, and the religion of many compounded of monſtrous abſurdities, ſuited to each perſon's complexion or paſſion, humour, or intereſt! How is the Scripture racked and diſtorted to make it ſpeak the ſenſe of private opinions, or differing parties; and the belief and practice of many no longer the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, but the dictates of daring men, preſumptuous enough to pervert it; not building up the temple of the Lord, but erecting new ſchemes, and ſetting them upon ſandy foundations of their own!

Well were it for mankind if a remembrance of our life being a race would encourage the ſteadfaſtneſs, watchfulneſs, and perſeverance even of thoſe who have in a good meaſure eſcaped the pollutions of the world; who have detected the cunning craftineſs of them who lie in wait to deceive, and have begun to run well. For if St. Paul,—if he who was caught up into the third heaven,—favoured with extraordinary viſions and revelations, above the power of human tongue to utter,—entruſted with the converſion of ſo many nations, and indefatigably labourious in that miniſtry;—If he, notwithſtanding all theſe virtues and advantages, found it neceſſary to keep under his body, and bring it into ſubjection; (ver. 27.) If he ſaw reaſon to fear that otherwiſe after having preached to others, he ſhould himſelf be a caſtaway;—what care can be too great for us, whoſe attachments and zeal are ſo much leſs! How can we anſwer it to God, or to our own ſouls, if we ſo far forget our own ſinfulneſs and frailty, as not readily to ſubmit to every method of forwarding us in the race that is ſet before us, and if we make not a diligent thankful uſe of every advantage and defence in this ſpiritual conteſt!

Chap. X. Ver. 1.] It ſeems from what is ſaid in this chapter, as if the Corinthians had told St. Paul that the temptations and conſtraints they were under, of going to their heathen neighbours' feaſts upon their ſacrifices, were ſo many and ſo great, that there was no avoiding it; and therefore they thought they might go to them without any offence to God, or danger to themſelves, ſince they were the people of God, purified from ſin by baptiſm, and fenced againſt it by partaking of the body and blood of Chriſt in the Lord's ſupper. To which St. Paul anſwers, that notwithſtanding their baptiſm, and participation of that ſpiritual meat and drink, yet they, as well as the Jews of old, might ſin, and draw on themſelves deſtruction from the hand of God; that eating of things which were known and acknowledged to be offered to idols, was partaking in the idolatrous worſhip; and therefore they were to prefer even the danger of perſecution to ſuch a compliance, for God would find a way for them to eſcape. ver. 1—22. Locke,

I would not have you, &c.] St. Paul had juſt before expreſſed his own apprehenſions of the danger of relapſing, and becoming a caſtaway, even under the higheſt diſpenſations of religion: Here, he endeavours to excite in the Corinthians the ſame ſenſe of their danger, by

2 And were all baptized unto Moſes in the cloud, and in the ſea.

3 And did all eat the ſame ſpiritual meat;

4 And did all drink the ſame ſpiritual drink. (For they drank of that ſpiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock was Chriſt.)

5 But with many of them God was not well pleaſed: for they were overthrown in the wilderneſs.

6 Now theſe things were our examples, to the intent we ſhould not luſt after evil things, as they alſo luſted.

7 Neither be ye idolaters, as were ſome of them; as it is written, The people ſat down to eat and to drink, and roſe up to play.

8 Neither let us commit fornication, as ſome of them committed, and fell in one day three and twenty thouſand.

9 Neither let us tempt Chriſt, as ſome of them alſo tempted, and were deſtroyed of ſerpents.

10 Neither murmur ye, as ſome of them alſo murmured, and were deſtroyed of the deſtroyer.

by reminding them that the Jewiſh, as well as the Chriſtian church, had received great tokens of divine favour. Such were to the Jews their paſſage through the Red Sea, under the conduct of the miraculous cloud, Exod. xiii. and their ſupernatural ſuſtenance in the wilderneſs, Such, and analogous to theſe, are the Chriſtian ſacraments. As the former did not ſecure the Jew from apoſtaſy, ſo neither will the latter the Chriſtian; whence he concludes, as in ver. 12. By baptized unto Moſes, the Apoſtle means, "Initiated into that kind of purification, which is proper to the law," here called Moſes; as the Goſpel-ſtate is often expreſſed by the name of Chriſt, and the ſtate of depraved nature by the name of Adam. See Heylin, and the next note.

Ver. 2. And were all baptized unto Moſes] The Apoſtle is here warning the Corinthians againſt the commiſſion of ſome vices, from too great a dependance on their Chriſtian privileges. And this he does by reminding them of the Iſraelites; many of whom, though they enjoyed ſimilar privileges, yet by their ſins fell under the diſpleaſure of God. He begins thus, ver. 1, 2. "Moreover, brethren, &c." Here is a plain alluſion to the original form of Chriſtian baptiſm by immerſion, as practiſed firſt by John the Baptiſt, and then by the Apoſtles and other diſciples of Chriſt. And the analogy between the caſe of the Iſraelites, while paſſing through the Red Sea, and the ordinance of baptiſm performed in that manner, appears very evident. For as the Iſraelites were under the cloud, and encompaſſed on each ſide by the ſea, they were in a manner immerſed in water. But it may be objected, that from the account in Exod. xiv. it ſeems as if the cloud was not over the heads of the Iſraelites, but removed behind them, when they paſſed through the ſea. In anſwer to which it has been replied, It was poſſible that while the cloud was paſſing over them, it might diſcharge a plentiful ſhower of rain for their refreſhment. But if this be ſuppoſed to have happened before the entrance of the Iſraelites into the ſea, the ſame objection will remain; and if it was afterwards, there ſeems to have been no neceſſity for the rain, as the cloud itſelf conſiſted of water; though perhaps the hiſtorical account may without force admit of the explication above given. For in ver. 16. Moſes is ordered to ſtretch out his hand over the ſea, &c. And though in the courſe of the narrative it is ſaid, ver. 19. that the angel—which went before—removed, and went behind them; and afterwards, at ver. 21. that Moſes ſtretched his hand, &c. yet Moſes, at the command of God, might have done this, and the Iſraelites entered into the ſea, before the cloud was removed from the front to the rear of the camp, or during the time of its removal, and while the Egyptians were at ſome diſtance from the ſhore. And if ſo, the Iſraelites muſt have been under the cloud and in the ſea at the ſame time. But although this interpretation may ſerve to confirm and illuſtrate the practice of Chriſtian baptiſm by immerſion; yet, as the ſimilitudes do not agree in all circumſtances, no concluſion can be drawn from thence, with regard to the proper objects of that ordinance. As to the expreſſion of being baptized unto Moſes, the like is uſed by the ſame Apoſtle in ſpeaking of Chriſtian baptiſm, Gal. iii. 27. where he ſays, "As many of you as were baptized unto Chriſt;" which in Acts viii. 16. is expreſſed by "being baptized in the name of the Lord Jeſus," that is, into his doctrine. Moſes was a legiſlator appointed by God to introduce a new inſtitution of his worſhip among the Jews. And in this reſpect, Heb. iii. he is compared with Chriſt, though in a lower degree, as the Chriſtian inſtitution is of a more excellent and ſpiritual nature. Wherefore, as baptiſm is the initiatory ordinance of the Chriſtian profeſſion, and the Iſraelites, at their paſſage through the Red Sea, were entering upon their new eſtabliſhment, under the conduct of Moſes; the Apoſtle calls what then happened to them, in a ſimilar manner, by the word baptiſm. The character of legiſlator is given only to Moſes and Chriſt, as each of them was authorized to promulge a divine inſtitution, though of a very different nature. And therefore perſons were never baptized in the name of any other divine inſtructor. Hence the Apoſtle puts this queſtion to the Corinthians, ch. i. 13. "Were ye baptized in the name of Paul?" Some propoſe to read, All, even to Moſes; i. e. all, not excepting Moſes, were baptized. See Heinſius, Ward, &c.

Ver. 3, 4. Spiritual meat—ſpiritual drink] Sacramental, or myſtical. MS and Heylin. It is not neceſſary to underſtand by the ſame meat and drink,—the ſame by which we Chriſtians are ſupported; for that could not properly be ſaid of any Iſraelites who were not true believers: But the meaning is, that they all, good and bad, ſhared the ſame miraculous ſupply of food and drink, which was πνευματικὸν, ſignifying ſomewhat ſpiritual. It is obſervable that St. Paul, ſpeaking of the Iſraelites, uſes the word all five times in the compaſs of the foregoing verſes; beſides that, he carefully ſays the ſame meat, and the ſame drink, which we cannot ſuppoſe to be done by chance; but emphatically, to ſignify to the Corinthians, (who probably preſumed too much upon their baptiſm, and eating of the Lord's ſupper, as if that were ſufficient to recommend them to God) that though the Iſraelites, all to a man, ate the very ſame ſpiritual food, and drank the very ſame ſpiritual drink, yet they were not all to a man preſerved; but many of them notwithſtanding ſinned, and fell under the avenging hand of God in the wilderneſs. The Jews have a tradition, that the water which iſſued from the rock in Horeb, Exod. xvii. 6. followed the Iſraelites through the wilderneſs: It has been objected, however, that this ſtream did not conſtantly follow them; for in that caſe they would have had no temptation to have murmured for want of water, as we know they did at Kadeſh, in the circumſtances ſo fatal to Moſes; nor would they have had any occaſion to buy water of the Edomites, as they propoſed to do, Deut. ii. 6. To this Mr. Mede replies, That perhaps the ſtreams from the firſt rock at Rephidim failed, for a further trial of their faith; and at Kadeſh God renewed the like wonder: But that, likewiſe, might probably fail, when they came into the inhabited country of the Edomites, which was not till near the end of their wanderings. We have obſerved on Exod. xvii. 7. that the word rendered followed them, might with equal truth, and much greater propriety, be rendered miniſtered to, or obeyed them;—a ſlight emendation, ſufficient to obviate all the difficulties ariſing from our preſent tranſlation. Beſides, it ſhould be obſerved, that the Apoſtle does not ſpeak of the real, but the ſpiritual rock; namely, Chriſt; whom that rock in the wilderneſs ſignified. The word was frequently bears this import; and inſtances of the like uſe of it every where abound in Scripture. This rock was indeed a ſtriking repreſentation of Chriſt, the rock of ages,—the ſure foundation of his people's hopes; from whom they derived thoſe ſtreams of bleſſing, which follow and miniſter to them through all this wilderneſs of mortal life, and will end in rivers of pleaſure, at the right hand of God for ever. See Locke, Hammond, and Mede's Diatrib. on the place.

Ver. 5. But with many of them] But with the greater part of them. Wat.

Ver. 6. Evil things] The fault of the Iſraelites here referred to ſeems to be, their longing after fleſh, Numb. xi. which coſt many of them their lives; and that which he guards the Corinthians againſt muſt be, their great propenſity to the pagan feaſts upon their ſacrifices. See Pſ. lxxviii. 30, 31. Locke, and Clarke.

Ver. 7. To play] Παίζειν ſignifies to dance: Feaſting and dancing uſually accompanied the heathen ſacrifices; and it is obſervable, that God himſelf condeſcended to be honoured with the latter ceremony, Exod. xv. 20. and xxxii. 17, 18. See Hammond, Whitby, and Elſner,

Ver. 8. Neither let us commit fornication] This was common at many idolatrous feaſts among the heathen; and it was the more proper for the Apoſtle to caution theſe Chriſtians againſt it, as it was proverbially called "The Corinthian practice;" See the Argument, and Reflections on ch. i. In Numb. xxv. 9. Four and twenty thouſand are mentioned; εἰκοσιτέσσαρες, which being written εἰκοσιτρς, was miſtaken for εἰκοσιτρεῖς, twenty-three. So Muſculus, Wall, &c. but ſee the note on Numbers, and Whitby.

Ver. 9. Neither let us tempt Chriſt] To tempt ſignifies to diſbelieve, after tokens ſufficient to command our faith, and engage our obedience. Though the word him be not in the ſecond clauſe, (ſome of them alſo tempted,—) it ſeems plainly to be implied: And this is a conſiderable text in proof of Chriſt's reſidence with the church in the wilderneſs, as the angel of God's preſence. Comp. Exod. xxiii. 20. Iſai. lxiii. 9. Acts vii. 38. Hebr. xi. 26.

Ver. 10. Of the deſtroyer] The Jews generally interpret this of him, whom they ſtile "The angel of death," and name Sammael. See Exod. xii. 23. Numb. xiv. 37. Heb. xi. 28. Locke, and Hammond.

11 Now all theſe things happened unto them for examples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.

12 Wherefore, let him that thinketh he ſtandeth, take heed leſt he fall.

13 There hath no temptation taken you, but ſuch as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not ſuffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation alſo make a way to eſcape, that ye may be able to bear it.

14 Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry.

15 I ſpeak as to wiſe men; judge ye what I ſay.

16 The cup of bleſſing which we bleſs, is it not the communion of the blood of Chriſt? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Chriſt?

17 For we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread.

18 Behold Iſrael after the fleſh: are not they which eat of the ſacrifices, partakers of the altar?

19 What ſay I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in ſacrifice to idols is any thing?

20 But I ſay, that the things which the Gentiles ſacrifice, they ſacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye ſhould have fellowſhip with devils.

21 Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils.

22 Do we provoke the Lord to jealouſy? are we ſtronger than he?

23 All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not.

24 Let no man ſeek his own, but every man another's wealth.

Ver. 11. Now all theſe things happened, &c.] It is to be obſerved, that all theſe inſtances mentioned by the Apoſtle, of the deſtruction which came upon the Iſraelites, who were in covenant with God, and partakers of thoſe typical ſacraments, were occaſioned by their luxurious appetites about meat and drink, and by fornication and idolatry; ſins to which the Corinthians had a great propenſity, and againſt which he therefore the more carefully guards them. Τέλη αἰώνων, rendered the ends of the world, properly ſignifies the ends of the ages: That is, the concluding age, or the laſt diſpenſation of God to mankind; which we muſt aſſuredly conclude that it is, if we believe the Goſpel to be true. See Locke.

Ver. 13. Common to man] 'Ανθρώπινος,—which may ſignify, proportionable to human ſtrength, as well as frequent to human creatures. Inſtead of But God is faithful, Wat. and the MS read, And, &c. In Pſ. ciii. 13, 14. and numberleſs other paſſages, God encourages his people to hope for his preſence and help in preſſing danger, See ch. i. 9. Doddridge, and Mintert.

Ver. 16. The cup of bleſſing, &c.] The Jews uſed to conclude the feaſt whereon the Paſchal lamb was eaten, with a cup of wine. This they called the cup of bleſſing, and the cup of praiſing, becauſe at the time of drinking it, they ſung an hymn of praiſe. We ſhould likewiſe recollect, that in the early ages of the world, when victims made ſo great a part of the religion of the Jews and Gentiles, the ſacrifice was followed by a religious feaſting on the thing which had been offered; the partakers whereof were ſuppoſed to become partakers of the benefits of the ſacrifice. Well therefore might the Apoſtle argue againſt the Corinthians, who ate of the ſacrifices of the Gentiles, and communicated with the Chriſtians, as in the verſe before us; from whence we may collect, that the cup of bleſſing, &c. is not merely a general commemoration of Chriſt's death and paſſion; It is the communion of the blood of Chriſt. See Warburton and Cudworth on the ſacrament. Inſtead of the communion, the MS and Dr. Waterland read, a participation.

Ver. 17. For we being many, &c.] Becauſe the bread is one, we, being many, are one body. MS. and Wat. This is ſtill a further proof that the cup of bleſſing, &c. is not, as ſome would urge, merely a commemoration of a deceaſed benefactor; but a commemoration of Chriſt's death and paſſion. In this verſe the Apoſtle alludes to the Jewiſh cuſtom of having but one loaf at the paſſover, which was not divided, till broken in order to be diſtributed; he ſays, therefore, that the partaking of one bread, made the receivers, of many to become one body:—A juſt inference, according to the idea we have affixed to this rite; for then the communion of the body and blood of Chriſt unites the receivers into one body, by an equal diſtribution of one common benefit; Or, in the elegant words of our church liturgy, "Then we ſpiritually eat the fleſh of Chriſt, and drink his blood; then we dwell in Chriſt, and Chriſt in us; we are one with Chriſt, and Chriſt with us."—But if the Lord's Supper be only a general commemoration of a deceaſed benefactor, it leaves the receivers as it found them; not one body, but many ſeparate profeſſors of one common faith. See as above. Inſtead of partakers, the MS reads communicants.

Ver. 20. I would not, &c.] I would not that ye ſhould be partakers of devils. Wat. I would not have you become communicants of devils. MS.

Ver. 21. Ye cannot drink the cup, &c.] There ſtill remains one more ſenſe of the Lord's Supper, which is, that it was a foederal rite or covenant: This is grounded upon the Apoſtle's reaſoning in this and the preceding verſes: "Thoſe who eat of the ſacrifices, ſays he, are partakers of the altar: ver. 18." Now a ſacrifice at the altar, was a foederal rite or covenant; conſequently the feaſt upon that ſacrifice, became a foederal rite and covenant likewiſe. It is eaſy to ſhew that the demons were conſidered as preſent at their ſacrifices, and as partakers with the worſhippers in the common feaſt, and that by theſe means friendſhip, brotherhood, and familiarity, were imagined to be contracted between them, becauſe they all ate at one table, and ſat down at one board. The Lord's table, and the table of devils, therefore, being both foederal rites or covenants, the ſame perſon could not be a partaker of both; becauſe no man can execute two foederal rites or covenants which mutually deſtroy each other. See Cudworth's "True notion of the Lord's Supper," ch. i. and v. Elſner, and Lowman's Heb. Ritual, p. 54.

Ver. 22. Do we provoke the Lord, &c.?] This alludes to the idea under which idolatry is repreſented as a kind of ſpiritual adultery, which moved the jealouſy of God; though every deliberate ſin is, in effect, a daring of his omnipotent vengeance. See Doddridge and Locke.

Ver. 23.] The Apoſtle here proceeds with another argument againſt things offered to idols, wherein he ſhews the danger which might be in it, from the ſcandal it might give, ſuppoſing the thing lawful in itſelf. He had formerly treated of this ſubject, (ch. 8.) ſo far as to let them ſee, that there was no good or virtue in eating things offered to idols, notwithſtanding they knew that idols were nothing, and they might think that their free eating without ſcruple ſhewed that they knew their liberty in the Goſpel,—that idols were in reality nothing, and therefore they ſlighted and diſregarded them and their worſhip as nothing; but that there might be evil in eating,—by the offence it might give to weak Chriſtians, who had not that knowledge. He here takes up the argument of offence again, and extends it to Jews and Gentiles, ver. 32; ſhewing that it is not enough to juſtify us in any action, that the thing we do is in itſelf lawful, unleſs we ſeek in it the glory of God, and the good of others.—ver. 23, to ch. xi. 1.

All things] The word all is here to be limited to ſuch things as are the ſubject of the Apoſtle's diſcourſe; and his meaning is,—"Suppoſing all theſe things are lawful; ſuppoſing it lawful to eat things offered unto idols; yet things that are lawful are not expedient: all things that are lawful for me, may not tend to the edification of others, and ſo ought to be forborne." See Locke and Doddridge.

Ver. 24. Let no man ſeek his own] This precept cannot be taken in a ſtrict and literal ſenſe, but ſhould be interpreted comparatively, ſo as to underſtand the Apoſtle as exhorting them not to ſeek their own advantage entirely, or not ſo much as that of others. Mr. Locke's paraphraſe is, "No one muſt ſeek barely his own private particular intereſt alone, but let every one ſeek the good of others alſo."

25 Whatſoever is ſold in the ſhambles, that eat, aſking no queſtion, for conſcience ſake.

26 For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulneſs thereof.

27 If any of them that believe not, bid you to a feaſt, and ye be diſpoſed to go; whatſoever is ſet before you eat, aſking no queſtion, forconſcience ſake.

28 But if any man ſay unto you, This is offered in ſacrifice unto idols, eat not, for his ſake that ſhewed it, and for conſcience ſake: For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulneſs thereof:

29 Conſcience, I ſay, not thine own, but of the other: for why is my liberty judged of another man's conſcience?

30 For, if I by grace be a partaker, why am I evil ſpoken of for that for which I give thanks?

31 Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatſoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.

32 Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God:

33 Even as I pleaſe all men in all things, not ſeeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be ſaved.

Ver. 25. Whatſoever is ſold in the ſhambles] Herodotus informs us, that the Egyptians, when they had cut off the head of the victim, uſed to carry the carcaſe to market, and ſell it to the Greeks, if they could find any to purchaſe; if not, they threw it into the river, judging it unlawful to eat it themſelves. Though the Grecian prieſts had no ſuch ſcruples, yet, as they had often more fleſh of their ſacrifices than they and their families could conſume, it was natural for them to take this method of diſpoſing of it to advantage; and at times of extraordinary ſacrifice, it is probable the neighbouring markets might be chiefly ſupplied from their temples. See Doddridge and Raphelius.

Ver. 26. And the fulneſs thereof] With all that therein is. Waterland; who omits the ſame clauſe as ſuperfluous in ver. 28. And Mr. Locke obſerves, that the repetition of thoſe words ſo manifeſtly diſturbs the ſenſe, that the Syr. Vulg. French, and other tranſlations have omitted them; in which they are juſtified by the Alexandrian and other Greek copies. Others however think, that the connection may well be preſerved by reading the words in a parentheſis, and profeſs themſelves not diſpoſed to have them omitted, as in their ideas they have an eminent propriety and beauty, ver. 28. in contraſt with the verſe before us. See Wetſtein, Mill, Hammond, and Doddridge.

Ver. 29. For why is my liberty judged of] Some think that the meaning is, "Why ſhould I uſe my liberty ſo, as to offend the conſcience of any?"—Others think it is an objection in the mouth of the Corinthians, and to be thus underſtood: "But why ſhould I ſuffer myſelf to be thus impoſed upon, and receive law from any, where Chriſt has left me free?" Rather, perhaps, this and ver. 30. are to be conſidered as coming in by way of parentheſis, to prevent the Corinthians from extending the former caution beyond what the Apoſtle deſignedby it; as if he had ſaid, "as to what immediately lies between God and my own ſoul, why is my liberty to be judged, arraigned, and condemned at the bar of another man's conſcience?—I am not in ſuch caſes to govern myſelf by the judgement and apprehenſion of others; nor have they any authority to judge or cenſure me for not concurring with them in their own narrow notions and declarations." See Doddridge, Locke, and Whitby.

Ver. 30. For if I, &c.] For if I eat or partake with thankſgiving. Wat.

Ver. 31, Whether therefore ye eat] "Therefore, on the whole, to conclude this diſcourſe, ſince no one particular rule can be laid down to ſuit all the diverſities of temper and apprehenſion which may ariſe; inſtead of uncharitable contentions with each other, or any thing which looks like mutual contempt, let us take all the pains we can to meet as in the center of real religion. See to it then, that whether ye eat or drink, or whatſoever elſe you do, in the common as well as ſacred actions of life, ye do all to the glory of God; purſuing the credit of the Goſpel, and the edification of the church, that God may be honoured in the happineſs of his creatures, and more univerſally acknowledged as the author of all good." See Doddridge, and more on this ſubject in the Reflections.

Ver. 32. Neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles] As theſe are both oppoſed to the church of God, it is reaſonable to conclude, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks of unconverted Jews and Greeks, and refers to the danger there might be of prejudicing them againſt Chriſtianity, by the indulgences againſt which he cautions them. See Doddridge, Calmet, and on the next chapter, ver. 1.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 31.

The deſign of the Apoſtle in this chapter is to preſs upon Chriſtians the great obligations they were under to walk worthy of their holy vocation; to be ſolicitous above all things to promote the glory of God, and the ſalvation of men; to bring over unbelievers to the acknowledgment of the truth, and to prevent as far as poſſible thoſe who believe from being offended and diſcouraged in their duty, or by any means tempted and ſeduced into ſin.

The great temptation in the Apoſtle's days was, that of relapſing into idolatry; either directly into groſs acts of this ſin, through fear of perſecution, or conſequentially into the ſnare of a defiled conſcience, by preſumptuouſly miſunderſtanding the true bounds of what was lawful and innocent. Againſt both theſe he exhorts the Corinthians in the chapter before us,—againſt falling into direct idolatry through fear of perſecution, he cautions them, ver. 13—21. againſt the next danger,—the falling conſequentially into the ſnare of a defiled conſcience, by preſumptuouſly miſunderſtanding the true bounds of what is lawful and innocent,—he cautions them in the remaining part of the chapter.

The words of the verſe under conſideration contain a doctrine of the higheſt importance in religion. By the glory of God is originally meant, 1. His eſſence, perſon, or majeſty. 2. The manifeſtation of his perfections or attributes in the external exerciſe of them towards his creatures. And from hence, 3. The return and acknowledgment which his creatures make again to God, for this manifeſtation of his goodneſs to them.

To give glory to God, is to promote his honour in the world, or to contribute what we can towards the keeping up in all men's minds a juſt ſenſe of him, and a regard to him. And this is done particularly by worſhipping him with conſtant and perpetually-returning acts of ſolemn public devotion:—By thanks particularly returned for ſpecial mercies or benefits received, whereby we profeſs our ſenſe of God's being the author of them;— by acknowledgment of his government and ſupreme dominion in the world;—by confeſſion of paſt offences, with true humiliation, and a juſt ſenſe of the unworthineſs and ungratefulneſs of ſin;—and by actual repentance and forſaking of ſin, accompanied with real, conſtant, habitual amendment of heart and life. In ſhort, whatever tends to the true honour of religion, and to the eſtabliſhment of virtue and goodneſs among men, this is one of thoſe things which truly promote the glory of God.

Hence then we ſee what is required of men to practiſe, in the ſeveral caſes and circumſtances of life, in order to their ſatisfying the precept in queſtion.—He that will in all things promote the glory of God, will not only be conſtant in acts immediately and directly religious; but he muſt alſo reſolve againſt being at any time guilty of any action which is directly irreligious. Whoever is ſincerely deſirous of doing all things to the glory of God, as he will be heartily ſorry for all his own ſins and offences, ſo he will really endeavour, as much as in him lieth, to prevent the ſin of others. He will avoid every thing which may lead them into ſin. He will ſet them an example of virtue in the practice of his own life: He will recommend to them, in his diſcourſe upon all fair occaſions, the excellency and the reaſonableneſs of religion: He will rejoice to ſee virtue, righteouſneſs, and univerſal charity prevail and proſper in the world; will wiſh, with Moſes, that all the Lord's people were prophets, and contribute all in his power towards enabling them to be ſuch.

But further; in all great actions,—actions of moment in the main courſe of human life, though they may not be directly religious, he ought expreſly to intend the glory of God, as his chief and main end: for whatever is therefore choſen, becauſe it tends to the promoting of virtue and goodneſs, is in the Scripture-ſenſe done for the glory of God; and whatever is in like manner avoided, becauſe it has a tendency to evil, is avoided for the glory of God.

Now there is no conſiderable action in any man's life, no action of conſequence and importance in the world, but which, even though it has not any direct relation to religion, yet ſome way or other has on the whole a tendency to promote the cauſe of virtue or of vice. Such, for inſtance, is a man's chooſing his profeſſion, or manner of life in the world. Whatſoever profeſſion,—though not directly unlawful,—yet leads men into many and ſtrong temptations to ſin, will always, if poſſible, be avoided by a man who is ſincerely deſirous of doing all things to the glory of God. Every innocent profeſſion may equally and indifferently be choſen by any good man; but yet, even in that choice, his main and ultimate end will be the exerciſe of right and truth. Profit, power, reputation, and the like, may very innocently and very juſtly be aimed at, by men in any buſineſs or employment

CHAP. XI.

He reproveth them, becauſe in holy aſſemblies their men prayed with their heads covered, and women with their heads uncovered: and becauſe generally their meetings were not for the better, but for the worſe; as namely, in profaning with their own feaſts the Lord's ſupper. Laſtly, he remindeth them of the firſt inſtitution thereof.

BE ye followers of me, even as I alſo am of Chriſt.

2 Now I praiſe you, brethren, that ye remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances, as I delivered them to you.

3 But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Chriſt; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Chriſt is God.

Ver. 1. Ch. iv. 16. Epheſ. v. 1. Phil. iii. 17. 1 Theſſ. i. 6. 2 Theſſ. iii. 9.—V. 2. Ch. iv. 17. Ch. vii. 17. Or, traditions. V. 3. Epheſ. v. 23. John xiv. 28. Ch. iii. 23. xv. 27, 28. Phil. ii. 7, 8, 9.

whatſoever; but then theſe things muſt always be deſired with a due ſubordination to the intereſts of virtue, which is the glory of God, and the only true and final happineſs of men.—Whoever, in the great lines and main courſe of his life, aims merely or principally at worldly ends,—in the attainment of thoſe ends, he has his peculiar, his only reward.

Once more; as in all great actions a good Chriſtian ought actually, ſo in all, even the ſmalleſt and moſt inconſiderable actions of life, he ought habitually to intend the glory of God. The royal prophet, in Pſ. cxlviii. 2, &c. repreſents all, even the irrational, nay, the very inanimate creatures, as glorifying God by fulfilling his word, by acting regularly according to the nature he had given them. Much more then may even the moſt common actions of men be juſtly ſaid to be done to the glory of God, when they are done decently and ſoberly, regularly and innocently, as becomes men and Chriſtians,—ſuch as have upon their minds, even when they are not directly thinking of it, an habitual regard to God and religion. In a journey, to a diligent man, and one whoſe mind is really bent upon his journey's end, every thing he does, as well as his actual travelling, tends truly to the ſame end. His reſt and ſleep, his ſtops and refreſhments, nay, his very diverſions and digreſſions ſtill tend uniformly towards enabling him to arrive at his intended home. And thus likewiſe in the courſe of a religious life, to a man ſincerely virtuous, every action of his life promotes the glory of God;—every thing he does is ſanctified by a habit of virtue; his worldly buſineſs and employment, by juſtice and charity running uniformly through all the parts of it;—the common actions of his life by decency and inoffenſiveneſs, and his very pleaſures and amuſements by innocency and right intention. In a word, whatſoever he is doing, he ſtill always habitually remembers the end, and therefore he never does amiſs.

The uſes naturally ariſing by way of reflection from what has been ſaid, are as follows:

1. From hence we may learn how ſevere a reproof thoſe perſons juſtly deſerve, who, far from doing all things, as the Apoſtle directs, to the glory of God, do on the contrary, by profaneneſs, unrighteouſneſs, and debauchery, directly diſhonour him whom they profeſs to ſerve; bringing a reproach and infamy upon our moſt holy religion, and cauſing the name of God and the doctrine of Chriſt to be, through their means, blaſphemed amongſt unbelievers.

2. Thoſe deſerve, in the next place, to be rebuked ſharply, who, though they do not diſhonour God by acts directly irreligious, yet are careleſs and neglecting in matters of religion: not much regarding whether truth or error prevail in the world; nor being ſolicitous to do honour to their religion, and to promote the ſpreading of the Goſpel of Chriſt, by ſhewing its reaſonableneſs, by preſerving its ſimplicity and purity, and by exhibiting its beauty to all mankind.

3. After theſe, ſuch are the objects of cenſure, who have indeed a zeal for religion, but not according to knowledge; placing the main ſtreſs of religion in forms and ceremonies unworthy of God, or in opinions and notions, which either through their obſcurity, or their diſagreement with the everlaſting Goſpel, with natural religion and the divine perfections, hinder inſtead of promoting the glory of God.

4. Even the beſt of men have need to be admoniſhed and put in remembrance, that they ſtir up the gift of God which is in them, that ſo they may be more and more diligent in all their actions to do every thing to the glory of God; not with a ſuperſtitious anxiety, or a burdenſome preciſeneſs in things of little moment, but with a chearful application of every occurrence of life to the promoting of truth and right, of reaſon and virtue among men. Rejoicing in the glory of God, and in the eſtabliſhment of his kingdom of righteouſneſs, as that wherein conſiſts the happineſs of the whole creation, both in this world, and in that which is to come.

Laſtly, From hence we may learn to comfort and ſatisfy the minds of ſome weak Chriſtians, who, not having a right notion what the glory of God is, can never aſſure themſelves that they are true promoters of it.—A Chriſtian's duty, of doing all things to the glory of God, ſignifies plainly and only this,—"That he ought always to prefer the intereſts of religion and virtue, and to promote and eſtabliſh them in the minds of his fellow-creatures before all worldly conſiderations whatſoever." See Clarke's Serm. vol. ii. p. 1, &c.

Chap. XI. Ver. 1.] This verſe ſeems to belong to the preceding chapter, where the Apoſtle had propoſed himſelf as an example, and therefore it ſhould not be ſeparated from it. From what St. Paul ſays in this and the preceding verſe taken together, we may collect that he makes ſome reflection on the falſe Apoſtle; at leaſt it is no ſmall proof of St. Paul's integrity and humility, that he propoſes himſelf to be followed no further, than as he ſought the good of others, and not his own, and as he had Chriſt for his pattern. See ch. iv. 16. Rom. xv. 3. and Locke.

Ver. 2.] St. Paul commends the Corinthians for obſerving the orders he had left with them, and uſes arguments to juſtify the rule he had given them, that women ſhould not pray or prophecy in their aſſemblies uncovered; concerning which, it ſeems, there was ſome contention, for the reſolution whereof they had appealed to St. Paul, ver. 2—16. Locke. Inſtead of that you remember me, &c. Dr. Waterland reads, that you remember every thing of mine, and that you keep the traditions, &c.

Ver. 3. But I would have you know] This about women ſeeming as difficult a paſſage as moſt in St. Paul's Epiſtles, I crave leave, ſays Mr. Locke, to premiſe ſome few conſiderations which I hope may conduce to the clearing of it. I. It is to obſerved, that it was the cuſtom for women who appeared in public to be veiled, ver. 13—16. therefore it could be no queſtion at all, whether they ought to be veiled when they aſſiſted at the prayers and praiſes in the public aſſemblies; or if that were the thing intended by the Apoſtle, it had been much eaſier, ſhorter, and plainer for him to have ſaid, that women ſhould be covered in the aſſemblies. II. It is plain that this covering the head in women is reſtrained to ſome particular actions which they performed in the aſſembly, expreſſed by the words praying and propheſying, ver. 4 and 5. which, whatever they ſignify, muſt have the ſame meaning, when applied to the women, in the 5th verſe, that they have when applied to the men in the 4th verſe. It will poſſibly be objected, "If women were to be veiled in the aſſemblies, let thoſe actions be what they will, the women joining in them were ſtill to be veiled."—Anſwer, This would be plainly ſo, if their interpretation were to be followed, who are of opinion, that by praying and propheſying here, was meant, being preſent in the aſſembly, and joining with the congregation in the prayers that were made, or hymns that were ſung, or in hearing the reading and expoſition of the Holy Scriptures there. But againſt this,—that the hearing of preaching or propheſying was never called preaching or propheſying, is ſo unanſwerable an objection, that I think there can be no reply to it. The caſe in ſhort ſeems to be this: The men prayed and propheſied in the aſſemblies, and did it with their heads uncovered: The women alſo ſometimes prayed and propheſied too in the aſſemblies, which when they did, they thought during their performing that action, they were excuſed from being veiled, and might be bareheaded, or at leaſt open-faced, as well as the men. This was that which the Apoſtle reſtrains in them, and directs, that though they prayed or propheſied, they were ſtill to remain veiled. III. The next thing to be conſidered is, what is here to be underſtood by praying and propheſying. And that ſeems to me to be the performing of ſome particular public action in the aſſembly by ſome one perſon, which was for that time peculiar to that perſon, and whilſt it laſted the reſt of the aſſembly ſilently aſſiſted. For it cannot be ſuppoſed, that when the Apoſtle ſays, a man praying or propheſying, that he means an action performed in common by the whole congregation; or if he did, what pretence could that give the woman to be unveiled more during the performance of ſuch an action, than at any other time? A woman muſt be veiled in the aſſembly;—what pretence then or claim could it give her to be unveiled, that ſhe joined with the reſt of the aſſembly in the prayer that ſome one perſon made? Such a praying as this could give no more ground for her being unveiled, than her being in the aſſembly could be thought a reaſon for her being unveiled. The ſame may be ſaid of propheſying, when underſtood to ſignify a woman's joining with the congregation in ſinging the praiſes of God. But if the woman prayed, as the mouth of the aſſembly, &c. then it was likely ſhe might think ſhe had the privilege to be unveiled. Praying and propheſying, as has been ſhewn, ſignifying here the doing ſome peculiar action in the aſſembly, whilſt the reſt of the congregation only aſſiſted, let us in the next place examine what that action was. As to propheſying, the Apoſtle in expreſs words tells us, ch. iv. 3 and 12. that it was "ſpeaking in the aſſembly." The ſame is evident as to praying, that the Apoſtle means by it "praying publickly with an audible voice in the congregation," ch. xiv. 14—19. IV. It is to be obſerved, that whether any one prayed or propheſied, they did it alone, the reſt remaining ſilent, ch. xiv. 27—33. So that even in thoſe extraordinary praiſes which any one ſung to God by the immediate motion and impulſe of the Holy Ghoſt, which was one of the actions called propheſying, they ſung alone. And indeed how could it be otherwiſe? For who could join with the perſon ſo propheſying in things dictated to him alone by the Holy Ghoſt, which the others could not know, till the per-

4 Every man praying or propheſying, having his head covered, diſhonoureth his head.

5 But every woman that prayeth or propheſieth with her head uncovered, diſhonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if ſhe were ſhaven.

6 For if the woman be not covered, let her alſo be ſhorn: but if it be a ſhame for a woman to be ſhorn or ſhaven, let her be covered.

7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, foraſmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man.

8 For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man.

9 Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man.

10 For this cauſe ought the woman to have power on her head, becauſe of the angels.

Ver. 5. Deut. xxi. 12.—V. 6. Numb. v. 18. Deut. xxii. 5.—V. 7. Gen. i. 26, 27.—V. 8. Gen. ii. 22.—V. 9. Gen. ii. 18, 21, 23.—V. 10. Gen. xxiv. 65. That is, a covering, in ſign that ſhe is under the power of her huſband. Eccles. v. 6.

ſon propheſying uttered them? V. Propheſying, as St. Paul tells us, ch. xiv. 3. was "ſpeaking unto others to edification, exhortation and comfort:" But every ſpeaking to others to any of theſe ends, was not propheſying, but only then when ſuch ſpeaking was a ſpiritual gift, performed by the immediate and extraordinary motion of the Holy Ghoſt, ch. xiv. 1, 12, 24, 30. For example, ſinging praiſes to God was called propheſying; but we ſee when Saul propheſied, the Spirit of God fell upon him, and he was turned into another man, 1 Sam. x. 6. Nor do I think any place in the New Teſtament can be produced wherein propheſying ſignifies bare reading of the Scripture, or any other action performed without a ſupernatural impulſe and aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God. This we are ſure, that the propheſying which St. Paul here ſpeaks of, is one of the extraordinary gifts given by the Spirit of God, ch. xii. 10. Now that the Spirit of God, and the gift of propheſy, ſhould be poured out upon women as well as men, in the time of the Goſpel, is plain from Acts xi. 17. and then where could be a fitter place for them to utter their propheſies in, than the aſſemblies? It is not unlikely what Mr. Mede, one of the moſt learned and ſagacious of our interpreters of Scripture, ſuggeſts upon this place; viz. That Chriſtian women might, out of a vanity incident to that ſex, propoſe to themſelves and affect an imitation of the prieſts and propheteſſes of the Gentiles, who had their faces uncovered when they uttered their oracles, or officiated in their ſacrifices: But I cannot but wonder that that very acute writer ſhould not ſee, that the bare being in the aſſembly could not give a Chriſtian woman any pretence to that freedom. None of the Bacchai or Pythia quitted their ordinary modeſt guiſe, but when ſhe was, as the poets expreſs it, Rapta or plena Deo, poſſeſſed and hurried away by the Spirit ſerved. And ſo, poſſibly, a Chriſtian woman, when ſhe found the Spirit of God poured out upon her, as Joel expreſſes it, exciting her to pray or ſing praiſes to God, or diſcover any truth immediately revealed to her, might think it convenient, for her better uttering of it, to be uncovered, or at leaſt to be no more reſtrained in her liberty of ſhewing herſelf, than the female prieſts of the heathens were when they delivered their oracles: But yet even in theſe actions the Apoſtle forbids the women to unveil themſelves. St. Paul's forbidding women to ſpeak in the aſſemblies, will probably ſeem a ſtrong argument againſt this: But when well conſidered, will perhaps prove none. There are two places wherein the Apoſtle forbids women to ſpeak in the church, 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35. and 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12. He that ſhall attentively read and compare theſe together, may obſerve that the ſilence enjoined the woman, is for a mark of her ſubjection to the male ſex: And therefore what in the one is expreſſed by keeping ſilence, and not ſpeaking, but being under obedience, in the other is called, being in ſilence with all ſubjection, not teaching or uſurping authority over the man. The women in the churches were not to aſſume the perſonage of doctors, or to ſpeak there as teachers; this carried with it the appearance of ſuperiority, and was forbidden. Nay, they were not ſo much as to aſk queſtions there, or to enter into any ſort of conference. This ſhews a kind of equality, and was alſo forbidden: And yet, though they were not to ſpeak in the church in their own names, or as if they were raiſed by the franchiſes of Chriſtianity to ſuch an equality with the men, that where knowledge or preſumption of their own abilities emboldened them to it, they might take upon them to be teachers and inſtructors of the congregation, or might at leaſt enter into queſtionings and debates there. This would have had too great an air of ſtanding upon even ground with the men, and would not have well comported with the ſubordination of the ſex. But ſtill this ſubordination which God, for order's ſake, had inſtituted in the world, hindered not, but that by the ſupernatural gifts of the Spirit he might make uſe of the weaker ſex, to any extraordinary function whenever he thought fit, as well as he did of the men. And yet, when they thus either prayed or propheſied by the motion and impulſe of the Holy Ghoſt, care was taken that whilſt they were obeying God, who was pleaſed by his Spirit to ſet them a ſpeaking, the ſubjection of their ſex ſhould not be forgotten, but owned and preſerved by their being covered. The Chriſtian religion was not to give offence, by any appearance or ſuſpicion that it took away the ſubordination of the ſexes, and ſet the woman at liberty from her natural ſubjection to the man. And therefore we ſee, that in both theſe caſes, the aim was to maintain and ſecure the confeſſed ſuperiority and dominion of the man, and not permit it to be invaded ſo much as in appearance. Hence the arguments in the one caſe for covering, and in the other for ſilence, are all drawn from the natural ſuperiority of the man, and the ſubjection of the woman. In the one the woman, without an extraordinary call, was to keep ſilence, as a mark of her ſubjection: In the other, where ſhe was to ſpeak by an extraordinary call and commiſſion from God, ſhe was yet to continue the profeſſion of her ſubjection, in keeping herſelf covered. Here by the way it is to be obſerved, that there was extraordinary praying to God by the impulſe of the Spirit, as well as ſpeaking unto men for their edification, exhortation, and comfort: ch. xiv. 15. Rom. viii. 26. Jude 20. Theſe things being premiſed, let us follow the thread of St. Paul's reaſoning. See Locke, and Mede's 16th diſcourſe.

Ver. 4. Diſhonoureth his head] It was part of the puniſhment among ſeveral nations, to cover the faces of the malefactors. The Romans practiced it, as appears from Matth. xxvi. and Mark xiv. 65. and that the Perſians obſerved this cuſtom likewiſe, is evident from Eſther vii. 8. This, therefore being uſed to condemned perſons, was undoubtedly a diſgrace, as the Apoſtle aſſerts. It was likewiſe the cuſtom among the Greeks and Romans, as well as the Jews, to appear in places of worſhip with their heads covered; and it is certain that the Jewiſh prieſts wore a kind of turban, when miniſtering in the temple: But it ſeems that the Corinthian men wore a veil, out of regard to a Phariſaical inſtitution, and in imitation of the cuſtom obſerved in the ſynagogues, of which the Apoſtle therefore diſapproves. The prieſts and propheteſſes of the Gentiles had their faces uncovered, when they were under an holy rapture, and delivered their oracles; and at this time the hair of the prieſteſſes was generally diſhevelled: As the Corinthian women, when under the divine inſpiration, wore their hair in the ſame faſhion, it made them too much reſemble the pagan prieſteſſes; and for this reaſon amongſt others, the Apoſtle with great propriety diſcourages the practice. See Mede's 16th diſcourſe, Whitby, Hammond, Elſner, and the foregoing note.

Ver. 7. Glory of God] The word rendered glory ſignifies both a beam or irradiation, and a likeneſs. If it be interpreted in the firſt ſenſe, it will imply, That as a beam or irradiation which flows from a luminous body, proves that the body from whence it flows is more honourable; ſo man, who is a beam or irradiation from God, is leſs honourable than the Deity; and conſequently that woman, who is an irradiation from the man, is leſs honourable than he. If we interpret the word in the ſecond ſenſe, the meaning will be, That as a man ought not to have his head covered, as being the immediate image and glory of God, made in his likeneſs, as the firſt copy of his kind, before woman was created; it is therefore decent that he ſhould appear with the marks of that ſuperiority which he bears. But the woman ſhould forbear it; and it is enough to ſay of her, that ſhe is the glory of the man, to whom God hath done no inconſiderable honour, as well as favour, in making ſo excellent and amiable a creature of his conſort. Yet ſtill her ſtate of ſubjection to him ſhould be remembered; and it is very expedient that ſhe ſhould appear in public with ſome tacit acknowledgments of it. See Gen. i. 26, 27. Hammond, Locke, Elſner, and Calmet.

Ver. 10. For this cauſe ought the woman to have power, &c.] A covering. Wat. Mr. Locke acknowledges, with a modeſty which does him much honour, that he did not underſtand this text,—and many ſeem to have darkened it by their attempts to explain it. The chief difficulty does not lie in the word power, which undoubtedly muſt be underſtood of the veil worn on their heads by married women, as a token of ſubjection to their huſband; (ſee Gen. xxiv. 65.) and ſome ſuppoſe that the veil was in Hebrew called רדיד redid, from the root רדד reded, which ſignifies ſubjection: So that the veil was as it were the habit by which the woman ſhewed that ſhe conſidered herſelf as in ſubjection: And Chardin obſerves, that the married women in Perſia wear a peculiar habit to the very ſame purpoſe. It is more difficult to underſtand the meaning of the clauſe, Becauſe of the angels,—διὰ τοὺς ἀγγέλους. It ſeems neither reaſonable nor decent to underſtand this of young miniſters, as if they were in peculiar danger of being enſnared by the beauty of women; and it is more groſsly abſurd ſtill, to ſuppoſe with Tertullian, that there was any room to apprehend it could be a ſnare to celeſtial ſpirits:—A miſtake which ſeemed to be grounded on the wild interpretation of Gen. vi. 2. ſo generally received among the fathers. Dr. Whitby underſtands it of evil angels, and thinks it refers to the puniſhment which Eve incurred, Gen. iii. 16. for hearkening to the ſuggeſtions of Satan. Mr. Gough, in a diſſertation on the place, by Ἀγγέλους underſtands ſpies, 11 Nevertheleſs, neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord.

12 For as the woman is of the man, even ſo is the man alſo by the woman; but all things of God.

13 Judge in yourſelves: is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered?

14 Doth not even nature itſelf teach you, that if a man have long hair, it is a ſhame unto him?

15 But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her for a covering.

16 But if any man ſeem to be contentious, we have no ſuch cuſtom, neither the churches of God.

17 Now in this that I declare unto you, I praiſe you not, that ye come together not for the better, but for the worſe.

18 For firſt of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there be diviſions among you; and I partly believe it.

19 For there muſt be alſo hereſies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifeſt among you.

20 When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lord's ſupper.

21 For in eating every one taketh before other his own ſupper: and one is hungry, and another is drunken.

22 What, have ye not houſes to eat and to drink in? or deſpiſe ye the church of God, and ſhame them that have not? What ſpies, who he ſuppoſes came into Chriſtian aſſemblies to make ill-natured remarks, and ſo would be glad to blaze abroad any indecencies which they might obſerve there. Others ſupppoſe that the preſence of good angels is implied; and they underſtand the paſſage thus, [obſerving that the preſence of angels in religious aſſemblies is favoured by Eccles. v. 1, 6. and the figures of the cherubim in the tabernacle and temple:] "The woman ought to have upon her head a veil, as a token of her being under the power and ſubjection of the man; and ſo much the rather ought ſhe to wear it in religious aſſemblies, becauſe of the angels; who are eſpecially preſent there, and before whom we ought to be exceedingly careful that nothing paſs which may be indecent and irregular, and unlike that perfect order and profound humility, with which they worſhip in the divine preſence."

It is not for me to determine amidſt this variety of opinions; I ſhall therefore only add, that the reader will find in the note on Rom. xvi. 1. an explanation of this paſſage, which appears to me as ſatisfactory as any other; and by referring to Gough's Diſſertation at the end of his Sermons, he will meet with copious matter for inquiry on the ſubject. See on Numb. vi. 7.

Ver. 13. Is it comely that a woman pray—uncovered?] The Grecian women, excepting the prieſteſſes, when under a holy tranſport or extaſy, uſed always to appear in their veils when they came into public aſſemblies. See Hammond, Wetſtein, Calmet. The word ἐξουσία, rendered power, ver. 10. is uſed by Lucian, in his "Βιων πρασις," for a veil.

Ver. 15, But if a woman have, &c.] This ſhould be read with an interrogation, connecting it with the former verſe,—But that if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her?—For, &c.

Ver. 16. But if any man ſeem to be, &c.] Be, or is diſpoſed to be, &c. Wat. and MS. "If any one, from a love of diſputing, or from his own different views of what is naturally decent, ſhould controvert what I advance, I ſhall not contend further; but content myſelf with ſaying, That we have here no ſuch cuſtom, for women to appear with their head uncovered; neither do I know of its prevailing in any other of the churches of God, whether planted by me, or any of my brethren. I think therefore that it ought to be avoided, as a ſingularity which may appear like affectation, and give offence, even if it be not judged a natural indecorum." See Doddridge and Calmet.

Ver. 17.] We may obſerve from ſeveral paſſages in this Epiſtle, that many Judaical cuſtoms had crept into the Corinthian church: This church being of St. Paul's own planting, who ſpent two years at Corinth in forming it, it is evident theſe abuſes had their riſe from ſome other teacher, who came to them after St. Paul's leaving them, which was about five years before writing this Epiſtle. Theſe diſorders therefore may with reaſon be aſcribed to the head of the faction which oppoſed St. Paul, and who, as has been remarked, was a Jew, and probably judaized; and this, it is likely, was the foundation of the great oppoſition between him and St. Paul, and the reaſon why St. Paul laboured ſo earneſtly to deſtroy his credit amongſt the Corinthians; this ſort of men being very buſy, very troubleſome, and very dangerous to the Goſpel, as may be ſeen in other of St. Paul's Epiſtles, particularly that to the Galatians.—The celebrating the paſſover amongſt the Jews, was plainly the eating of a meal, diſtinguiſhed from other ordinary meals by ſeveral peculiar ceremonies. Two of theſe ceremonies were, eating of bread ſolemnly broken, and drinking a cup of wine, called "The cup of bleſſing." Theſe two our Saviour transferred into the Chriſtian church, to be uſed in their aſſemblies, for a commemoration of his death and ſufferings. In celebrating this inſtitution of our Saviour, the judaizing Corinthians followed the Jewiſh cuſtom of eating their paſſover. They ate the Lord's ſupper as a part of their meal, bringing their proviſions into the aſſembly, where they ate, divided into diſtinct companies, ſome feaſting to exceſs, whilſt others, ill provided, were in want. Their eating thus in the public aſſembly, and mixing the Lord's ſupper with their ordinary meal, as a part of it, with other diſorders and indecencies accompanying it, is the ſubject matter of what remains in this chapter. The Apoſtle tells them, that he blames theſe innovations as much, as in the beginning of the chapter he commends them for keeping to his directions in other particulars. Locke.

Ver. 18. For firſt of all, &c.] To underſtand this, we muſt obſerve, firſt, that they had meetings ſometimes on purpoſe, only for eating the Lord's ſupper. ver. 33. Secondly, that to thoſe meetings they brought their own ſupper, ver. 21. Thirdly, that though every one's ſupper was brought into the common aſſembly, yet it was not to eat in common, but every one fell to his own ſupper apart, as ſoon as it was ready, without ſtaying for the reſt of the company, or communicating with them in eating. ver. 21—23. In this St. Paul blames three things eſpecially. Firſt, that they ate their common food in the aſſembly, which was to be eaten at home in their houſes, ver. 22—34. Secondly, that though they ate in their common meeting-place, yet they ate ſeparately, every one his own ſupper apart; ſo that the plenty and exceſs of ſome ſhamed the want and penury of others. ver. 22. Hereby alſo the diviſions amongſt them were kept up, ver. 18. they being as ſo many ſeparated and divided ſocieties, not as one united body of Chriſtians, commemorating their common head, as ought to have been the caſe in celebrating the Lord's ſupper. ch. x. 16, 17. Thirdly, that they mixed the Lord's ſupper with their own, eating it as a part of their ordinary meal; where they made not that diſcrimination between it and their common food, which they ought to have done. ver. 29. Locke.

Ver. 19. There muſt be alſo hereſies] There muſt be even hereſies. It ſeems evident from hence, that hereſy is ſpoken of as ſomething worſe than the ſchiſms or diviſions mentioned ver. 18. but whether it be an evil intirely of a different kind, or only of higher degree, is not ſo clear from this paſſage. The word 'Αιρέσις may probably here ſignify a ſect of people ſeparated from others, and forming what is called a diſtinct denomination; whereas there may be a ſchiſm without ſeparation, if the people aſſembling together have uncharitable contentions with each other; which was the caſe with theſe ſchiſmatical Corinthians. See Doddridge.

Ver. 21. Every one taketh before other, &c.] This circumſtance of their rapacious and indecent behaviour at their feaſts is finely illuſtrated by a paſſage from Xenoph. Memorab. lib. iii. c. 41 in which he obſerves, that Socrates was much offended with the Athenians for their conduct at their common ſuppers, as ſome prepared delicately for themſelves, while others were but ſlenderly provided for: He endeavoured to ſhame them out of this low taſte, by offering his proviſions to all the company. Socrates the eccleſiaſtical hiſtorian ſpeaks of ſome Egyptians living near Alexandria, who partook of the ſacrament in a very particular manner, much as it ſeems after the Corinthian faſhion; introducing it with a jovial feaſt, in which they regaled themſelves with all kinds of food. It may be proper juſt to obeſerve, that many well-diſpoſed Chriſtians being deterred from communicating at the Lord's ſupper, by paſſages in this chapter, particularly ver. 27, and 29, They have no need to fear the unworthy receiving ſo ſtrongly condemned here by St. Paul; ſince the abuſes which crept into the Corinthian church are ſuch, as can never be admitted in ours, upon the preſent mode of receiving the ſacrament. See Grove on the Sacrament, p. 108.

Ver. 22, 23. Shall I praiſe you, &c?] The Apoſtle plainly refers here to what he had ſaid ver. 2. where he praiſed them for remembering ſhall I ſay to you? ſhall I praiſe you in this? I praiſe you not.

23 For I have received of the Lord, that which alſo I delivered unto you, That the Lord Jeſus, the ſame night in which he was betrayed, took bread:

24 And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and ſaid, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me.

25 After the ſame manner alſo he took the cup, when he had ſupped, ſaying, This cup is the new teſtament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.

26 For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do ſhew the Lord's death, till he come.

27 Wherefore, whoſoever ſhall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, ſhall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord.

28 But let a man examine himſelf, and ſo let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup.

29 For he that eateth and drinketh un-bering him in all things, and for retaining what he had delivered to them. This commendation he now retracts; for in this matter of eating the Lord's ſupper they did not retain what he had delivered to them, ver. 23. which therefore, in the immediately-following words, he repeats to them again. It is very remarkable, that the inſtitution of the ordinance of the Lord's ſupper ſhould make a part of that immediate revelation with which our Lord honoured this great Apoſtle; and it affords a ſtrong argument for the perpetuity of it in the church: for had others of the Apoſtles (as Barclay preſumes to inſinuate) miſtaken what happened at the laſt paſſover, and founded the obſervation of the Euchariſt on that miſtake, ſurely Chriſt would rather have corrected this error, in his new revelation to St. Paul, than have adminiſtered ſuch an occaſion of confirming Chriſtians in it. See Locke, Doddridge, Barclay's Apol. prop. 13. and the notes on the parallel places.

Ver. 24, 25. And when he had given thanks, &c.] This is a remarkable inſtance to prove the authenticity of St. Luke's Goſpel. The Apoſtle finding it neceſſary to reprove the Corinthians for their behaviour at the Lord's ſupper, labours to convince them of the heinouſneſs of their conduct, by ſhewing how unſuitable it was to the nature and end of that ſolemn inſtitution: But when he comes to explain the inſtitution itſelf, though he acquired the knowledge of it by immediate revelation, yet it is very remarkable that he expreſſes himſelf in the words of the Evangeliſt, Luke xxii. 19, 20. Intending, it ſhould ſeem, by this quotation, to make them ſenſible, that though they might plead the frailty of their memory, in excuſe of their forgetfulneſs of what himſelf had delivered on this ſubject by word of mouth, they were nevertheleſs extremely culpable, in not attending to the information of the Goſpel they had then in their hands; which, if duly regarded, would have effectually reſtrained them from ſuch infamous proceedings. If this be allowed, and St. Paul had actually an eye to St. Luke in this paſſage, we have then a pretty clear proof that his Goſpel was written before this 1ſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians; that is, before the year fifty-ſeven, and may thence conclude, that we can not be far diſtant from the truth in fixing the date of its publication to the year 53. See Owen's Obſervations on the four Goſpels, p. 47, &c. We may obſerve, that St. Luke, referring to Chriſt's real body then to be offered up, uſes the word διδόμενον, given; St. Paul, referring to his ſacramental body, or the bread, uſes the word κλώμενον, broken, and both with ſingular propriety. The word γὰρ, for, ver. 26. has the force of an illative particle; as alſo in Luke xx. 28. accordingly the MS renders it therefore. Inſtead of teſtament, Dr. Waterland reads covenant.

Ver. 26. As often as ye eat this bread] It is no wonder that a text, in which this element is ſo plainly called bread, after conſecration, ſhould be urged againſt the popiſh doctrine of tranſubſtantiation: It ſignifies little for the favourers of that opinion to plead, that the Scriptures ſometimes call things changed by the name of the thing out of which they were made (as Adam is called duſt, Gen. iii. 19. Aaron's ſerpent a rod, Exod. vii. 12.) or call them according to their ſenſible appearance (as Joſhua v. 13. Mark xvi. 5.) for theſe inſtances rather turn againſt them, by proving that where the literal interpretation is evidently abſurd, we muſt have recourſe to the figurative. Nothing can be more unreaſonable than to refer the laſt clauſe of this verſe, as the Quakers do, to the time when Chriſt ſhould come, by his ſpiritual illumination on their minds, to take them off from carnal ordinances; for, not to inſiſt upon it, that we have at leaſt as much need of the Lord's ſupper as the primitive Chriſtians had,—not having ſo many advantages as they to keep up the memory of Chriſt in our minds, to quicken us to holineſs, and to unite us in love; it is evident that the grand coming of Chriſt by the Spirit was, when it was poured out on the day of Pentecoſt; an event many years prior to the date of this Epiſtle. See Doddridge, Stillingfleet, and Tillotſon.

Ver. 27. And drink] The original is, or drink. Our Saviour, in the inſtituion of the Lord's ſupper, tells the Apoſtles, that the bread and the wine were ſacramentally his body and blood, and that they were to be eaten and drunk in remembrance of him; which, as St. Paul interprets it, was to ſhew forth his death till he came. Whoever therefore ate and drank them ſo as not ſolemnly to ſhew forth his death, followed not Chriſt's inſtitution, but uſed them unworthily; that is, not to the end for which they were inſtituted. This makes St. Paul tell them, ver. 20. that their coming together to eat as they did, namely, the ſacramental bread and wine, promiſcuouſly with their other food, as a part of their meal,—and that, though in the ſame place, yet not altogether at one time, and in one company,—was not the eating of the Lord's ſupper. Shall be guilty of the body, &c. means, "ſhall be liable to the puniſhment due to one who make a wrong uſe of the ſacramental body and blood of Chriſt in the Lord's ſupper. What that puniſhment was, ſee ver. 30. and Mr. Locke.

Ver. 28. But let a man examine himſelf] St. Paul, as we have obſerved, tells the Corinthians, ver. 20. that to eat it after the manner they did, was not to eat the Lord's ſupper. He tells them alſo, ver. 29. that to eat it without a due and direct imitating regard had to the Lord's body (for ſo he calls the ſacramental bread and wine, as our Saviour did in the inſtitution) by ſeparating the bread and wine from the common uſe of eating and drinking for hunger and thirſt, was to eat unworthily. To remedy their diſorders herein, he ſets before them Chriſt's own inſtitution of this ſacrament, that in it they might ſee the manner and end of its inſtitution, and by that every one might examine his own comportment herein, whether it were conformable to that inſtitution, and ſuited to that end. In the account he gives of Chriſt's inſtitution, we may obſerve, he particularly remarks to them, that this eating and drinking was no part of common eating and drinking for hunger and thirſt; but was inſtituted in a very ſolemn manner, after they had ſupped, and for another end, viz. to repreſent Chriſt's body and blood, and to be eaten and drunk in remembrance of him; or, as St. Paul expounds it, to ſhew forth his death. Another thing which they might obſerve in the inſtitution was, that this was done by all who were preſent, united together in one company, at the ſame time. All which put together, ſhews us what the examination here propoſed is. For the deſign of the Apoſtle being to reform what he found fault with in their celebrating the Lord's ſupper, it is by that alone we muſt underſtand the directions he gives them about it, if we will ſuppoſe he talked pertinently to this captious people, whom he was very deſirous to reduce from the irregularities they were run into in this matter, as well as ſeveral others. And if the account of Chriſt's inſtitution be not in order to their examining their carriage by it, and adjuſting it to it, to what purpoſe is it here? The examination therefore propoſed was no other but an examination of their manner of eating the Lord's ſupper by Chriſt's inſtitution, to ſee how their behaviour herein comported with the inſtitution, and the end for which it was inſtituted. Which further appears to be ſo by the puniſhments annexed to their miſcarriages herein, which were infirmities, ſickneſs and temporal death, with which God chaſtened them, that they might not be condemned with the unbelieving world, ver. 30, 32. For if the unworthineſs here ſpoke of were either unbelief, or any of thoſe ſins which are uſually made the matter of examination, it is to be preſumed the Apoſtle would not wholly have paſſed them over in ſilence: this at leaſt is certain, that the puniſhment of theſe ſins is infinitely greater than that which God here inflicts on unworthy receivers, whether they who are guilty of them received the ſacrament or no. The words Καὶ ὅτως, as to the letter, are rightly tranſlated and ſo; but that tranſlation leaves generally a wrong ſenſe of the place in the mind of an Engliſh reader. For, in ordinary ſpeaking, theſe words, let a man examine, and ſo let him eat, are underſtood to import the ſame with theſe, let a man examine, and then let him eat; as if they ſignified no more, but that examination ſhould precede, and eating follow; which I take to be quite different from the meaning of the Apoſtle here, whoſe ſenſe the whole deſign of the context ſhews to be this: I here ſet before you the inſtitution of Chriſt; by that let a man examine his carriage, καὶ ὅτως, and according to that let him eat; let him conform the manner of his eating to that. Locke.

Ver. 29. Unworthily] See ver. 27. To receive for the purpoſes of intemperance or of faction, was certainly receiving very unworthily. The ſenſe of the Apoſtle's expreſſion, however, may be extended to every manner of receiving, contrary to the nature and deſign of this ſolemn ordinance, and conſequently to the caſe of doing it merely worthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himſelf, not diſcerning the Lord's body.

30 For this cauſe many are weak and ſickly among you, and many ſleep.

31 For if we would judge ourſelves, we ſhould not be judged.

32 But when we are judged, we are chaſtened of the Lord, that we ſhould not be condemned with the world.

33 Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another.

34 And if any man hunger, let him eat at home; that ye come not together unto condemnation. And the reſt will I ſet in order when I come.

C H A P. XII.

Spiritual gifts are diverſe, yet all to profit withal; and to that end are diverſly beſtowed: that by the like proportion, as the members of a natural body tend all to the mutual decency, ſervice, and ſuccour of the ſame body; ſo we ſhould do one for another, to make up the myſtical body of Chriſt.

NOW concerning ſpiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant.

Ver. 31. Pſ. xxxii. 5.—V. 32. Pſ. xciv. 12, 13. Hebr. xii. 5, 10.—V. 34. Ver. 21. Ver. 22. Or, judgement. Ch. vii. 17. Ch. iv. 19.——V. 1. Ch. xiv. 1, 37.

in a ſecular view, which it is heartily to be wiſhed that all concerned in it would ſeriouſly conſider. It is perhaps one of the moſt unhappy miſtakes in our verſion of the Bible, that the woad κρῖμα is rendered damnation. It has raiſed a dread in tender minds, which has greatly obſtructed the comfort and edification they might have received from this ordinance. As the word ſignifies only that the unworthy receiver is guilty of ſin, and may expect ſuch puniſhment as is mentioned in the next verſe, ſo, in conformity with the whole context, it ſhould have been rendered judgement. The Apoſtle afterwards ſays, we are judged, ἐκρινόμεθα, that is, "we are chaſtened or corrected, that we may not be condemned,"—κατακριθῶμεν; which plainly ſhews, that the judgement ſpoken of might be fatherly chaſtiſement. It ſhould likewiſe be obſerved, that St. Paul does not ſay Whoſoever ſhall eat this bread, being not worthy of it; but whoever eats it in ſuch an unworthy or irreverent manner as he deſcribes above; and therefore the text in this view certainly ought not to diſcourage Chriſtians at preſent from approaching the altar. See Wall, Locke, Doddridge, Warburton on the Lord's ſupper, and the next note. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt clauſe, drinketh judgement to himſelf, not diſtinguiſhing the Lord's body.

Ver. 31. For if we would judge ourſelves, &c.] In ver. 29. the Apoſtles uſes the word διακρίνων,—μὴ διακρίνων,—"Not diſcriminating, or putting a difference between the ſacramental bread and wine, which St. Paul, with our Saviour, calls Chriſt's body, and other bread and wine, in the ſolemn and ſeparate uſe of them." The Corinthians, as has been remarked, ate the Lord's ſupper in and with their own ordinary ſupper, whereby it came not to be ſufficiently diſtinguiſhed (as became a Chriſtian and religious obſervance ſo ſolemnly inſtituted) from common eating for bodily refreſhment; nor from the Jewiſh paſchal ſupper, and the bread broken, and the cup and bleſſing uſed in that: nor did it in this way of eating ſhew forth the Lord's death, as it was deſigned to do by the concurrence and communion of the whole aſſembly of Chriſtians, jointly united in the partaking of bread and wine in a way peculiar to them,—with reference ſolely to Jeſus Chriſt. This is what St. Paul calls eating unworthily: to avoid which, he exhorts them to judge themſelves, or rather (in plain alluſion to this not diſcriminating the Lord's body) to diſtinguiſh or diſcriminute themſelves; for διακρίνειν means the ſame here that it does ver. 29. and is never uſed to ſignify judge. He is little verſed in St. Paul's writings, who has not obſerved how apt he is to repeat the ſame word he had uſed before, to the ſame purpoſe, though in a different, and ſometimes a pretty hard conſtruction. As here he applies διακρίνειν to the perſons diſcriminating, as in the 29th verſe, to the thing to be diſcriminated; though in both places it be put to denote the ſame action. See Locke.

Ver. 32. We are chaſtened] Παιδευόμεθα properly ſignifies to be corrected, as ſcholars are by their maſters for their good. Inſtead of condemned, the MS reads corrected; and ſome would read the verſe, But when we judge NOT ourſelves, we are chaſtened by the Lord, &c.

Ver. 33, 34. Tarry one for another, &c.] Some would read this paſſage thus, Wait one for another, (and if any man hunger, let him eat at home) THAT ye may not come together to your guilt. The other conſtruction implies, that they ſhould eat at home, that they might not come together at all. See Muſculus and Bengelius.

R E F L E C T I O N S ON C H A P. XI.

It is the duty of Chriſtians frequently to remember the honourable relation in which they ſtand to Chriſt, as their head; and as beyond all doubt, under his mediatorial character, He is moſt willingly and joyfully ſubject to God, we ſhould learn to imitate him in that chearful and intire ſubjection, out of love and reverence to him; guarding againſt whatever is unbecoming, leſt he be diſhonoured thereby. ver. 3, 4.

When in any act of divine worſhip we have the happineſs to approach the bleſſed God, let us reverence his awful preſence, and even that of his holy angels, who attend the aſſemblies of the ſaints. We pray, "that the will of God may be done upon earth, as it is done in heaven:" and conſequently ſhould be careful to worſhip God in ſuch a manner, that thoſe celeſtial ſpirits, who ever appear before Him with ſacred awe, may not be offended at the rudeneſs and folly of ſinful mortals, whom they may well wonder to ſee admitted, in their beſt eſtate, to this divine privilege, which they have forfeited by repeated provocations. ver. 10.

What St. Paul obſerves of the mutual dependence which the ſexes have on each other, ſhould diſpoſe them to mutual candour and reſpect; avoiding the cruel tyranny or the vain affectation which often arms them on either ſide with ungenerous reflections; and as all things are of God, it ſhould be our concern that all things be faithfully employed for his glory. Whatever comforts we receive in relative life, (which are indeed many and important) ſhould lead us to adore the wiſdom of the divine conſtitution, in the original formation of our nature, and the ſecret iufluence and conduct of his Providence in the regulation of our reſpective circumſtances and affairs. ve. 11, 12.

We ſee from ver. 14—16. the force of cuſtom for determining in many reſpects what is decent, and what is otherwiſe. We ought to maintain a proper regard to this, leſt, through our imprudence, even our good ſhould be evil ſpoken of, and all our infirmities magnified into crimes. We ſhould often recollect the original dignity of our nature, by which we are the image and glory of God; that ſo far as by ſin and folly this image is loſt, we may endeavour to regain it, and where it is not loſt, may think and act more and more ſuitably to ſo high a reſolution.

What juſt matter of thankfulneſs to our bleſſed Redeemer does that account of the inſtitution of his ſacred ſupper afford, which St. Paul aſſures us he received immediately from him! Let us reflect, it was in that very night in which he was betrayed, that his thoughts were ſo compaſſionately employed for our comfort and happineſs;—a time, when it might have been imagined that his mind would be intirely poſſeſſed with his perſonal concerns, with the doleful ſcene of his approaching ſufferings. ver. 23. We learn from this account the perpetuity as well as the great leading deſign of the ordinance,—We ſhew forth the Lord's death, and we ſhew it forth till he come. ver. 26. If we do indeed deſire to preſerve the memory of our dying Saviour's love in the world, if we deſire to maintain it in our own ſouls,—we muſt conſtantly and regularly attend this bleſſed inſtitution, endeavouring by the lively exerciſe of faith and love to diſcern, and in a ſpiritual ſenſe to feed upon the Lord's body. Nor let any humble and upright ſoul be diſcouraged by theſe threatenings of judgement to thoſe profane ſinners, who offered ſuch groſs affronts to this holy ſolemnity; affronts which none of us are in danger of repeating. Their ſcandalous exceſſes, when they pretended to be worſhipping God on this aweful occaſion, might juſtly provoke the eyes of his holineſs, might awaken the arm of his indignation; yet even theſe ſinners were chaſtiſed, that they might not be finally and for ever coudemned. ver. 29—32.

Let not any then be terrified, as if every ſoul that approached the ordinance without due preparation, muſt by neceſſary conſequence ſeal its own damnation. Thus to attend the table of the Lord is indeed a ſin; but, bleſſed be God, not a ſin too great to be forgiven. Thoſe therefore who, though they feel in their hearts a reverential love to Chriſt, yet have hitherto refrained from attending this feaſt of love, ſhould from theſe conſiderations be engaged to attend it;—to attend it with due preparation and ſelf-examination, as to their repentance, faith, and love. Then may they with the moſt hearty welcome from the great Lord of the feaſt eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, receiving it as the memorial of Chriſt's body broken, and of his blood ſhed, for the remiſſion of ſins. Through that blood alone may we ſeek this invaluable bleſſing, without which indeed nothing can be a ſolid and laſting bleſſing to us. May we on every occaſion treat our brethren with a tenderneſs and reſpect becoming thoſe, who conſider ourſelves and them as redeemed by that precious blood, and indebted to it for the hopes of everlaſting ſalvation.

In a word, let us never reſt in the external rites or exerciſes of worſhip, how decently and regularly ſoever performed; but look to our inward temper, and the conduct of our minds, if we deſire to maintain their peace, and that our coming together ſhould be for the better, and not for the worſe. ver. 17.

Chap. XII. Ver. 1.] The Corinthians ſeem to have enquired of St. Paul, what order of precedency and preference men were to have with 2 Ye know that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto theſe dumb idols, even as ye were led.

3 Wherefore I give you to underſtand, that no man ſpeaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jeſus accurſed: and that no man can ſay that Jeſus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghoſt.

4 Now there are diverſities of gifts, but the ſame Spirit.

5 And there are differences of adminiſtrations, but the ſame Lord.

6 And there are diverſities of operations, but it is the ſame God which worketh all in all.

7 But the manifeſtation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal.

8 For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wiſdom; to another, the word of knowledge by the ſame Spirit;

9 To another, faith by the ſame Spirit; to another, the gifts of healing by the ſame Spirit; with reſpect to their ſpiritual gifts; nay, if we may gueſs by his anſwer, the queſtion they ſeem more particularly to have propoſed was, whether thoſe who had the gift of tongues ought not to take place, and ſpeak firſt, and be firſt heard in their meetings. Concerning this there appears to have been ſome ſtrife, maligning and diſorder among them, as may be collected from ver. 21—25. ch. xiii. 4, 5. xiv. 40. To this St. Paul anſwers in chapters xii. xiii. xiv. Firſt, that they had been all heathen idolaters, and ſo, being deniers of Chriſt, were in that ſtate none of them ſpiritual; but that now, being Chriſtians, and owning Jeſus to be the Lord, (which could not be done without the Spirit of God) they were all πνευματικοι, ſpiritual, and ſo there was no reaſon for one to undervalue another; as if he were not ſpiritual as well as himſelf. ver. 1—3. Secondly, that though there be a diverſity of gifts, yet they are all by the ſame ſpirit; from the ſame Lord, and the ſame God, working them all in every one according to his good pleaſure: ſo that in this reſpect alſo there is no difference or precedency; no occaſion for any one's being puffed up, or affecting priority, upon account of his gifts. ver. 4—11. Thirdly, That the diverſity of gifts is for the uſe and benefit of the church, which is Chriſt's body; wherein the members, as in the natural body, of meaner functions, are as much parts, and as neceſſary in their uſe to the good of the whole, and therefore to be honoured as much as any other. The union they have as members in the ſame body, makes them all equally ſhare in each other's good and evil; gives them a mutual eſteem and concern one for another, and leaves no room for conteſts or diviſions amongſt them about their gifts, or the honour and place due to them upon that account. ver. 12—31. Fourthly, That though gifts have their excellence and uſe, and thoſe who have them may be zealous in the uſe of them, yet the true and ſure way for a man to excel and be preferred above others, is, by enlarging himſelf in charity, and excelling in that, without which a Chriſtian, with all his ſpiritual gifts, is nothing. ch. xiii. Fifthly, In the compariſon of ſpiritual gifts, he gives thoſe the precedence which edify moſt; and in particular prefers propheſying to tongues. ch. xiv. Locke.

Concerning ſpiritual gifts] Mr. Locke would render this, As to ſpiritual men, or men aſſiſted and actuated by the ſpirit; and we are warranted, he ſays, in this verſion, by a like uſe of the word in ſeveral places of St. Paul's Epiſtles; as ch. ii. 15. and xiv. 37. of this Epiſtle, and Gal. vi. 1. And the context obliges us ſo to underſtand it; for if we will have it mean gifts, and not perſons, the ſenſe and coherence of the three firſt verſes will be very hard to make out: Beſides, there is evidence enough in ſeveral parts of it, that the ſubject of St. Paul's diſcourſe here is πνευματικοι, "perſons endowed with ſpiritual gifts," contending for precedency, in conſideration of their gifts; (ſee ver. 13.) and to what purpoſe elſe does he ſay, ch. xiv. 5. Greater is he that propheſieth, than he that ſpeaketh with tongues? Others, however, ſuppoſe that if the ſecond and third verſes are read in a parentheſis, the connection of the firſt with the fourth verſe will prove that the addition of gifts is very proper. The church of Corinth was fooliſhly elated by ſpiritual pride; which St. Paul endeavoured to mortify and humble; and in applying his remedy, he begins with reckoning up thoſe various graces, the credit of which they had abuſed by their indulgence of this unhappy temper. See Locke, Doddridge, and Warburton on grace, b. i. c. 4.

Ver. 3. No man, ſpeaking by the ſpirit—calleth Jeſus accurſed] "No man that is inſpired by the Spirit of God can ſpeak evil of Jeſus; and no man cometh to him, and heartily owns him for his Lord, except God draweth him by his Spirit." Some think that theſe words refer in general to the teſts put on Chriſtians by their perſecutors, that they ſhould not only deny, but likewiſe blaſpheme Chriſt; others think, that they rather refer to the Jews, who, while they uttered blaſphemies againſt Chriſt themſelves, and endeavoured to extort them from his diſciples, pretended to the gifts of the Spirit, and undertook to caſt out devils. Such a caution might therefore be very uſeful. See 1 John iv. 1—3. St. Chryſoſtom well obſerves, that the phraſe of ſaying that Jeſus is the Lord, or the Meſſiah, muſt be ſuppoſed to proceed from true faith in him; and the expreſſion is uſed to import a man's being a true Chriſtian, becauſe ſuch ſtrong temptations lay againſt profeſſing Chriſt under that character, that they who maintained this doctrine muſt have been true believers, though there might have been a few exceptions. This ſeems as plain a proof as could be deſired, that true faith is the work of the Spirit of God upon the heart. See Taylor on deiſm, p. 60. Owen on the Spirit, p. 3. Doddridge's third letter to the author of Chriſtianity not founded on argument, p. 34, &c.

Ver. 5. Differences of adminiſtrations] Diverſities of offices. Wat. MS, and Locke. Theſe offices are reckoned up, ver. 28, &c. The calling them adminiſtrations or offices, was a gentle manner of reminding the Corinthians of the great deſign of theſe gifts; and ſo, of reproving thoſe who perverted them to contrary purpoſes. See Doddridge, and Benſon.

Ver. 6. Of operations] What theſe were we learn from ver. 8—11. They are very properly called ἐνεργήματα, in-workings, becauſe they were above all human power. Men of themſelves could do nothing of them at all; but it was God, as the Apoſtle tells us here, who, in theſe extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, did all that was done: It was the effect of his immediate operation, as St. Paul aſſures us in that parallel place, Philip. ii. 13. in which chapter, ver. 3 and 14. we find that the Philippians ſtood a little in need of the ſame advice, which St. Paul preſſes here at large upon the Corinthians. Locke.

Ver. 7. But] Now. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 8. The word of wiſdom] "By this, I think, ſays Dr. Warburton, we muſt underſtand all the great principles of natural religion. In this ſenſe St. Paul uſes the word, Col. iv. 5. The ancients uſed the term in this ſenſe; and we can ſcarcely give it another in the place before us, where we ſee it diſtinguiſhed from the word of knowledge, which follows, and evidently means all the great principles of revealed religion. The term Γνῶσις, knowledge, being as peculiarly applied by Chriſtian writers to revealed religion, as Σοφία, wiſdom, is by the Pagans to the natural; and is no leſs a generic term than the other, being mentioned in the next chapter with one of its ſpecies; all myſtery, and all knowledge:—For myſtery is that part of knowledge which regards the interpretation of ſuch Jewiſh prophecies as concerned the new diſpenſation. In a word, our Apoſtle, ſpeaking in another place of Chriſt, who perfected revelation, (built from its firſt delivery and rudiments on natural religion) uſes the two terms in theſe aſſigned ſignifications,—In whom are hid all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge. Col. ii. 3. He likewiſe uſes the word knowledge in this ſenſe, 2 Cor. xi. 6. ſee alſo 1 Pet. iii. 7. And from this term thoſe early hereticks the Gnoſticks,—who ſo much deformed the ſimplicity and purity of the Chriſtian faith, by viſionary pretences to a ſuperior knowledge of revelation,—took their name." See Warburton on grace, as above. It may be neceſſary to obſerve, that Lord Barrington, Dr. Benſon, and many others, underſtand by the word of wiſdom, that extenſive plan of Chriſtianity, which was revealed to the Apoſtles by the holy Spirit; and by the word of knowledge an extraordinary ability to underſtand and explain the Old Teſtament, and eſpecially its prophecies. See Miſcel. Sacr. eſſay i. p. 39. and Benſon's propagation of Chriſtianity, vol. i. p. 40, &c. where the reader will find a large and minute detail of theſe ſpiritual gifts; Concerning which we may obſerve, with a candid expoſitor, that there are perhaps few texts in the New Teſtament, more difficult than ſome in this and the 14th chapter, relating to the extraordinary gifts then in the church, Which were at that time ſo well known, as to need no explication; and it is a noble inſtance of the genuine ſimplicity and modeſty of the Apoſtle, that he did not expatiate on ſo grand a ſubject with any unneceſſary parade.

Ver. 9. Faith, by the ſame Spirit] In the following chapter, where theſe graces are again mentioned, the Apoſtle explains the nature of the faith here reckoned among the gifts of the Spirit, by calling it a faith which could remove mountains, or ſuch a faith as was attended with a power of controlling nature; Alluding to that want with which Jeſus upbraids his diſciples, where he ſays, "If ye have faith as a grain of muſtard ſeed, ye ſhall ſay unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it ſhall remove. Matth. xvii. 20. The two next gifts, of healing and working miracles, ver. 10. are two ſpecies of the foregoing genus. By healing is meant that ſalutary aſſiſtance adminiſtered to the ſick, in a ſolemn office of the church, as directed by St. James v. 14. Is any ſick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith, that is, the faith mentioned juſt before, ſhall ſave the ſick, &c. By working miracles is meant, a more private and extemporaneous uſe of the ſame power, though leſs confined in its objects. The gifts of healing, χαρίσματα ἰαμάτων, properly

10 To another, the working of miracles; to another, prophecy; to another, diſcerning of ſpirits; to another, divers kinds of tongues; to another, the interpretation of tongues:

11 But all theſe worketh that one and the ſelf-ſame Spirit, dividing to every man ſeverally as he will.

12 For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: ſo alſo is Chriſt.

13 For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit.

14 For the body is not one member, but many.

15 If the foot ſhall ſay, Becauſe I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

16 And if the ear ſhall ſay, Becauſe I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

17 If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the ſmelling?

18 But now hath God ſet the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleaſed him.

19 And if they were all one member, where were the body?

20 But now are they many members, yet but one body.

21 And the eye cannot ſay unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again, the head to the feet, I have no need of you.

22 Nay, much more thoſe members of the body, which ſeem to be more feeble, are neceſſary.

23 And thoſe members of the body, which we think to be leſs honourable, upon theſe we beſtow more abundant honour, and our uncomely parts have more abundant comelineſs.

24 For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked:

25 That there ſhould be no ſchiſm in the body; but that the members ſhould have the ſame care one for another.

26 And whether one member ſuffer, all the members ſuffer with it: or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it.

27 Now ye are the body of Chriſt, and members in particular.

28 And God hath ſet ſome in the church, firſt apoſtles, ſecondarily prophets, thirdly expreſs gifts belonging to the church as ſuch; and the working of miracles, ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων, implies virtue reſiding in the individual or particular agent. Beſides, we may obſerve that gifts of healing was a leſs degree of miraculous power than the working of miracles, and is expreſly intimated ſo to be, ver. 28. See Warburton, as above.

Ver. 10. Prophecy] This plainly ſignifies, foretelling the future fortunes of the church, to the comfort and edification of the aſſembly, as St. Paul expreſſes it, ch. xiv. 3. and theſe effects generally attending the act of prophecy, in a little time aſſumed its name. But the proper ſenſe of prophecy, and that in which it is here to be underſtood, is the foretelling things to come. See on Rom. xii. 6. The next gift is the diſcerning of ſpirits. The reputation attending the exerciſe of theſe extraordinary endowments would be a ſtrong temptation to impoſtors to mimic and bely their powers, as we ſee it was in the caſe of Simon the magician. It graciouſly pleaſed the Holy Spirit, there fore, amidſt the bounty of theſe gifts, to beſtow one, whoſe property it was to bring all the others to the teſt, by the virtue which the poſſeſſor of it had of diſtinguiſhing between true and falſe inſpiration, where accidental ambiguity, or deſigned impoſture, had made the matter doubtful or ſuſpected. See Warburton, Barrington, Benſon, and on ch. xiv. 28.

Ver. 11. But all theſe worketh, &c.] But one and the ſame Spirit effecteth all theſe things, diſtributing to each man in particular, according to his will. Heylin.

Ver. 13. For by one Spirit, &c.] Both the ſacraments are inſtruments of our union with Chriſt. The naming the Jews here with Gentiles, and ſetting both on the ſame level, when converted to Chriſtianity, may probably be done by St. Paul with reference to the falſe Apoſtle, who was a Jew, and ſeems to have claimed ſome pre-eminence as due to him upon that account. Whereas, among the members of Chriſt, which all make but one body, there is no ſuperiority or other diſtinction, but as, by the ſeveral gifts beſtowed upon them, they contribute more or leſs to the edification of the church. In the laſt clauſe St. Paul refers to the ſacramental cup. "As we drink from the ſame ſacramental cup, ſo do we, by our communion with Chriſt, whoſe blood is repreſented by it, all imbibe the influences of the ſame ſpirit, by which the divine life was at firſt produced, and is continually preſerved." Mr. Locke thinks that the Apoſtle refers to the ſacramental cup, rather than the bread here, becauſe the wine is more ſpirituous, and in a lively manner repreſents the animating effects of Chriſt's blood, and the Spirit communicated by it. See Locke, Doddridge, Heylin, and Clarke. Some manuſcripts, inſtead of πνεῦμα, Spirit, read πομα, draught, or cup.

Ver. 15. Is it therefore not of the body?] It is not for that reaſon no part of the body. Bengelius, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 17. If the whole body were an eye] The Apoſtle by this intends probably to inſinuate, that were there no other gifts in the church, but thoſe which they ſo much extolled in ſome of their teachers, it would be of very great diſadvantage to the body. See Doddridge, and Benſon.

Ver. 22. Nay, much more thoſe members, &c.] But, thoſe members, &c. Wat. Some think that in the words which ſeem to be more feeble, St. Paul refers to the brains and bowels; which are very tender, and liable to many diſorders. Others underſtand it of the leaſt muſcular parts, veins, arteries, and other minute channels in the body; the leaſt obſtruction in which would be fatal. If more feeble be put for leſs noble, it ſuggeſts a very obvious and important ſenſe, relating to the channels nature has provided for throwing off the dregs; which, diſhonourable as they may ſeem, are ſo neceſſary, that if they be obſtructed, intenſe torment and inevitable death muſt enſue. Doddridge.

Ver. 23. Which we think to be leſs honourable] It ſeems as if he had ſaid, "The face, in which the image of God is particularly ſtamped, we leave uncovered; but as for thoſe parts which decency or cuſtom teach us to conceal, we contrive not only to cover, but alſo, as far as we conveniently can, to adorn by covering." The force of the original in the next clauſe is, Theſe are ſurrounded with more abundant honour. See Doddridge, and Elſner. Inſtead of our uncomely parts, Dr. Waterland and the MS read, our leſs comely.

Ver. 27. Now ye are the body of Chriſt] Dr. Heylin renders this, Thus ye are the body of Chriſt; each being a particular member, which God has placed in the church; (ver. 28.) as, firſt, Apoſtles, &c. Others read it, Ye are in ſome ſort the body and members of Chriſt,—aliquatenus, —in part, not, as our verſion, in particular. See Caſtalio.

Ver. 28. God hath ſet ſome, &c.] "As God hath placed ſome members in more eminent ſtations in the body, ſo alſo ſome Chriſtians in the church. He hath placed in the firſt rank Apoſtles, who are honoured with an office of the higheſt diſtinction, and furniſhed with endowments peculiar to themſelves. In the 2d place are ranked prophets, whoſe buſineſs it is to foretel future events, or to ſpeak by immediate interpretation, for the edification of the church. In the 3d, teachers of a more ordinary kind; afterwards thoſe who are endued, upon ſome particular occaſion, with miraculous powers; then teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diverſities of tongues.

29 Are all apoſtles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles?

30 Have all the gifts of healing, do all ſpeak with tongues? do all interpret?

31 But covet earneſtly the beſt gifts, And yet ſhew I unto you a more excellent way.

CHAP. XIII.

All gifts, how excellent ſoever, are nothing worth without charity: the praiſes thereof, and preference to hope and faith.

THough I ſpeak with the tongues of men, and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as ſounding braſs, or a tinkling cymbal.

the gifts of healing diſeaſes, by anointing the ſick with oil, and praying for their recovery. Beſides theſe, he has endowed ſome with ſuch extraordinary activity and ſagacity, as may fit them to be helpers in the management of charities: others are qualified by their prudence to be appointed to governments, that by their advice the affairs of ſocieties may be ſteered and conducted in the ſafeſt and happieſt manner. There are alſo wonderful operations, whereby men are taught different kinds of tongues, which they had never learned by any human methods." Monſieur Amyraut is of opinion that the ſame perſons might profeſs many of theſe gifts, and ſuſtain ſeveral of theſe characters, which were not ſtated diſtinct offices; and might be called helpers, in reference to their great dexterity and readineſs to help thoſe in diſtreſs; and governments, in regard to that genius for buſineſs, ſagacity in judging the circumſtances of affairs, and natural authority in the councils and reſolutions of ſocieties, which rendered them fit to preſide on ſuch occaſions. Some critics are of opinion, that the original words for helps and governments being added in the margin to explain what was meant by δυνάμεις, miracles, crept into the text, to which they do not belong; and accordingly they are omitted in the recapitulation, ver. 29, 30; where it would be better to read, Have all the power of miracles?—See Doddridge, Barrington, Benſon, and Markland.

Ver. 29. Are all Apoſtles?] It appears that this invidious temper was not extirpated from among the Corinthians, even by this juſt and lively expoſtulation: for Clemens Romanus, writing to them many years after, complains of its continued prevalence, as leading them to neglect a due regard for thoſe preſbyters who were fixed by the divine direction among them, and to throw them out of their epiſcopal office. See his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, ſect. 44.

Ver. 31. But covet earneſtly the beſt gifts] But ye contend earneſtly about the beſt gifts. "Ye contend one with another whoſe particular gift is beſt, and moſt preferable; but I will ſhew you a more excellent way; namely, mutual good will, affection, and charity." That this is the Apoſtle's meaning is plain, in that there was an emulation among them, and a ſtrife for precedency, on account of the ſeveral gifts they had, which made them in their aſſemblies deſire to be heard firſt. This was the fault which the Apoſtle was here correcting, and it is not likely he ſhould exhort them all promiſcuouſly to ſeek the principal and moſt eminent gifts, at the end of a diſcourſe wherein he had been demonſtrating to them, by the example of the human body, that there ought to be diverſities of gifts and functions in the church; but that there ought to be no ſchiſm, emulation, or conteſt amongſt them upon account of the exerciſes of thoſe gifts; that they were all uſeful in their places, and no member was at all to be the leſs honoured or valued for the gift he had, though it were not one of the firſt rank. And in this ſenſe the word ζηλῶν is taken in the next chapter, ver. 4. where St. Paul, purſuing the ſame argument, exhorts them to mutual charity, good-will, and affection, which he aſſures them is preferable to any gifts whatſoever. Beſides, to what purpoſe ſhould he exhort them to covet earneſtly the beſt gifts, when the obtaining of this or that gift, did not at all lie in their deſires or endeavours, the Apoſtle having juſt before told them, ver. 11. that the Spirit divides thoſe gifts to every man ſeverally, as he will, and thoſe to whom he wrote had their allotment already?—He might as reaſonably, according to his own doctrine in this very chapter, bid the foot covet to be the hand, or the ear to be the eye. Let it be remembered therefore, to rectify this, that St. Paul ſays, ver. 17. of this chapter, If the whole body were the eye, where were the hearing, &c. This great writer is not uſed to croſs his own deſign, or contradict his own reaſoning. Locke.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XII.

We thankfully acknowledge thy goodneſs, Sovereign Diſpoſer of all events, that we have not been led on, after the example of our pagan anceſtors, to the vain worſhip of dumb, of ſtupid idols; but have been taught from our infancy to adore the living Jehovah. May we, in the moſt ſolemn and conſiſtent manner, ſay, that Jeſus is the Lord; and while our actions ſpeak our regard to him as ſuch, may it appear that all our hearts are under the influences of the Spirit of God, by which alone men are brought to that divine temper. ver. 2, 3.

We ſhould frequently reflect upon thoſe glorious atteſtations, which were given to the truth of our holy religion, by that diverſity of gifts and operations with which its firſt teachers were furniſhed and adorned; thankfully receiving their teſtimony, and thereby ſetting to our ſeal that God is true. A view to that great deſign, in which all theſe wonderful things centre, ſhould engage us to ſtudy more and more an union of heart with all, who in every place call on the name of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. In him Greeks and barbarians, bond and free are united; all therefore ſhould unanimouſly ſeek his glory; and while his name is blaſphemed by the ignorant and malicious, who cannot bear the purity of that religion which he teaches, may it ſo be defended by us, as at the ſame time to be exemplified and adorned. ver. 4—14.

The wiſdom and goodneſs of God, as diſplayed in the formation of the human body, is a ſubject which well deſerves our attentive reflection, and humble acknowledgment. All its ſeveral parts are uſeful to the whole, and the moſt noble cannot upbraid the meaneſt as an incumbrance. Each has reaſon to rejoice in its own ſituation, as well as in the addition of all the reſt; and were the loweſt place made higher than it is, it would become uſeleſs and burdenſome. The ſame divine wiſdom is viſible, and ought to be acknowledged, in the ſubordination appointed in civil ſocieties, and in the church of Chriſt.

Let no man therefore be diſcouraged at the low ſtation wherein he is fixed! but rather let all acquieſce in the prudent and gracious diſpoſal of the ſupreme Lord, and apply themſelves to their proper functions. Let each member conſider all the reſt with pleaſure, and rejoice with thankfulneſs in the health and vigour of the other parts, making the proper uſe of them, and communicating in return its proper ſervices. If any be weak, let all ſtrengthen it: If there be blemiſh or imperfection in any part, let all the reſt tenderly cover it; unleſs when a regard to the health and happineſs of the whole requires that it ſhould be laid open and ſearched, in order to its being cured. And upon the whole, ſo far as we can prevent it, let there be no ſchiſm in the body: Alas! that there ſhould be ſo many breaches and contentions. While we ſincerely lament them, we ſhould each in his place endeavour to heal them, and unite in a ſympathizing care one of another. So ſhall we, in the remoteſt conſequences, beſt conſult our own intereſt and honour: ver. 15—25.

Bleſſed be God, that he hath in his church given not only Apoſtles and prophets, but alſo paſtors and teachers. Adored be that bounty with which he hath ſcattered down his gifts, whether ordinary or extraordinary, on the children of men. May we uſe them not to the purpoſes of oſtentation, but of edification; and may we be truly deſirous of thoſe, whereby we may bear moſt of the image of Chriſt, and beſt promote the great deſign for which he viſited our world, and was pleaſed to unite his church unto himſelf, and its ſeveral members to each other, in ſuch dear and indiſſoluble bonds.

Chap. XIII. Ver. 1. Though I ſpeak, &c.] St. Paul having told the Corinthians, in the laſt words of the preceding chapter, that he would ſhew them a more excellent way than the emulous producing of their gifts in the aſſembly, he informs them in the preſent admirable chapter, that this more excellent way is love, which he explains at large. He ſpeaks of the tongues of angels, agreeably to the conceptions of the Jews. The word 'Αγάπη is certainly rendered charity very improperly; for being in our language almoſt confined to the ſenſe of alms-giving, it hath led many into groſs errors on this ſubject. The original muſt here be taken in the nobleſt ſenſe; for "ſuch a love to the whole church, and the whole world, as ariſes from principles of true piety, and ultimately centers in that God who is love." See ver. 3. As a cymbal was made of two pieces of hollow braſs, which being ſtruck together made a tinkling, with very little variety of ſound, St. Paul choſe to inſtance in this, rather than in a harp or flute, or any other more harmonious inſtrument. It appears from many paſſages, both of Joſephus and the Jewiſh rabbies, that each of the things which St. Paul ſpeaks of in this and the following verſes, as abſolutely of no avail without love, was regarded in the higheſt degree by the Jews. See Locke, Doddridge, Whitby, Wetſtein, and Commentar. de Cymbalis, at the end of Fortuita Sacra.

Ver. 2. All myſteries, and all knowledge] Any predictions relating to our Saviour, or his doctrine, or the times of the Goſpel, contained in the Old Teſtament, in types, or figurative and obſcure expreſſions, not underſtood before his coming, and being then revealed to the world, St. Paul calls myſteries, ſays Mr. Locke, as may be ſeen all through his writings; ſo that myſtery and knowledge are terms here uſed to ſignify truths concerning Chriſt to come, contained ledge; and though I have all faith, ſo that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing.

3 And though I beſtow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.

4 Charity ſuffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itſelf, is not puffed up,

5 Doth not behave itſelf unſeemly, ſeeketh not her own, is not eaſily provoked, thinketh no evil;

6 Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth;

7 Beareth all things, believeth all

Ver. 3. Matth. vi. 1, 2.—V. 4. Prov. x. 12. 1 Pet. iv. 8. Or, is not raſh.—V. 5. Ch. x. 24. Phil. ii. 4.—V. 6. Pſ. x. 3. Rom. i. 32. 2 John 4. Or, with the truth.

tained in the Old Teſtament; and prophecy, the underſtanding of the types and prophecies containing thoſe truths, ſo as to be able to explain them to others. See on ch. xii. 8. By faith to remove mountains, or to do that which is next to impoſſible, muſt be meant the miraculous faith ſpoken of ch. xii. 9. and as it is here ſuppoſed that this faith might in fact be ſeparated from love, it cannot ſignify the ſame as in the Epiſtle to the Romans, where it is "ſuch an aſſent to a divine declaration, as produces a ſuitable temper and conduct." See Doddridge.

Ver. 4. Charity ſuffereth long] The Apoſtle here proceeds to give us ſixteen characters of divine love;—upon which, if the compaſs of our work allowed, it would be well worth while to expatiate: but it is with leſs regret that I omit to do ſo, as the reader will find ample ſatisfaction upon that head in the very uſeful work of the excellent Archbp. of Cambray, intitled, "The Characters and Properties of true Charity diſplayed:" referring to which, I ſhall only give a brief explication of the characters following. And 1ſt. Charity ſuffereth long,—is long-ſuffering, or patient towards all men: It ſuffers all the weakneſs, ignorance, errors, infirmities, all the frowardneſs and littleneſs of faith in the children of God; all the malice and wickedneſs of the children of the world:—and it ſuffers all this not only for a time, for a ſhort ſeaſon, but to the end; ſtill feeding our enemy when he hungers; if he thirſt, ſtill giving him drink: thus continually heaping coals of fire, of melting love, upon his head. And in every ſtep towards the overcoming evil with good, 2dly. It is kind,—χρηστεύεται,—a word not eaſily tranſlated:—It is ſoft, mild, benign; it ſtands at the utmoſt diſtance from moroſeneſs, from all harſhneſs, or ſourneſs of ſpirit; and inſpires the ſufferer at once with the moſt amiable ſweetneſs, and the moſt fervent and tender affection. Conſequently, love, 3dly, envieth not:—It is impoſſible it ſhould; it is directly oppoſite to that baneful temper; it cannot be that he who has this tender affection to all, who earneſtly wiſhes all temporal and ſpiritual bleſſings, all good things in this world and the world to come, to every ſoul that God hath made, ſhould be pained at his beſtowing any good gift on any child of man. If he has himſelf received the ſame, he does not grieve, but rejoice, that another partakes the common benefit. If he has not, he bleſſes God that his brother at leaſt has, and is therein happier than himſelf: and the greater his love, the more does he rejoice in the bleſſings of all mankind; the more is he removed from every kind and degree of envy towards any creature. 4thly, Love vaunteth not himſelf;—οὐ περπερεύεται,—is not raſh or haſty in judging: It will not haſtily condemn any one; it does not paſs a ſevere ſentence upon a ſlight or ſudden view of things; it firſt weighs all the evidence, particularly that which is brought in favour of the accuſed. A true lover of his neighbour is not like the generality of men, who ſee a little, preſume a great deal, and ſo jump to the concluſion. No; he proceeds with warineſs and circumſpection, taking heed to every ſtep, willingly ſubſcribing to that rule of the ancient heathen, "I am ſo far from lightly believing what one man ſays againſt another, that I will not eaſily believe what a man ſays againſt himſelf; I will always allow him ſecond thoughts, and many times counſel too." 5thly, Love is not puffed up; it does not incline or ſuffer any man to think more highly of himſelf than he ought to think, but rather to think ſoberly; yea, it humbles the ſoul unto the duſt; it deſtroys all high conceits engendering pride, and makes us rejoice to be as nothing. They who are kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love, cannot but in honour prefer one another. Thoſe who, having the ſame love, are of one accord, do in lowlineſs of mind each eſteem others better than themſelves. See Cambray as above, Stanhope, Clarke, Weſley, Boehm, and Bengelius.

Ver. 5. Doth not behave itſelf unſeemly] This is the ſixth character, and implies that love is not rude, or willingly offenſive to any. It renders to all their due; fear to whom fear, honour to whom honour: courteſy, civility, humanity to all the world, in their ſeveral degrees honouring all men. Good breeding, nay, the higheſt degree of it, politeneſs, is defined to be "a continual deſire to pleaſe, appearing in all the behaviour;" If ſo, there is none ſo well-bred as the Chriſtian,—a lover of all mankind; for he cannot but deſire to pleaſe all men for their good to edification: and theſe deſires cannot be hid; they will neceſſay appear in all his intercourſe with man; for his love is without diſſimulation: it will ſhew itſelf in his whole converſation and actions; yea, and will conſtrain him, though without guile, to become all things to all men, if by any means he may ſave ſome. And in the becoming all things to all men, love, 7thly, ſeeketh not its own: In ſtriving to pleaſe all men, the lover of mankind has no immediate eye to his own temporal advantage: he covets no man's ſilver, or gold, or apparel; he deſires nothing but the ſalvation of their ſouls; nay, he may be ſaid not to ſeek his own ſpiritual any more than temporal advantage; for while he is on the full ſtretch to ſave their ſouls from death, he as it were forgets himſelf: he does not think of himſelf, ſo long as that zeal for the glory of God ſwallows him up. See Exod. xxxii. 31, 32. Rom. ix. 3. No marvel that ſuch love, 8thly, is not provoked;—οὐ παροξύνεται,—The word eaſily is not in the original. St. Paul's words are abſolute, love is not provoked; it is not provoked to unkindneſs towards any one. Occaſions indeed will frequently occur, outward provocations of various kinds; but love does not yield to provocation; it triumphs over all, never exaſperated and thrown into bitter and implacable reſentments: in all trials it looks unto Jeſus, its great exemplar, and is more than conqueror in its love. And it prevents a thouſand provocations, which would otherwiſe ariſe, becauſe, 9thly, it thinketh no evil. Indeed the merciful man cannot avoid knowing many things that are evil; he cannot but ſee them with his own eyes, and hear them with his own ears; for love does not put out his eyes, ſo that it is impoſſible for him not to ſee that ſuch things are done; neither does it take away his underſtanding any more than his ſenſes; but οὐ λογίζεται τὸ κακὸν, it does not infer evil, where it does not appear; or reaſon out, or ſuppoſe what it hath neither ſeen nor heard. This is what true love abſolutely deſtroys; it tears up root and branch,—all imagining of what we have not known; it caſts out all jealouſies, all evil ſurmiſes, all readineſs to believe evil; it is frank, open, unſuſpicious; and as it cannot deſign, ſo neither does it fear evil. See as above.

Ver. 6. Rejoiceth not in iniquity] This is the 10th character of love,—that it rejoiceth not in iniquity; common as it is even for thoſe to do ſo, who bear the name of Chriſt. The true Chriſtian, however, is ſo far from this, that he laments over either the ſin or folly of an enemy; takes no pleaſure in hearing or repeating it; but rather deſires that it may be forgotten for ever. Nay, 11thly, he rejoiceth in the truth, whereſoever it is found; in the truth which is after godlineſs, bringing forth it's proper fruit, holineſs of heart and converſation. He rejoiceth to find, that even thoſe who differ from or oppoſe him, whether with regard to opinions, or ſome points of practice, are nevertheleſs lovers of God, and in other reſpects irreproachable. He is glad to hear good of them, and to ſpeak all he can conſiſtently with truth and juſtice. Indeed, good in general is his glory and joy, wherever diffuſed through the race of mankind. As a citizen of the world, he claims a ſhare in the happineſs of all the inhabitants of it. Becauſe he is a man, he is not unconcerned in the welfare of any man; but enjoys whatever brings glory to God, and promotes peace and good-will amongſt men. See as above.

Ver. 7. Beareth all things, &c.] The twelfth character of love is, that πάντα στέγει, it covereth all things, as the word ſhould undoubtedly be tranſlated; for otherwiſe this character would be the very ſame with the laſt in this verſe, πάντα ὑπομένει, endureth all things. See 1 Pet. iv. 8.—Becauſe the merciful man rejoiceth not in iniquity, neither does he willingly make mention of it. Whatever evil he ſees, hears, or knows, he nevertheleſs conceals, ſo far as he can, without making himſelf partaker of other men's ſins. Whereſoever, or with whomſoever he is, if he ſees any thing which he approves not, it goes not out of his lips unleſs to the perſon concerned,—if haply he may gain his brother. So far is he from making the faults or failings of others the matter of his cenſure or converſation, that of the abſent he will ſay nothing at all, if he can ſay nothing good. A tale-bearer, a back-biter, a whiſperer, an evil-ſpeaker, is to him all one as a murderer. He would juſt as ſoon take away his neighbour's life, as thus murder his reputation: juſt as ſoon would he think of diverting himſelf with ſetting fire to his neighbour's houſe, as of thus ſcattering abroad arrows, fire-brands, and death, and ſaying, Am I not in ſport? He makes only one exception. Sometimes he is convinced, that it is for the glory of God, or, which comes to the ſame, the good of his neighbour, that an evil ſhould not be covered. In this caſe, for the benefit of the innocent, he is conſtrained to declare the guilty; but he always in this caſe acts with the greateſt care and caution, leſt he ſhould tranſgreſs the law of love by ſpeaking too much, more than he would have done by not ſpeaking at all. 13thly, Love believeth all things. It is always willing to think the beſt; to put the moſt favourable conſtruction on every thing: It is ever ready to believe whatever may tend to the advantage of any one's character: It is eaſily convinced of what it earneſtly deſires,—the innocence or integrity of any man; or at leaſt of the ſincerity of his repentance, if he has once erred from the way. It is glad to excuſe whatever is amiſs; to condemn the offender as little as poſſible; and to make all the allowance for human weakneſs which can be done, without betraying the truth of God: And when it can no longer believe, then, 14thly, love hopeth all things. Is any evil related of any man? love hopes that the relation is not true; that the thing related was never done. Is it certain that it was?—But perhaps it was not done things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

8 Charity never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they ſhall fail; whether there be tongues, they ſhall ceaſe; whether there be knowledge, it ſhall vaniſh away.

9 For we know in part, and we propheſy in part.

10 But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part ſhall be done away.

11 When I was a child, I ſpake as a child, I underſtood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childiſh things.

12 For now we ſee through a glaſs, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then ſhall I know even as alſo I am known.

13 And now abideth faith, hope, charity, theſe three; but the greateſt of theſe is charity.

CHAP. XIV.

Prophecy is commended, and preferred before ſpeaking with tongues, by a compariſon drawn from muſical inſtruments. Both muſt be referred to edification, as to their true and proper end. The true uſe of each is taught, and the abuſe cenſured. Women are forbidden to ſpeak in the church.

FOllow after charity, and deſire ſpiritual gifts, but rather that ye may propheſy.

Ver. 11. Or, reaſoned.—V. 12. 2 Cor. iii. 18. v. 7. Phil. iii. 12. Gr. in a riddle. Matth. xviii. 10. 1 John iii. 2.——V. 1. Ch. xii. 31. Numb. xi. 25, 29.

done with ſuch circumſtances as are related; So that, allowing the fact, there is room to hope it was not ſo ill as it is repreſented. Was the action apparently, undeniably evil?—Love hopes the intention was not ſo. Is it clear the deſign was evil too?—yet it might not ſpring from the ſettled temper of the heart, but from a ſtart of paſſion, or from ſome vehement temptation, which hurried the man beyond himſelf; and even when it cannot be doubted that all the actions, deſigns, and tempers, are equally evil; ſtill love hopes that God will at leaſt make bare his arm, and get himſelf the victory; and that there ſhall be joy in heaven over this one ſinner that repenteth. Mean time, 15thly, it endureth all things; whatever the injuſtice, the malice, the cruelty of men can inflict, love is able to endure. It calls nothing intolerable; and never ſays of any thing, "this is not to be borne." A true believer can not only do, but ſuffer all things, through Chriſt that ſtrengtheneth him. See as above, and Bp. Beveridge's private thoughts.

Ver. 8. Charity never faileth] This is the 16th and laſt character of love:—It never faileth. It accompanies and adorns us to all eternity, and makes a very eſſential part of our preparation for the heavenly world: In which it hath an apparent advantage over many of thoſe gifts, which ſome are ſo ready to emulate and purſue, to the neglect and injury of this all-important love. But whether men admire prophecies, it is fit they ſhould know, that theſe ſhall be aboliſhed, when the faith of God's people ſhall no longer need to be encouraged, nor their devotion to be aſſiſted by ſuch exhortations and inſtructions as are neceſſary now: Or, whether they boaſt themſelves of the variety of tongues, they ſhall ceaſe in thoſe celeſtial regions. One ſpeech and one language ſhall prevail among all the bleſſed inhabitants, and the languages of earth be forgotten, as too low and imperfect: Yea, a great deal of that knowledge which we now purſue with the utmoſt eagerneſs, and which is very conducive to our preſent uſefulneſs amongſt mankind, ſhall then be aboliſhed and ſuperſeded, as referring to things altogether antiquated and paſſed away; or ſwallowed up in diſcoveries ſo much clearer, ſtronger, and more important, that it ſhall appear, in compariſon of them, as nothing. As ſtar-light is loſt in that of the mid-day ſun, ſo ſhall our preſent knowledge be loſt in the glorious light of eternity. See Doddridge, Wetſtein, and Homberg. Inſtead of they ſhall fail, Dr. Waterland reads, ſhall be out of uſe, or done away.

Ver. 9, 10. For we know in part, &c.] The wiſeſt of men have here but ſhort, narrow, imperfect conceptions, even of the things round about them; and much more of the deep things of God: And even the prophecies which men deliver from God, are far from taking in the whole of future events, or of that wiſdom and knowledge of God, which is treaſured up in the Scripture revelation. But when we are arrived at that perfect and heavenly ſtate, both that poor, low, and glimmering light, which is all the knowledge we can now attain to, and all the preſent ſlow and unſatisfactory methods of obtaining it, ſhall be exchanged for the moſt extenſive views of whatever it can be deſirable to know; opening upon the mind in the moſt eaſy, clear, and delightful manner. Doddridge, and Bengelius.

Ver. 11. When I was a child] "The future ſhall indeed be like a ſtate of adult age, when compared with that of feeble infancy; Juſt as when I was a child, I ſpake as a child would naturally do, a few imperfect words, hardly at firſt articulate and intelligible, and often in themſelves unmeaning. I was affected as a child; thrown into tranſports of joy or grief upon trifling occaſions, which manly reaſon ſoon taught me to deſpiſe. I reaſoned as a child, in a weak, inconcluſive, and ſometimes ridiculous manner; But when my faculties ripened, and I became a man, I put away the things of the child, and felt ſentiments, and engaged in purſuits correſpondent to ſuch advancements of age and reaſon. Such ſhall be the improvements of the heavenly ſtate, in compariſon with thoſe, which the moſt eminent Chriſtian can attain here." See Calmet, Doddridge, and Whitby.

Ver. 12. For now we ſee through a glaſs darkly] For now we ſee in an ambiguous manner, by means of a mirror; δι' ἐσόπτρȣ. The LXX uſe this word for the women's looking-glaſſes, or mirrors of metal, out of which Moſes made the laver, Exod. xxxviii. 8. It is well known that the uſe of dioptric glaſſes in teleſcopes did not prevail till many ages after the date of this Epiſtle. The meaning of the verſe is, "We now ſee the moſt noble objects of our intellectual view in an ambiguous and obſcure manner; as we diſcern diſtant objects by means of a glaſs or mirror, which reflects only their imperfect forms; ſo that, as when riddles are propoſed to us, our underſtandings are often confounded with the uncertain and indeterminate appearances of things.—But then we ſhall ſee, not the faint reflection, but the objects themſelves, face to face, in as diſtinct a manner as we could wiſh.—Now I know but in part, and though the light of an immediate revelation from heaven has been imparted to me in many inſtances, and in an extraordinary manner, I am ſenſible how great a part is ſtill kept under the veil. But then it ſhall be taken off, and I ſhall know, even as I alſo am known, in an intuitive and comprehenſive manner: So that my knowledge ſhall bear ſome fair reſemblance to that of the divine Being, which, while our notices of things hover about the ſurface, penetrates to the very centre of every object, and ſees through my ſoul and all things, as at one glance." See Doddridge, Clarke, and Hammond.

Ver. 13. And now abideth faith, &c.] "There are, then, only theſe three things which laſt, in oppoſition to the ſpiritual gifts before ſpoken of, which were to be of ſhort continuance in the church. Faith, hope, love, are the ſum of perfection on earth; love alone is the ſum of perfection in heaven: Nay, it is heaven itſelf; For,

——In obedience to what heaven decrees,
Knowledge ſhall fail, and prophecy ſhall ceaſe;
But laſting charity's more ample ſway,
Nor bound by time, nor ſubject to decay,
In happy triumph ſhall for ever live,
And endleſs good diffuſe, and endleſs praiſe receive."

See Mr. PRIOR's paraphraſe of the whole chapter: Reflections on which would be totally unneceſſary, ſince the great uſe every reader ought to make of it is, ſeriouſly to examine the heart, by the characters of love here laid down by the great Apoſtle, as fully ſatisfied from his ſtrong declarations, of the vanity and emptineſs of all profeſſion, gifts, and graces, without this divine temper.

Chap. XIV. Ver. 1.] St. Paul in this chapter concludes his anſwer to the Corinthians concerning ſpiritual men, and their gifts; and having told them that thoſe were moſt preferable which tended moſt to edification, and particularly ſhewn that prophecy was to be prefered to tongues, he gives them directions for the decent, orderly, and profitable exerciſe of their gifts in their aſſemblies. The word διώκετε, rendered follow after, properly ſignifies, "To purſue, with an eagerneſs like that with which hunters follow their game;" and it may be intended to intimate how hard it is to obtain and preſerve ſuch a truly benevolent ſpirit, in the main ſeries of life; conſidering, on the one hand, how many provocations we are likely to meet with, and on the other the force of ſelf-love, which will in ſo many inſtances be ready to break in upon it. We have ſhewn on ch. xii. 13. that the word ζηλȣ̃τε cannot here ſignify covet or deſire, as it is rendered. The meaning is evident from ver. 39. namely, that they ſhould not neglect the uſe of their ſpiritual gifts, but ſhould eſpecially, and in the firſt place cultivate and exerciſe the gift of prophecy; and yet, ſhould not wholly lay aſide the ſpeaking with variety of tongues in their aſſemblies. It will perhaps be wondered why St. Paul ſhould employ the word ζηλȣ̃ν in ſo unuſual a ſenſe; but that will eaſily be accounted for, if what we have remarked concerning St. Paul's cuſtom of repeating words be remembered. But, beſides

2 For he that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, ſpeaketh not unto men, but unto God: for no man underſtandeth him; howbeit, in the ſpirit he ſpeaketh myſteries.

3 But he that propheſieth, ſpeaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort.

4 He that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, edifieth himſelf; but he that propheſieth, edifieth the church.

5 I would that ye all ſpake with tongues, but rather that ye propheſied: for greater is he that propheſieth, than he that ſpeaketh with tongues; except he interpret, that the church may receive edifying.

6 Now, brethren, if I come unto you ſpeaking with tongues, what ſhall I profit you, except I ſhall ſpeak to you either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by propheſying, or by doctrine?

7 And even things without life giving ſound, whether pipe or harp, except they give a diſtinction in the ſounds, how ſhall it be known what is piped or harped?

8 For if the trumpet give an uncertain ſound, who ſhall prepare himſelf to the battle?

9 So likewiſe ye, except ye utter by the tongue words eaſy to be underſtood, how ſhall it be known what is ſpoken? for ye ſhall ſpeak into the air.

10 There are, it may be, ſo many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without ſignification.

11 Therefore, if I know not the meaning of the voice, I ſhall be unto him that ſpeaketh a barbarian, and he that ſpeaketh ſhall be a barbarian unto me.

12 Even ſo ye, foraſmuch as ye are zealous of ſpiritual gifts, ſeek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church.

13 Wherefore, let him that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, pray that he may interpret.

14 For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my ſpirit prayeth, but my underſtanding is unfruitful.

15 What is it then? I will pray with the ſpirit, and I will pray with the underſtanding alſo: I will ſing with the ſpirit, and I will ſing with the underſtanding alſo.

Ver. 2. Acts ii. 4. x. 46. Gr. heareth.—V. 6. Ver. 26.—V. 7. Or, tunes.—V. 9. Gr. ſignificant.—V. 12. Gr. of ſpirits.—V. 15. Epheſ. v. 19. Col. iii. 16. Pſ. xlvii. 7.

ſides what is familiar in St. Paul's way of writing, we may find a particular reaſon for his repeating the word ζηλοῦν here, though in a ſomewhat unuſual ſignification, he having, by way of reproof, told them that they did ζηλουν, covet, the beſt gifts; had emulation, or made a ſtir concerning whoſe gifts were beſt, and were therefore to be preferred in their aſſemblies. To prevent their thinking that ζηλοῦν might have too harſh a meaning [for he is very tender of offending them all through this Epiſtle, and therefore ſweetens all his reproofs as much as poſſible] he here takes it up again, and uſes it more than once, in a way which approves and adviſes that they ſhould ζηλοῦν,—Τὰ πνευματικά; whereby yet he means no more than that they ſhould not neglect their ſpiritual gifts. He would have them uſe them in their aſſemblies, but yet in ſuch method and order as he directs. See Locke, Grotius, and on ver. 15. Inſtead of follow and prophecy, Dr. Waterland reads, purſue—interpret.

Ver. 2. For he that ſpeaketh, &c.] "He that ſpeaks in a tongue unknown in the auditory which he addreſſes, ſpeaks in effect not to men, but to God; and as God alone knows the truth and importance of what he ſays, ſo is it all loſt on the audience, though he ſpeaks in the ſpirit the moſt ſublime myſteries." Dr. Whitby thinks that the gifts of languages and prophecy were always to be found in the ſame perſon; but that the firſt was permanent, the other tranſient; yet ſurely, it is very conceivable that either might be without the other. The miraculous in-ſtamping, as it were, in a man's mind, a new language, would indeed enable him to ſpeak all he knew in it; but his fitneſs to diſcourſe in public, as well as his capacity of predicting future events, were matters quite of another nature. He who attentively reads this chapter, ſays Mr. Locke, about ſpiritual men, and their gifts, may find reaſon to imagine, that it was thoſe who had the gifts of tongues, who cauſed the diſorder in the church of Corinth, by their forwardneſs to ſpeak, and ſtriving to be heard firſt; and ſo taking up too much of the time in their aſſemblies. For the remedying this diſorder, and better regulating this matter, amongſt other things, they had recourſe to St. Paul. This opinion will be confirmed, if we conſider, 1ſt, that the firſt gift which St. Paul compares with charity, ch. xiii. and extremely undervalues in compariſon of that divine virtue, is the gift of tongues; as if that were the gift they moſt affected to ſhew, and moſt valued themſelves upon; as indeed it was in itſelf moſt fitted for oſtentation in their aſſemblies of any other, if any one were inclined that way; and that the Corinthians, in their preſent ſtate, were not exempt from emulation and vanity, is very evident. 2dly, If we conſider, that when in this chapter St. Paul compares their ſpiritual gifts one with another, the firſt, nay, and only one which he debaſes and depreciates, in compariſon of others, is the gift of tongues; of which he diſcourſes for above twenty verſes together, in a way proper to abate a too high eſteem, and a too exceſſive uſe of it in their aſſemblies; which we cannot ſuppoſe he would have done, had they not been guilty of ſome ſuch miſcarriage in the caſe as ſeems to be intimated in ver. 24. 3dly, When he comes to give directions about the exerciſe of their gifts in their meetings, that of tongues is the only one which he reſtrains and limits. ver. 27, 28. See Doddridge, Whitby, and Locke.

Ver. 3. Propheſieth] Expounds or interprets. Wat. and in like manner through the following verſes.

Ver. 4. In an unknown tongue] By γλώσσῃ, tongue, Dr. Lightfoot, in this chapter, underſtands the Hebrew tongue; which, he obſerves, was uſed in the ſynagogue in reading the Scripture, in praying, and in preaching. "If that be the meaning of tongue here, ſays Mr. Locke, it ſuits well with the Apoſtle's deſign; which was to take them off from their Jewiſh falſe apoſtle, who probably might have encouraged and promoted this ſpeaking of the Hebrew in their aſſemblies." But it appears to me more likely that γλώσσῃ ſignifies any known tongue, in the general.

Ver. 5. I would that ye all ſpake with tongues] How happily does the Apoſtle teach us to eſtimate the value of gifts and talents, not by their brilliancy, but uſefulneſs. Speaking with tongues was indeed very ſerviceable for ſpreading the Goſpel abroad; but for thoſe who ſtaid at home, it was much more deſirable to be able to diſcourſe well on uſeful ſubjects in their own language; which might ſerve for the improvement of the ſociety to which they belonged, and the conviction of ſuch of their unbelieving neighbours as might, out of curioſity, happen to ſtep into their aſſemblies. See ver. 23—25.

Ver. 6. By revelation, or by knowledge, &c.] It is not to be doubted that the four diſtinct terms here uſed by the Apoſtle had each its diſtinct ſignification in his mind and intention. Whether what may be collected from theſe Epiſtles will ſufficiently warrant us to underſtand them in the following ſignifications, muſt be left to the judgement of others. Firſt, Revelation;—ſomething revealed by God immediately to the perſon; ſee ver. 30. Secondly, Knowledge;—the underſtanding of the myſtical and evangelical ſenſe of paſſages in the Old Teſtament, relating to our Saviour and the Goſpel. Thirdly, Prophecy;—an inſpired hymn, ver. 26, or the prediction of ſome future event. Fourthly, Doctrine;—any truth of the Goſpel concerning faith or manners. But whether this or any other preciſe meaning of theſe words can be certainly made out now, it is perhaps of no great neceſſity to be over curious; it being enough, for the underſtanding the ſenſe and argument of the Apoſtle here, to know, that theſe terms ſtand for ſome intelligible diſcourſe, tending to the edification of the church; though of what kind each of them was in particular, we certainly know not. See Locke, and Warburton on Grace, b. i. c. 4.

Ver. 10—12. There are, it may be, &c] There are, for example, many different languages in the world, and all are ſignificant: ver. 11. But if I do not underſtand the language, I ſhall be, with regard to him that uſes it, as a foreigner, and he will be ſo to me. ver. 12. Since then there is among you ſuch an emulation about ſpiritual gifts, ſeek to excel in thoſe which moſt contribute to edify the congregation. Heylin.

Ver. 13. Pray that he may interpret] Pray ſo as to interpret. Wat.

Ver. 14. But my underſtanding is unfruitful] "My meaning is unprofitable to others, who underſtand not my words." See ver. 4.

Ver. 15. I will pray with the underſtanding alſo] "When moved to it

16 Elſe, when thou ſhalt bleſs with the ſpirit, how ſhall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned, ſay Amen at thy giving of thanks, ſeeing he underſtandeth not what thou ſayeſt?

17 For thou verily giveſt thanks well, but the other is not edified.

18 I thank my God, I ſpeak with tongues, more than ye all:

19 Yet in the church I had rather ſpeak five words with my underſtanding, that by my voice I might teach others alſo, than ten thouſand words in an unknown tongue.

20 Brethren, be not children in underſtanding: howbeit, in malice be ye children, but in underſtanding be men.

21 In the law it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips, will I ſpeak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, ſaith the Lord.

22 Wherefore tongues are for a ſign, not to them that believe, but to them that believe not: but propheſying ſerveth not for them that believe not, but for them which believe.

23 If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all ſpeak with tongues, and there come in thoſe that are unlearned, or unbelievers, will they not ſay that ye are mad?

24 But if all propheſy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all:

25 And thus are the ſecrets of his heart made manifeſt; and ſo falling down on his face, he will worſhip God, and report that God is in you of a truth.

26 How is it then, brethren? when ye come together, every one of you hath a pſalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. Let all things be done to edifying.

27 If any man ſpeak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the moſt by three, and that by courſe; and let one interpret.

by the Spirir, I will pray in an unknown tongue; but ſo that my meaning may be underſtood by others;" i. e. "I will not do it but when there is ſome body by to interpret."—"I will not pretend, ſays Mr. Locke, to juſtify this interpretation of τῳ νοΐ by the exact rules of the Greek idiom; but the ſenſe of the place will, I think, bear me out in it; and as we have had occaſion often to remark, he muſt be little converſant with the writings of St. Paul, who does not obſerve that when he has uſed a term, he is apt to repeat it again in the ſame diſcourſe, in a way peculiar to himſelf, and ſomewhat varied from its ordinary ſignification. So, having here in the foregoing verſe uſed νοῦς for the ſentiment of his own mind, which was unprofitable for others when he prayed in a tongue unknown to them,—and oppoſed it to πνεύμα, which he uſed there for his own ſenſe, accompanying his own words, intelligible to himſelf, when by the impulſe of the Spirit he prayed in a foreign tongue; He continues in this verſe to uſe praying with the Spirit, and with the underſtanding in the ſame oppoſition, the one for praying in a ſtrange tongue, which alone his own mind underſtood and accompanied; the other, for praying ſo, as that the meaning of his mind in thoſe words he uttered was made known to others, ſo that they were alſo benefited. This riſe of πνεῦματι is farther confirmed in the next verſe; and what he means by Νοΐ here, he expreſſes by διὰ νοός, ver. 19. and there explains the meaning of it." Dr. Doddridge, however, is of opinion, that the ſenſe and high ſpirit of the Apoſtle in this clauſe is loſt by the above interpretation. I apprehend, ſays he, it is deſigned further to intimate what a want of manly ſenſe and right underſtanding it muſt betray, to talk in a language the hearers could not comprehend, how ſublime ſoever the diſcourſe may be. This the 20th verſe, and eſpecially the uſe of τέλειοι there ſtrongly ſuggeſts. Inſtead of I will pray with the underſtanding, and I will ſing with the underſtanding, Dr. Heylin reads, But my prayer ſhall be intelligible;—But my hymn ſhall be intelligible. See our Appendix to the Annotations on Geneſis, ch. xxxi. 27.

Ver. 16. He that occupieth, &c.] He that is one of the unlearned. Wat. Dr. Heylin reads, How ſhall a hearer, who knows only his own tongue, ſay, &c?

Ver. 18. I ſpeak with tongues more, &c.] The occaſion ſhews, that the Apoſtle conſidered this acquirement as a ſpiritual gift; and his uſing the preſent time ſhews, that he boaſted of it, as then in his poſſeſſion. But why did he ſpeak with more tongues than all of them?—For a good reaſon: He was the peculiar Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and was to preach the Goſpel amongſt remote and barbarous nations. See ver. 4. and Warburton on Grace, as above.

Ver. 20. Be not children in underſtanding] This is an admirable ſtroke of true oratory, adapted to humble their ſpirits, by repreſenting thoſe things in which they were moſt ready to pride themſelves, as comparatively childiſh. The word νηπιάζετε refers to infants, and is not ſufficiently expreſſed by the word children; for they are ſometimes vain, and ſometimes malicious too; it ſhould rather be rendered be little infants in malice,—κακία,—by which is to be underſtood all ſorts of evil temper of mind, contrary to the gentleneſs and innocency of childhood; and in particular their emulation and ſtriſe about the exerciſe of their gifts in their aſſemblies. Τέλειοι ſignifies full-grown men; intimating, that it was a kind of puerility, to emulate, and to quarrel with one another. See Locke, Doddridge, and Mintert.

Ver. 21. In the law it is written] In the law here means the Old Teſtament, Iſai. xxviii. 11. where God had been complaining of the unteachable diſpoſition of the Jews. Inſtead of with men of other lips, ſome read, ſurely in foreign language, and with foreign lips, &c. Moſt critics refer the words, as they ſtand in Iſaiah, to the Babylonians, who ſhould come and ſpeak to them in a language unintelligible to them; in which ſenſe the phraſe is uſed elſewhere, Deut. xxviii. 49. Jer. v. 15. Diodati thinks the meaning is, "Becauſe they would not attend to plain meſſages, God would ſpeak to them by ſuch as they could not underſtand:" and then the Apoſtle's argument will be, "Since God threatens this as a curſe, do not voluntarily bring it upon the church, merely to make oſtentation of your own gifts." See Luke xxiv. 44. Acts xxiv. 14.

Ver. 25. And thus are the ſecrets, &c.] "In a manner to him very ſurpriſing and unaccountable; inſomuch that ſometimes a perſon who comes into your aſſembly out of mere curioſity, or poſſibly with ſome ill deſign, is not able to command himſelf under the impreſſions which the word of God thus ſpoken makes upon him." It is very poſſible that, as in the known caſes of Nathanael and the woman of Samaria, (John i. 47. iv. 18.) ſome ſecret facts relating to a ſtranger, might in ſome inſtances be revealed to a prophet; perhaps, in ſome caſes, the ill deſigns which had brought them into the aſſembly, when they came only as ſpies: And this was well ſuited to the purpoſe of producing ſtrong convictions of the preſence of God with Chriſtians. The paſſage however may be ſo underſtood, as to include any remarkable correſpondence between what was ſpoken, and the thoughts and ſtate of mind whereof ſuch a ſtranger might be conſcious. Many memorable inſtances of which ſtill happen, where miniſters preach in an experimental manner, and laſting effects are often produced in conſequence of ſuch impreſſions. See Doddridge, Clarke, and Whitby.

Ver. 26. Every one of you hath a pſalm] Is ready with a pſalm, with a doctrine, &c. Locke and MS. It ſeems probable that ſome of theſe Chriſtians were ſo full of themſelves, and ſo deſirous of exerciſing their reſpective gifts, that, without waiting for the permiſſion and direction of him who preſided in the aſſembly (which in the ſynagogues the Apoſtles themſelves ſeem to have done, ſee Acts xiii. 15.) ſeveral began ſpeaking or ſinging in the ſame minute, and ſome began while others were ſpeaking. The manner in which diſcourſes were carried on in the ſchools of the philoſophers (where ſeveral little knots of diſputants ſeem to have been engaged at the ſame time,) and what happened in Jewiſh ſynagogues after worſhip was concluded, might poſſibly have given occaſion to an irregularity, which ſeems to us ſo very extraordinary. See Doddridge and Locke.

Ver. 27. If any ſpeak, &c.] St. Paul has ſaid in this chapter as much as conveniently could be ſaid, to reſtrain their ſpeaking in an unknown tongue in their aſſemblies, which ſeems to be that wherein the vanity and oſtentation of the Corinthians was moſt forward to ſhew itſelf. "It is not, ſays he, a gift intended for the edification of believers; however, ſince you will be exerciſing it in your meetings, let it it always be ſo ordered, that it may be for edification." Εἴτε ſhould be rendered although, ſince it is no where uſed ſimply for if, 28 But if there be no interpreter, let him keep ſilence in the church; and let him ſpeak to himſelf, and to God.

29 Let the prophets ſpeak two or three, and let the other judge.

30 If any thing be revealed to another that ſitteth by, let the firſt hold his peace.

31 For ye may all prophecy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted.

32 And the ſpirits of the prophets are ſubject to the prophets.

33 For God is not the author of confuſion, but of peace, as in all churches of the ſaints.

34 Let your women keep ſilence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to ſpeak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as alſo ſaith the law.

35 And if they will learn any thing, let them aſk their huſbands at home: for it is a ſhame for women to ſpeak in the church.

36 What? came the word of God out from you? or came it unto you only?

37 If any man think himſelf to be a prophet, or ſpiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you, are the commandments of the Lord.

38 But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

39 Wherefore, brethren, covet to propheſy, and forbid not to ſpeak with tongues.

40 Let all things be done decently, and in order.

Ver. 29. Ch. xii. 10.—V. 30. 1 Theſſ. v. 19, 20.—V. 33. 'Gr. tumult, or unquietneſs. Ch. xi. 16.—V. 34. 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12. Ch. xi. 3. Epheſ. v. 22. Col. iii. 18. 1 Pet. iii. 1. Gen. iii. 16.—V. 37. 2 Cor. x. 7. 1 John iv. 6.—V. 39. 1 Theſſ. v. 20.

as in our tranſlation: nor will the ſenſe here bear whether, which is the common ſignification of ειτε. Therefore, ſays Mr. Locke, I take the Apoſtle's meaning to be, "You muſt do nothing but to edification, ver. 26; and although you ſpeak in an unknown tongue, even an unknown tongue muſt be made uſe of in your aſſemblies only to edification." The rule of the ſynagogue was, "In the law let one read, and one interpret; in the prophets, let one read, and two interpret."—In Eſther, "ten may read, and ten interpret." It is not improbable that ſome ſuch diſorderly cuſtom had been introduced into the church of Corinth by the judaizing falſe apoſtle, to which St. Paul would here put an end. See Locke. Some learned critics would correct this and the 26th verſe together, thus: Hath every one a pſalm? Hath he a doctrine, &c?—Let all be done to edifying; or if any one ſpeak in an unknown tongue, let it be, &c. See Luke xi. 11. Calmet, and Markland.

Ver. 28. But if there be no interpreter] The miracle which conferred the gift of tongues ſeems to have been the inſtantaneous impreſſing on the mind the familiar and perfect knowledge of a language, with which the perſon was before unacquainted; yet ſo, that from that time the perſon receiving it ſhould be able, without any new miracle, to uſe it as he thought fit: in the ſame manner as the members of the body are freely and perfectly uſed, after having been reſtored by miracle to the exerciſe of their natural functions. It was as much in the courſe of nature for an Apoſtle, whom the Holy Spirit had enabled to ſpeak a ſtrange language, ever afterwards to have the uſe of that language, as it was for the cripple whom Jeſus reſtored to the uſe of his limbs, ever afterwards to walk, run, and perform all the functions of a man perfectly ſound and whole. This is the only hypotheſis upon which the abuſe of this gift can be accounted for. But though every man uſing this gift, and underſtanding what he ſays, muſt have been able to have rendered his diſcourſe ſentence by ſentence into his native language; yet he might be unable to render it into a third, which might be the language of many preſent. In ſuch a circumſtance the gift of interpretation might take place, if it conſiſted in an inſtantaneous capacity of underſtanding a ſtrange language, and rendering what was ſpoken in it into the native tongue of the interpreter. On this hypotheſis, one who had the gift of interpretation might not be able to ſpeak any foreign language at all; and he who had the gift of a tongue might not, in ſome circumſtances, be able to interpret to thoſe who were then his hearers: in this caſe, the gift of interpretation enabling a man to act only a ſecondary part, would be leſs oſtentatious, ſplendid, and ſtriking; but whenever it was exerciſed, it would always argue the perſon to be under an immediate agency of the ſpirit, and would conduce to his uſefulneſs. See Warburton on Grace, Whitby, and Leland againſt Morgan, vol. i. p. 375.

Ver. 30. Let the firſt hold his peace] Some think that σιγάτω here ſhould be rendered, have done ſpeaking; for if the direction had been, "Let him that was ſpeaking, immediately hold his peace, as ſoon as another intimates that he has a revelation," it would have introduced a confuſion which this advice was intended to prevent. "—If any thing be revealed to another, &c. let him not immediately ariſe and interrupt the firſt, but let him ſit ſtill till he have done ſpeaking." See ver. 32, 33.

Ver. 31. That all may learn] Yet ſo as all may learn. MS.

Ver. 32. The ſpirits of the prophets are ſubject, &c.] Thoſe who were actuated by the Holy Spirit, in the very moment of inſpiration ſtill retained the free uſe of themſelves, and continued maſters of their rational and perſuaſive faculties: But it was juſt the contrary with the heathen oracles. The Delphic propheteſs was a mere organ, her prophecies being delivered in a fit of extaſy, when the preſence of the God was ſuppoſed to obliterate all the impreſſions of human ideas. See Warburton as above.

Ver. 34, 35. Let your women keep ſilence] "As to your women, let them keep ſilence in your aſſemblies: for it is not permitted them to diſcourſe there, or pretend to teach: that no way ſuits the ſtate of ſubjection appointed them in the law. See Gen. iii. 16. But if they have a mind to have any thing explained to them that paſſes in the church, let them, for their information, aſk their huſbands at home; for it is a ſhame for women to diſcourſe and to debate with men publickly in the congregation." Locke; who adds, "Why I apply this prohibition of ſpeaking only to reaſoning, and purely voluntary diſcourſe—but ſuppoſe a liberty left women to ſpeak, where they had an immediate impulſe and revelation from the Spirit of God,—ſee ch. xi. 3." In the ſynagogue it was uſual for any man who had a mind, to demand of the teacher a further explication of what he had ſaid; but this was not permitted to the woman. Others reconcile this paſſage with ch. xi. 5, 13. by ſuppoſing, that when a woman was immediately inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt, ſhe was authorized to communicate to the audience the ſubject of what was revealed to her; but when ſhe was not inſpired, ſhe was to keep ſilence. See Whitby and Doddridge.

Ver. 37. Or ſpiritual] The ſpiritual man, in the ſenſe of St. Paul, is one who founds his knowledge in what is revealed by the Spirit of God, and not in the bare diſcoveries of his natural reaſon and parts. See ch. ii. 15.

Ver. 38. If any man be ignorant] By the any man mentioned in this and the foregoing verſe, St. Paul ſeems to intimate the falſe apoſtle; who pretended to give laws amongſt them, and, as we have obſerved, may well be ſuppoſed to be the author of theſe diſcourſes; whom therefore St. Paul reflects on and preſſes in theſe three verſes. Ἀγνοείτω, which we render Let him be ignorant, Whitby would render "Let him not be acknowledged to be a true prophet." See his note.

Ver. 39. Covet to prophecy] Ζηλῶν, to covet, taken through this whole diſcourſe to refer to the exerciſe, and not to the obtaining the gifts to which it is joined, will direct us right in underſtanding St. Paul, and make his meaning very eaſy and intelligible. Locke.

Ver. 40. Let all things be done decently] "Eſpecially remember this great comprehenſive rule, to be applied to a thouſand varieties which may ariſe, Let all things be done decently, and according to order; let all be conducted in a regular manner, to prevent ſuch diſturbances, diſputes, and ſcandals for the future, as have already ariſen in your ſociety, and will proceed to greater evils, if you do not immediately ſet about reforming them." See Doddridge, and Whichcote's Select Sermons, p. 177.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XIV.

How weak and poor a thing is pride and oſtentation, and how wiſe and honourable humility and charity! Who, that has a right diſcernment, would not rather have been the obſcureſt Chriſtian, that now almoſt unſeen joins our aſſemblies, and in heart, at leaſt, humbly puts his amen to the petitions preſented there, than the moſt fluent talker in Corinth; abuſing the ſpecial gifts of the Spirit, and trifling away, in an unſeaſonable diſplay of his then unprofitable endowments, the moments deſtined to the higheſt purpoſes of religious edification? Who muſt not lament to ſee pride and vain-glory ſo early inſinuating themſelves into Chriſtian ſocieties? Who muſt not from ſo ſad an inſtance learn to be greatly watchful over their own hearts, on a ſide where they are ſubject to ſuch dangerous attacks? ver. 2—12.

Had the moſt able and zealous Proteſtant divine endeavoured to expoſe the abſurdity of praying in an unknown tongue, as practiced in the church of Rome, it is difficult to imagine what he could have written more full to the purpoſe than the Apoſtle hath here done: And when it is conſidered how perverſely the Papiſts retain the uſage of ſuch prayers, it will ſeem no wonder that they ſhould keep the Scriptures alſo in an unknown tongue. But they proclaim at the ſame time their ſuperſtition and idolatry in ſo univerſal a language, that even a barbarian might perceive and learn it in their aſſemblies.

CHAP. XV.

By Chriſt's reſurrection he proveth the neceſſity of our reſurrection, againſt all ſuch as deny the reſurrection of the body. The fruit and manner thereof, and of the changing of them that ſhall be found alive at the laſt day.

MOreover, brethren, I declare unto you the goſpel which I preached unto you, which alſo ye have received, and wherein ye ſtand;

2 By which alſo ye are ſaved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unleſs ye have belived in vain.

3 For I delivered unto you firſt of all, that which I alſo received, how that Chriſt died for our ſins, according to the ſcriptures;

4 And that he was buried, and that he roſe again the third day, according to the ſcriptures:

5 And that he was ſeen of Cephas, then of the twelve:

6 After that he was ſeen of above five hundred brethren at once: of whom the greater part remain unto this preſent, but ſome are fallen aſleep.

ſemblies. May God give their prejudiced minds a juſter and happier turn, and teach us to avoid a blind and unreaſonable adherence to cuſtom, merely as ſuch; always directing ourſelves by what the reaſon of things, and the authority of Scripture concur to dictate. ver. 13—16.

We ſhould learn of this wiſe and benevolent Apoſtle, to eſtimate the value of gifts by their uſefulneſs, and to ſeek above all things the edification of our brethren, eſpecially if we are providentially called to miniſter in public. ver. 18, 19. There is, perhaps, a manner of ſpeaking in an unknown tongue, even when the language of our own country is uſed;—an height of compoſition, an abſtruſeneſs of thought, an obſcurity of phraſe, which common Chriſtians cannot underſtand. Let not the miniſters of the humble Jeſus ſeek ſuch high things, but in this important ſenſe of the exhortation, condeſcend to men of low eſtate. If the ignorant may be inſtructed, if the careleſs may be convinced, if the vicious may be reformed, if the devotion of our Chriſtian brethren may be excited, their love to each other cheriſhed, and their holy reſolutions confirmed,—the great ends of divine ordinances are anſwered; and that plainneſs of ſpeech which may be moſt likely to promote them, is rather the glory than the reproach of the Chriſtian orator.

How fondly do men flatter themſelves with empty appearances, and often how juſtly do ſuch deſerve the imputation of childiſh folly, the height of whoſe temper will leaſt allow them to bear it! Let us dare to examine ourſelves impartially; ſollicitous that we may not be children in underſtanding; but, forming our minds on the maxims of Scripture, and our lives on the example of Chriſt, may we grow up in him, to the meaſure and ſtature of a perfect man:—But let us be children in malice, endeavouring to be as free from every gloomy, malignant, ſelfiſh paſſion, as new-born infants are. ver. 20. Who can ſay he hath fully attained this happy and amiable character? Yet ſhould we diligently follow after it; remembering that there is a ſenſe, in which,—proud and intereſted, envious and malignant, as alas! we too much are,—we muſt become as little children, or we cannot inherit the kingdom of God.

Thoſe extraordinary gifts, which ſuited the firſt planting of Chriſtianity in the world, are now ceaſed; but we have great reaſon to bleſs God that they were given, and that we have ſuch an inconteſtible evidence of the truth of the Goſpel as this chapter affords. Such endowments muſt certainly argue a divine power, ſetting its ſeal to the Goſpel; and the reality of ſuch endowments can never be queſtioned, when we reflect on the manner in which the Apoſtle here reproves the abuſe of them; and that in a ſociety, where ſo many were alienated from him and his miniſtry; and conſequently where ſuch appeals, if not founded on the ſtricteſt and moſt apparent truth, muſt have expoſed him to a contempt never to have been removed. Theſe miraculous gifts having abundantly anſwered their ends, are wiſely withdrawn; yet ſtill the divine preſence is with the church; of which we have this happy proof, that there are thoſe who find the ſecrets of their hearts made manifeſt, by the faithful and ſkilful adminiſtration of Chriſtian ordinances; adoring the Lord God in their hearts, and acknowledging that he is of a truth with his church. May inſtances of this kind be more frequent, and may the ſpirituality and fervour with which divine ordinances ſhall be adminiſtered be ſuch, as may afford more reaſon to expect them. ver. 24, 25.

We ſhould always regard God as the Author, not of confuſion, but of peace; making it our concern to behave in his ſanctuary in a manner agreeable to this view; with ſuch ſolemn decorum, and with ſuch a tender regard to the edification and comfort of each other as he may approve. May the God of peace deliver Chriſtians of every ſect and rank from that ſpiritual pride, which has thrown ſo many religious ſocieties into diſorder. And, to advance a ſtate ſo happy as that of humility and love muſt neceſſarily be, may what the Apoſtles have written be acknowledged as the commandments of the Lord, and Chriſtian worſhip and practice be more regulated by their truly authentic canons; which would render many that have been ſince deviſed, relating to indifferent matters, as unneceſſary as ſome others are burdenſome, ſuperſtitious, and abſurd. ver. 33—40.

Chap. XV. Ver. 1.] After St. Paul had left the Corinthians, ſome amongſt them denied the reſurrection of the dead, though he had ſtrongly inculcated that doctrine. He confutes their objections by Chriſt's reſurrection, which the number of witneſſes yet remaining who had ſeen him, put paſt all queſtion; beſides the conſtant inculcating of it by all the Apoſtles every where. From the reſurrection of Chriſt thus eſtabliſhed, he infers the reſurrection of the dead; ſhews the order they ſhall riſe in, and what ſort of bodies they ſhall have. It is well known that the primitive Chriſtians were often inſulted by the heathen philoſophers, for their hope of a reſurrection, which one of them ridiculouſly enough calls "the hope of worms." See 2 Tim. ii. 18. Others taught that virtue was its own neceſſary reward, in ſuch a manner, as tended to overthrow the ſtrongeſt of all natural arguments for a future ſtate; namely, that taken from ſuch an unequal diſtribution of reward and puniſhment. If, biaſſed by theſe vain pretences of the heathen philoſophers, or ſeduced by any Jewiſh teachers, of Sadducean principles, the Chriſtians were tempted ſo to refine on the doctrine of the reſurrection, as in effect to explain it away, it ſhews the propriety of this Apoſtle's ſetting himſelf to prove the reſurrection of Chriſtians, rather than a reſurrection in general. See Locke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 2. By which ye are ſaved] "By which you are brought into a ſtate of ſalvation; into the way of being completely and eternally ſaved." The next clauſe ſhould be rendered, If you retain thoſe joyful tidings which I delivered unto you. The words rendered unleſs, ἐκτὸς εἰ μὴ, are remarkable, and may ſuggeſt the thought expreſſed ver. 17. So the two firſt verſes may be a tranſition; as if he had ſaid "I preach the ſame Goſpel ſtill, and I hope you will retain it: Yet I have reaſon to fear that ſome of you entertain notions, which tend quite to enervate it." Some would render ἐκτὸς εἰ μὴ with a comma, making it an exception to the former clauſe,—but if not,—if you do not retain what I have preached,—you have believed in vain. See 1 Tim. v. 19. Doddridge, Beza, and Pyle.

Ver. 4. And that he roſe again the third day] It has been queried where the Scriptures foretel that Chriſt ſhould riſe from the dead on the third day. Some think there is a tranſpoſition or parentheſis: ſo that the meaning will be, "He roſe again according to the Scriptures, and this on the third day." Others refer to Pſ. xvi. 10. which ſays, He ſhould not ſee corruption in the grave, as expreſſive of this, becauſe bodies begin to putrefy on the fourth day. Bp. Warburton refers this to the repreſentative ſacrifice of Iſaac. Iſaac, ſays he, was the repreſentative of Chriſt dying for us; his carrying the wood repreſented Chriſt carrying his croſs; his father's bringing him ſafe from mount Moriah, after three days, during which the ſon was under condemnation of death, repreſented the time Chriſt continued dead, and the father plainly received him under the character of Chriſt's repreſentative, as reſtored from the dead; for as his being brought to the mount, his being bound and laid on the altar, figured the ſufferings and death of Chriſt, ſo his being taken from thence alive, as properly figured Chriſt's reſurrection; nay, even the very time of his reſurrection from the dead. See Div. Leg. b. vi. ſect. 5. Chandler of Chriſtianity, p. 370. Bullock's Vindication, p. 48. and Jefferies's Review, p. 127.

Ver. 5. Then of the twelve] It is certain that neither Judas nor Thomas was there, and probably James might be abſent, (ſee on ver. 7.) But as the council of twenty-three among the Jews might be ſaid to be aſſembled, if the greater part were preſent, though the number might not be compleat; ſo the company might be called the twelve, though we ſhould ſuppoſe a fourth part to have been abſent. See Mark xvi. 14. Luke xxiv. 36. John xx. 26.

Ver. 5. Above five hundred brethren at once] This was probably in Galilee, where our Saviour had a very great number of diſciples; and though there were no more than an hundred and twenty aſſembled at Jeruſalem when Matthias was choſen, yet it does not follow, that there was no ſuch number in Galilee, where it appears from the whole tenor of the Goſpel, that our Lord's diſciples abounded very much. This, therefore, is ſo far from being an objection to the truth of our Saviour's reſurrection, (as Chubb and others would urge) that it is a glorious proof of the contrary. Had it been an impoſture, ſo many falſe hearts and tongues could never have acted in concert; nor would they all have kept the ſecret, which remorſe, intereſt, and perhaps often torture, might urge them

7 After that, he was ſeen of James; then of all the Apoſtles.

8 And laſt of all he was ſeen of me alſo, as of one born out of due time.

9 For I am the leaſt of the apoſtles, that am not meet to be called an apoſtle, becauſe I perſecuted the Church of God.

10 But by the grace of God I am what I am: and his grace which was beſtowed upon me, was not in vain; but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me.

11 Therefore whether it were I or they, ſo we preach, and ſo ye believed.

12 Now if Chriſt be preached that he roſe from the dead, how ſay ſome among you, that there is no reſurrection of the dead?

13 But if there is no reſurrection of the dead, then is Chriſt not riſen.

14 And if Chriſt be not riſen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is alſo vain.

15 Yea, and we are found falſe witneſſes of God; becauſe we have teſtified of God, that he raiſed up Chriſt: whom he raiſed not up, if ſo be that the dead riſe not.

16 For if the dead riſe not, then is not Chriſt raiſed:

17 And if Chriſt be not raiſed, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your ſins.

18 Then they alſo which are fallen aſleep in Chriſt, are periſhed.

19 If in this life only we have hope in Chriſt, we are of all men moſt miſerable.

to divulge: eſpecially as there had been one traitor among the twelve; on whoſe account, had they been conſcious of a fraud, a general ſuſpicion of each other's ſecrecy muſt have ariſen. See Ditton on the Reſurrection, and Prideaux's Letter to a Deiſt, p. 241.

Ver. 7. Then of all the Apoſtles] The change of phraſe, from that in the concluſion of the 5th verſe, is very remarkable, and probably intimates, that they who were there called the twelve, (that is, the greater part of the company, who uſed to be ſo denominated) were not all the Apoſtles. On which circumſtance a probable conjecture is grounded, that James might by ſome accident have been detained from meeting his brethren, both on the day of the reſurrection, and that day ſevennight; and likewiſe at the time when Chriſt appeared to the five hundred: And that he might in this reſpect be upon a level with them, our Lord appeared to him alone, after all the appearances mentioned before. See Doddridge, and St. Jerome.

Ver. 8. As of one born out of due time] An abortive birth which comes before its time, (the name St. Paul here gives himſelf) is uſually ſudden and unexpected; and is alſo weak and feeble, ſcarce deſerving to be called, or to be accounted a man. The former part agrees to St. Paul's being made a Chriſtian, and an Apoſtle, though it be in regard to the latter that in the following verſe he calls himſelf abortive. Locke.

Ver. 9. Becauſe I perſecuted the church of God] When this Apoſtle ſpeaks of his merits as a Jew, he expreſſes himſelf as in Galatians i. 13. Philip. iii. 4. where he glories in the action of perſecution as plainly meritorious; and ſo indeed it was in a Jew, as appears from the commendations given to it in the caſe of Phinehas and others. Yet where he ſpeaks of it under his preſent character of a Chriſtian, he condemns it as horrible and deteſtable; and this, in order to ſhew his followers how it ought to be regarded in the religion of Jeſus. See Warburton's Div. Leg. b. v. ſect. 2. and Epheſ. iii. 8.

Ver. 10. His grace which was beſtowed upon me] St. Paul throws in this commendation of himſelf, to keep up his credit in the church of Corinth, where there was a faction labouring to diſcredit him. Locke. Inſtead of was not in vain, &c. Dr. Waterland reads, has not been in vain; for I have laboured.

Ver. 12. How ſay ſome among you, &c.?] This may well be underſtood of the head of the contrary faction, and ſome of his diſciples. Firſt, becauſe St. Paul introduces this confutation by aſſerting his miſſion, which theſe his oppoſers would bring in queſtion. Secondly, becauſe he is ſo careful to let the Corinthians ſee he maintains not the doctrine of the reſurrection in oppoſition to theſe their new leaders, it being the doctrine he had preached to them at their firſt converſion, before any falſe Apoſtle appeared among them, and miſled them about the reſurrection. Their falſe apoſtle was a Jew, and in all appearance judaized; may he not alſo be ſuſpected of Sadduciſm?—For it is plain he with all his might oppoſed St. Paul, which muſt proceed from ſome very great difference in opinion at the bottom, as there are no footſteps of any perſonal provocation, Locke.

Ver. 13. Then Chriſt is not riſen] The argument on which the Apoſtle dwells in ſo copious a manner would appear to be of great moment, whatever the principles were by which the doctrine of the reſurrection was aſſaulted. It could not be ſaid that was in its own nature impoſſible, which was accompliſhed in Chriſt; and it would prove that the hope of a reſurrection was not, as the Gentiles repreſented it, a mean and ſordid hope, ſince it was accompliſhed in the Son of God. See Doddridge, Ditton, and on ver. 1.

Ver. 17. Ye are yet in your ſins] The word ſin is frequently uſed for the puniſhment due to ſin, and in that ſenſe it ſhould be underſtood here: "Ye are yet liable to the puniſhment of your ſins." It is the conſtant tenor of Scripture that atonement for the ſins of the world was made by our great High-prieſt upon the croſs; that his death was our redemption, and his blood the price paid for it: ſo that when we conſider the redemption, which includes our juſtification, with reſpect to Chriſt the author and finiſher of it, it muſt be aſcribed to his death and paſſion;—but as to ourſelves, our title and intereſt in this common ſalvation being grounded in faith, our juſtification, though purchaſed by the blood of Chriſt, muſt be appropriated to ourſelves through faith in that blood. For the ſame Apoſtle who hath told us that we are juſtified freely through the redemption which is in Chriſt Jeſus, hath likewiſe told us, that God hath ſet him forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood. For this reaſon we are ſaid to be juſtified by faith; not that our faith is the purchaſe of juſtification, which we owe to the blood of Chriſt alone; but becauſe through faith we obtain the benefit of the redemption wrought by Jeſus Chriſt. Now though the death of Chriſt was the reconciling of the world to God, yet the reſurrection of Chriſt is the great and ſolid foundation of our hope and faith in him; even of our faith in his blood, by which he made a propitiation for our ſins: and therefore, although Chriſt died for our offences, and made atonement for our ſins, yet ſince our faith in his death, and our hope in his blood, (by which hope and faith we are juſtified) are built upon the truth and credit of his reſurrection, it is very properly ſaid, that he roſe again for our juſtification. For the death of Chriſt would have been no juſtification to us, nor could we have had hope or faith in it, but for the power and glory of the reſurrection; which has wiped away the ſcandal and ignominy of the croſs, and made it a rational act of faith to hope for life and immortality from him, who himſelf once died upon the tree. Thus we learn from St. Paul, that if Chriſt be not riſen, our faith is in vain; we are yet in our ſins. Whence we gather, that faith in the death of Chriſt, not grounded on the aſſurance of his reſurrection, is a vain faith, and ſuch an one as cannot deliver us from our ſins: Nay, that the death of Chriſt could not have been a propitiation for ſin without his reſurrection, he expreſly teacheth in the next verſe:—Then they alſo, which are fallen aſleep in Chriſt, are periſhed. See Locke, and Sherlocke's Diſcourſes, vol. i. p. 212.

Ver. 18. Fallen aſleep in Chriſt] "All deceaſed Chriſtians, not excepting the moſt excellent of them, who have died for their religion. They have loſt their life and being together on this ſuppoſition, in the cauſe of one, who, if ſtill among the dead, muſt have been an impoſtor, and a falſe prophet."

Ver. 19. We are of all men moſt miſerable] Moſt pitiable. MS and Doddridge. It is quite foreign to the purpoſe to argue from this text, as ſome have done, that if there were no future ſtate, virtue would make men more miſerable than they would otherwiſe be. It is evident St. Paul here ſpeaks not of the caſe of good men in general, if their hopes of future happineſs ſhould, after all, be diſappointed; but of the caſe of the Apoſtles, and other firſt preachers and profeſſors of Chriſtianity, if, amidſt all their hardſhips and perſecutions, they were not ſupported by this hope. To be a Chriſtian in thoſe days, was to be an example of well-tried virtue, of true wiſdom, and of conſummate fortitude; to be expoſed to ſcorn, to infamy, and to death; to be pointed at as a fool, a madman, an enthuſiaſt; to be reviled as an atheiſt, and an enemy to all religion; to be puniſhed as a robber and a murderer; to loſe fame, and friends, and comfort; and to be expoſed to every thing at which human nature ſhudders, and which a perſon of the greateſt courage, unaſſiſted by divine grace, would certainly endeavour to evade: Deſtitute therefore of the hope of the reſurrection amidſt theſe ſufferings, they muſt have been perpetually ſubjected to the upbraidings of their own minds, for ſacrificing every view of happineſs in this world, to advance what they knew to be a pernicious falſhood. Perhaps there never was a ſet of men on earth ſo criminal and ſo wretched as they muſt have been on this ſuppoſition. See Jortin's Diſcourſes, and Doddridge's "Sermons on the Power and Grace of Chriſt," ſerm. ix. p. 259, &c.

20 But now is Chriſt riſen from the dead, and become the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept.

21 For ſince by man came death, by man came alſo the reſurrection of the dead.

22 For as in Adam all die, even ſo in Chriſt ſhall all be made alive.

23 But every man in his own order: Chriſt the firſt-fruits; afterward they that are Chriſt's at his coming.

24 Then cometh the end, when he ſhall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father, when he ſhall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power.

25 For he muſt reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet.

26 The laſt enemy that ſhall be deſtroyed is death.

27 For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he ſaith all things are put under him, it is manifeſt that he is excepted which did put all things under him.

28 And when all things ſhall be ſubdued unto him, then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.

29 Elſe, what ſhall they do, which are baptized for the dead, if the dead riſe not

Ver. 20. But now is Chriſt riſen, &c.] It is a great miſtake to imagine, that the Apoſtle is employed throughout this chapter in proving a reſurrection: the proof lies in a very narrow compaſs, chiefly from ver. 12 to 19. and almoſt all the reſt of the chapter is taken up in illuſtrating, vindicating, or applying it. The proof is indeed very ſhort, but moſt ſolid and convincing;—that which aroſe from Chriſt's reſurrection. Now that not only proved a reſurrectian to be in fact poſſible, but, which was much more, as it proved Chriſt to be a divine teacher, it proved the doctrine of a general reſurrection which he ſo expreſly taught. It was natural too for ſo good a man as St. Paul to inſiſt on the ſad conſequences which would follow, with reſpect to himſelf and his brethren, from giving up ſo glorious a hope; and the cordial manner in which he ſpeaks of this, is a noble internal argument, which every reader of ſenſibility muſt feel. Inſtead of—become the firſt fruits of them that ſlept, Dr. Waterland reads,—the firſt-fruits of them that are fallen aſleep. The firſt-fruits was a ſmall part, firſt taken and offered to God, and which ſanctified the whole maſs which was to follow. See on ver. 18. Doddridge, Locke, and Fleming's Chriſtology, vol. i. p. 218.

Ver. 24. When he ſhall have put down all rule] Shall have aboliſhed or depoſed. MS. The word καταργέομαι generally ſignifies diveſting a thing of ſome power, whether lawful or uſurped, which it formerly had, and reducing it to an incapacity of exerting that power any more. Thus it is uſed of Satan, Heb. ii. 14. of death, here and ver. 26. of temporal princes, 2 Tim. i. 10. and 1 Cor. i. 28. ii. 6. and of the ceremonial law, Epheſians ii. 15. See Doddridge and Wolf.

Ver. 28. Then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject] "When the Father ſhall have ſubjected all things to him, ſo that it ſhall appear to every eye that he is indeed Lord of all, then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject to him, who ſubjected all things to him, by a public act in the midſt of this moſt auguſt aſſembly; giving up as it were his commiſſion to preſide as univerſal Lord in the mediatorial kingdom to Him, as having anſwered the end for which it was given him, in the compleat ſalvation of all his people; whom he ſhall then introduce into a ſtate of the greateſt proximity to God, and moſt intimate converſe with him, that God may be, and that he may appear to be, all in all: that they all may enjoy compleat and everlaſting happineſs, in the full communication of the divine favour to them for ever, in a world where they ſhall no longer need a Mediator to introduce them to God." It appears evidently that the kingdom to be given up is the rule of this lower world, which is then to be conſumed; and that it may not ſeem as if a province of Chriſt's empire was deſtroyed, his adminiſtration, undertaken in avowed ſubſerviency to the ſcheme of redemption, Epheſ. i. 10. and compleated in the reſurrection of all his people, ſhall cloſe in the moſt honourable manner. God will declare the ends of it fully anſwered; and the whole body of his people ſhall be introduced by him into a ſtate of more intimate approach to and communion with God, than had been known by the ſpirits of the bleſſed in their ſeparate ſtate. Upon the whole, we muſt remember here, that Chriſt is ſpoken of in his mediatorial capacity; and that it follows in the nature of things that his mediatorial kingdom muſt ceaſe, and be given up, when the great end of his Mediatorſhip is compleatly anſwered; ſo that no poſſible objection can be derived from hence againſt the true divinity of the ſecond perſon in the ever-bleſſed Trinity, who being God before the creation of this world, and conſequently before he aſſumed the office of the Redeemer of men, will and muſt remain God over all, bleſſed for ever, when the great deſigns of that office are intirely compleated. See Waterland's 6th Sermon at Lady Moyer's Lecture, Jones's Catholic Doctrine of a Trinity, ch. i. art. 15, 39, &c. and Bp. Brown's Procedure of the Underſtanding.

Ver. 29. Elſe, what ſhall they do, &c.] The ordinance of baptiſm was deſigned to repreſent the great advantages of the Chriſtian inſtitution, ſome of which advantages are repreſented by the nature of this rite, and others by the manner of performing it. So water being ſuited to cleanſe and purify the body, in alluſion hereto Ananias ſays to Saul, Ariſe, and be baptized, and waſh away your ſins, Acts xxii. 16. See alſo 1 Pet. iii. 21. Tit. iii. 5. As to the manner of performing this right, the original mode being by immerſion, St. Paul hence tells the Coloſſians, that they were buried with Chriſt in baptiſm, and alſo riſen with him, ch. ii. 12. See likewiſe Rom. vi. 3—5. By which expreſſions he deſigns to intimate, that as Chriſt died and roſe again, ſo baptiſm was to them an emblem or repreſentation, that after death they ſhould be raiſed to a ſtate of future happineſs; and in the paſſage before us he ſeems to argue from the ſame topic; for there were ſome perſons then at Corinth, who though they made a profeſſion of Chriſtianity, yet denied the reſurrection of the body. Theſe the Apoſtle is here confuting, and from ſuch arguments as were acknowledged by themſelves; the firſt of which is taken from the reſurrection of Chriſt: whence he not only ſhews the poſſibility of the body's riſing, from a plain fact, but likewiſe the certainty of their riſing alſo, as founded upon his promiſe and power to effect it. But as they might credit the teſtimonies of our Saviour's reſurrection ſo ſoon after he was buried, and while his body lay uncorrupted, and yet queſtion how a body could be reſtored, and the particles reunited after it had been reduced to duſt, he proceeds to ſhew how inconſiſtent it was with their profeſſion as Chriſtians, to deny this great article of their faith: And among other arguments for this purpoſe, he ſeems in the paſſage under conſideration to make uſe of one taken from the manner of their baptiſm, which he ſhews to be vain and inſignificant, if dead bodies (for that is the proper ſenſe of νεκρὸς) are not to riſe again. And here the particle ἐπεὶ, inſtead of being tranſlated elſe, ſhould rather be rendered beſides or moreover: for the Apoſtle has done with the argument taken from the reſurrection of Chriſt, and now proceeds to another, which is introduced by that particle; the ſenſe whereof ſeems to be this: "Beſides, what advantage is it to be laid in the water like dead bodies, when you are baptized? If dead bodies are not to be raiſed again, why are ye baptized after the ſimilitude of dead bodies?—This ceremony can have no meaning or ſignificance in it, unleſs it prefigure the reſurrection of the body." The Apoſtle's reaſoning therefore appears to be taken from the mode of baptiſm, as then adminiſtered amongſt them; for they might allow there were other advantages repreſented by baptiſm, at the ſame time that they denied the reſurrection of the body; ſuch as the waſhing away of ſin, and the purifying of the conſcience; ſo that St. Paul could not ſo well argue againſt the uſe of baptiſm altogether, from their denial that the bodies of men ſhould be raiſed again, ſince they might not admit of ſuch a conſequence: but he might juſtly infer, there could be no reaſon for performing it in ſuch a manner, as prefigured a reſurrection, if there was really to be no ſuch thing, or no ground to expect it. Chryſoſtom and ſeveral of the fathers underſtood the words in the ſenſe: the chief difficulty objected to it lies in the ſenſe of ὑπὲρ, taken for like, or as, in the words ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν,—like, or as dead bodies: for ſo they ſhould be rendered, and not, as in our verſion, for the dead; which likewiſe obſcures the ſenſe, by repreſenting thoſe who were baptized and the dead as different perſons. St. Chryſoſtom ſurely muſt be allowed to have known perfectly well all the different acceptations of that particle, and therefore could not have been led into a ſenſe which it would not admit of; and indeed St. Paul himſelf uſes a ſimilar expreſſion in his Epiſtle to Philemon, ver. 13.—That in thy ſtead he might have adminiſtered to me in the bonds of the Goſpel; by which he does not intimate that Philemon ever adminiſtered to him, or attended on him while in bonds at Rome, or that he expected he ever would; but by the words ὑπὲρ σοῦ, which we tranſlate in thy ſtead, is meant, as Grotius well obſerves, "as, or in like manner as you would, were you with me:" ſo that the uſe of the prepoſition here, is the ſame as in the place before us. Sir Richard Ellys and Le Clerc ſuppoſe, that by ὑπὲρ νεκρῶν the Apoſtle means ſuch perſons as were baptized in the room of others who were dead; but it may be thought to ſuit as little his deſign to reaſon from the continuance of baptiſm, as from the ordinance itſelf, ſeparate from the manner of its adminiſtration. Some indeed have apprehended, that the Apoſtle argues from the ordinance itſelf, by the connection of this verſe with the following;—and why ſtand we in jeopardy every hour? But καὶ, which is here tranſlated and, is ſometimes uſed in tranſitions, and may introduce a new argument, taken at all? why are they then baptized for the dead?

30 And why ſtand we in jeopardy every hour?

31 I proteſt by your rejoicing which I have in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord, I die daily.

32 If after the manner of men, I have fought with beaſts at Epheſus, what advantageth it me, if the dead riſe not? let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.

33 Be not deceived: Evil communications corrupt good manners.

34 Awake to righteouſneſs, and ſin not; for ſome have not the knowledge of God: I ſpeak this to your ſhame.

35 But ſome man will ſay, How are the dead raiſed up? and with what body do they come?

36 Thou fool, that which thou ſoweſt is not quickened, except it die:

more eſpecially from the Apoſtles. Dr. Whitby, by the words for the dead, underſtands, "for that Jeſus, who, according to their doctrine, muſt ſtill be dead;" and he obſerves, that the plural οἱ νεκροι is frequently uſed in Scripture, when one perſon is ſpoken of; and that the reſurrection νεκρῶν—of the dead in general, is thrice mentioned by this Apoſtle, when ſpeaking of the reſurrection of Chriſt alone. It would be endleſs to enumerate all the interpretations which have been given of this paſſage. Mr. Locke freely confeſſes that he does not underſtand it. See Ward's 48th Diſſertation, Grotius, Ellys's Fortuita Sacra, p. 137. Le Clerc, and Whitby.

Ver. 31. I proteſt by your rejoicing] Our received copies read it ὑμετέραν, your rejoicing; but there are copies which encourage us to read it ἡμετέραν, our rejoicing, which ſeems ſo much more natural and eaſy, that one can ſcarce forbear believing it genuine. It may, however, be interpreted into a very pertinent ſenſe as it now ſtands. "I proteſt by your joys, which I do ſo cordially take part in, that I may call them my own." The MS reads glorying inſtead of rejoicing.

Ver. 32. If after the manner of men, &c.] St. Paul was a Roman citizen, and pleaded his privilege as ſuch, and therefore the chief captain was afraid becauſe he had bound him; for, as Cicero ſays, Facinus eſt vinciri civem Romanum, ſcelus verberari;—that is, to examine him by ſcourging: This was at Jeruſalem; but he had done the like before at Philippi. Now, if he pleaded his privilege on theſe leſſer occaſions, would he not much more have done it on ſuch an occaſion as this which is ſpecified in the text? Beſides, who ſhould order it?—The provincials had no ſuch power, and the governor would not venture to inflict ſuch a puniſhment on a Roman citizen, from which he was exempt by their laws: And eſpecially he would not have attempted it at that time, which was the beginning of Nero's reign, while he governed well, and very moderately. Nor does any time appear in the courſe of the hiſtory, which can well be aſſigned for it; for when St. Paul came firſt to Epheſus, he ſtayed but a little while, and left them in quiet, Acts xviii. 19. and upon his return thither, when the Jews endeavoured to prejudice the multitude againſt him, he taught in the ſchool of Tyrannus; and though he continued there two years, we hear of no riot till the affair of Demetrius. After this he immediately left the city, and went into Macedonia. There is a like difficulty as to the place;—for to ſuppoſe it to have been in the theatre, as ſome have done, ſeems wholly without foundation. Theatres were deſigned for ſcenical entertainments, ſuch as plays, muſical concerts, the conteſts of poets and orators; and ſometimes their public councils were held there. But they were no ways fitted, nor indeed ſafe, for conteſts with wild beaſts. The amphitheatres were the uſual places for thoſe ſhows. Nor do we find mention made in ancient writers of any amphitheatre at Epheſus: Though had there been one, and St. Paul had been expoſed in it, it is ſcarce probable but we ſhould have heard of it. Moreover, had the Apoſtle been thus engaged, it is difficult to apprehend how he could have eſcaped without a miracle. For thoſe who conquered the beaſts, were afterwards obliged to fight with men, till they were killed themſelves. This was the barbarous cuſtom at that very time, as we learn from Seneca, epiſt. 7. It ſeems moſt reaſonable, therefore, to underſtand the expreſſion as metaphorical, and that he alludes to the tumult raiſed by Demetrius. He uſes the like metaphors, and with reſpect to the ſame thing, ch. iv. 9. and again, ver. 13. alluding to another cuſtom. And in the Acts (ch. xx. 29.) ſpeaking of the Epheſians, making uſe of the ſame trope, he ſays, I know this, that after my departure ſhall grievous wolves enter in among you, not ſparing the flock. As to the expreſſion κατὰ ἄνθρωπον, the ſenſe ſeems to be, humanly ſpeaking; and ſo it is uſed by Chryſippas, and κατ' ἄνδρα by Æſchylus, as Grotius remarks upon Rom. iii. 5. where the Apoſtle ſupplies the verb λεγω, as alſo Galat. iii. 15. a verb which is often omitted, as may be ſeen in Bos de Ellipſis; and the expreſſion is always uſed in an alluſive ſenſe. The ſtories which Nicephorus and Theodoret give us, of an encounter which St. Paul had with wild beaſts on the theatre at Epheſus, have been ſo far regarded by Dr. Whitby, that he contends for the literal interpretation of this paſſage; in favour of which it is alſo urged, that had he ſpoken of brutal men, he would rather have mentioned the aſſault made upon him at Lyſtra, where he was ſtoned, and ſuppoſed to be dead. But the danger of being pulled to pieces might be greater at Epheſus: It had happened very lately, and as the ſcene was much nearer Corinth, it might be more natural for him to mention it here. The ſilence of St. Luke in his hiſtory, as to ſo memorable an event as a combat with beaſts muſt have been, and St. Paul's omitting it in the large catalogue of his ſufferings, 2 Cor. xi. 23. together with his known privilege as a Roman citizen, which would probably, at leaſt, to be ſure it ſhould legally, have protected him from ſuch an inſult, do all favour the figurative interpretation; and the expreſſion κατὰ ἄνθρωπον, after the manner of men, or humanly ſpeaking, has a propriety on this hypotheſis, which it cannot have on the other, and ſeems to be quite deciſive. See Ward's 49th Diſſertation, Whitby, Craddock, Doddridge, Grotius, and Witſius's Meletem. cap. viii. ſect. 23.

Let us eat and drink, &c.] If the dead riſe not at all, the Epicurean maxim might ſeem to be juſtified: "Let us make the beſt of this ſhort life, which is the whole period of our being; and giving up thoſe ſublime ſentiments and purſuits, which belong not to creatures of ſo ſhort and low an exiſtence, let us eat and drink, ſince we are to die as it were to-morrow, or the next day; for, ſo little is the difference between one period of ſuch a life and another, that it is ſcarce worth while to make the diſtinction." The clauſe before us affords the great argument urged to prove, that by the reſurrection of the dead St. Paul means a future ſtate: But the true ſolution ſeems to be, that he writes all along upon a ſuppoſition, that if ſuch proof as he had produced of Chriſt's reſurrection were not to be depended upon, we could have no certainty at all, with reſpect to any future exiſtence. And though it muſt be acknowledged that the natural arguments for the immortality of the ſoul, and future retributions, carry with them great probability, yet the degree of evidence is by no means comparable to that, which, admitting the truths of the facts alledged, the Corinthians muſt have had of Chriſt's reſurrection, with which our own has ſo neceſſary a connection: And conſequently, had theſe proofs been given up, what might have been pleaded in favour of the other, would probably have made every little impreſſion. It is ſcarce neceſſary to obſerve, that the Apoſtle is not here ſpeaking his own ſentiments, but arguing according to the Epicurean or Sadducean notions of thoſe, who, denying a future ſtate, urged as a natural conſequence, that man in that caſe had nothing more to do, than to make the beſt he could of the preſent life. St. Paul could not for a moment admit of ſuch a ſuppoſition. He was too firmly grounded in the belief of a reſurrection, to allow for one moment any reaſoning built upon the idea of its falſhood; and therefore we may obſerve, that he immediately adds to the ſentiments which he puts into the mouth of his oppoſers, Be not deceived, &c. ver. 33. Conſequently, all the abſurd and blaſphemous reaſoning of Chubb drawn from this paſſage, is grounded upon the moſt falſe and indefenſible principles. St Paul, in every page of his writings, ſhews too great a regard to holineſs and virtue, for us ever to believe that he could think, upon any hypotheſis, a life of impurity and vice preferable to them. See Doddridge, and Hallet on the reſurrection.

Ver. 33. Evil communications corrupt good manners] The original words are a quotation from the works of Menander, and are an Iambic verſe. Accordingly Dr. Doddridge very well tranſlates them thus:

Good manners are debauch'd by talk profane.

Ver. 34. I ſpeak this to your ſhame] May not this probably be ſaid, to make them aſhamed of their Leader, in whom they were ſo forward to glory? For it is not unlikely that their queſtioning and denying the reſurrection came from their new Apoſtle, who raiſed ſuch oppoſition againſt St. Paul. Locke. Inſtead of, Awake to righteouſneſs, ſome read, Awake, as becomes righteous men: The MS has it, Awake to right reaſon, and do not ſo groſsly miſtake.

Ver. 35. Some man will ſay, How, &c.?] If we will allow St. Paul to know what he ſays, it is plain from his anſwers that he underſtands theſe words to contain two queſtions: Firſt, "How comes it to paſs, that dead men are raiſed to life again;—would it not be better they ſhould live on;—why do they die to live again?" Secondly, "With what body ſhall they return to life?" To both theſe he diſtinctly anſwers, 1. That thoſe who are raiſed to an heavenly ſtate ſhall have other bodies; and next, that it is fit men ſhould die, death being no improper way to the attaining other bodies. He ſhews that there is ſo plain and common an inſtance of this, in the ſowing of all ſeeds, that he thinks it a fooliſh thing to make a difficulty of it; and then proceeds to declare, that as they ſhall have others, ſo they ſhall have better bodies than they had before; namely, ſpiritual and incorruptible bodies. See Locke's Human Underſtanding, b. ii. c. 27. and Ward's 48th Diſſertation.

Ver. 36. Except it die] It has been objected to this, that if the ſeed die, it never bears fruit; but it is certain that the ſeed in general

37 And that which thou ſoweſt, thou ſoweſt not that body that ſhall be, but bare grain; it may chance of wheat, or of ſome other grain:

38 But God giveth it a body as it hath pleaſed him, and to every ſeed his own body.

39 All fleſh is not the ſame fleſh: but there is one kind of fleſh of men, another fleſh of beaſts, another of fiſhes, and another of birds.

40 There are alſo celeſtial bodies, and bodies terreſtrial: but the glory of the celeſtial is one, and the glory of the terreſtrial is another.

41 There is one glory of the ſun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the ſtars: for one ſtar differeth from another ſtar in glory.

42 So alſo is the reſurrection of the dead. It is ſown in corruption; it is raiſed in incorruption:

43 It is ſown in diſhonour; it is raiſed in glory: it is ſown in weakneſs; it is raiſed in power:

44 It is ſown a natural body; it is raiſed

Ver. 42. Dan. xii. 3. Matth. xiii. 43. Phil. iii. 20.—V. 43. Phil. iii. 21.

neral does conſume away in the ground, though a little germen or bud, which makes a part of it, ſprings up into new life, and is fed by the death and corruption of the reſt. So that theſe wiſe philoſophers of our own, talk juſt as fooliſhly as the Corinthian freethinkers whom they vindicate. See the note on John xii. 23, 24. and my ſecond Sermon on Vegetation.

Ver. 38. To every ſeed his own body] The Apoſtle ſeems more directly to ſpeak of that, as its proper body, which is peculiar to that ſpecies of grain; yet undoubtedly each ear has a peculiar reference to one individual, as its proper ſeed, in ſuch a manner, as another of the ſame ſpecies has not: and what follows plainly ſuits ſuch a view. God is ſaid to give it this body as he pleaſes him, becauſe we know not how it is produced; and the Apoſtle's leading thought is, that it is abſurd to argue againſt a reſurrection, on a principle which is ſo palpably falſe as that muſt be, which ſuppoſes us to underſtand the whole progreſs of the divine works. See Doddridge, and Heylin.

Ver. 39. All fleſh is not the ſame] The ſcope of the paſſage makes it evident, that by fleſh St. Paul here means bodies; as much as to ſay, that God has given to the ſeveral ſorts of animals bodies in ſhape, texture, and organization, very different one from another, as he has thought good; and ſo he can give to men at the reſurrection, bodies of very different conſtitutions and qualities from thoſe which they had before. See Locke; who inſtead of beaſts, reads cattle; κτηνῶν.

Ver. 41, 42. There is one glory of the ſun, &c.] Some would connect theſe two verſes in the following manner: There is one glory of the ſun, &c.—For one ſtar differeth from another ſtar: ver. 42. So alſo in glory is the reſurrection of the dead. But the clauſe, So alſo is the reſurrection of the dead, ſhould rather conclude the 41ſt verſe. Two things are illuſtrated; the different ſpecies of bodies, terreſtrial and celeſtial, and the difference of glory even in the celeſtial. The latter is the ſubject of ver. 41. and to that only the circumſtance of bodies after the reſurrection is applied. Then, at the words, It is ſown in corruption, ver. 42. the Apoſtle reſumes the ſubject of ver. 39, 40. to ſhew that there are different kinds of bodies. It ſhould be obſerved, that the reſurrection of the dead here ſpoken of, is not the reſurrection of all mankind in common, but only the reſurrection of the juſt. This will be evident to any one who obſerves that St. Paul having ver. 22. declared that all men ſhall be made alive again, tells the Corinthians, ver. 23. That it ſhall not be all at once, but at ſeveral diſtances of time. Firſt of all Chriſt roſe, afterwards next in order to him the juſt ſhould all be raiſed, which reſurrection of the juſt is that which he treats, and gives an account of to the end of this diſcourſe and chapter, and thus never comes to the reſurrection of the wicked, which was to be the third and laſt in order: So that from the 23d verſe to the end of this chapter, all that he ſays of the reſurrection, is a deſcription only of the reſurrection of the juſt, though he calls it here by the general name of the reſurrection of the dead. That this is the caſe is ſo evident, that there is ſcarce a verſe from the 41ſt to the end, which does not evince it. 1ſt, What in this reſurrection is raiſed, St. Paul aſſures us, ver. 43. is raiſed in glory, but the wicked are not raiſed in glory. 2dly, He ſays we (ſpeaking in the name of all that ſhall be then raiſed) ſhall bear the image of the heavenly Adam, ver. 49. which cannot belong to the wicked. We ſhall all be changed, that by putting on incorruptibility and immortality, death may be ſwallowed up of victory, which God giveth us through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, ver. 51, 52, 53, 54, 57. which cannot likewiſe belong to the damned. And therefore we and us muſt be underſtood to be ſpoken in the name of the dead that are Chriſt's, who are to be raiſed apart by themſelves, before the reſt of mankind. 3dly, He ſays, ver. 52. that when the dead are raiſed, they who are alive ſhall be changed in the twinkling of an eye. Now that theſe dead are only the dead in Chriſt which ſhall riſe firſt, and ſhall be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, is plain from 1 Theſſ. iv. 16, 17. 4thly. He teaches, ver. 54. that by this corruptible's putting on incorruption, is brought to paſs the ſaying, that Death is ſwallowed up of victory. But I think no body will ſay, that the wicked have victory over death; yet that, according to the Apoſtle here, belongs to all thoſe whoſe corruptible bodies have put on incorruption, which therefore muſt be only thoſe that riſe the ſecond in order. From whence it is clear, that their reſurrection alone is that which is here mentioned and deſcribed. 5thly, A farther proof whereof is, ver. 56, 57. in that thei ſins being taken away, the ſting whereby death kills is taken away. And hence St. Paul ſays, God hath given us the victory, which is the ſame us or we who ſhould bear the image of the heavenly Adam, ver. 49. And the ſame we who ſhould all be changed, ver. 51, 52. All which places can therefore belong to none but thoſe who are Chriſt's, who ſhall be raiſed by themſelves the ſecond in order, before the reſt of the dead. It is very remarkable what St. Paul ſays in this 51ſt verſe, We ſhall not all ſleep, but we ſhall all be changed in the twinkling of an eye. The reaſon he gives for it, ver. 53. is, becauſe this corruptible thing muſt put on incorruption, and this mortal thing muſt put on immortality. How? why by putting off fleſh and blood, by an inſtantaneous change, becauſe, as he tells us, ver. 50. fleſh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; and therefore, to fit believers for that kingdom, thoſe who are alive at Chriſt's coming, ſhall be changed in the twinkling of an eye, and thoſe that are in their graves ſhall be changed likewiſe at the inſtant of their being raiſed, and ſo all the whole collection of ſaints, all the members of Chriſt's body, ſhall be put into a ſtate of incorruptibility, ver. 52. in a new ſort of bodies. Taking the reſurrection here ſpoken of to be the reſurrection of all the dead promiſcuouſly, St. Paul's reaſoning in this place can hardly be underſtood. But upon a ſuppoſition that he here deſcribes the reſurrection of the juſt only, that reſurrection which he ſays, ver. 23. is to be the next after Chriſt's, and ſeparate from the reſt, there is nothing can be more plain, natural, and eaſy than St. Paul's reaſoning: and it ſtands thus; "Men alive are fleſh and blood; the dead in the graves are but the remains of corrupted fleſh and blood; but fleſh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither can corruption inherit incorruption, i. e. immortality: therefore, to make all thoſe who are Chriſt's capable to enter into his eternal kingdom of life, as well thoſe of them who are alive, as thoſe of them who are raiſed from the dead, ſhall in the twinkling of an eye be all changed, and their corruptible ſhall put on incorruption, and their mortal ſhall put on immortality: And thus God gives them the victory over death, through their Lord Jeſus Chriſt." This is in ſhort St. Paul's arguing here, and the account he gives of the reſurrection of the bleſſed. But how the wicked, who are afterwards to be reſtored to life, were to be raiſed, and what was to become of them, he here ſays nothing, as not being to his preſent purpoſe; which was to aſſure the Corinthians, by the reſurrection of Chriſt, of a happy reſurrection to believers, and thereby to encourage them to continue ſtedfaſt in the faith which had ſuch a reward. That this was his deſign may be ſeen by the beginning of his diſcourſe, ver. 12—21. and by the concluſion, ver. 58. in theſe words: Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye ſtedfaſt, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, foraſmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord. Which words ſhew that what he had been ſpeaking of in the immediately preceding verſes, viz. their being changed, and the putting on of incorruption and immortality, and their having thereby the victory through Jeſus Chriſt, was what belonged ſolely to the ſaints, as a reward to thoſe who remained ſtedfaſt, and abounded in the work of the Lord. The like uſe of the like, though ſhorter, diſcourſe of the reſurrection, wherein he deſcribes only that of the bleſſed, he makes to the Theſſalonians, 1 Theſſ. iv. 13—18. which he concludes thus: Wherefore comfort one another with theſe words. Nor is it in this place alone that St. Paul calls the reſurrection of the juſt by the general name of the reſurrection of the dead. He does the ſame, Phil. iii. 11. where he ſpeaks of his ſufferings, and of his endeavours, if by any means he might attain unto the reſurrection of the dead; whereby he cannot mean the reſurrection of the dead in general; which, ſince he has declared in this very chapter, ver. 22. that all men, both good and bad, ſhall as certainly partake of, as that they ſhall die, there needs no endeavours to attain to it. Our Saviour likewiſe ſpeaks of the reſurrection of the juſt in the ſame general terms of the reſurrection, Matth. xxii. 30. And the reſurrection from the dead, Luke xx. 35. by which is meant only the reſurrection of the juſt, as is plain from the context. See Locke, Bengelius, and Mede's 33d Diſc.

Ver. 42—44. It is ſown in corruption] "The body which has now in it ſuch manifeſt principles of mortality and corruption, which conſiſts now of ſuch brittle and tender parts, that every the leaſt tendency diſturbs, and unfits them for their operations; which is now ſubject to ſo many caſualties, and has its continuance depending upon a ſpiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a ſpiritual body.

45 And ſo it is written, The firſt man Adam was made a living ſoul; the laſt Adam was made a quickening ſpirit.

46 Howbeit, that was not firſt which is ſpiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is ſpiritual.

47 The firſt man is of the earth, earthy: the ſecond man is the Lord from heaven.

48 As is the earthy, ſuch are they alſo that are earthy: and as is the heavenly, ſuch are they alſo that are heavenly.

49 And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we ſhall alſo bear the image of the heavenly.

50 Now this I ſay, brethren, that fleſh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

51 Behold, I ſhew you a myſtery; We ſhall not all ſleep, but we ſhall all be changed, 52 In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the laſt trump. For the trumpet ſhall ſound, and the dead ſhall be raiſed incorruptible, and we ſhall be changed.

53 For this corruptible muſt put on incorruption, and this mortal muſt put on immortality.

54 So when this corruptible ſhall have put on incorruption, and this mortal ſhall have put on immortality, then ſhall be brought to paſs the ſaying that is written, Death is ſwallowed up in victory.

55 O death, where is thy ſting? O grave, where is thy victory?

56 The ſting of death is ſin; and the ſtrength of ſin is the law.

57 But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

58 Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye ſtedfaſt, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, foraſmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.

the fit diſpoſition of many little and eaſily-diſordered parts, that it is a greater wonder how we continue to live a day, than why we die after ſo few years ſpace;—this body ſhall, at the reſurrection, be perfectly refined and purged from all the ſeeds of mortality and corruption. In a word, it ſhall ſpring up into an incorruptible and immortal ſubſtance, which ſhall be fitted to endure as long as the ſoul to which it is united, even to all eternity. Further, that body which at death ſeems ſo baſe and abject, ſo vile and contemptible, ſhall at the reſurrection be transformed into a bright, a beautiful, and glorious body; which, in compariſon of the animal frame, may with ſufficient propriety be called a ſpiritual body, as being an infinitely more pure and refined vehicle for the ſoul." Σῶμα ψυχικὸν, ver. 44. which we render a natural body, ſhould be rendered, more ſuitably to the Greek, and more conformable to the Apoſtle's meaning, an animal body; for St. Paul is ſhewing here, that as we have animal bodies now, which we derive from Adam, endowed with an animal life, which, unleſs ſupported with a conſtant ſupply of food and air, will fail and periſh; and at laſt, do what we can, will diſſolve and come to an end: ſo at the reſurrection, we ſhall have from Chriſt, the ſecond Adam, ſpiritual bodies, which ſhall have an eſſential and naturally inſeparable life in them, continuing and ſubſiſting perpetually of itſelf, without the help of meat, or drink, or air, or any ſuch foreign ſupport; without decay, or any tendency to a diſſolution. Of which our Saviour ſpeaking, ſays, That they who ſhall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the reſurrection from the dead, cannot die any more, for they are equal to the angels; that is, of an angelical nature and conſtitution: and ſurely, in this view, there can be no impropriety or abſurdity, as ſome have urged, in the Apoſtle's calling this future nature and conſtitution, whatever it may be, a ſpiritual body, or a ſpiritualized frame. See Clarke, Locke, and B. Calamy.

Ver. 45. The firſt man Adam was made a living ſoul] An animal with life, ψυχὴ—anima, from whence animal in the preceding verſes. See 1 Theſſ. v. 23. and the note on Gen. ii. 7. The laſt clauſe is not a quotation from Scripture, as ſome have thought, but what the Apoſtle adds on occaſion of the quotation from Geneſis; as if he had ſaid, "Chriſt is the laſt Adam, as an illuſtrious type of the firſt, (Rom. v. 14.) and he hath in himſelf a Spirit, with which he quickeneth whom he pleaſes, and in what degree he pleaſes." See John i. 4. v. 26. and the 21ſt and 26th verſes of this chapter.

Ver. 47. The firſt man is of the earth] "The firſt man was from the earth, and ſo earthly: he was created out of the duſt of the earth, and his body was only a maſs of animated clay; in reference to which it was ſaid, Duſt thou art. The ſecond man of whom we ſpeak, is the Lord from heaven. He came originally from the heavenly world, to which he is returned; and whatever of earth there was in the compoſition of the body he condeſcended to wear, it is now compleatly purified and refined into the moſt glorious form." Doddridge. Dr. Waterland, following ſome MSS, omits the words the Lord; but others, inſtead of ὁ κύριος, would read οὐρανὸς, agreeably to the Vulg.—The ſecond man is from heaven, heavenly; by which means this latter part of the verſe correſponds to the former.

Ver. 51. Behold, I ſhew you a myſtery] I tell you, &c. MS. and Wat. That is, "A doctrine hitherto unknown, and which you cannot now be able fully to comprehend; for we Chriſtians ſhall not all ſleep,—ſhall not all be ſubmitted to the ſtroke of death; but we ſhall all, the living as well as the dead, at the appearance of Chriſt to the final judgement, be changed in a moſt happy and glorious manner into the image of our Lord." See 1 Theſſ. iv. 15.

Ver. 53. For this corruptible] Τὸ φθαρτὸν, corruptible, and τὸ θνητὸν, mortal, have not here Σωμα, Body, for their ſubſtantive, as ſome imagine; but are put in the neuter gender abſolute, and ſtand to repreſent νεκροὶ, dead, as appears by the immediately preceding verſe, and by ver. 42, So alſo is the reſurrection of the dead; it is ſown in corruption. That is, "Mortal and corruptible men are ſown, being corruptible and weak:" Nor can it be thought ſtrange or ſtrained, that we interpret theſe words as adjectives of the neuter gender, to ſignify perſons, when in this very diſcourſe, ver. 46. the Apoſtle uſes two adjectives in the neuter gender, to ſignify the perſons of Adam and Chriſt, in ſuch a way, that it is impoſſible to underſtand them otherwiſe. We have a ſimilar mode of ſpeaking, Matth i. 20. and Luke i. 35. in both which the perſon of our Saviour is expreſſed by adjectives of the neuter gender. That therefore which is meant here being this, that this mortal man ſhall put on immortality, and this corruptible man incorruptibility,—any one will eaſily find another nominative caſe to σπείρεται, is ſown, ver. 43. rather than Σῶμα, body, when he conſiders the ſenſe of the place, wherein the Apoſtle's purpoſe is to ſpeak of Νεκροὶ mortal men, being dead, and raiſed again to life, and made immortal. Thoſe with whom grammatical conſtruction and the nominative caſe weigh ſo much, may be pleaſed to read this paſſage in Virgil.

> Linquebant dulces animas, aut ægra trahebant
> Corpora.—— Æn. lib. iii. ver. 140.

Where, by finding the nominative caſe to the two verbs in it, they may come to diſcover that perſonality, as contradiſtinguiſhed to both ſoul and body, may be the nominative caſe to verbs. Locke.

Ver. 54, 55. So when this corruptible, &c.] And when, &c. Wat. and MS. "When this glorious and long-expected event ſhall be accompliſhed,—when this corruptible part of our frame ſhall have put on incorruptible, &c. then ſhall be fulfilled what is written Iſai. xxv. 8. Death is ſwallowed up in victory; perfectly ſubdued and deſtroyed, and ſo happy a ſtate introduced, that it would not be known that death had ever had any place or power among Chriſt's ſubjects; in the aſſured view whereof, the Chriſtian may even now, with the greateſt pleaſure, take up his ſong of triumph, Where is thy ſting, O death?" The original has a kind of poetical turn, which ſeems in ſome meaſure to ſuit the ſublimity of the ſentiment; for the firſt of the clauſes, ver. 55. is an Ionic, and the ſecond a Trochaic verſe; and Mr. Pope has only tranſpoſed them, to make them, as they ſtand in our verſes, the concluſion of one of his ſtanzas,—O grave! where is thy victory?—O death! where is thy ſting? It is generally thought that theſe words are quoted from Hoſea xiii. 10, 14. where ſee the note; as alſo Locke, Doddridge, Voſſ. de LXX Interp. cap. 24. and Peters on Job, p. 393.

CHAP. XVI.

He exhorteth them to relieve the want of the brethren at Jeruſalem; commendeth Timothy; and after friendly admonitions, cloſeth his epiſtle with divers ſalutations.

NOW concerning the collection for the ſaints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even ſo do ye.

2 Upon the firſt day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in ſtore, as God hath proſpered him, that there be no gatherings when I come.

3 And when I come, whomſoever ye ſhall approve by your letters, them will I ſend to bring your liberality unto Jeruſalem.

4 And if it be meet that I go alſo, they ſhall go with me.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XV.

The death and reſurrection of Chriſt conſtitute the grand foundation of our holy faith. It may well be the daily joy of our hearts to think how firm that foundation ſtands, and what various and convincing evidence we have, that as Chriſt became incarnate, viſited this wretched world, and died for our ſins, according to the Scriptures; that as he condeſcended to go down into the caverns of the grave, and lie there in the cold and ſilent tomb, humbled in the duſt of death; ſo alſo, according to the ſame Scriptures, he was raiſed again on the third day; ver. 3, 4. How thankful ought we to be that ſuch a convincing proof was given of his reſurrection, demonſtrated by ſuch infallible tokens and repeated appearances to all the Apoſtles, who had every opportunity which the moſt ſcrupulous temper could demand, of examining at leiſure into its certainty! More than five hundred perſons were witneſſes to it at one time; witneſſes, who for many years ſurvived to atteſt this important fact, and corroborate our faith and hope in God, who quickeneth the dead. ver. 5. As therefore we have thus received, ſo let us ſtand faſt in this doctrine; remembering that our ſalvation dependeth on our ſtedfaſtly retaining it, and that if ever, on any conſiderations, we make ſhipwreck of faith and a good conſcience, we have believed in vain, and worſe than in vain. ver. 1, 2.

It is matter of thankful joy that St. Paul was added to this cloud of witneſſes who atteſted the reſurrection of Jeſus;—that great Apoſtle, in whom the grace of God was ſo richly magnified; magnified peculiarly in that humility which he here expreſſes in ſo amiable a manner; calling himſelf the leaſt of the Apoſtles, declaring that he was unworthy the name of an Apoſtle; and amidſt all the labours and glories of this eminent ſtation in the church, ſtill keeping in his eye that madneſs, with which, in the days of his infidelity he had waſted it. ver. 9. And ſhall not we alſo learn of him to ſay, By the grace of God I am what I am? ver. 10.—Let us be ſolicitous that his grace beſtowed on us be not in vain; and ever bearing in mind the many ſins of our unconverted ſtate, and our great unworthineſs, ſince we have known God, or rather been known of him, let us labour in our Lord's ſervice with proportionable zeal; and when we have laboured to the utmoſt, and exerted ourſelves with the greateſt fidelity and reſolution, let us aſcribe it to that divine agency, which ſtrengthened us for all; and ſay again, though ſome ſhould eſteem it a diſagreeable tautology, Not I, but the grace of God that was with me.

Well may we rejoice, to ſee the doctrine of our own reſurrection ſo cloſely connected in the ſacred writings, and eſpecially in this excellent diſcourſe of St. Paul, with that of our bleſſed Redeemer, as that they ſhould be declared to ſtand or to fall together. ver. 12—16. For Chriſt is aſſuredly riſen from the dead, and become the firſt fruits of them that ſlept. He hath repaired to all his ſpiritual ſeed the damage which Adam brought upon his deſcendants; yea, he is become to them the author of a far nobler life than the poſterity of Adam loſt by him. ver. 20—23.

Let us meditate with unutterable joy on the exaltation of our glorified head,—of our gracious ſovereign, who hath conquered death himſelf, and will make us partakers of his victory. He hath received from his Father glory, honour, and dominion; and he ſhall reign till his conqueſt be univerſal and compleat; ſhall reign till death be not only ſtripped of its trophies, but rendered ſubſervient to his triumphs;—till all his purpoſes for his Father's glory and his own be fully accompliſhed. ver. 24—26.

But O! who can expreſs the joy and glory of that day! when Chriſt ſhall give up the kingdom to the Father, and preſent unto him all its faithful ſubjects, transformed into his own image; a beautiful and ſplendid church indeed, for ever to be the object of the divine complacence; for ever to dwell in the divine preſence, in a ſtate of the greateſt nearneſs to God, who ſhall then be all in all! ver. 27, 28. Well may the expectation of this illuſtrious period chear the Chriſtian under his greateſt extremities, and make him of all men the moſt happy; when otherwiſe, on account of his ſufferings in the fleſh, he might ſeem of all men the moſt miſerable. ver. 29. Well may this his rejoicing in Chriſt Jeſus,—that ſacred oath which this perſecuted and diſtreſſed Apoſtle with ſo ſublime a ſpirit here uſes, encourage him to go on, though he be daily dying; (ver. 31.) though he were to encounter the moſt ſavage of mankind, and death itſelf in its moſt dreadful forms. Well may this knowledge of God, of his gracious purpoſes, and of his exalted Son, awaken us to righteouſneſs, and deliver us from the bondage of ſin. ver. 32, 34.

God Almighty enable us to retain theſe noble principles of doctrine and action, and to guard againſt thoſe evil communications, thoſe ſceptical and licentious notions. which would corrupt our ſpirits; which would enervate every generous ſpark kindled and animated by the Goſpel; and by bounding our views within the narrow circle of mortal life, degrade us from the anticipations of angelic ſeilicity, to the purſuits of brutal gratification. ver. 33.

We may learn from this incomparable diſcourſe of the Apoſtle to curb that vain curioſity, which is ſo ready in matters of divine revelations to break out in an unbecoming petulance; and where we are ſure that God declares the thing, let us leave it to him to overcome every difficulty that may ſeem to attend the manner in which it ſhall be effected. ver. 35. Nothing may be more uſeful for the conquering this weakneſs than to obſerve the operations of God in the works of nature, where he giveth to every ſeed, whether animal or vegetable, ſuch a body as ſhall pleaſe him. Each is proper for its ſphere, and beautiful in its connection and order, though the degree of their glory be different; yea, and thus all the diverſity of glory, which ſhall at laſt be apparent among the children of God,—even the children of the reſurrection, ſhall ſerve to illuſtrate the divine wiſdom, and goodneſs, and faithfulneſs. ver. 38—40.

The alterations and proceſs made in every inſtance will indeed be wonderful, when this mortal puts on immortality, and this corruptible puts on incorruption! O let us for ever adore the divine goodneſs, that when, by our relation to the firſt Adam, we were under a ſentence of condemnation and death, He was pleaſed, in his infinite mercy to appoint, that we ſhould ſtand related to Chriſt, as the ſecond Adam, in ſo happy a bond, that by him we might recover what we had loſt in the former; yea, and far more; ſo that, as we have borne the image of the earthy, we might as ſurely bear the image of the heavenly. ver. 47—53. May we all earneſtly aſpire after his bleſſedneſs, and remember, that our bearing the image of his holineſs, is inſeparably connected with the hope of ſo glorious a privilege!

Let us therefore endeavour, by cultivating holineſs in all its branches, to maintain this hope in all its ſpirit and energy; longing for that glorious day, when, in the utmoſt ſtrength of the prophetic expreſſion, Death ſhall be ſwallowed up in victory; and millions of voices, after the long ſilence of the grave, ſhall burſt out at once into that triumphant ſong, O death! where is thy ſting?—O grave! where is thy victory? ver. 55, 56. And when we ſee death diſarmed, and the terrors of the law ſilenced, let us bleſs God for Jeſus Chriſt, by whom the precepts of the law were perfectly ſulfilled, and its penalty endured, that ſo we might not only be delivered from the curſe, but called to inherit the bleſſing. Let it be conſidered as an engagement to univerſal obedience; and in the aſſurance that whatever other labours may be fruſtrated, thoſe in the Lord ſhall never be vain, Let gratitude and intereſt concur to render us ſteadfaſt, immoveable, and continually active in his ſervice. ver. 54—58.

Chap. XVI. Ver. 2. Upon the firſt day of the week] Beza obſerves, here, that Baſil joined theſe words, upon the firſt day of the week, to the preceding clauſe; which he reads thus, Now concerning the collection for the ſaints, even ſo do ye upon the firſt day of the week. According to this reading, the following word will expreſs, not what he adviſes to be done on that day, but previouſly the week before, in order to prepare for the collections which were to be made at their uſual meetings for public worſhip, on the firſt day of every week. The argument drawn from hence for the religious obſervation of the firſt day of the week, in theſe primitive churches of Corinth and Galatia, is too obvious to need any illuſtration, and yet too important to be paſſed by in an intire ſilence. The word θησαυρίζων ſignifies properly "putting into the common treaſury;" treaſuring it up in the common ſtock; for it is certain the Apoſtle directs that they ſhould every Lord's day bring to the congregation what their charity had laid aſide the foregoing week, as their gain came in; that there it might be put into ſome public box appointed for that purpoſe, or the officers' hands. For if they only laid it aſide at home, there would nevertheleſs be need of a collection when he came. See Luke xxiv. 1. John xx. 1. Matth. xxviii. 1. Ward, Doddridge, and Locke.

Verr. 3. And when I come, &c.] When I come, whomſoever you ſhall approve, them will I ſend with letters, to carry your liberality, &c. Wat. MS, and Locke. The Apoſtle's ſenſe juſtifies the preſent manner of reading; he telling them here, that finding their collection ready when he came, he would write by thoſe they ſhould think fit to employ in ſending it, or go himſelf with them, if it ſhould be thought convenient. There needed no approbation of their meſſengers to him by their letters, when he was preſent; and if the Corinthians, by their letters, approved of them to the ſaints at Jeruſalem, how could St. Paul ſay that he would ſend them?

Ver. 4. And if] But if, MS.

5 Now I will come unto you, when I ſhall paſs through Macedonia: for I do paſs through Macedonia.

6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey, whitherſoever I go.

7 For I will not ſee you now by the way; but I truſt to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit.

8 But I will tarry at Epheſus until Pentecoſt.

9 For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adverſaries.

10 Now if Timotheus come, ſee that he may be with you without fear: for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I alſo do.

11 Let no man therefore deſpiſe him: but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren.

12 As touching our brother Apollos, I greatly deſired him to come unto you, with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come when he ſhall have convenient time.

13 Watch ye, ſtand faſt in the faith, quit you like men, be ſtrong.

14 Let all your things be done with charity.

15 I beſeech you, brethren, (ye know the houſe of Stephanas, that it is the firſt-fruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themſelves to the miniſtry of the ſaints,)

16 That ye ſubmit yourſelves unto ſuch, and to every one that helpeth with us and laboureth.

17 I am glad of the coming of Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus: for that which was lacking on your part, they have ſupplied.

18 For they have refreſhed my ſpirit and your's: therefore acknowledge ye them that are ſuch.

19 The churches of Aſia ſalute you. Aquila and Priſcilla ſalute you much in the Lord, with the church which is in their houſe.

20 All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with an holy kiſs.

21 The ſalutation of me Paul, with mine own hand.

22 If any man love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, let him be Anathema, Maran-atha.

Ver. 5. For I do paſs through Macedonia] For I am juſt upon my journey through Macedonia. Macedonia was not the direct way from Epheſus to Corinth. It ſeems by the ſecond Epiſtle to the Corinthians, written a few months after this, that St. Paul was either in Macedonia, or on his way thither; (2 Cor. i. 16.) from whence it appears, that he had a ſecret purpoſe of ſeeing Corinth in his way to, as well as from Macedonia: but he does not expreſs this purpoſe here; ſo that we know not how it was ſignified to them, as from the text laſt mentioned it ſeems that it was. Doddridge.

Ver. 8. But I will tarry at Epheſus, &c.] This is a plain intimation that St. Paul was now at Epheſus, and conſequently that the inſcription added at the end of the Epiſtle, which tells us it was written from Philippi, is very far from being authentic. It ſhould be remembered, that no credit is to be given to any of theſe additions, which have been very preſumptuouſly made, and very imprudently retained. Dr. Waterland and the MS concur in this obſervation. See Mill, Wetſtein, Calmet, and Doddridge.

Ver. 9. For a great door and effectual, &c.] Some think that here is an alluſion to the door of the Circus, from whence chariots were let out when the races were to begin; and that the word 'Αντικείμενοι, ſignifies the ſame as antagoniſts, with whom the Apoſtle was to contend, as in a courſe. Acts xix. 20, &c. This oppoſition rendered his preſence more neceſſary, to preſerve thoſe who were already converted, and to increaſe the number, if God ſhould bleſs his miniſtry. See Doddridge, Beza, and Grotius.

Ver. 11. But conduct him forth, &c.] But bring him on his journey, &c. MS. The original words of the laſt clauſe are ſomething ambiguous; but the moſt natural ſenſe appears to be, "For I expect him here with the other brethren, who are now the companions of his journey," Accordingly it ſeems probable, that Timothy came to Epheſus before St. Paul was driven out of it by the tumult; and that the Apoſtle being obliged to leave that city in ſo abrupt a manner, deſired Timothy to ſtay a while after him, to ſettle the affairs of that important church more compleatly than he had an opportunity of doing. See 1 Tim. i. 3.

Ver. 12. Our brother] There are few, perhaps, who need be told, yet it may be convenient, once for all, to remark, That in the Apoſtle's time brother was the ordinary compellation which Chriſtians uſed one to another. The brethren here mentioned ſeem to be Stephanas, and thoſe others who came with a meſſage or letter to St. Paul from the church of Corinth, by whom he returned this Epiſtle in anſwer. See Locke, and on Acts xi. 26.

Ver. 13. Stand faſt, &c.] There is no need of ſeeking a different ſenſe of each word in this verſe. If there be any difference, ἀνδρίζεσθε may refer to a ſtrength of reſolution; κραταιοῦσθε to that chearful and courageous expectation of an happy event, which the conſciouſneſs of ſo good a cauſe would naturally adminiſter. The meaning of the next verſe is, "Let all your affairs be tranſacted in love, and under the influence of that noble principle of unfeigned benevolence, which I have ſo largely deſcribed in ch. xiii." The Apoſtle's main deſign being to put an end to the faction and diviſion which the falſe Apoſtle had made amongſt them, it is no wonder that we find unity and charity ſo much and ſo often preſſed in this and the ſecond Epiſtle. See Beza, Mintert, and Locke.

Ver. 15, 16. I beſeech you, brethren, &c.] Dr. Heylin renders theſe verſes thus: Ye know that the family of Stephanas is, &c.—I beſeech you then, my brethren, ver. 16. that you pay all deference to them, and all others who like them aſſiſt us in our labours. Doddridge reads, I beſeech you, brethren, as ye know the houſhold of Stephanas, that it is the firſt-fruits of Achaica, and as they have ſet themſelves to miniſtering to the ſaints, ver. 16. that you ſubject yourſelves to ſuch, and to every aſſociate in that work and labour. The 15th verſe ſeems to imply, that it was the generous care of the whole family to aſſiſt their fellow-Chriſtians, ſo that there was not a member of it which did not do its part.

Ver. 17. Fortunatus] This worthy man ſurvived St. Paul a conſiderable time; for it appears from the epiſtle of Clement to the Corinthians, ſect. 59. that he was the meſſenger of the church at Corinth to that of Rome, by whom Clement ſent back that invaluable epiſtle. See Archbp. Wake's Epiſtles of the apoſtolical fathers.

Ver. 18. For they have refreſhed my ſpirit, &c.] By removing thoſe ſuſpicions and fears which were on both ſides.

Ver. 22. Aquila and Priſcilla ſalute you much] They had formerly made ſome abode at Corinth, and there St. Paul's acquaintance with them commenced, Acts xviii. 1, 2. It is therefore no wonder that they were particular in their ſalutations.

Ver. 22. Anathema, Maran-atha] When the Jews loſt the power of life and death, they uſed nevertheleſs to pronounce an anathema on perſons, who ſhould have been executed according to the Moſaic law; and ſuch a perſon became an anathema, or cheren, or accurſed,—for the expreſſions are equivalent. They had a full perſuaſion that the curſe would not be in vain, and indeed it appears they expected that ſome judgement, correſponding to that which the law pronounced, would befal the offender: For inſtance, that a man to be ſtoned, would be killed by the falling of a ſtone, or other heavy body upon him;—a man to be ſtrangled, would be choked; or one whom the law ſentenced to the flames, would be burned in his houſe,—and the like. Now to expreſs their faith that God would one way or another, and probably in ſome remarkable way interpoſe, to add that efficacy to his own ſentence which they could not give it, it is moſt likely they uſed the Syriac words Maran-atha; that is, "The Lord cometh;" or, "He will ſurely and quickly come, to 23 The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you.

24 My love be with you all in Chriſt Jeſus. Amen.

The firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians was written from Philippi, by Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, and Timotheus.

Ver. 23. Rom. xvi. 20.

put this ſentence in execution, and to ſhew that the perſon on whom it falls, is indeed anathema,—accurſed" In alluſion to this, when the Apoſtle was ſpeaking of a ſecret alienation from Chriſt, maintained under the forms of Chriſtianity, (which perhaps might be the caſe among many of the Corinthians, and much more probably may be ſo among us,) as this was not a crime capable of being convicted and cenſured in the Chriſtian church, he reminds them that the Lord Jeſus Chriſt will come at length, and find it out and puniſh it in a proper manner. The Apoſtle choſe to write with his own hand this weighty ſentence, and inſert between his general ſalutation and benediction, that it might be the more attentively regarded. See on John ix. 22. Rom. vii. 6, 7. Doddridge, Taylor, Grotius, Calmet, and Bp. Patrick on Deut. xxvii. 15. Mr. Locke obſerves, "This being ſo different a ſentence from any of thoſe written with St. Paul's own hand in any of his other Epiſtles, may it not with great probability be underſtood to have an immediate reference to the falſe Apoſtle, to whom St. Paul imputes all the diſorders in this church, and of whom he ſpeaks not much leſs ſeverely, 2 Cor. xi. 13—15.?"

Ver. 24. My love be with you all, &c.] When we conſider what an alienation of affection ſome of theſe Corinthians had expreſſed with reſpect to our Apoſtle, this declaration of tender regard to them all, without any exception, is ſo much the more affectionate, and fully diſplays the benevolent diſpoſition of his mind. With reſpect to the ſubſcription of this Epiſtle, ſee on ver. 8.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XVI.

The example of St. Paul before us, ſhould teach miniſters to be ready to promote charitable collections for the relief of poor Chriſtians. They ſhould frequently exhort their hearers to do good and to communicate; reminding them that their contributions ought to bear a proportion to the degree in which God hath been pleaſed to proſper them. We ſee an evident reference to the ſtated aſſemblies of the church on the firſt day of the week, in this early age, and it is a proper duty of that day, to deviſe and execute liberal things, according to our reſpective abilities. ver. 1, 2.

The prudent caution of St. Paul, as to the management of pecuniary affairs, is worthy the attention of the miniſters of the Goſpel; and may teach them to take care, not only that they ſatiſfy their own conſciences in the fidelity of their tranſactions, but alſo that they provide things honeſt in the ſight of all men. ver. 3, 4. The Apoſtle's courage in making the oppoſition he met with at Epheſus a reaſon for his continuance there, may inſtruct us, not to ſtudy our own eaſe in the choice of our abode; but rather to prefer thoſe circumſtances, however diſagreeable in themſelves, wherein we may be providentially led to do moſt for the advancement of religion in the world. ver. 8.

His care that his young friend Timothy might be as eaſy as poſſible, conſtitutes likewiſe a very amiable part of his character, and ſuggeſts in a manner well worthy of notice, how careful private Chriſtians ſhould be, that they do not terrify and diſtreſs the minds of thoſe who are entering on the miniſterial office. ver. 10, 11. A faithful diſpoſition to labour in the work of the Lord ought to command reſpect; yet ſometimes, as in the inſtance of Apollos, even that diligence may be ſo liable to miſrepreſentation, that it may be the wiſdom of miniſters to abſent themſelves from places, where they have many to careſs and admire them. On the whole, the great buſineſs of life is, to glorify God in doing our beſt for promoting the happineſs of mankind; and no ſelf-denial ought to ſeem hard to us, while we keep that glorious end in view. ver. 12.

However the particular trials of Chriſtians may vary in different ages, the ſame works in general demand their diligence; the ſame enemies their watchfulneſs, the ſame difficulties their courage and fortitude: nor will they ever be more likely to perform, to reſiſt, and to endure well, than when charity reigns in their hearts, and preſides over the whole of their behaviour. ver. 13, 14.

We owe our ſincere thanks to the Author of all good, when he raiſes up the ſpirits of his ſervants to any diſtinguiſhed activity and zeal in his cauſe. Chriſtians, of ſtanding ſuperior to their brethren, ought to emulate ſuch a character; and when they do ſo with genuine marks of becoming modeſty, and upright views, all proper reſpect ſhould be paid to them: Eſpecially to thoſe who are honoured with, and labour faithfully in the miniſterial office. To ſuch, let others ſubmit themſelves in love; not, indeed, as to the lords of their faith, which even the Apoſtles pretended not to be; but as friends whom they eſteem and reverence, ever tenderly ſolicitous to ſecure their comfort, and increaſe their uſefulneſs. ver. 15, 16.

We ſee how much the Apoſtle was concerned to promote mutual friendſhip among the diſciples of our bleſſed Lord; how kindly he delivers the ſalutations of one and another. It becomes us to remember each other with cordial regard; and in imitation of this wiſe example, to do all we can to cultivate a good underſtanding among our Chriſtian brethren, and to abhor that diſpoſition to ſow diſcord, which has been ſo fatally ſucceſsful in producing envyings, and ſtrife, and every evil work. ver. 19, 20.

To conclude all; Let us lay up in our memory, and often review this aweful ſentence, this anathema maran-atha, which, to give it the greater weight, the Apoſtle records with his own hand: Be it ever remembered, that profeſſing Chriſtians, who do not ſincerely love their Maſter, lie under the heavieſt curſe which an Apoſtle can pronounce, or God inflict. ver. 21, 22. May ſuch unhappy perſons take the alarm, and labour to obtain a more ingenuous temper; ere the Lord, whom they neglect, and againſt whom they entertain a ſecret enmity, deſcend from heaven with inſupportable terror, and pronounce the anathema with his own lips, in circumſtances which ſhall for ever cut off all hope, and all poſſibility of its being reverſed. If his ſolemn voice pronounce, his almighty hand will immediately execute it: How will they be caſt down to deſtruction, as in a moment! how will they be utterly conſumed with terrors! To prevent ſo dreadful an end of our high profeſſion, of our exalted hopes, may the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with us! Amen.

SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

CORINTHIANS.

CHAP. I.

The apoſtle encourageth them againſt troubles, by the comforts and deliverances which God had given him, as in all his afflictions, ſo particularly in his late danger in Aſia: and calling both his own conſcience and their's to witneſs of his ſincere manner of preaching the immutable truth of the goſpel, he excuſeth his not coming to them, as proceeding not of lightneſs, but of his lenity towards them.

PAUL, an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the ſaints which are in all Achaia:

2 Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

3 Bleſſed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort;

4 Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourſelves are comforted of God.

Ver. 1. Epheſ. i. 1. Phil. i. 1. Col. i. 2.—V. 2. Rom. i. 7. Gal. i. 3.—V. 3. Ephes. i. 3. 1 Pet. i. 3.

St. Paul's firſt Epiſtle produced different effects amongſt the Corinthians: Many of them entered into themſelves; they excommunicated the inceſtuous man, requeſted St. Paul's return with tears, and vindicated him and his office againſt the falſe teacher and his adherents. Others of them ſtill adhered to that adverſary of St. Paul, expreſly denied his apoſtolical office, and even furniſhed themſelves with pretended arguments from that Epiſtle. He had formerly promiſed to take a journey from Epheſus to Corinth; thence to viſit the Macedonians, and return from them to Corinth: But the unhappy ſtate of the Corinthian church made him alter his intention, ſince he found he muſt have treated them with ſeverity, ch. i. 15—23. Hence his adverſaries partly argued, 1ſt, that St. Paul was irreſolute and unſteady, and therefore could not be a prophet; 2dly, the improbability of his ever coming to Corinth again, ſince he was afraid of them. Such was the ſtate of the Corinthian church, when St. Paul, after his departure from Epheſus, having viſited Macedonia, received an account of the above particulars from Titus, ch. vii. 5, 6. and therefore wrote them his ſecond Epiſtle about the end of the ſame year, or the beginning of 58. The contents of this Epiſtle are theſe: Firſt, he gives the Corinthians an account of his ſufferings to that time, and of the comfort he derived from meditating on the reſurrection; ch. i. 1—11. Secondly, he vindicates himſelf againſt thoſe, who would not conſider him as a true Apoſtle, becauſe he had altered his reſolutions, ch. i. 12—ii. 4. Thirdly, he forgives the inceſtuous man, and tells the Corinthians how much he longed for their amendment, ch. ii. 5—13. Fourthly, he treats of the office committed to him of preaching the redemption, and highly prefers it to preaching the law; to which probably his adverſaries had made a great pretence. They had ridiculed his ſufferings:—He ſhews that they are no diſgrace to the Goſpel, or its miniſters; and here he gives a ſhort abſtract of the doctrine he preaches; Ch. ii. 14.—to the end of ch. v. Fifthly, he ſhews it to be his office, not only to preach the redemption by Chriſt, but to inculcate certain duties, and particularly that of flying from idolatry;—an oblique cenſure of thoſe who attended the idol feaſts: ch. vi. Sixthly, he endeavours once more to win their confidence, by telling them how affectionately he was diſpoſed towards them, and rejoiced at their amendment, ch. vii. Seventhly, he exhorts them to a liberal collection for the Chriſtians in Judea; ch. viii. to ix. 15. Eighthly, he vindicates himſelf againſt thoſe who thought him deficient in the evidences of his apoſtleſhip, and imputed his caution when at Corinth to his conſciouſneſs of not being a true Apoſtle. Ch. x. to the end of the Epiſtle. See Lardner, Michaelis, and Locke.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. Timothy our brother] That is, either in the common faith, (ſee Rom. i. 13. and 1 Cor. xvi. 13.) or, brother in the work of the miniſtry. See Rom. xvi. 21. St. Paul may be ſuppoſed to have given Timothy the title of brother here for dignity ſake, to procure him a reputation above his age amongſt the Corinthians, to whom he had before ſent him with ſome kind of authority to rectify their diſorders. Timothy was but a young man when St. Paul wrote his firſt Epiſtle to him, as appears 1 Tim. iv. 12. which Epiſtle, by univerſal conſent, was written to Timothy after he had been at Corinth, and in the opinion of ſome very learned men, not leſs than eight years after; and therefore his calling him brother here, and joining him with himſelf in writing this Epiſtle, may be to let the Corinthians ſee, that though he who had been ſent to them was ſo young, yet he was one whom St. Paul thought fit to treat as an equal. Achaia was the country in which Corinth ſtood. Locke.

Ver. 3. Bleſſed be God] St. Paul begins with juſtifying his former letter to them, which had afflicted them, (ſee ch. vii. 7, 8.) by telling them that he thanks God for his deliverance out of his afflictions, becauſe it enables him to comfort them, by the example both of his affliction and deliverance; acknowledging the obligation he had to them and others, for their prayers and thanks for his deliverance: Which he preſumes they could not but put up for him, ſince his conſcience bears him witneſs (which was his comfort) that in his carriage to all men, and to them more eſpecially, he had been direct and ſincere, without any ſelfiſh or carnal intereſt; and that what he wrote to them had no other deſign, than what lay open, and they read in his words,—and did alſo acknowledge, and he doubted not but they ſhould always acknowledge, (part of them doing ſo already) that he was the man in whom they gloried, as they ſhall be his glory in the day of the Lord. ver. 3—14. From what St. Paul ſays in this paſſage,—which, if read attentively, will appear to be written with great addreſs,—it may be gathered, that the oppoſite faction endeavoured to evade the force of the former Epiſtle, by ſuggeſting, that whatever he might pretend, St. Paul was a cunning, artificial, ſelf-intereſted man, and had ſome hidden deſign in it; which accuſation appears in other parts alſo of this Epiſtle, as ch. iv. 2, 5. It is obſervable, that eleven of St. Paul's thirteen Epiſtles begin with exclamations of joy, praiſe, and thankſgiving. As ſoon as he thought of a Chriſtian church planted in one place or another, there ſeems to have been a flow of moſt lively affection accompanying the idea, in which all ſenſibility of his, or of their temporal afflictions was ſwallowed up, and the fulneſs of his heart muſt vent itſelf in ſuch chearful, exalted, and devout language. See Locke, Doddridge, and Beza.

Ver. 4. Who comforteth us] It is certain that the mention of theſe experiences muſt have a powerful tendency to conciliate the regard of 5 For as the ſufferings of Chriſt abound in us, ſo our conſolation alſo aboundeth by Chriſt.

6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for your conſolation and ſalvation, which is effectual in the enduring of the ſame ſufferings, which we alſo ſuffer: or whether we be comforted, it is for your conſolation and ſalvation.

7 And our hope of you is ſtedfaſt, knowing that as ye are partakers of the ſufferings, ſo ſhall ye be alſo of the conſolation.

8 For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Aſia, that we were preſſed out of meaſure, above ſtrength, inſomuch that we deſpaired even of life:

9 But we had the ſentence of death in ourſelves, that we ſhould not truſt in ourſelves, but in God which raiſeth the dead:

10 Who delivered us from ſo great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we truſt that he will yet deliver us;

11 Ye alſo helping together by prayer for us, that for the gift beſtowed upon us by the means of many perſons, thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

12 For our rejoicing is this, the teſtimony of our conſcience, that in ſimplicity and godly ſincerity, not with fleſhly wiſdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our converſation in the world, and more abundantly to you-wards.

13 For we write none other things unto you, than what ye read or acknowledge; and I truſt ye ſhall acknowledge even to the end;

14 As alſo ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your rejoicing, even as ye alſo are our's, in the day of the Lord Jeſus.

15 And in this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a ſecond benefit:

16 And to paſs by you into Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way towards Judea.

17 When I therefore was thus minded, did I uſe lightneſs? or the things that I purpoſe, do I purpoſe according to the fleſh, of the Corinthians to St. Paul, and ſuch an introduction to his Epiſtle as the whole of this before us muſt naturally prejudice them ſtrongly in his favour. Some think that the laſt clauſe of this verſe refers plainly to the comfort which the repentance of the inceſtuous perſon gave St. Paul, after the affliction he had endured on his account. See ch. vii. 7, But it ſeems more natural to underſtand it of that general conſolation ariſing from the pardon of ſin, an intereſt in God, an aſſurance that nothing ſhould ſeparate him from Chriſt; that afflictions ſhould co-operate for his advantage, and that a crown of glory, heightened by theſe trials, ſhould cloſe the ſcene. He frequently inſiſts on theſe topicks in his Epiſtles, and none ſurely can be more important and delightful. See Doddridge, Locke, and Whitby.

Ver. 6. Which is effectual] Effected. MS. and Wat. Inſtead of ſalvation, Mr. Locke reads relief; as it ſignifies here only, ſays he, deliverance from their preſent ſorrow.

Ver. 7. And our hope of you is ſteadfaſt] Theſe words in ſeveral good MSS are put in connection with the firſt clauſe of ver. 6. and ſo the verſion will run thus: Whether we be afflicted, it is in ſubſerviency to your conſolation and relief, which is effectually wrought out by the patient enduring of the ſame ſufferings which we alſo undergo, and our hope concerning you is ſteadfaſt: or whether we be comforted, it is for your conſolation and relief; knowing that as you are partakers of the ſufferings, ſo alſo of the conſolation. The repetition of the words conſolation and redemption ſhews how agreeable the thought was to him. See Beza, Grotius, and Homberg.

Ver. 8. Our trouble—in Aſia] Some have thought, that this may refer to the perſecutions at Lyſtra, where St. Paul's danger had been extreme, and he had been recovered by miracle: Acts xiv. 19, 20. But as that happened ſo long before the viſit to Corinth, in which he planted the church there, Acts xviii. 1. it ſeems more probable, that he either refers to ſome oppoſition which he met with in his journey through Galatia and Phrygia, Acts xviii. 23. of which no particular account has reached us; or rather, to the tumult raiſed againſt him at Epheſus by Demetrius, Acts xix. 29, 30. See Whitby, Cradock, and Doddridge.

Ver. 11. You alſo helping together by prayer] "I have this confidence in God's continual care; and it is the more chearful, as I perſuade myſelf you are and will be aſſiſting us by your prayers, that ſo the favour obtained for us by the importunate prayers of many, may be acknowledged by the thankſgiving of many on our account;—as nothing can be more reaſonable than that mercies obtained by prayer, ſhould be owned in praiſe." See Doddridge and Heylin.

Ver. 12. In ſimplicity] Plain-heartedneſs; not only meaning well on the whole, but declining an over-artful way of proſecuting a good end. What is meant by fleſhly wiſdom may be ſeen ch. ii. 5. St. Paul's working with his own hands for his maintenance among the Corinthians (Acts xviii. 3. Cor. ix 15.) which he did not every where, muſt be a convincing proof of what he obſerves in the laſt clauſe of this verſe. See Locke and Doddridge. Inſtead of by the grace of God, &c. Dr. Waterland reads, with the gifts of God, or that which God gives, we have converſed, &c. Mr. Locke obſerves, that ἐν χάριτι Θεῦ, in the favour of God, is the ſame with the favour of God that is with me; that is, "by God's favourable aſſiſtance."

Ver. 13. What ye read and acknowledge] What ye know and acknowledge. Doddridge. Than what, when you read, you acknowledge. Wall's Critic. Notes. "I take the ſenſe to be, ſays Dr. Heylin, that he meant not by his letters to inſinuate any thing more than was plainly expreſſed, and appeared at the firſt view of them, agreeably to the declaration he had made in the verſe before."

Ver. 14. That we are your rejoicing] That I am your glory, as you alſo will be mine. The Apoſtle here ſignifies, that part of them who adhered to and owned him as their teacher; in which ſenſe glorying is much uſed in theſe Epiſtles to the Corinthians, on occaſion of the ſeveral partiſans boaſting, ſome that they were of Paul, and others that they were of Apollos, &c. See Locke, and Heylin.

Ver. 15. And in this confidence I was minded] I purpoſed, MS. So ver. 17. The next thing which St. Paul juſtifies, is his not coming to them: He had promiſed to call on the Corinthians in his way to Macedonia, but failed; this his oppoſers would have to proceed from levity in him, or a mind regulating itſelf wholly by carnal intereſt. (ver. 17.) To which he anſwers, that God himſelf having confirmed him amongſt them by the unction and earneſt of his Spirit, in the miniſtry of the Goſpel of his Son,—whom St. Paul had preached to them ſteadily the ſame, without any the leaſt variation, or unſaying any thing he had at any time delivered,—they could have no ground to ſuſpect him to be an unſtable uncertain man, who could not be depended on in what he ſaid to them: ver. 15—22. In the next place, with a very ſolemn aſſeveration he profeſſes, that it was to ſpare them that he came not to them. ver. 23—ch. ii. 3. He gives another reaſon, ver. 12, 13. why he went on to Macedonia, without coming to Corinth, as he had purpoſed; namely, the uncertainty he was in, by the not coming of Titus, concerning their diſpoſition at Corinth. Having mentioned his journey to Macedonia, he takes notice of the ſucceſs which God gave to him there and every where, declaring of what conſequence his preaching was, both to the ſalvation and condemnation of thoſe who received or rejected it; profeſſing again his ſincerity and diſintereſtedneſs, not without a ſevere reflection on their falſe apoſtle. ver. 14—17.

By the word χάριν, in the verſe before us, which our Bibles tranſlate benefit, or grace, it is plain the Apoſtle means his being preſent among them a ſecond time, without giving them any grief or diſpleaſure. He had been with them before almoſt two years together, with ſatisfaction and kindneſs; he intended them another viſit, but it was, he ſays, that they might have the like gratification; that is, the like ſatisfaction in his company a ſecond time: which is to the ſame purport with what he ſays, ch. ii. 1. Locke.

Ver. 16. And to paſs by you into Macedonia] See on 1 Cor. xvi. 7.

Ver. 17—20. Yea, yea, and nay, nay?] The Vulg. with other ancient verſions, and ſome MSS, have not the terms doubled, as in the preſent Greek; but, as in the ſequel, only yes and no: which terms, put together as here, argue inconſiſtency and falſhood. The that with me there ſhould be yea, yea, and nay, nay?

18 But as God is true, our word toward you was not yea and nay.

19 For the Son of God, Jeſus Chriſt, who was preached among you by us, even by me and Silvanus, and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea.

20 For all the promiſes of God in him are yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us.

21 Now he which ſtabliſheth us with you in Chriſt, and hath anointed us, is God:

22 Who hath alſo ſealed us, and given the earneſt of the Spirit in our hearts.

23 Moreover, I call God for a record upon my ſoul, that to ſpare you I came not as yet unto Corinth.

24 Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye ſtand.

Ver. 18. Or, preaching.—V. 21. 1 John ii. 20, 27.—V. 22. Epheſ. i. 13. iv. 30. 2 Tim. ii. 19. Rev. ii. 17. Ch. v. 5. Eph. i. 14.—V. 23. Rom. i. 9. 1 Cor. iv. 21. Ch. ii. 3. xii. 20. xiii. 2, 10.—V. 24. 1 Cor. iii. 5. 1 Pet. v. 3. Rom. xi. 20.

ſenſe of theſe verſes is, "I did not change my deſign through levity, nor did I purpoſe firſt one thing and then the contrary, as ſelfiſh views might determine me. ver. 18. As God is true, we have never prevaricated with you: ver. 19. For what I, Sylvanus, and Timothy have preached concerning Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God, is not inconſiſtent, but invariably the ſame: ver. 20. For all the promiſes of God are ratified in and verified by him to the glory of God by our preaching." Nothing can really render the promiſes of God more certain than they are; but God's giving them to us through Chriſt, aſſures us, that they are indeed his promiſes; as in Chriſt there is ſuch a real evidence of his converſing with men; and as the wonders which God hath actually wrought in the incarnation, life, reſurrection, and aſcenſion of his Son, (facts in themſelves much more wonderful than any of the glorious conſequences to follow) tend greatly to confirm our faith, and make it eaſier for us to believe ſuch illuſtrious promiſes as thoſe which are given us, the very greatneſs of which might otherwiſe have been an impediment to our faith, and have created a ſuſpicion, not whether God would have performed what he had promiſed, but whether ſuch promiſes were really given us. See Heylin, Beza, Wetſtein, and Doddridge.

Ver. 21. Now he which ſtabliſheth us] Who maketh us ſteady; in oppoſition to the charge of inconſtancy, which he complains of, ver. 17. The Greek of anointed is χρίσας, that is, "hath given us of the ſame Spirit which renders Jeſus the Chriſt. See Heylin, and the next note.

Ver. 22. Who hath alſo ſealed us] Mr. Locke ſays, that by anointed, ver. 21. is meant, "ſet apart to be an Apoſtle by an extraordinary call." Prieſts and prophets were ſet apart by anointing, as well as kings. Sealed refers to the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, which are an evidence of the truth he brings from God, as a ſeal is of a letter. The earneſt means that of eternal life; for the Spirit is mentioned as a pledge of that in more places than one. Comp. ch. v. 5. Epheſ. i. 13, 14. All theſe are arguments to ſatisfy the Corinthians that St. Paul was not, nor could be, a man who minded not what he ſaid, but as it ſerved his turn. His reaſoning, ver. 18—22. whereby he would convince the Corinthians that he was neither fickle nor unſteady, being a little obſcure by reaſon of the brevity of his ſtile, the following ſummary will ſet it in a clear light, "God hath ſet me apart to the miniſtry of the Goſpel by an extraordinary call, has atteſted my miſſion by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, has given me the earneſt of eternal life in my heart by his Spirit, and has confirmed me amongſt you in preaching the Goſpel, which is all uniform and of a piece;—as I have preached it to you, without varying in the leaſt; and there, to the glory of God, have ſhewn that all the promiſes concur, and are unalterably certain in Chriſt. Having therefore never faltered in any thing which I have ſaid to you, and having all theſe atteſtations of being under the ſpecial direction and guidance of God himſelf, who is unalterably true, I cannot be ſuſpected of dealing doubly with you in any thing relating to my miniſtry." See Locke, Whitby, Saurin's Serm. tom. xi. p. 83, &c. and Tillotſon's Serm. vol. v. ſerm. 4. p. 139.

Ver. 23, 24. Moreover, I call God to record] To witneſs, MS and and Wat. Nothing but the great importance of St. Paul's vindicating his character to ſuch a church, would have juſtified the ſolemnity of an oath of this kind. The meaning of theſe verſes is as follows: "With reſpect to that change in my purpoſe of coming to you, which ſome would repreſent as an inſtance of a contrary conduct, I call God to witneſs, and declare to you, even as I have hope he will have mercy on my ſoul, that it was not becauſe I ſlighted my friends, or feared mine enemies, but out of real tenderneſs, and with a deſire to ſpare you the uneaſineſs, which I thought I muſt in that caſe have been obliged to give you,—that I came not as yet to Corinth: ver. 24. Not that I pretend to ſuch a dominion over your faith, as to require you to believe what I have taught you, without coming to you, when I am expected there to maintain and make it good;—for it is by that faith you ſtand; But I forbore to come, as one concerned to preſerve and help forward your joy, which I am tender of, and therefore declined coming to you, whilſt I thought you in an eſtate which would require a ſeverity from me that would trouble you." It is plain that St. Paul's doctrine had been oppoſed by ſome of them at Corinth; (1 Cor. 15, 12.) his apoſtleſhip queſtioned; (1 Cor. ix. 1, 2. 2 Cor. xiii. 13.) he himſelf triumphed over, as if he durſt not come; (1 Cor. iv, 18.) they ſaying his letters were weighty and powerful, but his bodily preſence weak, and his ſpeech contemptible; 2 Cor. x. 10. This being the ſtate in which his reputation was then at Corinth, and he having promiſed to come to them, 1 Cor. xvi. 5. he could not but think it neceſſary to excuſe his failing them, by reaſons which ſhould be both convincing and kind; ſuch as are contained in the verſes before us. See Doddridge and Locke.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. I.

It is very obſervable how often the great Apoſtle deſcribes and addreſs Chriſtians under the Appellation of ſaints, ver. 1. Let the venerable title be ever fixed and retained in our minds; that ſo we may continually remember the obligations we are under to anſwer it, as we would avoid the guilt and infamy of lying to God and men, by falſely and hypocritically profeſſing the beſt religion, very poſſibly, to the worſt, and undoubtedly to the vaineſt purpoſes: And that we may be excited to a ſanctity becoming this title, let us often think of God, as the Father of mercies, and as the God of all conſolation; and eſpecially let us contemplate him, as aſſuming theſe titles under the character of the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; ver. 3. So ſhall we find our hearts more powerfully engaged to love and truſt in him, and enter into a more intimate acquaintance and frequent converſe with him.

From him may we ſeek conſolation in every diſtreſs: (ver. 4.) conſidering theſe ſupports which we ſo experience, not as given for ourſelves alone, but for others; that we, on the like principles, may conſole them. Miniſters, in particular, ſhould regard them in this view, and rejoice in thoſe tribulations which may render them more capable of comforting ſuch as are in trouble, by thoſe conſolations with which they themſelves have been comforted by God; that ſo the church may be edified, and glorified God in all, by the thankſgiving of many, for mercies obtained in anſwer to united prayers. ver. 11.

Let us particularly remember the ſupport which St. Paul experienced, when he was preſſed above meaſure, and as it ſeemed, quite beyond his ſtrength, ſo as to deſpaire of life,—and received the ſentence of death in itſelf, as what was wiſely appointed to teach him a firmer confidence in God, who raiſeth the dead, ver. 9. Strong as his faith was, it admitted of farther degrees, and the improvement of it was a happy equivalent for all the extremities he ſuffered. He therefore glories, as ſecure of being reſcued from future dangers; ver. 10. Nor was his faith vain, though he afterwards fell by the hand of his enemies, and ſeemed as helpleſs a prey to their malice and rage, as any of the multitudes whoſe blood Nero, or the inſtruments of his cruelty, poured out like water. Death is itſelf the grand reſcue to a good man, which bears him to a ſtate of everlaſting ſecurity; and in this ſenſe, every believer may adopt the Apoſtle's words, and while he acknowledges paſt and preſent, may aſſuredly boaſt of future deliverances.

Happy therefore ſhall we be, if by divine grace enabled at all times to maintain the temper and conduct of Chriſtians; and may confidently rejoice in the teſtimony of our conſciences, that our converſation in the world is in ſimplicity and godly ſincerity; ver. 12. that our ends in religion are great and noble; that our conduct is ſimple and uniform; in a word, that we act as in the ſight of an heart-ſearching God. Then may we look upon the applauſes, or the cenſures of men, as comparatively a very light matter; and may reſt aſſured, if, as with regard to the Apoſtle in the inſtance before us, we ſuffer a malignant breath for a while, to obſcure the luſtre of our character, The day is near, which will reveal it in unclouded glory.

All the promiſes of God, are yea and amen in Chriſt. Let us depend upon it that they will be performed, and make it our great care, that we may be able to ſay we are intereſted through him, in the bleſſings to which they relate. Let there be a proportionable ſteadineſs and conſiſtency in our obedience; nor let our engagements to God be yea and nay, ſince his to us are ſo invariably faithful.—Are we eſtabliſhed in Chriſt? Are we ſealed with the earneſt of the ſpirit in our hearts. Let us acknowledge, that it is God who hath imparted it to us; and let Chriſtians of the greateſt integrity and experience be proportionably humble, rather than by any means elated on account of their ſuperiority to others. ver. 19—22.

We ſee the light in which miniſters ſhould always conſider themſelves, and in which they are to be conſidered by others;—Not as having dominion over the faith of their people, or a right to dictate, by their own authority, what they ſhould believe, or, on the ſame principles, what

CHAP. II.

Having ſhewed the reaſon why he came not to them, he requireth them to forgive and to comfort that excommunicated perſon, even as himſelf alſo, upon his true repentance, had forgiven him: declaring withal why he departed from Troas to Macedonia, and the happy ſucceſs which God gave to his preaching in all places.

BUT I determined this with myſelf, that I would not come again to you in heavineſs.

2 For if I make you ſorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the ſame which is made ſorry by me?

3 And I wrote this ſame unto you, leſt when I came, I ſhould have ſorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.

4 For out of much affliction and anguiſh of heart, I wrote unto you with many tears; not that ye ſhould be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

5 But if any have cauſed grief, he hath not grieved me, but in part: that I may not overcharge you all.

6 Sufficient to ſuch a man is this puniſhment, which was inflicted of many.

7 So that contrariwiſe, ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, leſt perhaps ſuch a one ſhould be ſwallowed up with over-much ſorrow.

8 Wherefore I beſeech you, that ye would confirm your love towards him.

9 For to this end alſo did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things.

10 To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive alſo: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your ſakes forgave I it, in the perſon of Chriſt;

11 Leſt Satan ſhould get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

12 Furthermore, when I came to Troas, to preach Chriſt's goſpel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord, 13 I had no reſt in my ſpirit, becauſe I found not Titus my brother: but, taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia.

14 Now thanks be unto God which always cauſeth us to triumph in Chriſt, and maketh manifeſt the ſavour of his knowledge by us in every place.

what they ſhould do; but as helpers of their joy, (ver. 24.) in conſequence of their being helpers of their piety and obedience. In this view, how amiable and engaging doth the miniſterial office appear! What a friendly aſpect doth it wear upon the happineſs of mankind! and how little true benevolence do they manifeſt, who would expoſe it to ridicule and contempt!

May thoſe who bear that office, be careful that they do not give it the moſt dangerous wound, and abet the evil works of thoſe who deſpiſe and deride it; which yet they will moſt effectually do, if they once appear to form their purpoſes according to the fleſh. ver. 17. Let them with a ſingle eye direct all their adminiſtrations to the glory of God, and the edification of the church; that they may be able to appeal to their hearers, as thoſe who muſt acknowledge, and bear their teſtimony to their uprightneſs. In that caſe, they may confidently look on them as thoſe, in whom they hope to rejoice in the day of the Lord. (ver. 13, 14.) And if, while they purſue theſe ends, they are cenſured as perſons actuated by any mean and leſs worthy principle, let them not be much ſurpriſed or diſcouraged. They ſhare in exerciſes, from which the bleſſed Apoſtle St. Paul was not exempted; as indeed there is no integrity or caution, which can guard any man from the effects of that malice againſt Chriſt and his Goſpel, with which ſome hearts overflow, when they feel themſelves condemned by it.

Chap. II. Ver. 1. But—I would not come again, &c.] "I purpoſed in myſelf, it is true, to come to you again, but I reſolved too that it ſhould be without bringing ſorrow with me." That this is the meaning of this verſe, and not that he would not come to them in ſorrow a ſecond time, is paſt doubt, ſince he had never been with them in ſorrow a firſt time. See ch. i. 15. and Locke.

Ver. 2. But the ſame which is made ſorry by me?] It cannot reaſonably be objected that the ſound part of the church would rejoice him, for even they would be grieved by the neceſſity of the ſeverities inflicted: They would ſympathize with the corrected perſon. And on the other hand, the recovery of offenders would give him more ſenſible joy than any thing elſe; which conſiderations, taken together, will abundantly juſtify this expreſſion. Doddridge, and Locke.

Ver. 3. I wrote this ſame unto you] That I wrote relates to the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians is evident, becauſe it is ſo uſed in the next, and in the 9th verſe; and what he wrote in that Epiſtle, which he calls αυτο τουτο, this very thing, was, moſt probably, concerning the puniſhment of the fornicator; as appears by what follows to ver. 11. eſpecially if it be compared with 1 Cor. iv. and v. 8. For there he writes to them to puniſh that perſon; and if St. Paul had come himſelf before it was done, he muſt have come with a rod, as he calls it, and have himſelf chaſtiſed them: But now, knowing that the Corinthians had puniſhed him, in compliance with his letter, and having had this trial of their obedience, he is ſo far from continuing the ſeverity, that he writes to them to forgive him, and to take him again into their affection. Locke.

Ver. 4. And anguiſh of heart] Over-bearing anguiſh ſeems the import of συνοχῆ, which nearly reſembles συνέχει, ch. v. 14. See the place.

Ver. 5. But if any have cauſed grief, &c.] St. Paul being ſatisfied with the Corinthians for their ready compliance with his orders in his former letter, to puniſh the fornicator, intercedes to have him reſtored; and to that end leſſens his fault, and declares, that however he might have cauſed grief to the Corinthians, yet he had cauſed none to him. Locke. St. Chryſoſtom, the Syriac, and Arabic, render this verſe thus: He has not grieved me, but (not to aggravate too much) in ſome ſort all of you. Pere Simon has it, He has not only grieved me, but ſome of you. See 1 Cor. xii. 37. The following verſion of Dr. Heylin is paraphraſtical, though expreſſive of the ſenſe: "Whatever affliction I have had, I am not the only perſon concerned; ſo that I muſt not charge you all, with what comes but from a part of you."

Ver. 6. Sufficient to ſuch a man, &c.] "Sufficient to ſuch a one, who hath here been the aggreſſor, is this rebuke and cenſure, which he hath already ſuffered by many, and indeed by the whole body of your ſociety; which hath ſhewn ſo wiſe and pious a readineſs to purſue the directions I gave, for animadverting upon him, and bringing him to repentance." It is obſervable how tenderly St. Paul deals with the Corinthians in this Epiſtle; for though he treats of the fornicator, from the 5th to the 10th verſe, incluſively, yet he never mentions him under that, or any other diſobliging title, but in the ſoft and inoffenſive terms of any one, or ſuch a one. See Locke, and Doddridge. Inſtead of this puniſhment, &c. Dr. Waterland and the MS read, this rebuke from the majority.

Ver. 12, 13. When I came to Troas] When I came to Troas, and a door to the Goſpel of Chriſt was opened. Knatchbull. How uneaſy St. Paul was, and upon what account: See ch. vii. 5—16. It was not barely for the abſence of Titus, but for want of the news he brought with him, ch. vii. 7. Inſtead of, I went thence into Macedonia, the MS read, I came from thence, &c.

Ver. 14. Who cauſeth us to triumph in Chriſt] That is, "In the ſucceſs of my preaching in my journey to Macedonia, and alſo in my victory at the ſame time at Corinth, over the falſe Apoſtles, my oppoſers, who had raiſed a faction againſt me amongſt you." Thus St. Paul repreſents himſelf as triumphing through the divine power; and as in triumphal proceſſions, eſpecially in the eaſt, fragrant odours and incenſe were burnt near the conquerors, he ſeems beautifully to allude to this circumſtance, in what he ſays of the ὀσμὴν, the odour of the Goſpel, in the following verſes: and he ſeems further to allude to the different effects of ſtrong perfumes, to cheer ſome, and to 15 For we are unto God a ſweet ſavour of Chriſt, in them that are ſaved, and in them that periſh:

16 To the one we are the ſavour of death unto death; and to the other, the ſavour of life unto life. And who is ſufficient for theſe things?

17 For we are not as many, which corrupt the word of God: but as of ſincerity, but as of God, in the ſight of God ſpeak we in Chriſt.

CHAP. III.

Leſt their falſe teachers ſhould charge him with vain glory, he ſheweth the faith and graces of the Corinthians to be a ſufficient commendation of his miniſtry. Whereupon, entering a compariſon between the miniſters of the law, and of the goſpel, he proveth that his miniſtry is ſo far the more excellent, as the goſpel of life and liberty is more glorious than the law of condemnation.

DO we begin again to commend ourſelves? or need we, as ſome others, epiſtles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you?

2 Ye are our epiſtle written in our hearts, known and read of all men:

3 Foraſmuch as ye are manifeſtly declared to be the epiſtle of Chriſt, miniſtered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of ſtone, but in fleſhly tables of the heart.

4 And ſuch truſt have we through Chriſt to God-ward:

5 Not that we are ſufficient of ourſelves to think any thing as of ourſelves; but our ſufficiency is of God:

6 Who alſo hath made us able miniſters of the new teſtament; not of the letter, but of the ſpirit: for the letter killeth, but the ſpirit giveth life.

7 But if the minſtration of death, written and engraven in ſtones, was glorious, ſo that the children of Iſrael could not ſtedfaſtly behold the face of Moſes, for the glory of his countenance, which glory was to be done away; throw others into violent diſorders, according to the different diſpoſitions they are in to receive them: Ælian obſerves, that ſome kind of animals are killed by them. Hiſt. Animal. l. iii. c. 7. See Locke, and Doddridge. Dr. Heylin obſerves, that the knowledge of God, or knowledge that there is a God, may be a mere ſpeculation; not ſo the ſavour, reliſh, or mental ſenſation of God, called here the ſavour of his knowledge. Now an Apoſtle ſpeaking by the Spirit of God, really excites this ſavour or ſenſation in the minds of his hearers: being himſelf actuated by God, he gives for the time ſome real perception of him.—Thoſe who piouſly cultivate this, improve accordingly; thoſe who withſtand it, and will not be wrought upon by it, grow more indiſpoſed and hardened:—as is ſhewn in the following verſes.

Ver. 15, 16. For we are unto God, &c.] For, upon God's account, [or, in order that God may be known] we communicate a ſavoury odour of Chriſt, to them who are ſaved, and to them who are not. ver. 16. To the one we are the ſavour of death, ſo as to prove mortal to them; and to the others the ſavour of life, ſo as to revive them. And who is ſo well qualified for theſe things as we are?—The phraſe, For upon God's account, is literally, For God. That God cannot be effectually known, but through Chriſt, is the conſtant doctrine of Scripture. See the above note, Heylin, Mill, and Wall.

Ver. 17. Which corrupt the word of God] Καπηλεύοντες, adulterating, is an expreſſive phraſe, alluding to the practice of thoſe who deal in liquors, which they debaſe for their own greater gain; and it inſinuates in ſtrong terms, the mean temper and conduct of their falſe teachers. See Mintert, Bos, Heylin, and the Reflections at the end of the next chapter.

Chap. III. Ver. 1. Do we begin again to commend ourſelves] This is a plain indication that St. Paul had been blamed amongſt them for commending himſelf; as the next clauſe ſeems to intimate, that their falſe Apoſtle had got himſelf recommended to them by letters, and ſo had introduced himſelf into that church. Locke.

Ver. 2. Ye are our Epiſtle, &c.] "I may well ſay you are yourſelves our epiſtle, the beſt recommendation from God himſelf; his teſtimonial, as it were, written upon your hearts, in the glorious change by our means produced there: and the effects of it are ſo apparent in your lives, that I may ſay ye are known and read by all men, who know what you once were, and now are." Many copies read our hearts; but the Apoſtle ſeems to mean, that the change produced not only in their external conduct, but in their inward temper, was ſo great, that all who could judge of it by intimate knowledge, (and it is certain that ſome judgement may be formed) muſt own it a great atteſtation to his miniſtry;—and in this view we ſhould read Your hearts. The enormities into which they were once plunged, (ſee 1 Cor. vi. 11, &c.) would much illuſtrate this argument. See Doddridge, and the next verſe.

Ver. 3. For as much as ye are manifeſtly declared] The ſenſe of St. Paul in this verſe is plainly this; That he needed no letters of commendation to them; but that by their converſion, and the Goſpel written not with ink, but with the Spirit of God in the tables of their hearts, and not in tables of ſtone, by his miniſtry, was as clear an evidence and teſtimony to them of his miſſion from Chriſt, as the law written in tables of ſtone was an evidence of Moſes' miſſion: So that he [St. Paul] needed no other recommendation. This is what we are to underſtand by the verſe; unleſs we will make the tables of ſtone to have no ſignification here. But to ſay, as he does, that the Corinthians, being written upon, in their hearts, not with ink, but with the Spirit of God, by the hand of St. Paul,—was Chriſt's commendatory letter of him, This being a pretty bold expreſſion, liable to the exception of the captious part of the Corinthians; to obviate all imputation of vanity or vain-glory herein, he immediately ſubjoins what follows in the next verſe. Locke.

Ver. 4, 5. And ſuch truſt have we, &c.] As if he had ſaid, "But miſtake me not, as if I boaſted of myſelf. This ſo great boaſting which I uſe, is only my confidence in God through Chriſt; for it was God who made me a miniſter of the Goſpel, who beſtowed on me the ability for it; and whatever I perform in it is wholly from him." Πεποιθησις, truſt, is a milder term for boaſting. So St. Paul uſes it, ch. x. 7. compared with v. 8. See alſo Rom. ii. 19. Λογιζεσθω, ch. x. 7. is uſed as here, [ver. 5.] for counting upon oneſelf. The clauſe ſhould be rendered to reckon upon any thing as of ourſelves; Or if λογισασθαι ſhall rather be thought to ſignify here, to diſcover by reaſoning, then the Apoſtle's ſenſe will run thus: "Not as if I was ſufficient of myſelf,—by the ſtrength of my own natural parts, to attain the knowledge of the Goſpel truths which I preach; but my ability herein is all from God." But in whatever ſenſe λογισασθαι is here taken, it is certain that τι, which is tranſlated any thing, muſt be limited to the ſubject in hand; namely, the Goſpel which he had preached to them. See Locke and Whitby. Dr. Heylin renders theſe verſes, And we are aſſured of this, through Chriſt, before God; ver. 5. Not that we are ſufficient of ourſelves to effect any thing by the ſtrength of our own reaſon; but our ſufficiency is from God; ver. 6. who hath enabled us to be miniſters, &c. See ch. i. 6.

Ver. 6. Not of the letter, &c.] By expreſſing himſelf as he does here, St. Paul may be underſtood to intimate, that the New Teſtament or Covenant, was alſo, though obſcurely, held forth in the law; for he ſays he was conſtituted a miniſter of the Spirit, or ſpiritual meaning of the law; which was Chriſt, (as he tells us himſelf, ver. 17.) and giveth life, whilſt the letter killeth. But both letter and Spirit muſt be underſtood of the ſame thing,—viz. the letter of the law, and the Spirit of the law: and in fact, we find St. Paul truly a miniſter of the Spirit of the law, eſpecially in his Epiſtle to the Hebrews, where he ſhews what a ſpiritual ſenſe ran through the Moſaical inſtitution and writings. The letter killeth, by pronouncing death, without any way of remiſſion, on all tranſgreſſors; it leaves them under an irrevocable ſentence of death: But the Spirit, that is, Chriſt, (ver. 17.) who is a quickening Spirit, (1 Cor. xv. 45.) giveth life. See Locke.

Ver. 7, Which glory was to be done away] Καταργουμένην, done away, is applied here to the ſhining of Moſes's face, and to the law, ver. 11

8 How ſhall not the miniſtration of the ſpirit be rather glorious?

9 For if the miniſtration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the miniſtration of righteouſneſs exceed in glory.

10 For even that which was made glorious, had no glory in this reſpect, by reaſon of the glory that excelleth.

11 For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious.

12 Seeing then that we have ſuch hope, we uſe great plainneſs of ſpeech.

13 And not as Moſes, which put a vail over his face, that the children of Iſrael could not ſtedfaſtly look to the end of that which is aboliſhed.

14 But their minds were blinded: for until this day remaineth the ſame vail untaken away, in the reading of the old teſtament; which vail is done away in Chriſt.

15 But even unto this day, when Moſes is read, the vail is upon their heart.

16 Nevertheleſs, when it ſhall turn to the Lord, the vail ſhall be taken away.

17 Now the Lord is that Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

18 But we all with open face beholding as in a glaſs the glory of the Lord, are and 13. In all which places it is uſed in the preſent tenſe, and has the ſignification of an adjective, ſtanding for temporary,—or of a duration whoſe end was determined; and is oppoſed to τῳ μένοντι, that which remaineth; i. e. that which is laſting, and hath no pre-determined end ſet to it: as ver. 11. where the Goſpel diſpenſation is called το μένον, that which remaineth. This may help us to underſtand from glory to glory, ver. 18. which is manifeſtly oppoſed to the glory done away in this verſe, and ſo plainly ſignifies a continued laſting glory of the miniſtry of the Goſpel; which, as he tells us there, conſiſted in their being changed into the image and clear repreſentation of the Lord himſelf; as the glory of Moſes conſiſted in the tranſitory brightneſs of his face, which was a faint reflection of the glory of God appearing to him in the mount. Locke.

Ver. 9. Miniſtration of righteouſneſs] Or, of juſtification. So the miniſtry of the Goſpel is called, becauſe by the Goſpel a way is provided for the juſtification of thoſe who have tranſgreſſed. But the law has nothing but rigid condemnation for all tranſgreſſors, and therefore is called here the miniſtration of condemnation. See Locke and Wall.

Ver. 10. For even that which was made glorious] Though the ſhewing that the miniſtration of the Goſpel is more glorious than that of the law be what St. Paul is treating of here, thereby to juſtify himſelf, if he hath aſſumed ſome authority and commendation to himſelf in his miniſtry and apoſtleſhip; yet, in his thus induſtriouſly placing the miniſtry of the Goſpel in honour above that of Moſes, may he not poſſibly have an eye to the judaizing falſe apoſtle of the Corinthians, to let them ſee what little regard was to be had to that miniſtration, in compariſon of the miniſtry of the Goſpel? Locke.

Ver. 11. If that which is done away] St. Paul here mentions another pre-eminence and ſuperiority of glory in the Goſpel over the law; namely, that the law was to ceaſe and be aboliſhed, but the Goſpel to remain, and never to be aboliſhed. See Locke and Hallet.

Ver. 12. That we have ſuch hope] That St. Paul, by theſe words, means the honourable employment of an Apoſtle and miniſter of the Goſpel, or the glory belonging to his miniſtry in the Goſpel, is evident from the whole foregoing compariſon which he has made between the miniſtry of the law and of the Goſpel, and not between the law and the Goſpel themſelves. The calling of it hope inſtead of glory here, where he ſpeaks of his having it, is the language of modeſty, which more particularly ſuited his preſent purpoſe; for the concluſion which in this verſe he draws from what went before, plainly ſhews his deſign in this diſcourſe to be, the juſtifying his ſpeaking freely of himſelf and others. His argument is to this effect: "Having therefore ſo honourable an employment, as is the miniſtry of the Goſpel, which far exceeds the miniſtry of the law in glory;—though even that gave ſo great a luſtre to Moſes's face, that the children of Iſrael could not with fixed eyes look upon him;—I, as becomes one of ſuch hopes, in ſuch a poſt as ſets me above all mean conſiderations and compliances, uſe great freedom and plainneſs of ſpeech in all things which concern my miniſtry." See Locke and Whitby.

Ver. 13. Could not ſteadfaſtly look, &c.] St. Paul is here juſtifying in himſelf, and to other miniſters of the goſpel, the plainneſs and openneſs of their preaching, which he had aſſerted in the preceding verſe. Theſe words therefore here muſt of neceſſity be underſtood, not of Moſes, but of the miniſters of the Goſpel; namely, that it was not the obſcurity of their preaching, not any thing veiled in their way of propoſing the Goſpel, which was the cauſe why the children of Iſrael did not underſtand the law perfectly, and ſee Chriſt the end of it in the writings of Moſes. What is ſaid in the next verſe plainly determines the words to this ſenſe: "We the miniſters of the Goſpel ſpeak plainly and openly, and put no veil upon ourſelves, (as Moſes did,) whereby to hinder the Jews from ſeeing Chriſt in the law; but that which hinders them is a blindneſs of their minds, which has been always on them, and remains to this day." This ſeems to be obviating an objection, which ſome of the Corinthians might make to the Apoſtle's boaſting of ſo much plainneſs and clearneſs in his preaching; as much as to ſay, "If you preach the Goſpel, and Chriſt contained in the law, with ſuch a ſhining clearneſs and evidence, how comes it that the Jews are not converted to it?"—His reply is, "Their unbelief comes not from any obſcurity in our preaching, but from a blindneſs which reſts upon their minds to this day." See Locke, and Rom. x. 2—4. The MS before me, inſtead of, that the children of Iſrael could not ſtedfaſtly look, &c. reads,—denoting, that the children of Iſrael did not look, &c. And inſtead of τέλος, the end, Junius, by a very ingenious criticiſm, would read κλέος, the glory:—They could not look on the glory of that, &c. See Wetſtein.

Ver. 14. Untaken away—which veil is done away in Chriſt] Not diſcovered, that in Chriſt it is done away. Caſtalio. Not uncovered, becauſe in Chriſt [only] it is done away. Piſcator, Bengelius, and Heylin.

Ver. 15. When Moſes is read] St. Paul poſſibly alludes here to the cuſtom of the Jews, which continues ſtill in the ſynagogue, that when the law is read, they put a veil over their faces.

Ver. 17. Now the Lord is that Spirit] Now where the Lord is, the Spirit is. Le Clerc. Now the Spirit is the Lord; and where that Spirit is, there is the liberty of the Lord. Wat. and Wells. Theſe words, according to Mr. Locke, relate to ver. 6. where St. Paul ſays he is a miniſter, not of the law, nor of the outſide and literal ſenſe, but of the myſtical and ſpiritual meaning of it; which here he tells us is Chriſt. And he adds, there is liberty, becauſe the Spirit is given only to ſons, or thoſe that are free. See Rom. viii. 15. This verſe may be paraphraſed, "Now the Lord Jeſus Chriſt is that Spirit of the law of which I ſpoke before, to whom the letter of it was intended to lead the Jews; and it is the office of the Spirit of God, as the great agent in his kingdom, to direct the minds of men to it: And let him be univerſally ſought in this view; for where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty; a moral, liberal, and filial diſpoſition, to which, under the influence and operation of the Spirit, the Goſpel brings thoſe who are ſubject to bondage under the imperfect diſpenſation of Moſes." See Wells, Locke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 18. But we all with open face] St. Paul juſtifies his freedom and plainneſs of ſpeech, by his being made by God himſelf a miniſter of the Goſpel, which is a more glorious miniſtry than that of Moſes in promulgating the law. This he does from ver. 6 to ver. 12 incluſively; from thence to the end of the chapter, he juſtifies his liberty of ſpeaking, in that he, as a miniſter of the Goſpel, being illuminated with greater and brighter rays of light than Moſes, was to ſpeak as he did with more freedom and clearneſs than Moſes had done. This being the ſcope of St. Paul in this place, it is plain that all, from the words, who put a veil upon his face, ver. 13. to the beginning of this verſe, is a parentheſis; which being ſo read, the compariſon between the miniſters of the Goſpel and Moſes ſtands clear. "Moſes with a veil covered the brightneſs and glory of God, which ſhone in his countenance; but we, the miniſters of the Goſpel, with open countenances, reflecting as mirrors the glory of the Lord, &c." For ſo Mr. Locke would underſtand the word κατοπτριζόμενοι, and not beholding as in a mirror, becauſe the compariſon is between the miniſters of the Goſpel and Moſes, and not between the miniſters of the Goſpel and the children of Iſrael. Now the action of beholding was the action of the children of Iſrael; but that of ſhining, or reflecting the glory received in the mount, was the action of Moſes; and therefore it muſt be ſomething anſwering to that in the miniſters of the Goſpel, wherein the compariſon is made; as is farther manifeſt in another expreſs part of the compariſon, between the veiled face of Moſes, ver. 13. and the open face of the miniſters of the Goſpel in this verſe. The face of Moſes was veiled, and the bright ſhining or glory of God remaining on it, or reflected from it, might not be ſeen; But the faces of the miniſters of the Goſpel are open, that the bright ſhining of the Goſpel, or the glory of Chriſt may be ſeen. Thus the juſtneſs of the compariſon ſtands fair, and has an eaſy ſenſe. We are changed into the ſame image, imports, "The reflection of Chriſt from us is ſo bright and clear, that we are changed into his very image; whereas the light which ſhone in Moſes's countenance was but a faint reflection of the glory which he ſaw when God ſhewed changed into the ſame image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.

CHAP. IV.

He declareth how he hath uſed all ſincerity and faithful diligence in preaching the goſpel; and how the troubles and perſecutions which he daily endured for the ſame, did redound to the praiſe of God's power, to the benefit of the church, and to the apoſtle's own eternal glory.

THerefore, ſeeing we have this miniſtry, as we have received mercy, we faint not;

2 But have renounced the hidden things of diſhoneſty; not walking in craftineſs, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifeſtation of the truth, commending ourſelves to every man's conſcience in the ſight of God.

3 But if our goſpel be hid, it is hid to them that are loſt:

him his back-parts." Exod. xxxiii. 23. From glory to glory means, "With a continued influx and renewing of glory;" in oppoſition to the ſhining of Moſes's face, which decayed and diſappeared in a little while. See on ver. 7. The next clauſe ſhould be rendered, Even as from the Lord the Spirit; that is, "As if this irradiation of light and glory came immediately from the ſource of it; the Lord himſelf, who is that Spirit, whereof we are the miniſters, ver. 6. which giveth life and liberty, ver. 17." The liberty there ſpoken of is παῤῥησία, mentioned ver. 12. and the ſubject of St. Paul's diſcourſe here:—as is further manifeſt from what immediately follows in the ſix firſt verſes of the next chapter, wherein the attentive reader may find a clear comment on the preſent verſe, which is there explained in the ſenſe here given. It may be proper, however, to obſerve, that there are ſome who do not intirely agree with this interpretation of Mr. Locke. Dr. Doddridge paraphraſes the verſe thus: "In conſequence of the liberty enjoyed by virtue of the Goſpel, we all, who have been ſo happy as ſuitably to welcome it, with unveiled face attentively beholding, as by a glaſs or mirror, the glory of the Lord reflected from his word, are transformed into ſomething of the ſame reſplendant image of the bleſſed Redeemer, whoſe ſhining face we there ſee. And the more ſtedfaſtly we behold this illuſtrious and amiable form, the more do we partake of it, proceeding gradually from glory to glory; and all this is as proceeding from the Lord the Spirit. For as the Lord Jeſus Chriſt is the Spirit of the law, ſo the divine Spirit, under his direction and influences, is the cauſe of this noble and divine effect." Dr. Heylin obſerves, that inſtead of beholding as in a mirror, he thinks the original imports receiving as on a mirror. Theodoret, explaining this verſe, ſays, "As clear water repreſents the face of thoſe who look on it, ſo the pure heart becomes as it were a mirror and effigies of the divine glory." Therefore the transformation is not imputed ultimately to our ſeeing God, but to his favourable regard to us, whereby he impreſſes his image on the pure heart, as a poliſhed mirror, while it perſiſts in his preſence ſteadily, and with an uninterrupted ſerenity. I think then that the verſe before us may be thus rendered: We, on whom the unveiled face of the Lord impreſſes his glory, as on a mirror, are transformed into his reſemblance, &c. See Whitby, Elſner, Bos, and Pearſon on the Creed, art. 8.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. II. AND III.

Who can forbear wiſhing that the infinite importance of the Goſpel meſſage may be deeply impreſſed upon all who preach, and all who hear it? Life or death is in queſtion,—eternal life or eternal death: and while it is from day to day reviving its thouſands, it is to be feared, that in ſome places it is, by the righteous judgement of God on hard and impenitent hearts, aggravating the guilt and miſery of its thouſands.

How awful is the work of diſpenſing this Goſpel! Who can pretend to be ſufficient for ſuch things as theſe? Who, that conſiders the nature and importance of the miniſterial work, can undertake or purſue it but with fear and trembling? ch. ii. 15, 16. Yet, inſufficient as they ought humbly to acknowledge themſelves to be, to reckon upon any thing as from themſelves, there is a ſufficiency in God imparted to faithful miniſters: In conſequence of which, they are often made to triumph in Chriſt, borne on in a holy ſuperiority to all the difficulties of their work, and ſeeing that their labour is not in vain in the Lord. Well may that ſupport them under the diſcouragements which in other inſtances they feel, when the fruit of their labours does not immediately appear; yea, when the preſent ſtate of many under their care is directly contrary to what they could deſire. For their work is ſtill with the Lord, and they are a ſweet ſavour to God in them that periſh, as well as in them that are ſaved. Let them therefore gird up the loins of their mind, and exert themſelves with the utmoſt vigour; rejoicing in this, that God will on the whole be glorified, and they ſhall on the whole be accepted, and through his abundant grace be amply rewarded. ver. 14, 15.

But, as they deſire to ſecure this acceptance, they ſhould never allow themſelves, by any foreign mixtures, to adulterate the word of God; ſolicitous to ſpeak it in its uncorrupted ſincerity, as in the ſight and preſence of God, and as thoſe who know it is not their buſineſs to deviſe a meſſage out of their own heart,—but to deliver what they have received of the Lord: ſo may they hope there ſhall not be wanting thoſe, who, according to the view which the Apoſtle gives us of theſe Corinthians, ſhall appear as Epiſtles written by the hand of Chriſt himſelf, in atteſtation of their commiſſion from him. ver. 17. and ch. iii. 2.

That miniſters may more chearfully hope for and expect ſuch an honour, we ſhould pray that the Spirit of God may lead them into the true ſenſe and meaning of Scripture; that they may not unprofitably amuſe themſelves and their hearers with vain and cold criticiſms on the letter of it, ſo as to neglect and forget what is moſt ſpiritual in its deſign and meaning; but that they may, under the divine illumination, attain to the mind of the Spirit, and be enabled to make greater proficiency in unfolding and illuſtrating the important myſteries of the kingdom of heaven, and may be to multitudes a Savour of life unto life. ver. 6.

Still full in our view ſtands the glorious glaſs of the Goſpel, from which the luſtre of the Redeemer's countenance is reflected: It is our duty daily to behold his image there, and contemplate it with an attentive eye, as thoſe who are ſolicitous that we may wear ſome of thoſe rays; yea, that we may wear them with ſtill increaſing luſtre; that we may be transformed from glory to glory, and reflecting theſe rays, ſhine as lights in the world.

It will greatly conduce to raiſe our minds to this laudable temper, if we frequently reflect on the excellence of the Chriſtian diſpenſation, as a diſpenſation of the Spirit and of life; whereas the law was the miniſtration of death: and while from the glory attending the law we infer, with the Apoſtle, the ſupereminent glory of the Goſpel, we ſhall learn alſo the ſuperior obligation under which it brings us to regard and obey it, and the proportionably greater danger of deſpiſing it. ver. 7, 8. The law of Moſes was ſoon to be aboliſhed; the Goſpel ſtill remains, and ſhall remain to the end of time. Let us pray for its proſperity, and do our utmoſt to promote it; and let us earneſtly plead with God, that whereas there is now a veil upon the face of the Jews, even to this day, when the ſacred records are read amongſt them, they may turn unto the Lord, and find the veil taken away: that ſo, by the converſion of Iſrael as a nation, there may be a glorious acceſſion of evidence toChriſtianity, and that the Jews themſelves may be happy in the bleſſing of him, whom their fathers crucified, and whom they continue ſo unhappily to reject. ver. 11—16.

While defending ſo divine a cauſe, and enforcing ſo important a meſſage, may the miniſters of the Goſpel uſe all becoming plainneſs of ſpeech; and may all Chriſtians know more of that liberty which the Spirit of the Lord gives; that God may in all things be glorified through Jeſus Chriſt! ver. 12—17.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1. We faint not] This is to the ſame purpoſe with we uſe great plainneſs of ſpeech, in the 12th verſe of the foregoing chapter, and ſignifies in both places the clear, plain, direct, and diſintereſted preaching of the Goſpel; which is what the Apoſtle means by that figurative way of ſpeaking in the former chapter, eſpecially the laſt verſe of it, and which he more plainly expreſſes in the five or ſix firſt verſes of this: the whole buſineſs of the former part of this Epiſtle being, as we have already obſerved, to juſtify to the Corinthians his behaviour in his miniſtry; and to convince them, that in his preaching the Goſpel he had been open and candid, without any hidden deſign, or the leaſt mixture of any ſecular intereſt. Locke.

Ver. 2. Have renounced the hidden things of diſhoneſty] All diſhoneſt artifices of falſe teachers. The word ἀπειπάμεθα, which we render renounced, does not imply that they ever had any thing to do with theſe things; however, it would perhaps be better to tranſlate it ſet at defiance; which ſeems more literally to expreſs the original. See Doddridge, Whitby, and ch. iii. 18. Dr. Waterland reads the latter part of the verſe, But commending ourſelves by manifeſting the truth to every man's conſcience, &c.

Ver. 3. If our Goſpel be hid, &c.] If our Goſpel be under a veil too, it is veiled to thoſe that are periſhed. This has an evident reference to what was ſaid above, concerning the veil on the faces of the Jews; and the text may juſtly be urged as a proof of the perſpicuity of the Apoſtle's writings in all matters of importance to our Salvation. See Doddridge, and Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. v. p. 320.

Ver. 4. The god of this world] That is, the devil; ſo called, becauſe the men of this world worſhipped and obeyed him as their god. It would be a good illuſtration of the preſent paſſage, if it could be proved, as it has been intimated, that this malignant ſpirit was ſo early called by the Jews, סמאל, Semâl, "the god who blinds." Blinded their minds here anſwers to their minds were blinded, ch. iii. 14. and the 2d and 3d verſe of this explains ver. 13, 14, of that chapter.

blinded the minds of them which believe not, leſt the light of the glorious goſpel of Chriſt, who is the image of God, ſhould ſhine unto them.

5 For we preach not ourſelves, but Chriſt Jeſus the Lord; and ourſelves your ſervants for Jeſus' ſake.

6 For God, who commanded the light to ſhine out of darkneſs, hath ſhined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jeſus Chriſt.

7 But we have this treaſure in earthen veſſels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.

8 We are troubled on every ſide, yet not diſtreſſed; we are perplexed, but not in deſpair;

9 Perſecuted, but not forſaken; caſt down, but not deſtroyed;

10 Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jeſus, that the life alſo of Jeſus might be made manifeſt in our body.

11 For we which live, are always delivered unto death for Jeſus' ſake, that the life alſo of Jeſus might be made manifeſt in our mortal fleſh.

12 So then death worketh in us, but life in you.

13 We having the ſame ſpirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I ſpoken; we alſo believe, and therefore ſpeak;

14 Knowing, that he which raiſed up the Lord Jeſus, ſhall raiſe up us alſo by Jeſus, and ſhall preſent us with you.

15 For all things are for your ſakes, that the abundant grace might, through the thankſgiving of many, redound to the glory of God.

16 For which cauſe we faint not; but though our outward man periſh, yet the inward man is renewed day by day.

17 For our light affliction, which is but ter. Of the glorious Goſpel of Chriſt might be rendered, of the Goſpel of the glory of Chriſt. Glory here, as in the former chapter, may be put for ſhining and brightneſs; ſo that the Goſpel of the glory of Chriſt denotes the brightneſs or clearneſs of the doctrine wherein Chriſt is manifeſted in the Goſpel. Chriſt is the image of the inviſible God, in all his perfections and glories. Locke, Doddridge, and Wall.

Ver. 5. For we preach not ourſelves] "We aim not at exalting our own authority, extending our reputation, or ſecuring to ourſelves any ſecular advantage; but, renouncing all ſuch views, claims, and deſires, we preach Chriſt Jeſus as the ſupreme Lord of his church: And inſtead of ſetting up ourſelves for your maſters, we declare ourſelves to be your ſervants, for the ſake of Jeſus; and are willing, out of regard for you, and above all, out of duty to him, to ſtoop to the humbleſt offices of love, by which we may be ſerviceable to you in your moſt important intereſts." Doddridge and Grotius.

Ver. 6. For God, who commanded the light] "God, who by his powerful word, in the firſt creation of this world, commanded the light inſtantaneouſly to ſhine out of that darkneſs which covered the whole face of the deep, (Gen. i. 5.) hath alſo ſhined in our once-prejudiced and benighted hearts, to impart the luſtre of the knowledge of God's glory, diſcovered, as we before obſerved, in the face of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; from thence reflected upon us, and from us to you, for the important purpoſes of your ſanctification and ſalvation." This is a continuation ſtill of the allegory of Moſes, and the ſhining of his face, &c. ſo much inſiſted on in the foregoing chapter; for the fuller explication whereof, we will add a word or two more to what has been already ſaid upon it. Moſes, by approaching to God in the mount, had a communication of glory or light from it, which irradiated from his face when he deſcended from the mount. Moſes put a veil over his face, to hide this light or glory; for St. Paul uſes both theſe names for the ſame thing: but the glory or light of the knowledge of God more fully and clearly communicated by Jeſus Chriſt, is ſaid here to ſhine in his face; and in that reſpect it is that Chriſt, in the foregoing verſe, is called by St. Paul the image of God; and the Apoſtles are ſaid, in the laſt verſe of the preceding chapter, to be transformed into the ſame image from glory to glory; that is, by their large and clear communications of the knowledge of God in the Goſpel, they are ſaid to be transformed into the ſame image; to repreſent, as mirrors, the glory of the Lord, and to be as it were the images of Chriſt, as Chriſt is the image of God. See Doddridge, Locke, and Calmet, Inſtead of face of Jeſus Chriſt, Dr. Waterland, Wall, and the MS read perſon. See ch. ii. 10.

Ver. 7. We have this treaſure in earthen veſſels] Veſſels of clay, which have been baked, and are brittle. The word rendered earthen,—ὀϛρακίνοις,—ſometimes ſignifies ſhells, which are often made uſe of to preſerve things of value in the cabinets of the curious; and theſe being likewiſe brittle, convey the ſame idea as the former,—that of the frailty of the human body, and the value of the treaſure depoſited in them. See Hammond and Mintert.

Ver. 8. We are troubled on every ſide] This and the following verſes contain a beautiful and pathetic detail of the ſufferings of the Apoſtles; and the contraſt which runs through them gives an air of ſublimity to the whole, at the ſame time that it conveys a noble idea of the intrepidity of the firſt Chriſtians. This paſſage may at firſt ſeem a digreſſion, but nothing could be more pertinent to the Apoſtle's grand purpoſe. He aimed at recovering the affections of theſe Corinthians, which were much alienated from him: To this end, he freely opens his heart towards them, and tenderly repreſents the many and grievous preſſures and hardſhips to which love to ſouls, and love to theirs amongſt the reſt, expoſed him. This ſeems to be the true key to this beautiful and pathetic paſſage. Inſtead of not diſtreſſed, Dr. Heylin reads, not cruſhed; and Dr. Doddridge, not utterly over-preſſed. Στενοχωρούμενοι properly ſignifies, cruſhed in a ſtrait paſſage.

Ver. 10. Always bearing about in the body, &c.] "So that the cruelties which were exerciſed in putting him to death, ſeem to be acted over again upon us, by the rage ofthe enemy. Yet all this is, in effect, not that an immediate period ſhould be put to our life and miniſtry, as they deſire, but that the life alſo of Jeſus, now triumphant above all hoſtile power, may be more evidently manifeſted in the preſervation of this our feeble body; which enemies, ſo many and ſo mighty, are continually endeavouring to deſtroy." See Doddridge, Locke, and Grotius.

Ver. 12. So then death worketh in us] Is wrought in us. MS, and Wat. "So that the preaching of the Goſpel procures ſufferings and danger of death to me, but to you it procures life; that is, the energy of the Spirit of Chriſt, whereby he lives in, and gives life to thoſe who believe in him." Locke.

Ver. 13. We having the ſame Spirit, &c.] Dr. Heylin reads this, We, having the ſame Spirit of faith [which David had] when he ſaid, I believed, and therefore have I ſpoken;—we alſo believe, &c. And he obſerves, that by the ſpirit of faith is meant the diſpoſition which faith produces. So ſpirit of meekneſs, &c. Preachers who ſpeak in this ſpirit of faith, i. e. having in themſelves a full conviction of the truths they deliver, will transfer ſomewhat of that conviction into the breaſts of their hearers. Such conſider, that they and their audience muſt appear together before Chriſt, ver. 14. and are careful to deliver nothing, but what they may avow in the day of judgement. See Locke, Heylin, and on Pſ. cxvi. 10.

Ver. 15, 16. For all things are for your ſakes] "For I do and ſuffer all things for your ſakes, that the exuberant favour of God may abound by the thankſgiving of a greater number to the glory of God." That is, "I endeavour by my ſufferings and preaching to make as many converts as I can; that ſo, the more partaking of the mercy and favour of God, of which there is a plentiful and inexhauſtible ſtore, the more may give thanks unto him; it being more for the glory of God, that a greater number ſhould give thanks and pray to him. For which cauſe I faint not."—Concerning the word faint, ſee on ver. 1. Here St. Paul gives another proof of his ſincerity in his miniſtry; viz. the ſufferings and the danger of death which he daily incurs by his preaching the Goſpel. And the reaſon why thoſe ſufferings and danger deter him not, nor make him faint at all, He tells them is, the aſſurance he has that God through Chriſt will raiſe him again, and reward him with immortality in glory. See ver. 17. ch. v. 9, &c. and Locke.

Ver. 17. For our light affliction] This is one of the moſt emphatical paſſages in St. Paul's writings; in which he ſpeaks as much like for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory;

18 While we look not at the things which are ſeen, but at the things which are not ſeen: for the things which are ſeen are temporal; but the things which are not ſeen are eternal.

CHAP. V.

In his aſſured hope of immortal glory, and in expectance of it, and of the general judgement, he laboureth to keep a good conſcience; not that he may herein boaſt of himſelf, but as one that, having received life from Chriſt, endeavoureth to live as a new creature to Chriſt only, and by his miniſtry of reconciliation to reconcile others alſo in Chriſt to God.

FOR we know that if our earthly houſe of this tabernacle were diſſolved, we have a building of God, an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

2 For in this we groan earneſtly, deſiring to be clothed upon with our houſe which is from heaven:

3 If ſo be that being clothed, we ſhall not be found naked.

4 For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be ſwallowed up of life.

5 Now he that hath wrought us for the ſelf-ſame thing, is God, who alſo hath given unto us the earneſt of the Spirit.

6 Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilſt we are at home in the body, we are abſent from the Lord:

7 For we walk by faith, not by ſight.

8 We are confident, I ſay, and willing rather to be abſent from the body, and to be preſent with the Lord.

9 Wherefore we labour, that whether preſent or abſent, we may be accepted of him.

10 For we muſt all appear before the judgement-ſeat of Chriſt; that every one an orator as an Apoſtle. The lightneſs of the trial is expreſſed by Τὸ ἐλαφρὸν της θλίψεως, the lightneſs of our affliction; as if he had ſaid, "It is even levity itſelf, in ſuch a compariſon." On the other hand, the Καθ' ὑπερβολὴν εἰς ὑπερβολὴν, which we render, far more exceeding, is infinitely emphatical, and cannot be fully expreſſed by any tranſlation. It ſignifies that all hyperboles fall ſhort of deſcribing that weighty, eternal glory, ſo ſolid and laſting, that you may paſs from one hyperbole to another, and yet when you have gained the laſt, are infinitely below it. It is every where viſible what an influence St. Paul's Hebrew had upon his Greek: כבד kebed, ſignifies to be heavy, and to be glorious; St. Paul in his Greek unites theſe ſignifications, and ſays, weight of glory. See Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, vol. i. p. 332. Doddridge, and Locke.

Ver. 18. While we look not at, &c.] While we aim not at. MS. This is the exact ſignification of σκοπούντων; and our Engliſh word "ſcope," or "mark aimed at," is derived from the ſame Greek theme. See the Reflections at the end of the next chapter.

Chap. V. Ver. 1. We know that if our earthly houſe, &c.] "I know that if this my body, which is but as a tent for my ſojourning here upon earth for a ſhort time, were diſſolved, I ſhall have another, of a divine original; which, unlike buildings made with mens hands, ſhall not be ſubject to decay, but ſhall be immortal and eternal in the heavens." See Locke, and Whitby.

Ver. 2—4. For in this we groan] The following ſeems the beſt and moſt unexceptionable expoſition of the very difficult paſſage before us: "And in this view we groan, through that intenſeneſs of ſpirit with which we are earneſtly and perpetually deſiring to be clothed upon with our houſe which is from heaven; ſince, being ſo clothed upon, we ſhall not be found naked, and expoſed to any evil and inconvenience, how entirely ſoever we may be ſtripped of every thing we can call our own here below. And moreover, we who are yet in this tabernacle, do groan, not only with thoſe longings after a bleſſed immortality, but alſo being burdened with the preſent weight of many infirmities and calamities. For which cauſe, nevertheleſs, we would not be unclothed, or ſtripped of the body; for that is what we cannot conſider as in itſelf deſirable; but rather, if it might be referred to our own choice, clothed upon immediately with a glory like that which ſhall inveſt the ſaints after the reſurrection; that ſo what is mortal, corruptible, and obnoxious to theſe diſorders, burdens, and ſorrows, may all be ſo abſorbed and ſwallowed up by life, as if it were annihilated by that divine vigor and energy, which ſhall then exert itſelf in and upon us." See 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54. Doddridge, Mill, Wetſtein, Locke; and particularly Archbp. Tillotſon's 24th Sermon on the death of Dr. Whichcote.

Ver. 5. Now he that hath wrought us, &c.]—"To theſe noble views and ſublime deſires." This is a moſt emphatical manner of ſpeaking; not only aſſerting that God is the Author of it, but aſcribing Deity to the Author. As if he had ſaid, "None but God could have raiſed us to ſuch a temper." The Spirit is frequently mentioned as the pledge and earneſt of immortality; more particularly Epheſ. i. 13, 14. which, compared with Rom. viii. 23. ſhews that the inheritance whereof the ſpirit is the earneſt, is the ſame which the Apoſtle ſpeaks of here; namely, the poſſeſſion of immortal bodies. See Locke, and Howe's works, vol. i. p. 680.

Ver. 6. We are always confident] Undaunted,—of good courage. Wat. MS, and ſo ver. 8. The original here, and in ver. 8. implies the ſame with we faint not, ch. iv. 1 and 16. "I go on undauntedly, without fainting; preaching the Goſpel with ſincerity, and direct plainneſs of ſpeech." The concluſion which he draws here from the conſideration of the reſurrection and immortality, is the ſame which he makes upon the ſame ground, ch. iv. 14, 16. Ἐνδημοῦντες, which we render are at home, properly ſignifies, are ſojourning, and ſhould certainly be ſo rendered; it deſtroying the Apoſtle's whole argument to tranſlate it, "While at home in the body," as it is clearly his deſign to intimate that this is not our home. See Locke, Tillotſon, and Clarke.

Ver. 7. For we walk by faith, &c.] "We now walk and conduct ourſelves in the whole courſe of our life, by the faith of objects as yet unſeen, and not by the ſight of thoſe glories, or by a regard to thoſe things which we can ſee." Comp. Gal. iii. 11. Heb. x. 38.

Ver. 8. And willing rather to be abſent, &c.] This may be underſtood as ſpoken with reſpect to death; and then it will imply that a Chriſtian, ſoon as he dies, is preſent with Chriſt: Or it may mean, that he wiſhed for Chriſt's coming, that he might be tranſlated from this ſtate of abſence, into a ſtate of immediate preſence. Some have argued from this text, not only againſt the ſleep of the ſoul during the intermediate ſtate, but that pious ſouls, when departed from our world, go into the higheſt heaven, where they dwell with Chriſt; and are not, as ſome have ſuppoſed, in a place where they have only a tranſient ſight of him on ſome extraordinary occaſions. See Wall, Locke, and Boyſe's Four laſt things, p. 592.

Ver. 9. Wherefore we labour] We make it the height of our ambition. Φιλοτιμούμεθα, whether ſtaying in the body, or going out of it: That is, "Whether I am to ſtay longer here, or ſuddenly to depart." The foregoing verſe leads us to this ſenſe; and what he ſays in the preſent,—That he endeavours, whether ἐνδημῶν, or ἐκδημῶν, to be well pleaſing to the Lord, (that is, to do what is well pleaſing to him) ſhews, that neither of theſe words can ſignify here, his being with Chriſt in heaven; for when he is there, the time of endeavouring to approve himſelf is over. From ch. iv. 12. to this place St. Paul, to convince the Corinthians of his uprightneſs in his miniſtry, has been ſhewing that the hopes and ſure expectation he had of eternal life, kept him ſtedfaſt and reſolute in an open ſincere preaching of the Goſpel, without any deceitful artifice: In which his argument ſtands thus; "Knowing that God, who raiſed up Chriſt, will raiſe me up again, I, without any fear or conſideration of what it may draw upon me, preach the Goſpel faithfully; making this account, that the momentary afflictions which I may ſuffer for it here, and which are but ſlight indeed, in compariſon of the eternal things of another life, will exceedingly increaſe my happineſs in the other world, where I long to be; and therefore death, which brings me home to Chriſt, is no terror to me. All my care is, that whether I am to ſtay longer in this body, or quickly to leave it, living or dying I may approve myſelf to Chriſt in my miniſtry." In the next two verſes the Apoſtle has another argument to fix in the Corinthians the ſame thoughts of him; and that is, the puniſhment he ſhall receive at the day of judgement, if neglecting to preach the Goſpel faithfully, and not endeavouring ſincerely and earneſtly to make converts to Chriſt. Locke.

may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

11 Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we perſuade men; but we are made manifeſt unto God; and I truſt alſo, are made manifeſt in your conſciences.

12 For we commend not ourſelves again unto you, but give you occaſion to glory on our behalf, that ye may have ſomewhat to anſwer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart.

13 For whether we be beſides ourſelves, it is to God: or whether we be ſober, it is for your cauſe.

14 For the love of Chriſt conſtraineth us, becauſe we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead:

15 And that he died for all, that they which live, ſhould not henceforth live unto themſelves, but unto him which died for them, and roſe again.

16 Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the fleſh; yea, though we have known Chriſt after the fleſh, yet now henceforth know we him no more.

17 Therefore, if any man be in Chriſt, he is a new creature: old things are paſſed away; behold, all things are become new.

18 And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himſelf by Jeſus Chriſt, and hath given to us the miniſtry of reconciliation;

19 To wit, that God was in Chriſt, reconciling the world unto himſelf, not imputing their treſpaſſes unto him; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.

20 Now then we are ambaſſadors for Chriſt, as though God did beſeech you by us: we pray you in Chriſt's ſtead, Be ye reconciled to God.

21 For he hath made him to be ſin for us, who knew no ſin; that we might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him.

Ver. 11. Knowing therefore the terror, &c.] Some would read, We do not perſuade men, but, &c. See 1 Cor. iv. 3. and Gal. i. 10. And others read it with an interrogation, Do we falſely perſuade men, when we know we ſhall be made manifeſt before God in judgement?" But, is it not clear as it ſtands?—"We convince men, and perſuade them to be Chriſtians, and by that means are manifeſted to God as his ſervants, and to your conſciences." Mr. Locke's paraphraſe is, "Knowing therefore this terrible judgement of the Lord, I preach the Goſpel, perſuading men to be Chriſtians: And with what integrity I diſcharge that duty, is manifeſt to God; and I truſt alſo you are convinced of it in your conſciences." See Bp Hare's "New Defence of the Biſhop of Bangor's Sermons," Raphelius, Calmet, and the Reflections.

Ver. 12. For we commend not ourſelves again] From this place and ſeveral others in the Epiſtle it cannot be doubted, but that St. Paul's ſpeaking well of himſelf had been objected to him as a fault; and in this lay his great difficulty, how to deal with this people. If he anſwered nothing to what was talked of him, his ſilence might be interpreted guilt and confuſion. If he defended himſelf, he was accuſed of vanity, ſelf-commendation, and folly. Hence it is that he uſes ſo many reaſons to ſhew, that his whole carriage was upon principles far above all wordly conſiderations; and tells them here, once for all, that the account he gives of himſelf is only to furniſh them who are his friends and adhered to him, with matter to juſtify themſelves in their eſteem of him, and to reply to thoſe who oppoſed him. Of this alſo the laſt clauſe may be underſtood; for it is manifeſt from ch. x. 7, 15. and xi. 12, 22, 23. that they pretended to ſomething in which they gloried, though St. Paul aſſures us that they were ſatiſfied in conſcience that they had no ſolid ground of glorying. Locke.

Ver. 13. Whether we be beſide ourſelves] From this verſe to ch. vi. 12, St. Paul gives another reaſon for his diſintereſted carriage in preaching the Goſpel, and that is, his love to Chriſt; who by his death having given him life, who was dead, he concludes, that in gratitude he ought not to live to himſelf any more: and therefore, being as in a new creation, he had now no longer any regard to the things or perſons of this world; but being made by God a miniſter of the Goſpel, he minded only the faithful diſcharge of his duty in that miniſtry, and purſuant thereunto took care that his behaviour ſhould be ſuch as he deſcribes, ch. vi. 3—10. Beſide ourſelves means, "in ſpeaking well of myſelf in my own juſtification." Whoever obſerves what St. Paul ſays, ch. xi, 1, 16, 21. xii. 6, 11. will ſcarce doubt, but that the ſpeaking of himſelf as he did, was by his enemies called glorying, and imputed to him as folly and madneſs. See Locke and Doddridge.

Ver. 14. Conſtraineth us] "Bears us away, like a ſtrong and reſiſtleſs torrent." Thus much is implied by the original word συνέχει. See on Philip. i. 23.

Ver. 16. Henceforth know we no man, &c.] "From this time we have no longer any partial regard to the Jew more than to the Gentile, on account of the deſcent of the former. We do not now eſteem any one for the advantages of this world, riches, learning, or eloquence; and even they who have ſeen and converſed with Chriſt while he was on earth, have now no claim to be preferred before us. All their perſonal knowledge is now vaniſhed, and no man knows Chriſt any otherwiſe than in proportion as he obeys his laws; for he governs and inſtructs us now, as a heavenly king, by his Spirit." Some interpret the laſt clauſe thus: "Nay, if we have known Chriſt after the fleſh, and governed ourſelves by any carnal expectations from the Meſſiah as a temporal prince, who ſhould render our nation the terror of the whole world, and raiſe us to univerſal monarchy, Henceforth we know him in theſe views no more; but entertain quite different ſentiments concerning him." See Locke, Clarke, Wall, and Doddridge.

Ver. 17. Therefore, if any man be in Chriſt, &c.] Galatians vi. 14, 15. may give ſome light to this place. To connect this and the preceding verſe with St. Paul's diſcourſe here, they muſt be underſtood in reference to the falſe Apoſtle, againſt whom St. Paul is here juſtifying himſelf; making it his chief buſineſs, in this as well as his former Epiſtle, to ſhew that what the falſe Apoſtle gloried in was no juſt cauſe of boaſting. Purſuant to this deſign of ſinking the authority and credit of that falſe Apoſtle, St. Paul in this and the following verſes inſinuates theſe two things: 1. That the miniſtry of reconciliation being committed to him, they ſhould not forſake him, to hearken to and follow that pretender. 2. That they being in Chriſt, and ſo a new creation, ſhould, as he does, not know any man in the fleſh,—not eſteem or glory in that falſe Apoſtle, becauſe he might perhaps pretend to have ſeen our Saviour in the fleſh, or to have heard him, or the like. Κτίσις ſignifies creation, and is ſo tranſlated Rom. viii. 22. and the paſſage may either mean, as above, that if any one be in Chriſt, it is as if he were in a new creation, wherein all former relations, conſiderations, and intereſts are ceaſed, and all things in that ſtate are new to him; or it may imply, (and perhaps it takes in both,) that there is a new creation in his heart,—his appetites, apprehenſions, and purſuits being changed, and his life actually amended and reformed. See Locke, and Doddridge's Sermons on Regeneration.

Ver. 18. And all things, &c.] Now, &c. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 19. To wit, that God was in Chriſt] Namely, &c. Doddridge. For God was in Chriſt, &c. Heylin.

Ver. 20. We are ambaſſadors for Chriſt] The Apoſtles were ſo in a peculiar ſenſe; but if it be the will of Chriſt that miniſters in all ages ſhould preſs men to accept the treaty of reconciliation eſtabliſhed in him, then it is evident they may be called his ambaſſadors, even though ſuch a phraſe had never been uſed in Scripture. Ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ plainly means in Chriſt's ſtead, as we render it. When Chriſt was in the world, he preſſed this treaty of reconciliation, and we riſe up in his ſtead to urge it ſtill further. See Doddridge, Hammond, and Matth. v. 24.

Ver. 21. Made him to be ſin, &c.] "A ſin-offering for us, that by the ſacrifice of himſelf he might expiate the guilt of our tranſgreſſions, and that ſo we might be made accepted in him, and furniſhed with

That he hath approved himſelf a faithful miniſter of Chriſt, both by his exhortations, and by integrity of life, and by patiently enduring all kinds of affliction and diſgraces for the goſpel. Of which he ſpeaketh the more bold-a plea as prevalent for our juſtification and admiſſion into the divine favour, as if we had retained our innocence untainted, and in every reſpect conformed ourſelves to the righteouſneſs which the law of God required and demanded." To be made the righteouſneſs of God, that is, divinely righteous, is a very ſtrong phraſe, to ſignify our being accepted of God as perfectly righteous, when conſidered as by faith united to Him who was perfectly ſo. There is an evident and beautiful contraſt between Chriſt's being made ſin, and our being made righteouſneſs; that is, being treated as perfectly righteous. See Doddridge, Heylin, and Taylor.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. V. Ver. 10, 11.

It is the privilege and diſtinguiſhing character of a rational being to be able to look forward into futurity, and to conſider his actions not only with reſpect to the preſent advantage or diſadvantage ariſing from them, but to view them in their conſequences, through all the parts of time in which himſelf may poſſibly exiſt. If therefore we value the privilege of being reaſonable creatures, the only way to preſerve it is to make uſe of it; and by extending our views into all the ſcenes of futurity, in which we ourſelves muſt bear a part, to lay the foundation of ſolid and durable happineſs.

With reſpect to that principal point, that fundamental article of religion,—the expectation of a life after this,—we may obſerve, there is no difference between the hopes conveyed to us in the Goſpel of Chriſt, and the expectation built upon natural reaſon: for as the wiſeſt men thought there muſt be, ſo the Goſpel aſſures us there will be a day, in which God will judge the world in righteouſneſs, and render to every man according to his works. Thus far the doctrine of the Goſpel, and the dictates of natural reaſon muſt ſtand or fall together. If this doctrine indeed has had a larger and more extenſive influence through the authority of the Goſpel, than it could have had by the mere force of ſpeculative reaſoning,—the world has then received an advantage by the encouragement given to virtue, and the reſtraint laid upon vice by theſe means, which ought ever to be acknowledged with thankfulneſs.

Now the Goſpel has added to this doctrine, and communicated to us the knowledge of ſome circumſtances, which were not diſcoverable but by the means of revelation; and they are principally theſe, —that there ſhall be a reſurrection the of body; that Chriſt ſhall be judge of this world;—and that the rewards and puniſhments in another life ſhall be in proportion to our behaviour in this. We will briefly conſider theſe particulars, and ſhew for what purpoſe they were revealed.

1. The reſurrection of the body was revealed to give all men a plain and a ſenſible notion of their being ſubject to a future judgement. Death is the deſtruction of the man, and ſure we are that the lifeleſs body is no man;—and whatever notions ſome may have of the ſoul in its ſtate of ſeparate exiſtence, yet a mere ſpirit is not a man; for man is made of ſoul and body; and therefore to bring the man into judgement to anſwer for his deeds, the ſoul and body muſt be brought together again. This doctrine, eſtabliſhed upon the authority of the Goſpel, does not remove all prejudices of the caſe, when conſidered by the ſhort and ſcanty notions we have of the powers of nature, but it effectually removes all difficulties that affect this belief, conſidered with reſpect to religion and morality: for the ſingle point in which religion is concerned, is to know, whether men ſhall be accountable hereafter for their actions here. Reaſon tells us, that they ought to be ſo; but a great difficulty ariſes from the diſſolution of the man by death; a difficulty, followed by endleſs ſpeculations upon the nature of the ſoul, its ſeparate exiſtence, its guilt in this ſeparate ſtate with reſpect to crimes committed in another, and in conjunction with the body, &c. But take in the declaration of the Goſpel, that ſoul and body ſhall be as certainly united at the reſurrection, as they were divided by death, and every man be himſelf again; and there is no more difficulty in conceiving, that men may be judged for their iniquities hereafter, than there is in conceiving that they may be judged here, when they offend againſt the laws of their country.

But ſome have aſked, "What body ſhall be raiſed, ſince no man has exactly the ſame body two days together? New parts are perpetually added by nutrition, old ones carried off by perſpiration; ſo that, in the compaſs of a few years, an human body may be almoſt totally altered." But this objection, plauſible as it may ſeem, has nothing to do in the preſent caſe: religion is concerned only to preſerve the identity or ſameneſs of the perſon, as the object of future judgement, and has nothing to do with that kind of identity, againſt which the objection can be ſuppoſed to have any force. Were the caſe otherwiſe, the difficulty would be really as great in human judgements now, as in the divine judgement hereafter Suppoſe a murderer at twenty ſhould not be diſcovered till he was ſixty, and then brought to trial;—would common ſenſe admit him to plead that he was not the ſame perſon who committed the fact; and to alledge in proof of it the alterations in his body for the laſt forty years? Suppoſe then, that inſtead of being diſcovered at ſixty, he ſhould die at ſixty, and ſhould riſe either with the body he had at ſixty, or twenty, or any intermediate time,—would not the caſe be juſt the ſame with reſpect to the future judgment?—This ſhews therefore that the article of the reſurrection, ſo far as it is a ſupport of religion and of a future judgement, ſtands quite clear of this difficulty.

But the prejudices which affect men moſt, on conſidering this article of the reſurrection, ariſe from the weakeſt of all imaginations, —that they can judge from the ſettled laws and courſe of nature, what is or is not poſſible to the power of God. It is very true that all our powers are bounded by the laws of nature; but does it follow that his power muſt be ſo bounded, who appointed theſe laws of nature, and could have appointed others, if he thought proper? We cannot raiſe a dead body; our hands are tied up by the laws of nature, which we cannot ſurpaſs;—neither can we create a new man: But we certainly know, from reaſon and experience, that there is One who can: and what can induce us to ſuppoſe, that He cannot give life to a body a ſecond time, who we can certainly know gave life to it at firſt?—Theſe prejudices therefore we may ſafely refer to the power of the Almighty, to which all nature is obedient, and upon which we may ſecurely depend for the performance of divine promiſes,—how unpromiſing ſoever to our ſhort-ſighted intellect the circumſtances may be which attend them.

But whatever difficulties of this kind may remain, yet this article has removed all which lie in the way of our conſidering ourſelves as accountable creatures, and ſubject to the future judgement of God. It is not a mere Spirit, but the man himſelf, who is to be brought to that judgement; and plain ſenſe muſt ſee and acknowledge the reaſonableneſs of judging a man hereafter for the crimes committed in this life, as evidently as it ſees the reaſonableneſs of judging him here, when his crimes happen to be detected. So that the revelation in this particular has brought faith and common ſenſe to a perfect agreement.

2. And this Goſpel revelation, ſecondly, has made known to us that Chriſt ſhall judge the world. We need not multiply texts to this purpoſe, John v. 22, 27. Acts x. 42. xvii. 31. are fully ſufficient to eſtabliſh a doctrine ſo very well known to all Chiſtians, and which is part of the creed we daily and publickly rehearſe.

But it is material to obſerve, that this authority is given to Chriſt, becauſe he is the Son of man, as he himſelf aſſumes, John v. 27. and that the perſon ordained to be judge is a man;—even the man whom God raiſed from the dead, as St. Paul aſſerts, Acts xvii. 31. How happy is it for us to have a judge,—I had almoſt ſaid ſo partial, but I may well ſay ſo favourable to us, that he was content to be himſelf the ſacrifice, to redeem us from the puniſhment due to our ſins! When we conſider ourſelves,—how wretched and weak we are,—how perpetually doing wrong, either wilfully or ignorantly,—and contemplate the infinite majeſty, holineſs, and juſtice of God; what account can we hope to give of ourſelves to him, whoſe eyes are purer than to behold iniquity? But ſee, God hath withdrawn his terrors, and given a man to be the judge of men; ſo that we may ſay of our judge, what the Apoſtle to the Hebrews ſays of our high-prieſt, We have not a judge who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without ſin.

It may perhaps be thought that this is drawing conſequences upon the foot of vulgar apprehenſions, and that in reality there is no difference, whether God be Judge himſelf, or commit the judgement to the Son of man: For, ſince Chriſt ſhall come not only in the power, but in the wiſdom and juſtice of God alſo, to judge the world; what difference can there be in the judgement, ſince in both caſes it muſt be guided and formed by the wiſdom and juſtice of God? —True it is, that a mere man is not qualified to be the judge of the world: The knowledge of hearts is neceſſary to the right diſcharge of that office; a knowledge, which no mere man was ever endowed with. But ſtill, if man is to be judge, the ſentiments, notions, and feelings of the man, however guided and influenced by ſuperior wiſdom, muſt preſide over and govern the whole action; otherwiſe the man will not be judge.

Hence then we may anſwer ſome difficulties which ſpeculative men have brought into the ſubject of a future judgement. Some have imagined that juſtice, mercy, and goodneſs in God, are not of the ſame kind with juſtice, mercy, and goodneſs in men; and therefore that we can never, from our notions of theſe qualities in man, argue conſequentially to the attributes of God, or to the acts flowing from theſe attributes: The reſult of which is, that when we talk of God's juſtice, or mercy in judging the world, we talk of ſomething which we do not underſtand. But if men would conſult Scripture, theſe difficulties would not meet them in their way: For ſurely we know what juſtice, mercy, and goodneſs mean among men; and ſince the Scriptures aſſure us that the man whom God raiſed from the dead, is ordained Judge of the world, we may be very certain that the juſtice, mercy, and goodneſs to be diſplayed in the future judgement, will be ſuch as all men have a common ſenſe and apprehenſion of: Unleſs we can imagine that a new rule is to be introduced, to which the Judge, and thoſe to be judged, are equally ſtrangers. Upon this foot of Scripture then, we may certainly know what the juſtice, mercy, and goodneſs are by which we muſt finally ſtand or fall; and this point being ſecured, the ſpeculation may be left to ſhift for itſelf.

3. Let us then go, 3dly, one ſtep farther, and view the conſequences of this judgement;—this ſolemn judgement, which every mortal muſt undergo. If we conſult either Scripture or reaſon, we ſhall find no evidence of any farther change to be made in our future ſtate, after judgement hath once paſſed on us. That we are accountable, and ſhall therefore be judged, reaſon teſtifies; but can ſee nothing relating to us after judgement, except the reward or the puniſhment conſequent upon it. And therefore the only concluſion to be drawn from this information is, that the condition of man will be finally determined as to happineſs or miſery, and conſequently that man muſt continue under the good or the bad effects of the laſt judgement.

ly amongſt them, becauſe his heart is open to them; and he expecteth the like affection from them again: exhorting to flee the ſociety and pollution of idolaters, as being themſelves temples of the living God.

WE then, as workers together with him, beſeech you alſo, that ye receive not the grace of God in vain.

As reaſon can ſhew us nothing beyond judgement, but that ſtate and condition which are the effect of it; ſo the Holy Scripture hath given us reaſon to think that nothing elſe there ſhall be, by deſcribing the rewards and puniſhments of another life, as having perpetual duration. Life eternal is prepared for the righteous, and everlaſting puniſhment for the wicked. The fire prepared to receive them is never to go out, the worm prepared to torment them will never die: So that in this view our All depends upon the judgement which ſhall be finally paſſed on us at the ſecond coming of our Lord; and therefore there is a juſtneſs of thought, as well as great charity to the ſouls of men, in what the Apoſtle adds,—Knowing the terror of the Lord, we perſuade men.

If the Chriſtian revelation has cleared our doubts by bringing life and immortality to light through the Goſpel; if it has given us ground for hope and confidence, by aſſuring us that we ſhall be judged by him who ſo loved us, that he gave himſelf for us, and ſubmitted to die, that we might live; it hath alſo given us ground to be watchful and careful over ourſelves, and to work out our ſalvation with fear and trembling. For it is a fearful thing to be called to anſwer for ourſelves before the great Searcher of all hearts!—to anſwer to Him who loved us, for deſpiſing the love he ſhewed us!—to anſwer to Him who died for us, for having crucified him afreſh, and put him to open ſhame; and for having accounted the blood of the covenant an unholy thing! This will be the ſad caſe of every wilful ſinner. The view of this miſery and diſtreſs, which ſinners are calling upon themſelves by their iniquity, moved the Apoſtle, and muſt ever move thoſe who ſucceed to his office, to warn men to flee from the wrath which is to come. We know the terror of the Lord, and therefore perſuade men. Happy would it be, if, knowing and conſidering theſe terrors, men would ſuffer themſelves to be perſuaded in time, and haſte for refuge unto the everlaſting hope ſet before them, in Jeſus Chriſt our Lord!

Chap. VI. Ver. 1. We then, as workers together with him] As the joint labourers of God. Doddridge. As inſtruments employed by God. Heylin. See on 1 Cor. iii. 9. Receiving the grace of God in vain, is the ſame with believing in vain, 1 Cor. xv. 2. That is, receiving the doctrine of the Goſpel for true, and profeſſing Chriſtianity without perſiſting in it, or performing what the Goſpel requires.

Ver. 2. For he ſaith] See on Iſai. xlix. 8. The Apoſtle's reaſoning is, "God, addreſſing himſelf in the paſſage produced from Iſaiah to the Meſſiah, ſpeaks of a limited time, in which the Meſſiah's petition in favour of his people was welcome to him, and in which He was ready to grant ſalvation; and behold, now is the accepted time,—Now is the precious ſeaſon, when, by the wonderful favour and goodneſs of God, complete forgiveneſs and eternal felicity are freely offered." This verſe ſhould be read in a parentheſis.

Ver. 4. In afflictions, &c.] Dr. Whitby thinks that the firſt word Θλῖψις, ſignifies affliction in general; the ſecond, Ἀνάγκη, more grievous and unavoidable troubles; and the third, στενοχωρία, ſuch preſſures as reduce us to the greateſt ſtraits. See on ch. iv. 8. The compound ſenſe, therefore, on the whole is, "We are as it were hemmed in with inevitable, and, humanly ſpeaking, inextricable calamities on every ſide." Beza interprets the word ἀκαταστασίαις, rendered tumults in the next verſe, of "ſuch attacks as a man cannot ſtand againſt, but which bear him hither and thither with violence." He would render it in Latin by exagitationibus.

Ver. 6. By pureneſs, by knowledge, &c.] By purity, or chaſtity Wat. and Heylin. "By knowledge of thoſe divine truths which it is our great buſineſs to teach others; and by the due exerciſe of that knowledge, in a conſtant command over our paſſions." Dr. Scott by knowledge underſtands Chriſtian prudence.

Ver. 7. By the armour of righteouſneſs] "While our enemies aſſault us on every ſide, it is our care ſtill to be clothed and girded about with the armour of righteouſneſs, both on the right hand and on the left; well knowing that armour to be impenetrable." On the right hand, and on the left, means on every ſide;—perfectly and entirely. Some refer it to the Chriſtian's being armed againſt the temptations of proſperity and adverſity. Mr. Locke's paraphraſe is, "By uprightneſs of mind, wherewith I am armed at all points, both to do and to ſuffer." It is ſcarce neceſſary to obſerve to the reader, how extremely ſublime and pathetic this whole paſſage is. Comp. Philip. iv. 18. 1 Tim. vi. 17. Epheſ. i. 3. Rev. xxi. 7. 1 Cor. iii. 21—23.

Ver. 11. O ye Corinthians!] Another argument made uſe of by St. Paul, to juſtify and excuſe his plainneſs of ſpeech to the Corinthians is, the great affection he has for them; into an expreſſion whereof he here breaks out in a very pathetical manner. This, with an exhortation to ſeparate themſelves from idolaters and unbelievers, is what he inſiſts upon from this place to ch. vii. 16. "O ye Corinthians! my mouth is opened to you; my heart is enlarged to you: my affection, my tenderneſs, my compliance for you is not ſtrait or narrow. It is your own narrowneſs makes you uneaſy. Let me ſpeak to you, as a father to his children: In return, do you likewiſe enlarge your affections and deference to me; be ye not aſſociated with unbelievers, (ver. 14.) have nothing to do with them in their vices or worſhip, for what fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs, &c? See Locke, and ch. vii. 1.

18 And will be a Father unto you, and ye ſhall be my ſons and daughters, ſaith the Lord Almighty.

CHAP. VII.

He proceedeth in exhorting them to purity of life, and to bear him like affection as he doth to them. Whereof leſt they might ſeem to doubt, he declareth what comfort he took in his afflictions, by the report which Titus gave of their godly ſorrow, which his former epiſtle had wrought in them, and of their loving-kindneſs and obedience towards Titus, anſwerable to his former boaſtings of them.

HAVING therefore theſe promiſes, dearly beloved, let us cleanſe ourſelves from all filthineſs of the fleſh and ſpirit, perfecting holineſs in the fear of God.

2 Receive us: we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man.

3 I ſpeak not this to condemn you: for I have ſaid before, that ye are in our hearts to die and live with you,

4 Great is my boldneſs of ſpeech toward you, great is my glorying of you: I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation.

5 For when we were come into Macedonia, our fleſh had no reſt, but we were troubled on every ſide; without were fightings, within were fears.

6 Nevertheleſs, God that comforteth thoſe that are caſt down, comforted us by the coming of Titus;

7 And not by his coming only, but by the conſolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earneſt deſire your mourning, your fervent mind toward me; ſo that I rejoiced the more.

8 For though I made you ſorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I did repent: for I perceive that the ſame epiſtle made you ſorry, though it were but for a ſeaſon.

9 Now I rejoice, not that ye were made ſorry, but that ye ſorrowed to repentance: for ye were made ſorry after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

10 For godly ſorrow worketh repentance to ſalvation, not to be repented of: but the ſorrow of the world worketh death.

11 For behold, this ſelf-ſame thing, that ye ſorrowed after a godly ſort, what carefulneſs it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourſelves; yea, what indignation; yea, what fear; yea, what vehement deſire; yea, what zeal; yea, what revenge! In all things ye have approved yourſelves to be clear in this matter.

12 Wherefore, though I wrote unto you, I did it not for his cauſe that had done the wrong, nor for his cauſe that ſuffered wrong; but that our care for you in the ſight of God might appear unto you.

this interrogation; "If God would not endure idols in any part of the land in which he dwelt, how much leſs would he endure them under his own roof?" No words in our language can equal the force of the Greek, which we render I will dwell in them;—ἐνοικήσω ἐν αὐτοῖς,—"I will take up my indwelling in them." This was a promiſe made to the Jews, on their being converted, and conſequently refers to their privileges, as members of the Chriſtian church; which ſhews the propriety of the application, Jer. xxxi. 33. xxxii. 37, 38. See Doddridge, and Peters on Job, p. 283.

Ver. 17, 18. And be ye ſeparate, ſaith the Lord] As God's promiſe of dwelling in a peculiar manner among the Jews, obliged them to ſeparate themſelves from the converſe of their heathen neighbours, that they might not be enſnared with their ſuperſtitions; much more are Chriſtians obliged by that peculiar gracious preſence of God which they enjoy, to ſeparate themſelves from all impure and idolatrous worſhip. It has been queried whence this quotation is taken. Some ſay Jer. xxxi. 1, &c. but that does not ſufficiently expreſs the paternal relation,—I will be a Father, &c. Others refer to 2 Sam. vii. 8, 14. which may be applied to Chriſt, and in him to believers. Comp. Heb. i. 4, 5. Some think it is not expreſly to be found any where, and that it refers to all the Scriptures, where God calls his people by the title of children. See Doddridge, Wetſtein, and Wolf.

Chap. VII. Ver. 1. Having therefore theſe promiſes] This verſe ſhould certainly have been connected with what goes before, and not have begun a new chapter. Some would read the latter part of it thus: From all filthineſs of the fleſh, and perfecting the holineſs of the Spirit in the fear of God. If we underſtand it according to our verſion, the meaning is, "Let us endeavour to purify ourſelves from every actual and outward defilement, and from every inward ſenſual affection which can pollute our hearts, and render them diſpleaſing to God."

Ver. 2. We have defrauded no man] The original word ſignifies, "to indulge a covetous temper, and make a prey of others by it;" and perhaps intimates, that the falſe teachers, of whom he had ſo much reaſon to complain, had done ſo. See Locke and Doddridge.

Ver. 4. Boldneſs of ſpeech] Freedom of ſpeech. Wat. and Doddridge. The word rendered exceeding joyful, ὑπερπερισσεύομαι, is very expreſſive, and ſeems to be a word of the Apoſtle's own making.

Ver. 6. Nevertheleſs] But. MS. and Wat.

Ver. 8. Though I did repent] However anxious I might before have been. Μεταμέλεια ſtrictly expreſſes an after-care and anxiety for any thing that has been done; whereas the word repent always ſignifies a wiſh that it had not been done. Now, as what St. Paul did in writing the former Epiſtle was proper, and done under the direction of the divine Spirit, it does not ſeem reaſonable to ſuppoſe that he really repented of it; and therefore the above tranſlation ſeems proper. The word may alſo ſignify a kind of miſgiving of heart; natural when the reproof, however neceſſary, is given to a perſon one tenderly loves, where the event is dubious, as it might be in this inſtance. Inſtead of but that ye ſorrowed, the MS reads, but that ye were made ſorry. Doddridge. Dr. Waterland renders the laſt clauſe, made you ſorry but for a ſeaſon. And Dr. Heylin, though but for a ſhort time.

Ver. 10, For godly ſorrow: &c.] See the Reflections.

Ver. 12. Yea, what revenge!] What puniſhment!—namely, of the inceſtuous perſon. Heylin. The word clear in this verſe anſwers very well to ἁγνὸς in the Greek: But then, "to be clear," in Engliſh, is generally underſtood to ſignify, "not to have been guilty;" which could not be the ſenſe of the Apoſtle, he having charged the Corinthians ſo warmly in his firſt Epiſtle. His meaning muſt therefore be, that they had now reſolved on a contrary courſe, and were ſo far clear; that is, were ſet right, and in good diſpoſition again, as he deſcribes it in the former part of this verſe; and therefore ἐν τῷ πράγματι, which we render in this matter, might perhaps better be rendered in fact; that is, "by your ſorrow, your fear, &c." It cannot

13 Therefore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, becauſe his ſpirit was refreſhed by you all.

14 For if I have boaſted any thing to him of you, I am not aſhamed; but as we ſpake all things to you in truth, even ſo our boaſting which I made before Titus, is found a truth.

15 And his inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilſt he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling ye received him.

16 I rejoice therefore that I have confidence in you in all things.

Ver. 15. Gr. bowels. Ch. ii. 9. Phil. ii. 12.—V. 16. 2 Theſſ. iii. 4. Philem. 8, 21.

cannot well be tranſlated in this matter, underſtanding thereby the puniſhment of the fornicator,—for that was not the matter of which St. Paul had been ſpeaking; but the Corinthians' ſiding with the falſe Apoſtle againſt him, had been the ſubject of the preceding part of this, and of the three or four foregoing chapters, wherein he juſtifies himſelf againſt their ſlanders, and invalidates the pretences of the adverſe party. This is what lay chiefly upon his heart, and what he labours both in this and the former epiſtle to rectify, as the foundation of all the diſorders amongſt them; and conſequently is that wherein he rejoices to find them all ſet right. Indeed, in the immediately following verſe he mentions his having written to them concerning the fornicator, but it is only as an argument of his kindneſs and concern for them; but that which was the great cauſe of his rejoicing, was the breaking the faction, and the reuniting them all to himſelf; which he expreſſes in the word all, emphatically uſed ver. 13, 15. and from thence he concludes thus; I rejoice therefore, that I have confidence in you in all things, ver. 16. His mind was now at reſt; the partiſans of his oppoſer having forſaken that leader in whom they had ſo much gloried, and being all now come over to him, he doubted not but all would go well, and therefore here drops the ſubject. Locke.

Ver. 16. I rejoice therefore, &c.] The addreſs of all this part of the Epiſtle is ſtriking and excellent; this verſe in particular finely introduces what he had to ſay in the following chapter, and is ſtrongly illuſtrated by ch. ix. 2 to 4. Doddridge.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VII. 10.

From the conſideration of the different effects of worldly, and of religious ſorrow here recorded, the Apoſtle with no leſs truth than art inſinuates to the Corinthians, how really he had acted the part of a friend towards them, in bringing them to a due ſenſe of ſorrow for the ſins they had committed.—But it is the part of a friend to eaſe our minds of grief, to ſtep in between us and ſorrow, and to make us, as far as it is poſſible, forget our misfortunes. Why then, it may be aſked, do the miniſters of Chriſt perpetually ſuggeſt new fears to us, and ſtill labour to awaken our ſouls to a ſenſe of their miſery, and to fill us with ſorrow, by continually repreſenting to us the greatneſs of our loſs?—To this let the Apoſtle anſwer for himſelf, and for all, (as in ver. 9.) I rejoiced, not that ye were made ſorry, but that ye ſorrowed to repentance.

If from worldly ſorrow there can ariſe nothing but certain woe and miſery; if the anguiſh of mind produces feebleneſs of body, and the lamenting our paſt misfortunes, renders us incapable of the enjoyments which are preſent; happy is the man who can bear up againſt afflictions, and with an undiſturbed mind ſubmit to thoſe evils which no ſorrow can either alleviate or prevent. But, if in godly ſorrow the effects are juſt contrary; if grief can blot out the guilt of ſins paſt, and preſerve us from the infection for the time to come; if it brings eaſe to the wounded ſpirit, and makes us to be at peace with ourſelves and with God: If it renders life comfortable, and death not terrible; if it rids us of fear for the preſent, and fills us with hope full of future glory; how happy then are they, who go to the houſe of mourning, and by a wiſe choice eſcape the puniſhment of ſin, by ſubmitting to the ſorrow of it!

How theſe bleſſed fruits grow out of godly ſorrow, will appear from the words in queſtion; whence we may obſerve,

1. That ſorrow is diſtinguiſhed from repentance; for godly ſorrow is ſaid to work repentance,—and is therefore ſuppoſed to have the ſame relation to it, that the cauſe has to its effect. In common ſpeech we are apt to ſpeak of ſorrow for ſin under the name of repentance, and to aſcribe to it that effect which belongs only to repentance. But the Apoſtle here has plainly another notion of repentance, ſince the common notion would create an abſurdity: For if by repentance we underſtand ſorrow for ſin, the Apoſtle muſt then be underſtood to ſay, "That godly ſorrow produces ſorrow for ſin; that is, that godly ſorrow produces itſelf;" ſince that only is godly ſorrow, which is upon the account of ſin. Repentance therefore is diſtinct from ſorrow, as it is wrought by it; and properly denotes "a change of mind;" which is indeed the natural effect of godly ſorrow, and the neceſſary condition of ſalvation. And ſo diſtinct is this change of mind from ſorrow, that of all its effects it is the happieſt; eaſe and comfort attend on it, joy and hope flow from it: This is a change not to be repented of; it can never cauſe us any grief or pain, or give us reaſon to lament any effect proceeding from it.

Sorrow then is not repentance, though it be the cauſe of repentance in moſt caſes. The alliance between them will be beſt explained by conſidering the nature of ſorrow in general, and the impreſſions it makes upon every man's mind. Whatever is the cauſe of ſorrow, muſt needs be the cauſe of averſion too; ſince to take pleaſure in the thing that grieves us, and cauſes us pain, is a contradiction in nature. Sin eſpecially cannot be the cauſe of our ſorrow, but it muſt be likewiſe of our averſion; the natural conſequence of which is repentance, or a change of mind. Thus we ſee how conſequentially a change of mind ariſes from godly ſorrow, or ſorrow from ſin.

2. This godly ſorrow, ſecondly, is not ſaid to work ſalvation immediately, and of itſelf, but by means of that repentance, or change of mind, which it produceth. Which ſhews that a change of mind, and conſequently a change of life, is abſolutely neceſſary towards the obtaining the mercy and forgiveneſs of God; and that it is to little purpoſe to lament our ſins, unleſs we reſolve to forſake them. So many are the ſad effects of ſin, with reſpect to this world, that the ſinner who has no fear of God before his eyes, has reaſon enough to be ſorry for his ſins. But ſorrow ariſing from theſe motives is mere worldly ſorrow: One man laments the decay of his health; another the loſs of his reputation; and a third the ruin of his fortune; and very often one laments the loſs of all; and equally would they have lamented theſe loſſes, had they come from any other cauſe beſides ſin. He that is ſorry for his ſin, merely becauſe it hath deſtroyed his health, would have been as ſorry had a fever deſtroyed it; and he that grieves for the loſs of his fortune, would have grieved in the ſame manner, if fire, or the raging ſea had been his undoing. From whence it is plain, that in ſuch ſorrow as this, no regard is had to God; whom yet we are principally to reſpect in our repentance, as being the perſon againſt whom we have offended, and whoſe mercy and pardon we labour to obtain.

In true ſorrow that produces repentance, the ſenſe of our guilt is a great ingredient, as well as the ſenſe of our miſery. The very hopes we have of obtaining pardon at the hand of God, will fill our minds with indignation at ourſelves, for having offended ſo gracious a Maſter; for, if we can think him good to forgive us, we muſt needs think ourſelves wicked, and loſt to all ſenſe of gratitude and goodneſs, that we could offend ſo kind and compaſſionate a Lord. In ſhort, fear, zeal, indignation, every paſſion will be rouſed to act its part in making us hate ourſelves and our iniquities, and will never let us be at peace with our own hearts, till we have purged ourſelves of every evil luſt, and conſecrated them anew to the ſervice of our Maſter:—And this is that true repentance unto ſalvation never to be repented of.

Fear may ſometimes prevail againſt the power of luſt, and the wretch who hates to think of God, may yet not be able to exclude the fear and dread of him. When the flames of hell play before the ſinner's eyes, and guilt, conſcious of its own deſerts, fills the imagination with all the horrors of damnation; in this caſe there will never want ſorrow, though perhaps there be no ſigns of repentance. Thus Judas grieved; in his grief he died; and in his death he found the pains of hell!

In the Goſpel there are no promiſes made to grief and ſorrow; the mercies of God are offered upon the condition of repentance. Sorrow that produces not repentance,—that is, a thorough change and reformation,—is of no account in the ſight of God. Such ſorrow may be the ſinner's due; if he ſuffers under it, he has but his reward: it is the puniſhment of his iniquity, but can never be the condition of his pardon.

One would think this were too plain a caſe to be miſtaken; and yet, ſo commonly is it miſtaken, that repentance is grown almoſt into a form and method, and inſtead of reforming their ſins, men ſet themſelves ſo many days to be ſorry for them. Alas! it is a fruitleſs grief; and they may aſſure themſelves their hopes of pardon will be as empty and deluſive as their ſorrow. Were men once truly ſenſible of their guilt, there would need no art to produce ſorrow, no rules whereby to limit their grief; nature would be the beſt inſtructor, and teach us to lament our miſery and our guilt with unſought tears and groans. Were we ſincere, we ſhould naturally fly the viper that had ſtung us, and not cheriſh and careſs the venemous animal, while with falſe tears we bathe the wound we have received.

Repentance unto life is the gift of God to a ſinful world, and the greateſt that heaven ever beſtowed upon it: For though Nature is no ſtranger to the grief and ſorrow of repentance, yet is repentance our title to life through the Goſpel of Chriſt Jeſus. And therefore, when the Gentiles were admitted to be partakers of the Goſpel, and the news thereof was brought to the Apoſtles and brethren at Jeruſalem, they bleſſed God for his great goodneſs in having granted to the Gentiles alſo repentance unto life. Acts xi. 18.

3. The nature of this godly repentance will be better underſtood, by comparing it with worldly ſorrow, and ſhewing the difference between them. Now worldly ſorrow is ſaid immediately to work death: It brings forth nothing analogous to repentance, but does rather confirm the evil diſpoſitions from which it grows.

There is ſuch a connection between the paſſions, that one cannot be powerfully ſet on work, but it muſt move and engage the others in their ſeveral ſpheres. Thus, ver. 11. the Apoſtle tells us, that the godly ſorrow of the Corinthians produced fear, indignation, zeal,

CHAP. VIII.

He ſtirreth them up to a liberal contribution for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, by the example of the Macedonians, by commendation of their former forwardneſs, by the example of Chriſt, and by the ſpiritual profit that ſhall redound to themſelves thereby: commending to them the integrity and willingneſs of Titus, and thoſe other brethren, who, upon his requeſt, exhortation, and commendation, were purpoſely come to them for this buſineſs.

MOreover, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God beſtowed on the churches of Macedonia;

2 How that in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy, and their deep poverty, abounded unto the riches of their liberality.

3 For to their power, I bear record, yea, and beyond their power, they were willing of themſelves;

4 Praying us with much intreaty, that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowſhip of the miniſtering to the ſaints.

5 And this they did, not as we hoped, but firſt gave their own ſelves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God:

6 Inſomuch that we deſired Titus, that as he had begun, ſo he would alſo finiſh in you the ſame grace alſo.

7 Therefore, as ye abound in every thing, in faith, in utterance, and in knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us; ſee that ye abound in this grace alſo.

8 I ſpeak not by commandment, but by occaſion of the forwardneſs of others, and to prove the ſincerity of your love.

9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that though he was rich, yet for your ſakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich.

10 And herein I give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before,

Ver. 2. Mark xii. 44. Gr. ſimplicity.—V. 4. Acts xi. 29. Rom. xv. 26. 1 Cor. xvi. 1. Ch. ix. 1.—V. 7. 1 Cor. i. 5.—V. 8. 1 Cor. vii. 6.—V. 9. Luke ix. 58. Phil. ii. 7.—V. 10. 1 Cor. vii. 25. Prov. xix. 17. Matth. x. 42.

and vehement deſire and revenge. And thus it muſt be: Whatever afflicts us is the object of our hatred and fear; whatever we lament the loſs of, that we muſt needs vehemently deſire and long after; and our grief for the loſs will rouſe us to recover, if poſſible, the thing we lament for.

This being agreed, we need only conſider the cauſes from which worldly ſorrow and godly ariſe, to ſee the workings of both, and the different effects which they muſt produce. In all godly ſorrow we grieve for having enjoyed too much of the world, to the hazard of loſing the more valuable pleaſures of immortality: In worldly ſorrow we lament our having had too little of the world. It is evident then that ſorrow in one caſe will make us fly from the world and its allurements; in the other it will render us but the more eager to purſue and overtake them. In the one caſe ſorrow does as it were new-make the man, gives him new deſires and diſpoſitions of mind, teaches him to ſhun the pleaſures he once embraced with eager appetite, and to ſeek new joys and comforts, to which before he was a ſtranger. In the other caſe, grief confirms the old habits, quickens the old deſires, and makes a man ten times more worldly-minded than he was before; ſo that his laſt ſtate is even worſe than his firſt. Which will further appear by conſidering,

4. That the death which is wrought by worldly ſorrow is oppoſed to the ſalvation which follows repentance, and may therefore ſignify eternal death, as well as temporal; the truth of the propoſition admitting either or both of theſe explications.

The natural effect of grief, conſidered as ſuch, is to waſte and impair the ſtrength, to deaden the faculties of the mind, and to make a man uſeleſs to himſelf and his friends. But then here lies the difference between godly ſorrow and worldly. The firſt, in every ſtep, tends to peace and joy, and its moſt natural effect is to deſtroy itſelf, and leave the mind in perfect eaſe and tranquility. The ſinner's tears, though they ſpring from grief, are yet the moſt ſovereign cordial to an afflicted heart, and like ſhowers in ſummer, portend a cooler and more refreſhing air. But worldly ſorrow knows no reſt, has no period; it ſtill urges men to new purſuits after the world, and the world has new diſappointments in reſerve to baffle all their eager care. Every diſappointment is a new occaſion of grief, and the whole gain of this paſſion for the world being fairly computed, amounts to this,—Vanity and vexation of ſpirit.

Thus the caſe ſtands, if we regard only the comforts of this life. Sorrow for ſin produces the pleaſure of righteouſneſs, which is a perpetual ſpring of joy and ſpiritual conſolation; whilſt the worldly man, purſuing falſe enjoyments, is ever reaping real torments. But if we change the ſcene,—if we look into the other world, the difference grows wider ſtill. The time is coming when the tears of repentance ſhall be wiped away; when the ſinner's grief ſhall ſtand between him and judgement; and the ſhame which he took to himſelf, ſhall protect him from ſhame at the great appearance of the eternal world. Whereas worldly ſorrow will then have an heavy account to paſs: thoſe tears, thoſe guilty tears, which were ſhed for the tranſitory pleaſures of mortality, will riſe up in judgement againſt the ſinner's ſoul, and fearfully exclude him from the joys of that divine life, which endureth for evermore.—The ſorrow of the world worketh DEATH!

Chap. VIII. Ver. 1. The Apoſtle having employed the ſeven foregoing chapters in his own juſtification, and having in the cloſe expreſſed the great ſatisfaction he had in their being all united again in their affection and obedience to him, exhorts them in this and the following chapter, by the example of the churches of Macedonia particularly, to unite in a liberal contribution for the poor Chriſtians in Judea.

Inſtead of we do you to wit, &c. Dr. Waterland, Mr. Locke, and others read, we make known unto you the godly charity given by the churches of Macedonia. Χαρις, which is tranſlated grace in our verſion, is here uſed by St. Paul for gift, or liberality, and is ſo uſed, ver. 4, 6, 7, 9, 19. and 1 Cor. xvi. 3. It is called the gift of God, becauſe God is the author and procurer of it, moving mens hearts thereto. Beſides, διδομενην ἐν cannot ſignify beſtowed on, but given in, or by. See Whitby and Locke.

Ver. 2. In a great trial of affliction] How ill-diſpoſed the Macedonians were to the Chriſtians, may be ſeen Acts xvi, and 17. Inſtead of abounded, Dr. Waterland reads hath abounded.

Ver. 3. For to—yea, and beyond their power] This is a noble hyperbole; like that of Demoſthenes, "I have performed all, even with an induſtry beyond my power." The preſent and following verſes are thus connected and read by Bengelius: For to their power, (I bear record,) yea, beyond their power, of their own accord, beſeeching us with much intreaty, they gave to us the liberality, and the communication of the miniſtry to the ſaints; and this, not in the manner in which we preſumed to hope, but firſt giving themſelves to God, and then to us by the will of God.

Ver. 6. As he had begun, &c.] "As he had begun the collection among you, ſo he would alſo finiſh it." Heylin; who, inſtead of grace in the next verſe, reads work of Charity. See ver. 1, and 9.

Ver. 8. And to prove the ſincerity of your love] The genuine temper, &c. Wat. and Locke. St. Paul, who is ſo careful all through this Epiſtle to ſhew his eſteem and good opinion of the Corinthians, taking all occaſions to ſpeak and preſume well of them, (whereof we have an eminent example in the immediately preceding verſe,) could not in this place ſo far forget his deſign of treating them very tenderly now they were returned to him, as to tell them, that he ſent Titus for the promoting their contribution, to make a trial of the ſincerity of their love: This had been but an ill expreſſion of that confidence, which in ch. vii. 16. he tells them, he had in them in all things. Taking therefore, as we may, without violence to the words, δοκιμαζων for drawing out a proof, and γνήσιον for genuine, the paſſage may be well rendered ſhewing the world a proof of the genuine temper of your love; and thus properly expreſs St. Paul's obliging way of ſtirring up the Corinthians to a liberal contribution: For his diſcourſe briefly ſtands thus: "The great liberality of the poor Macedonians made me ſend Titus to you, to finiſh the collection of your charity, which he had begun; that you, who excel in all other virtues, might be eminent in this alſo. But I urge this not as a commandment from God, but, upon occaſion of the liberality of others, preſent you with an opportuity of giving the world a proof of the genuine temper of your charity, which, like that of your other virtues, will not bear to be out-done." Locke.

Ver. 9. Ye know the grace of our Lord, &c.] Rather, the munificence, or liberality;—the ſignification wherein St. Paul uſes χάρις frequently in this chapter. Heylin renders it the bounty.

Ver. 10. But alſo to be forward] But alſo to exert yourſelves. MS. Dr. Heylin reads the latter part of this verſe, who have not only begun already to make a collection, but alſo were the firſt that propoſed it a year ag not only to do, but alſo to be forward a year ago.

11 Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readineſs to will, ſo there may be a performance alſo out of that which ye have.

12 For if there be firſt a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not.

13 For I mean not that other men be eaſed, and you burdened:

14 But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a ſupply for their want, and their abundance alſo may be a ſupply for your want; that there may be equality:

15 As it is written, He that had gathered much, had nothing over; and he that had gathered little, had no lack.

16 But thanks be to God, which put the ſame earneſt care into the heart of Titus for you.

17 For indeed he accepted the exhortation; but being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you.

18 And we have ſent with him the brother, whoſe praiſe is in the goſpel, throughout all the churches;

19 (And not that only, but who was alſo choſen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is adminiſtered by us to the glory of the ſame Lord, and declaration of your ready mind:)

20 Avoiding this, that no man ſhould blame us in this abundance which is adminiſtered by us:

21 Providing for honeſt things, not only in the ſight of the Lord, but alſo in the ſight of men.

22 And we have ſent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which I have in you.

23 Whether any do enquire of Titus, he is my partner, and fellow-helper concerning you: or our brethren be enquired of, they are the meſſengers of the churches, and the glory of Chriſt.

24 Wherefore, ſhew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love, and of our boaſting on your behalf.

CHAP. IX.

He yieldeth the reaſon why, though he knew their forwardneſs, yet he ſent Titus and his brethren beforehand: and proceedeth in ſtirring them up to a bountiful alms, as being but a kind of ſowing of ſeed, which ſhall return a great increaſe to them, and occaſion a great ſacrifice of thankſgivings unto God.

FOR as touching the miniſtering to the ſaints, it is ſuperfluous for me to write to you:

ago. He goes on to the next verſe, Now therefore compleat it; that as you readily undertook it, ſo you may as readily perform it, each man according to his ability.

Ver. 14. But by an equality] But that of an equality your abundance, &c. Doddridge. I would only recommend an equality. Heylin. The Apoſtle does not mean that Chriſtians are obliged to be all upon a level, but that there ought to be ſuch mutual aſſiſtance and relief amongſt them, as that the wants and neceſſities of all might be ſupplied; and in that ſenſe the moſt indigent might be brought nearer to an equality with the rich. The Chriſtians at Jeruſalem, for a good while, were in want of nothing; they who had lands or poſſeſſions ſold them, and they had all things in common: but now, at the diſtance of five and twenty years from that æra, the frequent loſſes they endured by confiſcations, &c. the increaſe of the number of Chriſtians, and the gradual conſumption of the money ariſing from ſales, reduced them to great extremities of poverty. But though the Jews were poor and oppreſſed, the Corinthians were rich and proſperous; and therefore there was no reaſon to expect that what the Apoſtle here mentions would ever happen to the latter,—that their [the Jews'] abundance ſhould be a ſupply for the want of the Corinthians. To this it may be ſufficient to reply, that all human affairs are unſtable and uncertain; Corinth itſelf, from great proſperity, had been utterly undone in the Roman war by Memmius ſome time before; or; ſuppoſing that no ſuch event ſhould happen to them again, yet particular perſons might be diſtreſſed, or the whole body of Chriſtians there reduced by perſecutions, though their city continued to flouriſh. See Doddridge, Wall, Grotius, and Calmet.

Ver. 15. He that had gathered much, &c.] See the note on Exod. xvi. 18.

Ver. 18. The brother, whoſe praiſe is in the Goſpel] This is generally ſuppoſed to have been St. Luke, who now was, and had been a long while St. Paul's companion in his travels. Many ancient Chriſtians underſtood the expreſſion, whoſe praiſe in the Goſpel is in all the churches, as referring to the univerſal approbation with which St. Luke's Goſpel was every where received. This may be included; but the Apoſtle's meaning ſeems more extenſive: "Whoſe praiſe is in the Goſpel, on account of the various and eminent ſervices which he has done for the intereſts of Chriſtianity, wherever his influence has extended, both by his writings and exhortations." See Locke, Whitby, Wall, and Gordon at Boyle's Lectures, p. 482.

Ver. 19. And not that only, &c.] This verſe is to be included in a parentheſis, and the continued ſenſe of ver. 18 and 20 will be, We have ſent that brother—to avoid blame, &c. Dr. Heylin tranſlates and connects the verſes from 18 to 21 thus: A brother, who is not only famous for his ſucceſs in preaching the Goſpel, ver. 19. but alſo is particularly appointed by the churches to accompany me with this collection, which we ſhall diſpoſe of to the glory of God, and agreeably to your good intention. ver. 20. (I have uſed this precaution [in having one joined with me] to prevent any ſuſpicion that might be raiſed, upon my having the management of ſo large a ſum; ver. 21. For I am careful to conduct myſelf unblameably, not only in the ſight of the Lord, but alſo in the ſight of men.)

Ver. 22, 23. And we have ſent, &c.] We likewiſe ſend with them, [Luke and Titus,] another brother [Apollos,] whoſe zeal we have experienced upon many occaſions; and he is now more than ordinarily intent upon this, through the great confidence he has in you. ver. 23. For as to Titus, he is my companion and aſſiſtant in your affairs, and the other brethren are deputies of the churches, and [have been inſtruments of] the glory of Chriſt. Heylin. Some critics propoſe a comma only at the end of the 22d verſe, and would connect the two thus; We have ſent with them our brother—in the great confidence which we have in you, both on account of Titus, my partner and fellow-labourer for you; and in regard to our brethren, the Apoſtles or meſſengers of the churches, and the glory of Chriſt. It is a great character which the Apoſtle gives of theſe brethren,—"the appointed and diſtinguiſhed meſſengers of the churches, and the glory of Chriſt;—men by whom the name of Chriſt is glorified." He had ſaid of himſelf and them before, ver. 21. that they provided for things honeſt, &c. willing that any one might inſpect their accounts, both on the creditor and debtor's ſide; a conduct eſpecially neceſſary for all thoſe who are intruſted with the diſtribution of charity. See Wall, Eſtius, and Bengelius.

Chap. IX. Ver. 1. For as touching the miniſtering to the ſaints] Now concerning the miniſtration to the ſaints, it is ſuperfluous that I ſhould write further to you. Doddridge. It is ſuperfluous for me to write more to you, about the aſſiſtance which is preparing for the ſaints; ver. 2. For I am convinced of your generous inclination, and have boaſted of it to them, &c. —ſo that your zeal hath excited many others. Heylin. By Achaia in this verſe, is meant the church of Corinth; which was made up of the inhabitants of that town, and of the circumjacent parts of Achaia. See ch. i. 1.

mind, for which I boaſt of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath provoked very many.

3 Yet have I ſent the brethren, leſt our boaſting of you ſhould be in vain in this behalf; that as I ſaid, ye may be ready:

4 Leſt haply, if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we ſay not, ye) ſhould be aſhamed in this ſame confident boaſting.

5 Therefore I thought it neceſſary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the ſame might be ready as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetouſneſs.

6 But this I ſay, He which ſoweth ſparingly, ſhall reap alſo ſparingly; and he which ſoweth bountifully, ſhall reap alſo bountifully.

7 Every man according as he purpoſeth in his heart, ſo let him give; not grudgingly, or of neceſſity: for God loveth a chearful giver.

8 And God is able to make all grace abound towards you; that ye always having all ſufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work:

9 (As it is written, He hath diſperſed abroad; he hath given to the poor: his righteouſneſs remaineth for ever.

10 Now he that miniſtereth ſeed to the ſower, both miniſter bread for your food, and multiply your ſeed ſown, and increaſe the fruits of your righteouſneſs;)

11 Being enriched in every thing to all bountifulneſs, which cauſeth through us thankſgiving to God.

12 For the adminiſtration of this ſervice, not only ſupplieth the want of the ſaints, but is abundant alſo by many thankſgivings unto God;

13 (Whilſt by the experiment of this miniſtration they glorify God for your profeſſed ſubjection unto the goſpel of Chriſt, and for your liberal diſtribution unto them, and unto all men;)

14 And by their prayer for you, which long after you for the exceeding grace of God in you.

15 Thanks be unto God for his unſpeakable gift!

Ver. 5. Whereof he had notice before] Which had been ſpoken of before, namely, to the Macedonian Chriſtians. ver. 2. Dr. Waterland, following a different reading [προεπαγγελμενην] renders it before promiſed. The word πλεονεξίαν, rendered covetouſneſs, ſignifies a kind of extortion, by which money is as it were wrung by importunity from perſons of a covetous diſpoſition; and by ſuch perſeverance and obſtinacy as covetous people themſelves make uſe of, where their own gain is concerned. And thus it is oppoſed to εὐλογία; what is readily given, and comes as it were with a bleſſing. See Doddridge and Raphelius.

Ver. 8. All grace] Rather charitable gift, or liberality; as χαρις ſignifies in the former chapter and as the context determines the ſenſe here. Markland is of opinion that ἔργον, work, at the end of this verſe, is brought in from the margin: which ſpoils the writer's ſenſe; who ſpeaks of abounding in every good, meaning riches; not moral good, which ἔργον ἀγαθὸν implies.

Ver. 10. Now he that miniſtereth, &c.] Now may he that miniſtereth ſeed to the ſower, and bread for food, both miniſter and multiply your ſeed, and increaſe the fruits of your beneficence. See Iſai. lv. 10. Matth. vi. 1, Locke, Piſcator, and Bengelius.

Ver. 11. Being enriched, &c.] This ſhould be connected with ver. 8. the 9th and 10th being in a parentheſis.

Ver. 12. The adminiſtration of this ſervice] This uſe of the word λειτουργία intimates, that it was to be conſidered not merely as an act of humanity, but of religion; moſt pleaſing to God, and ſuitable to the nature of the Goſpel diſpenſation. Comp. Heb. xiii. 16. and ſee the note on Rom. xv. 25.

Ver. 13. Whilſt by the experiment, &c.] Having this proof of your charity; they will glorify God on account of that ſubjection to the Goſpel of Chriſt which you profeſs, and for your liberal diſtribution to them, as well as others: ver. 14. And they will pray for you, and bear a tender affection to you, upon account of the eminent grace which God hath beſtowed upon you. Heylin, and Doddridge.

Ver. 15 Thanks be unto God, &c.!] Dr. Whitby underſtands this in the ſenſe following: "I adore God for this charitable temper in you, and other ſincere Chriſtians, by which God is glorified, the Goſpel adorned, the poor ſaints are refreſhed, and you fitted for an exceeding great reward." And thus underſtood, it is as remarkable a text as moſt in the Bible, to ſhew that every good affection in the human heart is to be aſcribed to a divine influence. Others however think, that as the invaluable gift of Chriſt was ſo familiar to the Apoſtle's mind, he rather, by a ſtrong and natural tranſition, glances on that. It appears, I think, plainly enough, that by the unſpeakable gift, the Apoſtle means that exceeding grace of God—his precious gift to the world through Chriſt, which he ſpeaks of in the preceding verſe, as bringing forth ſuch excellent fruits in the Corinthians. See Whitby, Doddridge, and L'Enfant.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VIII. AND IX.

How peculiarly amiable does the Chriſtian liberality of theſe Macedonians appear (ch. viii. 1, 2.) when conſidered as abounding in a great trial of affliction, and in the depth of their poverty!—yet a poverty mingled with an abundance of joy, on account of that rich and happy ſtate into which the Goſpel had brought them, and the firſt-fruits of that glorious inheritance to which they were intitled by the tenor of it. They were willing of themſelves to contribute even beyond their power, (ver. 3.) as perſons of common generoſity would have eſtimated it. Nor did they, on their dying beds, repent ſuch an uſe of their property, or wiſh that it had been ſpent in gratifying their appetites, or hoarded for thoſe they were to leave behind them: nor do they now regret theſe liberalities, or complain that their expected harveſt is periſhed.

May we remember their example for imitation; nor let any, who have a mite to ſpare, be wholly deficient, how low ſoever their circumſtances may be; remembering that gracious complacency with which, where there is a willing mind, the ſmalleſt tribute to the treaſury of God is accepted;—according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not. ver. 12. To elevate us to the moſt generous efforts of overflowing benevolence, may we ever bear in mind that grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, of which we all know ſomething, but which it is impoſſible we ſhould ever fully know, becauſe it paſſeth knowledge;—that grace, which engaged him, when rich, for our ſakes to become poor, that we might be enriched by his poverty. ver. 9. What have we, that deſerves to be called a poſſeſſion, which we do not hold by an act of divine bounty and grace?

Let us then conſider ourſelves as under indiſpenſable engagements, in conſequence of it, to conſecrate our all to him, conſcious that our all is but a low return for the infinite obligations under which he hath laid us. He hath contrived and determined that the poor, in ſome form or other, we ſhould always have with us, that we may do them good as a token of our gratitude to him. Let us faithfully aim to ſupply their need; and he who hath moſt, will have no ſuperfluity to throw away upon the luſts or vanities of life; and he who hath leaſt, will have no unſupplied lack: ver. 15. Thus the poor will rejoice in the relief of their neceſſities; and the rich, in the happieſt and moſt delightful uſe of their abundance.

The tenderneſs of miniſters, in all points where the comfort and edification of the church is concerned, is indeed matter of the higheſt moment; and where it is remarkable in its degree, it affords juſt cauſe of thankſgivings to God; for it is he who puts into their hearts that earneſt care; who excites and maintains every ſentiment of benevolence, when they offer themſelves willingly to any generous and charitable ſervice. ver. 16, 17. It is grace which has communicated whatever good is done; and it ought to be aſcribed to the glory of the ſame Lord from whom it comes; nor can it fail to loſe much of its value, if it be not directed to this ultimate, this ſupreme end.

CHAP. X.

Againſt the falſe apoſtles, who diſgraced the weakneſs of his perſon and bodily preſence, he ſetteth out the ſpiritual might and authority with which he is armed againſt all adverſary powers; aſſuring them, that at his coming he will be found as mighty in word, as he is now in writing, being abſent: and withal taxing them for reaching out themſelves beyond their compaſs, and vaunting themſelves into other men's labours.

NOW I Paul myſelf beſeech you, by the meekneſs and gentleneſs of Chriſt, who in preſence am baſe among you, but being abſent am bold toward you.

2 But I beſeech you, that I may not be bold when I am preſent, with that confidence wherewith I think to be bold againſt ſome, which think of us, as if we walked according to the fleſh.

3 For though we walk in the fleſh, we do not war after the fleſh:

4 (For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God, to the pulling down of ſtrong holds;)

5 Caſting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itſelf againſt the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Chriſt;

6 And having in a readineſs to revenge all diſobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled.

Ver. 1. Rom. xii. 1. Or, in outward appearance.—V. 2. 1 Cor. iv. 21. Ch. xiii. 10. Or, reckon.—V. 4. Epheſ. vi. 13. 1 Tim. i. 18. Acts vii. 22. Or, to God. Jer. i. 10.—V. 5. Or, reaſonings.—V. 6. Ch. ii. 9.

When the Corinthians deſired to depoſit their alms in the hands of St. Paul, (ver. 20.) they certainly acted a very wiſe part, as no man living could have rendered them more ſecure, as to the fidelity or the diſcretion of the diſtribution: and yet we ſee, that high as the Apoſtle's character ſtood, and though he had ſo often given, and was daily renewing ſuch ſtriking demonſtrations both of his wiſdom and integrity,—he neverthelеſs would not undertake the truſt alone, but uſed all proper methods to approve his exactneſs in the management thereof, even to ſtrangers; providing things honeſt and laudable, not only in the ſight of God, but alſo of men. ver. 21.

May miniſters be often thus employed, as the almoners of perſons richer than themſelves;—(as their readineſs to help the poor in their temporal affairs may, and has often been found greatly to promote their uſefulneſs in ſpirituals,) and may they appear to have managed their truſt with the like conſcious and delicate honour. May they ſhew a diſpoſition like that of St. Paul, to aſſiſt in eſtabliſhing and advancing the characters of their younger brethren, and introducing them into eſteem and confidence. ver. 23. Thus will they indeed moſt effectually ſtrengthen their own hands, and edify and comfort the churches: thus will they prove the glory of Chriſt themſelves in the preſent age, and be the means of raiſing up others, who may eminently deſerve that illuſtrious title in ſucceeding generations.

Let us obſerve with pleaſure the happy addreſs of the Apoſtle, ch. ix. 2. a felicity, not the reſult of craft, but of that amiable temper which was ſo natural to him. He pleads the high opinion he had entertained of his Corinthian friends, and the honourable things he had ſaid of them; ver. 5. expreſſing his perſuaſion of their readineſs to give, as a matter of bounty, not of conſtraint. He leads them to the inexhauſtible ſtores of the divine liberality, from which they had received their preſent all; from which he wiſhes they may receive more and more: and this not that theſe ſupplies might be ignobly conſumed in ſelf-gratifications, but employed in acts of the nobleſt beneficence. ver. 5—8. He repreſents to them the thankſgivings it had already occaſioned to GOD, the refreſhment it had adminiſtered to the ſaints, the honour it did to their character and profeſſion, and the eſteem and friendſhip for them, which it excited in the minds of thoſe, who, though unacquainted with them, were well affected towards their happineſs, in conſequence of this honourable ſpecimen of their character. ver. 9—13. Who could withſtand the force of ſuch oratory? No doubt it was effectual to cultivate the temper it applauded, and to add a rich abundance to the fruits of their righteouſneſs.

Let us then apply the thoughts here ſuggeſted for our own inſtruction, to excite us to abound in acts of liberality, and to preſent them to God with that chearfulneſs which he loves. To him let us continually look, to make all grace abound in us, and ſeek a ſufficiency in all things relating to this preſent life, chiefly that we may be ready to every good work; that ſo our liberality may ſtill endure, and that the multiplication of our ſeed ſown may increaſe the fruits of our righteouſneſs. To God be the praiſe of all aſcribed. He miniſters ſeed to the ſower; He ſupplies bread for food; (ver. 10.) He calls up the bleſſings of harveſt; He enſures the advantages of commerce. May we praiſe him ourſelves, and by the ready communication of the good things which he hath given us to thoſe that want, not only ſupply their neceſſities, but give them cauſe to abound in thankſgiving to God, as well as in prayer for us; while they ſee and acknowledge that exceeding grace, which is the ſpring of every generous motion in the human heart, and to which therefore be the glory of all!

To conclude, happy ſhall we be, if we learn that pious and evangelical turn of thought ſuggeſted by St. Paul, ver. 15. if by all the other gifts of God, we are thus led up to the firſt and greateſt unſpeakable gift of his love and mercy to ſinful men. From thence ſurely we may encourage our hopes of whatever elſe is neceſſary and deſirable; for, as this great Apoſtle elſewhere argues,—he that ſpared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how is it poſſible that he ſhould not be ready with him alſo freely to give us all things that are truly good for us! Rom. viii, 32.

Chap. X. Ver. 1.] St. Paul having finiſhed his exhortation to liberality in the collection for the Chriſtians at Jeruſalem, he reſumes his former argument, and proſecutes the main purpoſe of this Epiſtle; which was totally to reduce and put a final end to the adverſe faction,—which ſeems not yet to be intirely extinct,—by bringing the Corinthians wholly off from the falſe apoſtle, to whom they had adhered, and to re-eſtabliſh himſelf and his authority in the minds of all the members of that church. Thinking it fit to forbear all ſeverity, till he had by fair means reduced as many of the contrary party as he could, (ſee ver. 6.) he begins his diſcourſe here by conjuring them by the meekneſs and gentleneſs of Chriſt, as an example which might excuſe his delay of inflicting puniſhment upon the ringleaders and chief offenders, without giving them reaſon to think it was for want of power. It ſeems very probable that they had upbraided and reflected upon him in ſome ſuch language as that in the cloſe of the verſe: But there was a ſenſe in which he was indeed lowly amongſt them, his preſence having nothing majeſtic. See ver. 10. Doddridge, and Locke. Inſtead of baſe, Dr. Waterland and Heylin read mean.

Ver. 2. As if we walked according to the fleſh] "As if in my conduct and miniſtry I regulated myſelf wholly by carnal conſiderations, by low and mercenary views." Locke.

Ver. 3. For though we walk, &c.] "For though we inhabit mortal bodies, and are obliged in ſome reſpects to ſtoop to the care of them; yet we do not manage that important war in which we are engaged, according to the fleſh; by carnal methods, or with worldly and intereſted views." Doddridge and Locke. Cradock explains this ſomewhat differently: "Though we are not free from a mixture of human infirmities, yet I do not exerciſe my apoſtolical power in a weak manner, as either fearing or flattering men; but uſe ſuch ſpiritual weapons, as Chriſtian fortitude, zeal, freedom in ſpeaking the truths of God, and courage in adminiſtering the cenſures of the church; which, through the divine concurrence are very effectual." An ingenious critic would render the verſe thus: For, walking IN the fleſh, not ACCORDING TO the fleſh, we carry on our warfare. See Junius and Oſterman.

Ver. 4. (For the weapons of our warfare, &c.] What are the carnal weapons, and thoſe oppoſed to them, which he calls mighty through God, [exceeding powerful. Wat. and MS.] may be ſeen, if we read and comp. 1 Cor. i. 23, 24. with the 2d chapter, 1—13. and 2 Cor. iv. 2—6. Locke.

Ver. 5. And bringing into captivity every thought] The ſoul ſeeing its fortifications demoliſhed, ſubmits to the conqueror, and then every thought, every reaſoning takes law from him. Nothing is admitted which contradicts the Goſpel, Chriſt being acknowledged as abſolute maſter. The former clauſe ſhews how ready men are to fortify themſelves againſt him, and to raiſe as it were one barrier behind another, to obſtruct his entrance into the ſoul. See Rom. xv. 18, 19. Doddridge, Calmet, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 6. And having in a readineſs, &c.] Thoſe whom the Apoſtle here addreſſes are the Corinthian converts, to whom this Epiſtle is written: Some of theſe had been drawn into a faction againſt him; theſe he had been and was endeavouring to bring back to that obedience in which the reſt had continued to him, as an Apoſtle of Chriſt. The Corinthians of theſe two ſorts are thoſe he means, when he ſays to them, ch. ii. 3. and vii. 13, 15. you all; that is, "all you Chriſtians of Corinth and Achaia:" for he who had raiſed the faction amongſt them, and given ſo much trouble to St. Paul, was a ſtranger and a Jew, (ch. xi. 22.) crept in amongſt them, after St. Paul had gathered and eſtabliſhed that church. Of him the Apoſtle ſeems to have no hopes, ch. xi. 13—15. and therefore he every where threatens, and here particularly, in the preſent and 11th verſe, to make an example of him and his adherents, (if any were ſo obſtinate

7 Do ye look on things after the outward appearance? if any man truſt to himſelf, that he is Chriſt's, let him of himſelf think this again, that as he is Chriſt's, even ſo are we Chriſt's.

8 For though I ſhould boaſt ſomewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your deſtruction, I ſhould not be aſhamed:

9 That I may not ſeem as if I would terrify you by letters.

10 For his letters (ſay they) are weighty and powerful, but his bodily preſence is weak, and his ſpeech contemptible.

11 Let ſuch an one think this, that ſuch as we are in word by letters, when we are abſent, ſuch will we be alſo in deed, when we are preſent.

12 For we dare not make ourſelves of the number, or compare ourſelves with ſome that commend themſelves: but they meaſuring themſelves by themſelves, and comparing themſelves amongſt themſelves, are not wiſe.

13 But we will not boaſt of things without our meaſure, but according to the meaſure of the rule which God hath diſtributed to us; a meaſure to reach even unto you.

14 For we ſtretch not ourſelves beyond our meaſure, as though we reached not unto you: for we are come as far as to you alſo, in preaching the goſpel of Chriſt:

15 Not boaſting of things without our meaſure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increaſed, that we ſhall be enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly,

16 To preach the goſpel in the regions beyond you, and not to boaſt in another man's line of things made ready to our hand.

17 But he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

18 For not he that commendeth himſelf is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth.

as ſtill to remain with him,) when he had brought back all the Corinthians whom he could hope to prevail upon. It ſhould be remembered, that before this time the Apoſtle had ſmitten Elymas with blindneſs; and it is highly probable, from this whole paſſage before us, that ſome other miracles of this awful kind had been wrought by him, though they are not recorded in Scripture. See Locke and Doddridge.

Ver. 8. Somewhat more] See ch. xi. 23. The next clauſe contains another reaſon inſinuated by the Apoſtle for his forbearing any ſeverity for the preſent towards them. I ſhould not be aſhamed, infers, "Becauſe the truth would juſtify me in it." See Locke.

Ver. 10. His bodily preſence weak, &c.] Chryſoſtom, Nicephorus, and Lucian relate of St. Paul, that his ſtature was low, his body crooked, and his head bald; which ſeem to be the infirmities here referred to. Some think he had alſo an impediment in his ſpeech; but there does not appear to be any ſufficient teſtimony of that. See on ch. xii. 7. and Witſius's Meletem.

Ver. 12. But they meaſuring themſelves by themſelves] Dr. Whitby would render it meaſuring themſelves by one another; as if they compared themſelves with their falſe apoſtles, and grew proud in the degree in which they reſembled them in acuteneſs and eloquence, or other things on which thoſe deceitful teachers valued themſelves. But it is more natural to think the meaning is, "They looked continually on themſelves, ſurveying their own great imaginary furniture, but not conſidering the vaſtly ſuperior abilities of many others; and ſo formed a diſproportionate opinion of themſelves:" and this is every where one of the greateſt ſources of pride. Mr. Locke obſerves, that this is ſpoken ironically. Ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, amongſt themſelves, ſhould rather be rendered within themſelves; for in all likelihood the faction and oppoſition againſt St. Paul was made by one perſon, as before obſerved; for though he ſpeaks here in the plural number, which is the more ſoft and decent way in ſuch caſes, yet we ſee in the foregoing verſes he ſpeaks directly and expreſly as of one perſon; and therefore ἐν ἑαυτοῖς may moſt conſonantly with the Apoſtle's meaning be underſtood to ſignify within themſelves; that is, with what they find in themſelves: the whole paſſage ſhewing, that this perſon made an eſtimate of himſelf only by what he found in himſelf, and thereupon preferred himſelf to St. Paul, without conſidering what St. Paul was, or had done. Inſtead of are not wiſe, Mr. Locke reads do not underſtand; namely, that they ought not to intrude themſelves into a church planted by another man, and there vaunt and ſet themſelves above him who planted it,—which is the meaning of the following verſes. It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that Bos has taken great pains to prove, that to meaſure oneſelf by oneſelf, is a phraſe which expreſſes modeſty, and making a right eſtimate of ourſelves and others:—and taking συνιεσιν not for a verb, but for the dative of a participle, he would render it, we meaſure ourſelves by ourſelves, and compare ourſelves with ourſelves, not with the wiſe; that is, ironically, "not with ſuch wiſe men as theſe." Dr. Waterland gives this verſion, which he ſeems to approve; but the ſenſe above offered ſeems moſt natural. Markland gives a different reading; But do not perceive that they fix the meaſure of themſelves in themſelves, and that they compare themſelves with themſelves.

Ver. 13. Without our meaſure] Ἄμετρα, here and in ver. 15. doth not ſignify immenſe, or immoderate, but ſomething which had not been meaſured out and allotted to him; ſomething which is not committed to him, nor within his province. Locke.

Ver. 14. For we are come as far, &c.] This ſeems to charge the falſe apoſtle, who had cauſed all this diſturbance in the church of Corinth, that without being appointed to it, without preaching the Goſpel in his way thither, as became an Apoſtle, he had crept into that church. Locke.

Ver, 15, 16. Not boaſting, &c.] That is, "Not intermeddling, or aſſuming to myſelf an authority to meddle, or honour for doing ſo." St. Paul here viſibly taxes the falſe Apoſtle for coming into a church converted and gathered by another, and there pretending to be ſomebody, and to rule all. This is another thing which renders it probable that the oppoſition made to St. Paul was but by one man, who had placed himſelf at the head of the faction; for it is plain that it was a ſtranger who came thither after St. Paul had planted this church, who pretending to be more an apoſtle than St. Paul, with greater illumination and more power, ſet up againſt him, to govern that church, and withdraw the Corinthians from following the rules and doctrines of St. Paul. Now it can never be ſuppoſed to be a combination of men who came to Corinth with that deſign; nor that they were different men, who came thither ſeparately, each ſetting up for himſelf; for then they would have fallen out one with another, as well as with St. Paul, and in both caſes he muſt have ſpoken of them in a different way from what he does now. The ſame character and carriage is given to them throughout both theſe Epiſtles; and in 1 Cor. iii. 10. he plainly ſpeaks of one man. That ſetting up thus to be a preacher of the Goſpel among thoſe who were already Chriſtians, was looked upon by St. Paul to be a fault, we learn from Rom. xv. 20. Inſtead of—meaſure, that is, of other mens labours. ver. 15. the MS reads meaſure in other mens labours; and inſtead of another man's line, ver. 16. ſome would read another man's rule or province. It is certain the Apoſtle did go to places already converted, to confirm and eſtabliſh his brethren in the faith; but this was chiefly where he had himſelf planted churches: though he might take ſome others in his way, which it would have been affectation and diſreſpect, rather than modeſty, to have avoided. But he did not boaſt in churches thus viſited, as if he were the founder of them, as his oppoſers probably did; pouring contempt on St. Paul's labours, as if they were hardly to be called Chriſtian churches, which he had left, as they pretended, in ſo unformed and unfiniſhed a ſtate. See Locke, Doddridge, and Heylin.

Ver. 18. But whom the Lord commendeth] Particularly by the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt. It is of theſe weapons of his warfare that St. Paul ſpeaks in this chapter; and it is by them that he intends to try which is the true Apoſtle, when he comes to them. Locke.

lity with the chief apoſtles, of his preaching the goſpel to them freely, and without putting them to any charge: ſhewing that he was not inferior to thoſe deceitful workers in any legal prerogative; and in the ſervice of Chriſt, and in all kind of ſufferings for his miniſtry, far ſuperior.

WOuld to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly; and indeed bear with me.

2 For I am jealous over you with godly jealouſy: for I have eſpouſed you to one huſband, that I may preſent you as a chaſte virgin to Chriſt.

3 But I fear leſt by any means, as the ſerpent beguiled Eve through his ſubtilty, ſo your minds ſhould be corrupted from the ſimplicity that is in Chriſt.

4 For if he that cometh preacheth another Jeſus, whom we have not preached, or if ye receive another ſpirit, which ye have not received, or another goſpel, which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear with him.

5 For I ſuppoſe I was not a whit behind the very chiefeſt apoſtles.

6 But though I be rude in ſpeech, yet not in knowledge; but we have been throughly made manifeſt among you in all things.

7 Have I committed an offence in abaſing myſelf, that ye might be exalted, becauſe I have preached to you the goſpel of God freely?

8 I robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you ſervice.

9 And when I was preſent with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me, the brethren which came from Macedonia ſupplied: and in all things I have kept myſelf from being burdenſome unto you, and ſo will I keep myſelf.

10 As the truth of Chriſt is in me, no man ſhall ſtop me of this boaſting in the regions of Achaia.

11 Wherefore? becauſe I love you not? God knoweth.

12 But what I do, that I will do, that I may cut off occaſion from them which deſire occaſion; that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we.

13 For ſuch are falſe apoſtles, deceitful

Ver. 1. Ver. 16. Ch. v. 13. Or, you do bear with me.—V. 2. Gal. iv. 17, 18. 1 Cor. iv. 15. Col. i. 28. Lev. xxi. 13.—V. 3. Gen. iii. 4. John viii. 44. Epheſ. vi. 24.—V. 4. Gal. i. 7, 8. Chap. XI. Ver. 1. Would to God you could bear] Would you could bear. Wat. St. Paul modeſtly calls his ſpeaking in his own defence folly. From hence to the 6th verſe he ſhews, that the pretended apoſtle, bringing to them no other Saviour or Goſpel, nor conferring greater power of miracles than himſelf, was not to be preferred before him. See Locke, and ch. v. 12, 13.

Ver. 2. That I may preſent you as a chaſte virgin] This is greatly illuſtrated by recollecting, that there was an officer among the Greeks, whoſe buſineſs it was to educate and form young women, eſpecially thoſe of rank and figure, deſigned for marriage; and then to preſent them to thoſe who were to be their huſbands: and if this officer permitted them, through negligence, to be corrupted, between the eſpouſals and conſummation of the marriage, great blame would naturally fall upon him. Some, conſidering the ſentence for I have eſpouſed, &c. as a parentheſis, tranſpoſe the paſſage, and read the verſe thus: For I am jealous over you with a godly jealouſy, that I may preſent you as a chaſte virgin to Chriſt; for I have eſpouſed you to one huſband. See Doddridge, Raphelius, and Heylin.

Ver. 3. Leſt by any means, &c.] Leſt by ſome means or other, &c. Wat. and MS. As the ſucceſs of the ſerpent againſt Eve lay in falſe pretences and inſinuations, ſo the ſucceſs of the falſe Apoſtles was owing to deceitful pretenſions and inſinuations likewiſe. The ſimplicity that is in, or rather towards Chriſt, anſwers to one huſband in the preceding verſe; for ἓν, one, is not uſed there without meaning, but plainly implies thus much: "I have formed and fitted you for one perſon alone, one huſband, who is Chriſt: I am greatly concerned that you may not be drawn aſide from that ſubmiſſion, that obedience, that temper of mind, which is owing to him; for I hope to put you into his hands, poſſeſſed with pure virgin thoughts, wholly fixed on him, not divided, nor roving after any other, that he may take you to wife, and marry you to himſelf for ever." It is plain their perverter who oppoſed St. Paul was a Jew, as we have ſeen. Of all who profeſſed Chriſtianity, the Jews were they who gave St. Paul moſt trouble and oppoſition; for they having ſet their hearts upon their own religion, endeavoured to blend Judaiſm and Chriſtianity together. We may ſuppoſe the caſe here to be much the ſame with that which he more fully expreſſes in the Epiſtle to the Galatians, particularly ch. i. 6—12. ch. iv. 9—21. and v. 1—13. The meaning of the place before us ſeems to be this: "I have taught you the Goſpel alone, in its pure and unmixed ſimplicity, by which only you can be united to Chriſt; but I fear leſt this your new Apoſtle ſhould draw you from it, and that your minds ſhould not adhere ſingly and ſimply to what I have taught, but ſhould be corrupted by a mixture of Judaiſm." St. Paul expreſſes Chriſtians being delivered from the law, and their freedom from the ritual obſervances of the Jews in like manner, by their being married to Chriſt, Rom. vii. 4. which place may give ſome light to this. See Locke, Doddridge, and Rymer on Revelation, p. 79.

Ver. 5. Ye might well bear, &c.] You would kindly, &c. Wat.

Ver. 6. Rude in ſpeech] The word ἰδιώτης, rendered rude, ſignifies a private man; one who can ſpeak no better than the generality of his neighbours, being unformed by the rules of eloquence: And this is perfectly conſiſtent with that great natural pathos which we find in this Apoſtle's writings; ſo that there is no need of recurring here, with Dr. Whitby, to the ſuppoſed impediment in St. Paul's ſpeech, which, allowing it ever ſo certain a fact, could not properly be expreſſed by this phraſe. The Archbp. of Cambray has a very pertinent remark on this expreſſion; namely, "That this might well be the caſe, though St. Paul ſhared ſo largely in the gift of tongues; as, when he was at Tarſus, he probably learned a corrupt kind of Greek ſpoken by the inhabitants of that place; for we have reaſon to believe, that with reſpect to any of the languages which the Apoſtles had learned in a natural way, the Spirit left them to ſpeak as before." See Doddridge, Whitby, and Cambray on Eloquence, p. 136.

Ver. 7. Have I committed an offence] The adverſe party made it an argument againſt St. Paul that he was no Apoſtle, ſince he took nothing among the Corinthians for his maintenance: 1 Cor. ix. 1—3. Another objection raiſed againſt him on this account was, that he loved them not. ver. 11. This he anſwers here by giving another reaſon for ſo doing. A third allegation was, that it was only a crafty trick in him to catch them; ch. xii. 16. which he anſwers there. Locke.

Ver. 8 .I robbed other churches] "I may almoſt, in this ſenſe, be ſaid to have robbed other churches; ſo freely have I received from them, at leaſt taking wages as it were of them, for waiting upon you; for indeed I received a kind of ſtipend from them while I abode at Corinth." The word ἐσύλησα, rendered robbed, properly ſignifies, I took the ſpoils: It is a military term, as is the next alſo, ὀψώνιον, wages, or rather pay. See Bengelius, L'Enfant, and Mintert.

Ver. 9. I was chargeable to no man] Beza would render it, I was not idle at any man's expence. The word νάρκη, (from whence κατενάρκησα,) implies a benumbed inactive ſtate, to which no man ſeems to have been leſs obnoxious than St. Paul. See Beza, and Stockius.

Ver. 12. That I will do] Rather, And will do; ſo the words ſtand in the Greek, and do not refer to ver. 10. as a profeſſion of St. Paul's reſolution to take nothing from them; but to ver. 11. to which they are joined, ſhewing that his refuſing any reward from them was not out of unkindneſs, but for another reaſon;" —What I do, and will do, is, that I may cut off all occaſion, &c." The Jews had a maxim among them: "That it was better for their wiſe men to ſkin dead beaſts for a living, than to aſk a maintenance from the generoſity of thoſe whom they taught:" But it plainly appears, that whatever the falſe apoſtles might boaſt on this head, there was no foundation for it. Comp. ver. 20. 1 Cor. ix. 12. and ſee Locke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 13. For ſuch are falſe apoſtles] They had queſtioned St. Paul's apoſtleſhip, 1 Cor. ix. becauſe of his not taking a maintenance from the Corinthians. He here directly, and without reſerve, declares them to be no true apoſtles. Locke.

workers, transforming themſelves into the apoſtles of Chriſt.

14 And no marvel; for Satan himſelf is transformed into an angel of light.

15 Therefore it is no great thing if his miniſters alſo be transformed as the miniſters of righteouſneſs; whoſe end ſhall be according to their works.

16 I ſay again, Let no man think me a fool; if otherwiſe, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boaſt myſelf a little.

17 That which I ſpeak, I ſpeak it not after the Lord, but as it were fooliſhly, in this confidence of boaſting.

18 Seeing that many glory after the fleſh, I will glory alſo.

19 For ye ſuffer fools gladly, ſeeing ye yourſelves are wiſe.

20 For ye ſuffer if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himſelf, if a man ſmite you on the face.

21 I ſpeak as concerning reproach, as though we had been weak. Howbeit, wherein ſoever any is bold, (I ſpeak fooliſhly) I am bold alſo.

22 Are they Hebrews? ſo am I. Are they Iſraelites? ſo am I. Are they the ſeed of Abraham? ſo am I.

23 Are they miniſters of Chriſt? (I ſpeak as a fool) I am more; in labours more abundant, in ſtripes above meaſure, in priſons more frequent, in deaths oft.

24 Of the Jews five times received I forty ſtripes ſave one.

Ver. 16. I ſay again, Let no man think, &c.] St. Paul goes on in his juſtification, reflecting upon the carriage of the falſe apoſtle towards the Corinthians; ver. 16—21. He compares himſelf with the falſe apoſtle in what he boaſts of, as being an Hebrew, ver. 21, 22. or, miniſter of Chriſt, ver. 23. and then enlarges upon his labours and ſufferings. Locke.

Ver. 17. In this confidence of boaſting] It ſeems indeed not very juſt and natural to interpret this as ſpoken by immediate ſuggeſtion; yet it being, in preſent circumſtances, very proper that the Apoſtle ſhould ſpeak thus, the Holy Spirit might, by a general, though unperceived influence, lead him into this tract of thought and expreſſion; and though ſuch apologies might ſeem beneath the dignity of an Apoſtle's character, yet that very conſideration is an excellent, and moſt uſeful example of humility to all Chriſtians, and eſpecially to miniſters. See Doddridge, and Lowth on Inſpiration.

Ver. 20. If a man bring you into bondage, &c.] This is ſpoken ironically, to expreſs their bearing with the inſolence and covetouſneſs of their falſe apoſtle. The bondage here meant was ſubjection to the will of that apoſtle, as appears from the following particulars of this verſe,—and not ſubjection to the Jewiſh rites; for, had that been the caſe, St. Paul was ſo zealous againſt it, that he would have ſpoken more plainly and warmly, as we ſee in his Epiſtle to the Galatians; and not have touched it thus only by the bye, in a doubtful expreſſion. Beſides, it is plain that no ſuch thing was yet attempted openly, only St. Paul was afraid of it. See ver. 3. The meaning of the whole verſe is, "You bear with it, if a man bring you into bondage; that is, domineer over you, and uſe you like his bondmen and ſlaves: If he make a prey of you, and almoſt devour you by his exorbitant demands; if he make a gain of you, that is, take or extort preſents or a ſalary from you; if he be elevated and high amongſt you; if he ſmite you on the face; that is, if he treats you in the moſt contumelious, diſgraceful, and debaſing manner." See Locke, and Whitby. Some would render this and the preceding verſe, (and I think with more force,) as follows; ver. 19. Wiſe as you are, ye bear with fools gladly: ver. 20. But, do you bear it if any man bring you into bondage? If, &c.?

Ver. 21. I ſpeak as concerning reproach] Do I ſpeak this by way of diſhonour, as if we ourſelves were weak? Surely, in whatſoever any one elſe may be confident, (I ſpeak it in folly) I alſo am confident. Doddridge. Heylin renders the verſe thus: I ſpeak of diſgraces which touch me, as if I had ſuffered them myſelf; but in whatſoever any of them dare to boaſt, (I ſpeak fooliſhly) I dare the ſame.

Ver. 22. Are they Hebrews?] Mr. Locke obſerves, that though the Apoſtle makes uſe of the plural number they, it is his opinion that he means but one perſon; as after, when he ſays we, he means only himſelf; the reaſon whereof hath been elſewhere given. "Are they Hebrews by language? ſays the Apoſtle, capable of conſulting the Scriptures in the original, with all the advantages which a familiar acquaintance with that tongue from their childhood can give them?—So am I: Are they Iſraelites by birth?—Not deſcended from Eſau, or any other branch of the family but that on which the bleſſing was entailed?—So am I. Are they of the ſeed of Abraham, both by the father's and mother's ſide, not proſelytes, or of mingled deſcent?—So am I; and can trace up as fair and clear a genealogy through the tribe of Benjamin, to the father of the faithful." See Locke, Doddridge, Whitby, and on Acts vi. 1.

Ver. 23. I am more] I am more ſo. Wat. In ſtripes above meaſure, ſhould rather be read (with Dr. Waterland) in ſtripes far exceeding; for theſe words, as the other particulars of the verſe, ſhould be taken comparatively, with reference to the falſe Apoſtle; with whom St. Paul is comparing himſelf in the miniſtry of the Goſpel. Unleſs this be ſo underſtood, there will ſeem to be a diſagreeable tautology in the following verſes; which, taking theſe words in a comparative ſenſe, are proofs of his ſaying, In ſtripes I am exceedingly beyond him; for, of the Jews five times, &c. See Locke, and on Deut. xxv. 3.

Ver. 25. Thrice was I beaten with rods] See Matth. xxvii. 26. Mark xv. 15. John xix. 1. The wreck at Malta happened long after this time; ſo that it muſt have been the fourth ſhipwreck St. Paul ſuffered. Had the inhabitants of that iſland been informed of this circumſtance, they would have been confirmed in their ſuſpicions of his being a very bad man; but this remarkably ſhews us, that a ſeries of what the world calls "misfortunes from the hand of Providence," may befal the beſt and worthieſt of mankind. Νυχθήμερον, rendered a day and a night, ſignifies "a natural day, including the hours of light and darkneſs." St. Paul was, during ſuch a natural day, in the deep; probably floating on the remainders of the wreck, and juſt on the point of being waſhed away and ſunk every moment. As Βυθὸς, the word here uſed, and rendered the deep, was the name of a deep dungeon at Cyzicum, in the Propontis, Dr. Hammond conjectures that St. Paul was caſt into it, as he paſſed from Troas to that city: But the interpretation above given ſeems more eaſy and natural. See Locke, Doddridge, and Hammond.

Ver. 26. In perils of waters] Of rivers. MS. The word ſhould certainly be ſo rendered, to contra-diſtinguiſh theſe hazards, from thoſe which he underwent by ſea. In the city, means not only in Jeruſalem, but in other cities, in oppoſition to perils in the wilderneſs. The Apoſtle poſſibly mentions falſe brethren laſt, as apprehending peculiar danger from their efforts among the Corinthians. See Doddridge, and Locke.

Ver. 27. In weарineſs and painfulneſs] The latter of the words here uſed, Μόχθος, is more expreſſive than the former, Κόπος: It ſignifies not only ſtrenuous labour, but ſuch as proceeds to a degree of fatigue. What an idea does this verſe give us of the Apoſtle's fidelity and zeal! How hard was it for a man of a genteel and liberal education, as St. Paul was, to bear ſuch rigours, and to wander about like a vagabond, hungry, and almoſt naked; yet coming into the preſence of perſons of high life, and ſpeaking in large and various aſſemblies, on matters of the utmoſt importance! See Doddridge, lord Lyttelton on St. Paul's Converſion, and the Reflections.

Ver. 28. Beſides thoſe things that are without] Beſide foreign affairs, the care of all the churches is ruſhing in upon me every day. Doddridge. Others would read, Beſides what is excluſive of theſe things, the care of that which cometh upon me daily; the care of all the churches.

all the churches, is, &c. for what he had before mentioned were no other than external things. That which cometh upon me daily, Mr. Saurin would read, what beſiegeth me daily. The original is very emphatical; that daily inſurrection upon me,—the care, &c. Ἐπισύςασίς properly ſignifies a tumult, or croud of people riſing up againſt a man at once, and ready to bear him down. See Stockius, and Saurin's Sermons, tom. x. p. 163.

Ver. 29. Who is offended] "So as to be led into ſin by the raſhneſs or uncharitableneſs of others; and I am not fired—with grief and indignation, to ſee ſuch diſhonour brought upon religion, and with zeal to repreſs the grievance, if poſſible." Πυρῦμαι properly ſignifies to be fired; and it may, perhaps, in this connection, allude to the ſudden hurry of ſpirits into which a man is put by the dangerous fall of a perſon he tenderly loves, eſpecially when occaſioned by the careleſſneſs and folly of another. Junius would read τυρῦμαι—and I am not troubled, or diſmayed.

Ver. 30. If I muſt needs glory] See ch. xii. 11. By καυχᾶσθαι, which is tranſlated ſometimes to glory, and ſometimes to boaſt, the Apoſtle throughout, when he applies it to himſelf, means nothing but the mentioning ſome commendable action of his, without vanity or oſtentation; and barely from the neceſſity of the occaſion. Locke.

Ver. 31. The God and Father, &c.] God, even the Father, &c. Wat. There ſhould only be a colon at the end of the verſe: this ſolemn aſſeveration being introduced to give credit, not to what precedes, but to what follows; which was then known only to few, and is therefore atteſted in like manner, Gal. i. 20. though afterwards particularly related by St. Luke, Acts xix. 25. Bengelius.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XI. Ver. 19, &c.

This portion of Scripture is the more remarkable, becauſe it preſents us with a great Apoſtle, engaged in an act very unuſual, and, generally ſpeaking, very unbecoming that character. It ſeems therefore highly neceſſary, in order to underſtand and be able to account for ſuch proceeding, that we conſider carefully, firſt, the occaſion, and, ſecondly, the manner of it; after which, ſuch other reflections may be properly ſuggeſted, as naturally ariſe from the ſubject.

I. The occaſion, as has been frequently hinted, was evidently the corruptions brought into the church of Corinth by ſome falſe teachers, who, like thoſe of the ſame ſtamp in every age and church, had inſinuated themſelves into the affections of the people; as by other arts of ſubtilty and deceit, ſo more eſpecially, by extolling their owu ability and merit, and by diſparaging reflections caſt upon their regular paſtor. The people appear to have been caught with this guile, and to have drunk in theſe prejudices againſt St. Paul; and were grown ſo immediately fond of their new teachers, that at the ſame time that they thought the juſt and gentle authority of an Apoſtle a yoke too heavy, The utmoſt vanity and inſolence, the moſt inſatiable pillaging and avarice, the moſt imperious tyranny, and contumelious treatment went down very contentedly, from the hands of thoſe idolized intruders.

Had this partiality been attended with no farther conſequence than the leſſening St. Paul's private reputation, he would not have thought it worth while ſo ſolicitouſly to vindicate his honour; but foreſeeing that ſo undeſerved a preference of the men, would certainly bring on a liking for their errors, and thus endanger the ſouls of as many as ſhould adhere to them, Charity for his brethren called for juſtice to himſelf. Accordingly, for the ſake of thoſe deluded Corinthians, and to juſtify the truth, he found it neceſſary to aſſert his due; to provoke his bold detractors to a compariſon, and ſo at once to ſhew how much he, and how little they, were able to produce, in proof of their authority;—an authority, which he was legally inveſted with, and exerciſed with lenity and temper; but which they, by dint of arrogance, aſſumed to themſelves, and abuſed to the vile purpoſes of calumny and faction.

Such was the occaſion, ſuch the end of our Apoſtle's appearing here in a figure ſo unlike what he commoly makes in his writings; yet which, though they are ſo reaſonable, and ſo urgent, he manages in ſuch a way, as to clear his humility of every ſuſpicion that the moſt captious adverſary could caſt upon it.

II. This may better appear from the ſecond particular,—the manner of his proceeding on this delicate occaſion: In which we ſhould obſerve, 1. His many apologies, or ſeeming condemnations of himſelf, in giving way ſo far to the provocations of thoſe who ſpoke or thought againſt him. See ver. 21, 23, 30. (and again ch. xii. 1, 11, &c.) with other expreſſions to the like purpoſe. So cautiouſly doth the Apoſtle conduct himſelf in a point, which he rightly underſtood to be ſo nice: for, as the expatiating upon ourſelves without any neceſſity, is of all faults in converſation the moſt nauſeous and offenſive, ſo the being extremely tender and officious, even in our own vindication, is ſeldom free from vanity. This is the caſe of all mankind,—but eſpecially of the miniſters of Chriſt, who muſt expect a ſhare in calumnies and contradictions, and ought to be armed with patience to endure them, above the proportion of common men. When therefore theſe have influence upon their perſonal advantages only, it is generally better to leave the clearing of their innocence to time, and the evidence of a good converſation. Where they reflect upon their character, and by poiſoning the people with ill impreſſions, tend to obſtruct the efficacy of their labours,—the cauſe becomes public; their charge is concerned; and a becoming ſolicitude to ſet matters right in ſuch circumſtances, is no longer zeal for their own, but charity for other men's ſafety and good.

And yet, even in theſe circumſtances, St. Paul's example teaches us how careful we ought to be in warding off all the ſpiteful conſtructions which are apt to be made of the moſt neceſſary and the moſt modeſt publication of our own conduct and deſervings: for, 2. The ſubjects he chooſes here to enlarge upon were, Not the greatneſs of his miracles, not the power of his eloquence and arguments, not the ſucceſs of his labours, or the number of converts he had won, or of the churches he had planted,—though no man could with greater right have alledged all theſe; But only the toils and hardſhips, the perſecutions and afflictions in which the diſcharge of his miniſtry had engaged him. Theſe were ſuch privileges, as his adverſaries neither had, nor deſired to have to boaſt of. They had other things in view; (ver. 20.) the gain of private contributions,—the command of their hearers purſes, and an abſolute dominion over their perſons. The grounds upon which they exalted themſelves were all taken from worldly advantages, (ver. 21, 22.) and in that reſpect St. Paul is content to delare himſelf their equal. The particulars in which he declares himſelf their ſuperior, were of ſuch a kind, that they were well enough ſatisfied to yield him a perference in them;—ſtripes and impriſonment, ſhipwrecks and deaths, hard and perilous journeys, cold, and hunger, and thirſt. Theſe it was ſo far from vanity to glory in, that the Apoſtle found it neceſſary (ch. xii.) to ſubjoin his being honoured with extraordinary viſions and revelations, to prevent ſo great a degree, and ſo conſtant a ſucceſſion of ſufferings from being turned into an argument of God's diſpleaſure, againſt one ſo inceſſantly exerciſed in them.

And yet, theſe afflictions were really the moſt proper and worthy matter of glorying to St. Paul. The moſt proper, becauſe it was perfectly free from all vanity and ſelf-ſeeking; for his were not ſufferings in purſuit of his own emolument or gratification; not induſtriouſly courted, nor oſtentatiouſly magnified, in order to turn them into gain;—And the moſt worthy, becauſe to all who duly conſidered them, they were proofs of that abundant grace which ſupported him under them; of that unparalleled ſincerity and zeal which diſpoſed him ſo chearfully to perſevere in encountering with them; and of the truth of that doctrine, which, by the miniſtry of one ſo wonderouſly oppreſſed and ill-treated, could yet gain ſo much ground, and triumph over all oppoſition.

The paſſage thus explained, offers to us the following uſeful conſiderations:

1. The deſcription here given of falſe teachers ſhould be a warning to all Chriſtians againſt liſtening to their wiles, and an admonition to ſuſpect and beware of ſuch, as make it their buſineſs to infuſe into mens minds jealouſies and evil ſurmiſes againſt their lawful paſtors; —a ſhrewd ſign that they draw off the people, becauſe thereout they ſuck no ſmall advantage. And if it ſhould, as ſometimes it may happen, that ſuch may have ſufferings and hardſhips to alledge, for their miniſtry; yet even then care muſt be taken to look into the ground of ſuch ſufferings; whether theſe alſo be not a profitable bargain for this work, and a perſecution ſo called, but in truth, "a ſetting their quiet to ſale at the higheſt market." In a word, none who uſe St. Paul's argument rightly, will ſuffer for evil-doers againſt the laws of men, in caſes where thoſe are not manifeſtly againſt the laws of God.

The inſtance before us ſhews, 2. How far we ought to be from reckoning what we endure for God's cauſe, (when it really is God's cauſe) as matter of ſorrow or ſhame to us. St. Paul, in compariſon of the reſt of the Apoſtles, was a labourer called in at the eleventh hour; and as he taught the Philippians to eſteem it, ſo he thought it, —a peculiar grace, that it was given him not only to believe in Jeſus, but alſo to ſuffer for his name. The fervency of his charity and zeal made up what was wanting in point of time; and we (eſpecially thoſe amongſt us who are miniſters of the Goſpel) never make a more juſt computation of our ſervices, than when we reckon them by the hardſhips and ſelf-denials we are content to undergo for the good of our own ſouls, or thoſe of our Chriſtian brethren.

3. When St. Paul to all his other ſuffering, adds the care of all

CHAP. XII.

Commending his apoſtleſhip, though he might glory of his wonderful revelations, yet he rather chooſeth to glory of his infirmities; blaming the Corinthians for forcing him to this vain-boaſting: he promiſeth to come to them again; but yet altogether in the affection of a father, although he feareth he ſhall to his grief find many offenders, and publick diſorders there.

IT is not expedient for me, doubtleſs, to glory. I will come to viſions and revelations of the Lord.

2 I knew a man in Chriſt above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;) ſuch an one caught up to the third heaven.

3 And I knew ſuch a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth:)

4 How that he was caught up into paradiſe, and heard unſpeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter.

5 Of ſuch an one will I glory: yet of myſelf I will not glory, but in mine infirmities.

6 For though I would deſire to glory, I ſhall not be a fool; for I will ſay the truth: but now I forbear, leſt any man ſhould think of me above that which he ſeeth me to be, or that he heareth of me.

7 And leſt I ſhould be exalted above meaſure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the fleſh, the meſſenger of Satan to buffet me, leſt I ſhould be exalted above meaſure.

Ver. 1. Gr. For I will come.—V. 2. Acts xxii. 17. Ver. 3. A. D. 46. at Lyſtra, Acts xiv. 6.—V. 4. Or, poſſible.—V. 5. Ch. xi. 30. V. 6. Ch. x. 8. xi. 16.—V. 7. See Ezek. xxviii. 24. Gal. iv. 14.

the churches, and his zealous compaſſion over them who failed or were afflicted in them; this ſhews us the abundance of his charity, and inſtructs us what ought to be the meaſure of ours: not to neglect, or think ourſelves excuſed from a tender concern for the afflictions or dangers of our brethren, upon the account of any ſufferings of our own. Be our other circumſtances what they will, yet ſtill they are members of Chriſt's body; and while that relation continues, all the duties reſulting from it muſt do ſo too. So indiſpenſable and perpetual a duty is charity, for the ſouls of others eſpecially; ſo far, indeed, are thoſe hardſhips, which lie outward and open to the view of others, from being the moſt ſenſible part of what good men endure.

Laſtly, The methods uſed for exerciſing St. Paul's patience and virtue teach us plainly, That the way in which God would be ſerved by Chriſtians, but eſpecially by his miniſters, is that of conſtancy, of indefatigable diligence, and of diffuſive charity; that eaſe and idleneſs, that luxury and an effeminate declining of trouble for the public good, are by no means agreeable to the character of a diſciple of Chriſt Jeſus. So ſtrenuouſly doth this great Apoſtle, by his own example, encourage and prepare us for the like diſcipline, if called to it, that no one who profeſſeth himſelf the ſervant of Chriſt can plead exemption from a ſimilar perſeverance and fortitude. One great and evident deſign of theſe ſharp conflicts of St. Paul was, doubtleſs, to ſtimulate every future Chriſtian to reduce the ſoftneſs of a nature generally too indulgent of fleſh and blood, and to inure him to ſuffer hardſhip like a good ſoldier under the common captain of our ſalvation. In which warfare, the leſs we ſpare our own perſons, the more we may depend upon his protection and ſupport under the conflict; the brighter trophies ſhall we raiſe to his glory, to the honour of religion, and the unſpeakable advantage both of body and ſoul, in that day of triumph and eternal joy! Amen. See Stanhope's Epiſt. and Goſp.

Chap. XII. Ver. 1. I will come to viſions, &c.] The Apoſtle's ſpeaking of his viſions and revelations, which indeed did him the higheſt honour, could not be a proof that he was determined not to boaſt; it is evident therefore, that γὰρ in the original [ἐλεύσομαι γὰρ] cannot have its uſual ſignification, and be rendered for. Our tranſlators take it for a mere expletive, and therefore omit it. Doddridge tranſlates it neverthele ſs; and it is certain that it has various ſignifications, and muſt have this ſignification here, if it expreſs any thing. Some would read the verſe, Is it not expedient for me to glory?—I will come therefore [γὲν] to viſions, &c.

Ver. 2. I knew a man in Chriſt] By the power of Chriſt. MS. St. Paul muſt undoubtedly mean himſelf, or the whole article had been quite foreign to his purpoſe. It appears from hence, that the Apoſtle had concealed this extraordinary event fourteen years; and if this Epiſtle was written about the year 58, as is ſuppoſed, this viſion muſt have fallen out in the year 44, which was ſo long after his converſion, as to prove it quite different from the trance mentioned Acts ix. 9. Dr. Benſon thinks this glorious repreſentation was made to him in the temple, on the journey mentioned Acts xi. 30. xxii. 17. and intended to encourage him againſt the difficulties he was to encounter in preaching the Goſpel to the Gentiles. Whether in the body—or out of the body, muſt mean, "I know not whether he was then in the body, during that extraordinary extaſy; or for a time taken out of the body, ſo that only the principle of animal life remained in him." As St. Paul muſt know that his body was not actually dead during this trance, but that the animal motion of his lungs and heart continued, it would lead one to imagine, that he really apprehended the principle of animal life to be ſomething diſtinct from the rational ſoul, which he calls himſelf. It appears, at leaſt, that he loſt all conſciouſneſs of any thing about him at that time; and what the preſence of an immaterial ſoul in a body can be, diſtinct from the capacity of perceiving by it, is difficult to conceive. See the next note, Benſon, Doddridge, and Bp. Brown's Diſtinction of Spirit, Soul, and Body, in his "Procedure of the Underſtanding." b. ii. ch. 10. Caſtalio and Bengelius tranſlate the beginning of this verſe, I knew a Chriſtian caught up fourteen years ago, &c. Inſtead of I cannot tell, here and ver. 3. Dr. Waterland reads, I know not.

Ver. 4. Caught up into paradiſe] By the third heaven, ver. 2. ſome underſtand the ſeat of the divine glory, the place where Chriſt dwelleth at the Father's right hand; and by paradiſe, that garden of God, which is the ſeat of the happy in the intermediate ſtate, and during their ſeparation from the body. Bp. Bull, diſcourſing on this ſubject, obſerves, "St. Paul,—who had been caught up into the third heaven, and alſo into paradiſe, (which the Scriptures tell us is the receptacle of the ſpirits of good men, ſeparated from their bodies) and therefore was beſt able to give us an account of the ſtate of ſouls dwelling there,—Aſſures us, that thoſe ſouls live and operate, and have a perception of excellent things; nay, in the very ſame paſſage, where he ſpeaks of that rapture of his, he plainly enough confirms this hypotheſis: For, firſt, when he declares himſelf uncertain whether he received thoſe admirable viſions in or out of the body, he manifeſtly ſuppoſeth it poſſible for the ſoul, when out of the body, not only to ſubſiſt, but alſo to perceive and know,—and even things above the natural apprehenſion of mortal men; and then, when he tells us that he received in paradiſe viſions and revelations, and heard there ἄῤῥητα ῥήματα, unſpeakable words, not lawful, or rather, not poſſibl efor a man to utter, he directly teaches, that paradiſe is ſo far from being a place of darkneſs and obſcurity, ſilence and oblivion, where the good ſpirits, its proper inhabitants, are all in a profound ſleep, as ſome have vainly imagined,—that on the contrary, it is a moſt glorious place, full of light and raviſhing viſion; a place where myſteries may be heard and learned, far ſurpaſſing the reach of frail mortals. In ſhort, the glories of the third heaven, and of paradiſe, ſeem to be by an extraordinary revelation opened and diſcovered to St. Paul, not only for his own ſupport under the heavy preſſure of his afflictions, but alſo that he might be able to ſpeak of them with greater aſſurance to others. And the order is obſervable: Firſt, he had repreſented to him the moſt perfect joys of the third, or higheſt heaven, of which we hope to be partakers after the reſurrection; and then, leſt ſo long an expectation ſhould diſcourage us, he ſaw alſo the intermediate joys of paradiſe, wherewith the ſouls of the faithful are refreſhed until the reſurrection: And for our comfort he tells us, that even theſe alſo are inexpreſſible." See Bp. Bull's Works, vol. i. p. 89.

Ver. 5. But in mine infirmities] "In thoſe things which carry the marks of weakneſs, though in a certain connection, they will appear honourable too." Locke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 7. Was given to me a thorn in the fleſh] The conjectures of commentators reſpecting St. Paul's thorn in the fleſh, have been innumerable. We ſhall not dwell upon them, but inſert the following, as it appears to be the moſt rational interpretation. Ezekiel has a parallel paſſage, ch. xxviii. 24. where the pricking briar, and grieving thorn, are uſed to expreſs a great affliction. In alluſion to which the Apoſtle might uſe this term to ſignify ſome paralytic diſorder, which affected his ſpeech and aſpect, owing to the inſufferable glories of this viſion, which might weaken and relax the nervous ſyſtem. This infirmity in his fleſh might give occaſion to the meſſenger of Satan, or the falſe teacher and calumnious adverſary who oppoſed the Apoſtle, to repreſent him in a deſpicable light. As this diſorder might threaten both his acceptance and uſefulneſs, it is no wonder that he was ſo importunate for its removal; yet, being the effect of ſo great and ſingular a favour, he might with the higheſt

8 For this thing I beſought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me.

9 And he ſaid unto me, My grace is ſufficient for thee: for my ſtrength is made perfect in weakneſs. Moſt gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Chriſt may reſt upon me.

10 Therefore I take pleaſure in infirmities, in reproaches, in neceſſities, in perſecutions, in diſtreſſes for Chriſt's ſake: for when I am weak, then am I ſtrong.

11 I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefeſt apoſtles, though I be nothing.

12 Truly the ſigns of an apoſtle were wrought among you in all patience, in ſigns and wonders, and mighty deeds.

13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that I myſelf was not burdenſome to you? forgive me this wrong.

14 Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdenſome to you. For I ſeek not your's, but you. For the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

15 And I will very gladly ſpend and be ſpent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the leſs I be loved.

16 But be it ſo, I did not burden you: nevertheleſs, being crafty, I caught you with guile.

17 Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I ſent unto you?

18 I deſired Titus, and with him I ſent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the ſame ſpirit? walked we not in the ſame ſteps?

19 Again, think ye that we excuſe ourſelves unto you? we ſpeak before God in Chriſt: but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying.

20 For I fear, leſt when I come I ſhall not find you ſuch as I would, and that I ſhall be found unto you ſuch as ye would not: leſt there be debates, envyings, wraths, ſtrifes, backbitings, whiſperings, ſwellings, tumults:

21 And leſt when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I ſhall bewail many which have ſinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanneſs, and fornication, and laſciviouſneſs which they have committed.

CHAP. XIII.

He threateneth ſeverity, and the power of his apoſtleſhip againſt obſtinate ſinners; and adviſing them to a trial of their faith, and to reformation of their ſins before his coming, he concludeth his epiſtle with a general exhortation, and a prayer.

THIS is the third time I am coming to you. In the mouth of two or three witneſſes ſhall every word be eſtabliſhed.

propriety talk of glorying in it; ver. 9. See Hammond, Whitby, and Miſcel. Sacr. eſſay iii. p. 22, &c. Mr. Locke obſerves, that as St. Paul thought fit to conceal what this thorn in the fleſh was, it is not eaſy for us to diſcover, nor is it very material to know what it was. Dr. Waterland, after ſeveral MSS, leaves out the laſt clauſe, Leſt I ſhould be exalted, &c.

Ver. 9. My ſtrength is made perfect in weakneſs] "Is illuſtrated in proportion to the weakneſs of the inſtrument I make uſe of." Ἐπισκηνώσῃ, which we render may reſt upon, is emphatical, and ſignifies literally, may pitch its tent upon. See on John i. 14.

Ver. 10. For when I am weak, &c.] "For when, looked upon in my outward ſtate, I appear weak, then, by the power of Chriſt, which dwelleth in me, I am found to be ſtrong." Locke.

Ver. 12. In all patience] This may well be underſtood to reflect on the haughtineſs and plenty, wherein the falſe apoſtle lived amongſt them. See Locke, and 1 Cor. i. 4—7.

Ver. 14. The third time, I am ready, &c.] Having been diſappointed twice before; 1 Cor. xvi. 5. 2 Cor. i. 15, 16.

Ver. 15. I will very gladly ſpend and be ſpent] "I will gladly exhauſt my ſtrength, and put myſelf to any expence too, for your ſalvation; though the conſequence of all ſhould be, that the more abundantly I love you, the leſs I ſhould be loved by you." See 2 Tim. ii. 10. 1 Theſſ. ii. 8.

Ver. 16. But be it ſo, I did not burden you, &c.] That I did not burden you, yet [perhaps it will be ſuggeſted] that being a crafty deceiver, I circumvented you with guile. Wat.

Ver. 18. I deſired Titus] "To go to you." St. Paul would certainly have had no occaſion to do ſo, had his views been mercenary, or his miſſion lucrative. See Heylin, and Locke.

Ver. 19. Again, think you that we excuſe, &c.] He had before given the reaſon, ch. i. 23. for his not coming to them, with the ſame aſſeveration as in the preſent verſe. If we trace the thread of St. Paul's diſcourſe, we may obſerve, that having concluded the juſtification of himſelf and his apoſtleſhip by his paſt actions, ver. 13. he had it in his thoughts to tell them how he would deal with the falſe apoſtle and his adherents when he came, as he was now ready to do; and therefore he ſolemnly begins, ver. 14. with Behold; and tells them that now the third time he was ready to come to them: To which joining what was much upon his mind, that he would not be burdenſome to them when he came, this ſuggeſted to his thoughts an objection; namely, that this perſonal ſhyneſs in him was but cunning, for that he deſigned to draw gain from them by other hands; from which he clears himſelf by the inſtance of Titus, and a brother whom he had ſent together with him; who were as far from receiving any thing from them as he himſelf. Titus and his other meſſenger being thus mentioned, he thought it neceſſary to obviate another ſuſpicion which might be raiſed in the minds of ſome of them, as if he mentioned the ſending of thoſe two as an apology for his not coming himſelf. This he utterly diſclaims; and to prevent any thoughts of that kind, ſolemnly proteſts to them, that in all his carriage to them he had done nothing but for their edification; that he had no other aim in any of his actions; and that he forbore coming merely out of reſpect and good will to them. So that the whole, from ver. 14. to ch. xiii. 1. muſt be looked upon as a diſcourſe which fell in occaſionally, though tending to the ſame purpoſe with the reſt:—A way of writing very uſual with our Apoſtle, and with other writers who abound in quickneſs and variety of thoughts, as he did. Such men, by new matter riſing in their way, are often put by from what they were going, and had begun to ſay; which therefore they are obliged to take up again, and to continue at a diſtance; as St. Paul does here, after the interpoſition of eight verſes. Locke.

Ver. 20. Leſt there be—envyings, &c.] All theſe were the natural conſequences of thoſe debates which had ariſen among them; and therefore St. Paul, in a very judicious manner, gives this ſolemn warning with relation to them.

Chap. XIII. Ver. 1. In the mouth of two or three witneſſes] Theſe words ſeem to be quoted from the law of our Saviour, Matth. xviii. 16. and not from the law of Moſes in Deuteronomy; not only because

2 I told you before, and foretel you, as if I were preſent the ſecond time; and being abſent, now I write to them which heretofore have ſinned, and to all other, that if I come again I will not ſpare:

3 Since ye ſeek a proof of Chriſt ſpeaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you.

4 For though he was crucified through weakneſs, yet he liveth by the power of God. For we alſo are weak in him, but we ſhall live with him by the power of God toward you.

5 Examine yourſelves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own ſelves. Know ye not your own ſelves, how that Jeſus Chriſt is in you, except ye be reprobates?

6 But I truſt that ye ſhall know, that we are not reprobates.

7 Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we ſhould appear approved, but that ye ſhould do that which is honeſt, though we be as reprobates.

8 For we can do nothing againſt the truth, but for the truth.

9 For we are glad when we are weak, and ye are ſtrong: and this alſo we wiſh, even your perfection.

10 Therefore I write theſe things being abſent, leſt being preſent I ſhould uſe ſharpneſs, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to deſtruction.

11 Finally, brethren, farewel. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace ſhall be with you.

12 Greet one another with an holy kiſs.

13 All the ſaints ſalute you.

14 The grace of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, cauſe the words are the ſame with thoſe in St. Matthew, but from the likeneſs of the caſe. In Deuteronomy the rule given concerns only judicial trials; in St. Matthew it is a rule given for the management of perſuaſion uſed for the reclaiming an offender by fair means, before coming to the utmoſt extremity, which is the caſe of St. Paul here. In Deuteronomy the judge was to hear the witneſſes, Deut. xvii. 6. xix. 15. In St. Matthew the party was to hear the witneſſes, Matth. xviii. 17. which was alſo the caſe of St. Paul here; the witneſſes which he means that he made uſe of to perſuade them, being his two Epiſtles. That by witneſſes he means his two Epiſtles, is plain from his way of expreſſing himſelf here, where he carefully ſets down his telling them twice; viz. before in his former Epiſtle, ch. iv. 19. and now a ſecond time in his ſecond Epiſtle; and alſo by the words, as if I were preſent with you a ſecond time. By our Saviour's rule the offended perſon was to go twice to the offender; and therefore St. Paul ſays, as if I were with you a ſecond time, counting his letters as two perſonal applications to them; as our Saviour directed ſhould be done, before coming to rougher means. Some take the witneſſes to be the three meſſengers by whom his firſt Epiſtle is ſuppoſed to be ſent: But this would not be according to the method preſcribed by our Saviour, in the place from which St. Paul takes the words he uſes; for there were no witneſſes to be made uſe of in the firſt application; neither if thoſe had been the witneſſes meant, would there have been any need for St. Paul ſo expreſly and carefully to have ſet down,—as if preſent a ſecond time; words, which in that caſe would be ſuperfluous. Beſides, thoſe three men are no where mentioned to have been ſent by him to perſuade them, nor the Corinthians required to hear them, or reproved for not having done it: And laſtly, they could not be better witneſſes of St. Paul's endeavours twice to gain the Corinthians by fair means, before he proceeded to ſeverity, than the Epiſtles themſelves were. Locke.

Ver. 2. I will not ſpare] It is certainly a great confirmation of the veracity of the Apoſtles, that when factions were raiſed againſt them they uſed none of the arts of flattery, however neceſſary they might ſeem, but depended on the force of a miraculous power to reduce offenders; the pretence to which would have been moſt abſurd, if they had not really been conſcious to themſelves, that it was engaged in their favour. See Bp. Burnet on the Articles, p. 62. and on 1 Cor. iv. 21.

Ver. 4. Crucified through weakneſs] With appearance of weakneſs, yet he liveth with the manifeſtation of the power of God. The meaning of the place is this: "Though Chriſt in his crucifixion appeared weak and deſpicable, yet he now lives to ſhew the power of God, in the miracles and mighty works which he does: So I, though by my ſufferings and infirmities I may appear weak and contemptible, yet ſhall I live to ſhew the power of God, by puniſhing miraculouſly the offenders amongſt you." Locke.

Ver. 5. Examine yourſelves, &c.] Examine your ownſelves, if ye be in the faith; diſcern your ownſelves. Do ye not know your ownſelves, that Jeſus Chriſt is in you, except ye be undiſcerning?—and ſo ver. 6, 7. Wat. The difference between the words rendered examine and prove, ſeems to be gradual: "Examine, and thoroughly prove, whether you be δόκιμοι, ſuch as can ſtand the teſt; or ἀδόκιμοι, ſuch as cannot; like baſe reprobate metal." It is plain, ſays Mr. Locke, that ἀδόκιμοι, tranſlated reprobates in theſe verſes, has no ſuch ſignification, reprobation being very remote from the Apoſtle's argument: But the word is here uſed for "one who cannot give proof of Chriſt's being in him; one that is deſtitute of a ſupernatural power:" For thus ſtands St. Paul's diſcourſe: "Since ye ſeek a proof, δοκιμὴν, ver. 3. you ſhall know that I am not deſtitute of a proof,—ἀδόκιμος, ver. 6." See on ver. 10,

Ver. 7. Approved] Diſcerning. Wat.

Ver. 9. When we are weak, &c.] "When we ſeem weak, by not exerting any miraculous power to the puniſhment of offenders; and ye are ſtrong in gifts and graces, in faith and good works." The word καταρτισιν, rendered perfection, alludes to a building, wherein all the parts are ſo compacted together, as to form one compleat edifice. It is uſed, 1. To imply the firſt forming of a ſociety. 2. For reſtoring any faulty members to the community. 3. For the revival of harmony and unanimity among the members of a ſociety. And, 4. The reſtoring of peace and tranquillity, by which the members might meet together without apprehenſion of danger, though they had been antecedently ſcattered abroad by perſecutions The Apoſtle might include all theſe ſenſes in his addreſs; but more eſpecially that which implies the reformation of an offender, as previous to his being readmitted into the church. See Mintert, Hammond, and Doddridge; who renders the word Your being ſet in perfect order.

Ver. 10. Therefore I write, &c.] Dr. Heylin tranſlates this paſſage very well, from ver. 5. Try yourſelves, whether ye be in the faith; bring yourſelves to the proof. Are you ſo little acquainted with yourſelves, as not to know whether Jeſus Chriſt be in you? Unleſs indeed you have no proofs of it. ver. 6. But I truſt that you ſhall be convinced that we are not without ſuch proofs. ver. 7. Now I pray God that I may not inflict any evil upon you, and ſo my proofs may not be produced, [and this we aſk of God for your ſakes] that ye may do what is right, although we thereby ſhall appear as not having the proofs [we threaten you with]; ver. 8. For we can do nothing againſt the truth, but for the truth: ver. 9. And therefore it is matter of joy to us, when we are thus diſarmed by the ſtrength of your integrity. And this is what I pray for, even your perfection. ver. 10. Theſe things therefore I write to you, being abſent, that when I come, I may not uſe ſeverity, according to the power which the Lord hath given me, for edification, and not for deſtruction.

Ver. 11. Be perfect] Καταρτίζεσθε, "Endeavour to bring about a perfect reformation." See on ver. 9. Τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖτε, be of one mind, ſhould rather be rendered, attend to the ſame thing: "Purſue with the greateſt unanimity of heart, and intenſeneſs of affection, that which ought to be the great end of all our ſchemes and deſigns; the care of glorifying God, and adorning the Goſpel." See 1 Cor. i. 10. Wall, Locke, and Doddridge's Sermon "on Candour and Unanimity," p. 8.

Ver. 14. The grace of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt] Χάρις ſhould rather be rendered here by favour; for if grace be taken for ſanctifying influences communicated from Chriſt,—which doubtleſs makes a great part of the idea,—it may be leſs eaſy to diſtinguiſh it from the communion of the Spirit. This text hath always been produced with great force in proof of the doctrine of the Trinity. See particularly Dr. Waterland's ſermon on the text. It is with great reaſon that this comprehenſive and inſtructive benediction is pronounced juſt before our aſſemblies for public worſhip are diſmiſſed; and it is certainly very indecent (to uſe the mildeſt term) to ſee many quitting thoſe aſſemblies, or getting themſelves into poſtures of removal, before this ſhort ſentence can be ended. See Numb. vi. 26, 27. Doddridge, and Locke. As the ſermon of Dr. Waterland's referred to above is an excellent and highly-approved compoſition upon the ſubject, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghoſt, be with you all! Amen.

ject, but extremely ſcarce, I doubt not it will be acceptable to my readers to find it ſubjoined here by way of

REFLECTIONS.

In 2 Cor. xiii. 14. we find firſt, grace, as coming from God the Son, love as from God the Father, and communion as being of the Holy Ghoſt. What theſe three things mean, will be ſhewn when we ſpeak of their diſtinct offices; for we deſign, firſt, to treat of the nature, diſtinction, union, and offices of the three divine Perſons; and ſecondly, to intimate the uſe and importance of theſe great articles of our Chriſtian faith.

I. 1. In the firſt place it is proper to ſay ſomething of the nature of each Perſon, that we may the better conceive what kind of Perſons they are. The firſt and moſt general diſtinction of all things is into two kinds, created and uncreated. The nature of a creature is, that it comes into being by the order and will of another, and may ceaſe to be whenever the Creator pleaſes. Of this kind are the ſun, moon, ſtars, men, and angels; they are all of a frail and changeable nature; they might ceaſe to be, and ſink into nothing, as from nothing they came, were they not ſupported by a ſuperior hand. Only the three divine Perſons,—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, they never can fail or ceaſe. They always were, and always will be: Their property is always to exiſt, from everlaſting to everlaſting, without the help or ſupport of any thing elſe whatever, being indeed the ſtay and ſupport of the whole creation.

Our thoughts are quite loſt, as often as we think of any perſon's exiſting before all beginning, yet we are very certain that ſo it muſt be, or elſe nothing could ever begin to be at all. Whether one only, or more perſons might, or do exiſt in this moſt perfect and incomprehenſible manner, we could never know by our own reaſon alone, unaſſiſted with divine revelation. But ſacred writ ſufficiently aſſures us, that three ſuch Perſons there are; who have been from all eternity, who cannot but be to all eternity; and who are the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt. And this is, and has been all along, the faith of Chriſt's church founded upon Scripture.

To conceive then rightly of theſe three divine Perſons, we ſhould conſider them as being juſt the reverſe of what creatures are; not frail, mutable, or depending upon any one's pleaſure; not as beginning to be, or capable of ever ceaſing to be; but as being perfect, and unchangeable, all-ſufficient, and independent; without beginning, and without poſſibility of ever coming to an end: And for that reaſon they are all properly divine.

2. With reſpect to their diſtinction, they are conſtantly repreſented in Scripture as diſtinct from each other. The Father is not the Son, nor is the Holy Ghoſt either of the other two. They are deſcribed, as any other diſtinct perſons are, by different characters and offices; and that ſo very frequently in the New Teſtament, that it were needleſs to inſtance in particulars. The Father is ſaid to ſend, the Son to be ſent, and the Holy Ghoſt to proceed, or go forth. The Father is repreſented as one witneſs, the Son as another witneſs;—the Son as one comforter, the Holy Ghoſt as another comforter, not both as one. The Father is introduced as ſpeaking to the Son; the Son as ſpeaking to the Father; and the Holy Ghoſt as delivering commands from both. Theſe, and a multitude of other particulars, plainly prove their diſtinction one from another; which being analogous to, and nearly reſembling the diſtinction of perſons among rational creatures, we therefore preſume to call it a perſonal diſtinction, and to call the ſacred Three, Three Perſons.

3 There is alſo an union, a very cloſe and inexpreſſible union, among the divine Three; and though Scripture every where repreſents theſe three Perſons as divine, and every one, ſingly, God and Lord; yet the ſame Scriptures do as conſtantly teach that there is but one God and one Lord: Whence it evidently follows, that theſe Three are but one God and one Lord.—And if ſuch an imperfect union as that of man and wife be reaſon ſufficient to make them twain to be one fleſh; and if the union of a good man to Chriſt ſhall ſuffice to make them, in a certain ſenſe, one Spirit, (1 Cor. vi. 17.) how much more ſhall the incomparably-cloſer, and infinitely-higher union of the three divine Perſons with each other, be ſufficient to denominate them one God, and one Lord? There is no other union like it, or ſecond to it;—an union of will, preſence, power, glory, and all perfections;—an union ſo inſeparable and unalterable, that no one of the Perſons ever was, or ever could be, without the other two; it being as neceſſary for the Three to be, and to act together, as to be at all; which is the perfection of unity, and the ſtrongeſt conjunction poſſible.

This important doctrine is rendered certain, not only from John x. 30. Rev. xxi. 22. Rev. xxii. 1. 1 Cor. ii. 11. and 1 John v. 7. but from many other places of Scripture. So that the unity of three perſons in one godhead is ſufficiently revealed, as well as their diſtinction: Neither is there any difficulty in admitting that three things may be three and one in different reſpects; diſtinct enough to be three, and yet united enough to be one; diſtinct without diviſion, united without confuſion. Theſe, therefore, together, are the one Lord God of the Chriſtians, whom we worſhip, and into whom we have been baptized.

4 Having thus conſidered what the divine Perſons are in themſelves, let us next obſerve, what are their offices relative to us. In our common and excellent church catechiſm, taken from Scripture, we are taught "to believe in God the Father, who made us, in God the Son, who redeemed us, and in God the Holy Ghoſt, who ſanctifieth us:" So that the peculiar offices of the three divine Perſons are, to create, redeem, and ſanctify: The Father is God the Creator; the Son is God the Redeemer; the Holy Ghoſt is God the Sanctifier. Which is not to be ſo underſtood, as if neither the Son nor Holy Ghoſt were concerned in creating; nor as if neither Father nor Holy Ghoſt were concerned in redeeming; nor as if neither Father nor Son were concerned in ſanctifying. All the three Perſons concur in every work; all the three together create, redeem, and ſanctify: But, each Perſon is repreſented in Scripture as having his more peculiar province; on account of which peculiarity, over and above what is common to all, one is more emphatically Creator, another Redeemer, and a third Sanctifier. So much as is common to all, ſerves to intimate their union one with the other; and ſo much as is peculiar to any one, in like manner ſerves to keep up the notion of their diſtinction.

We may obſerve ſomething of this nature in the words immediately under conſideration: The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: Grace is the common gift of the whole Trinity; but yet, here it is peculiarly attributed to Chriſt, as his gift and bleſſing, and denoting the ſpecial grace of redemption. The next words are,—the love of God; i. e. of God the Father. Now we read of the love of Chriſt, and of the love of the Spirit; and love is common to the whole Trinity; for God is love: But here one particular kind of love is intended;—the love of the Father, in ſending his Son to redeem us, and the Holy Ghoſt to ſanctify our ſouls.

The laſt words are,—And the communion of the Holy Ghoſt: Now, there is a communion both of the Father and the Son with every good man; John xiv. 23. Every good man is the temple of the whole Trinity, which has communion with him, and abides in him; as is plain from innumerable texts of Scriptures; but in this text before us, one peculiar kind of communion appertaining eſpecially to the Holy Ghoſt is ſignified. And upon the whole we may obſerve, that though St. Paul might have indifferently applied grace, or love, or communion to either Father, or Son, or Holy Ghoſt, or to all together; yet he rather choſe to make the characters ſeveral and diſtinct, to keep up a more lively ſenſe of the diſtinction of perſons and offices.

II. 1. The importance and uſe of theſe weighty truths may be judged of, firſt, from the nature of the thing itſelf: For, if there be really ſuch three divine Perſons, as above deſcribed, (and none can doubt of it, that read the Scriptures without prejudice) it muſt have been as neceſſary to let mankind into ſome knowledge of them all, as it is that we ſhould have juſt ſentiments of any one; for there is no having a right apprehenſion of any one, without knowing what relation he ſtands under to the other two. Farther, if there really be three divine perſons, it is as neceſſary that man ſhould be acquainted with it, as it is that he ſhould direct his worſhip where it is due, and to whom it belongs, For, if all honour, and glory, and adoration be due to every Perſon, as much as to any, it was highly requiſite that a creature, made for worſhip as man is, ſhould be inſtructed where and to whom to pay it. To offer it to any ſingle Perſon only, when it is claimable by three, is defrauding the other two of their juſt dues, and is not honouring God perfectly, or in full meaſure and proportion.

Add to this, that if man is to be trained up to a knowledge of God here, in order to be admitted to ſee Him as He is in the life hereafter, it ſeems highly requiſite that he ſhould know at leaſt how many, and what Perſons ſtand in that character; that by his acquaintance with them now, in ſuch a meaſure as is proper to his preſent ſtate, he may attract ſuch love and eſteem for them here, as may prepare him for the fuller viſion and fruition of the ſame hereafter.

2. This reaſoning is abundantly confirmed, from the concern which God hath ſhewn to imprint and inculcate upon us this ſo neceſſary and ſaving belief. There is no need to cite here the various texts of Scripture bearing teſtimony to the divinity of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, and engaging us to place our hope, truſt, and confidence in, and to pay our worſhip to them all: It will be ſufficient for this purpoſe to ſingle out two or three conſiderations, which appear of great force in the argument.

It is obſervable that as ſoon as ever our Lord had given his diſciples commiſſion to form a church, He inſtructs them to baptize in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt: Matth. xxviii. 19. From whence we may juſtly infer, that faith in theſe three Perſons as divine, in oppoſition to all the gods of the Gentiles, was to be the fundamental article of Chriſtianity,—the diſtinguiſhing character of the true religion.

There is another thing remarkable, not ſo obvious perhaps as the former, but no leſs worthy of notice; namely, how purpoſely the whole ſcheme of the divine diſpenſations ſeems calculated, to introduce men gradually into the knowledge of theſe three Perſons. This appears all the way down, from the fall of Adam, to the completion of all by the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt. One might juſtly wonder why man, created after God's image, ſhould be ſo ſoon ſuffered to fall; and why, after his fall, ſuch a vaſt preparation and ſo long a train ſhould be laid for his recovery; that there ſhould be no way for it, but by means of a Redeemer, to mediate and to intercede, to do and to ſuffer for him, to raiſe and reſtore him, and at length to judge him. Why might not the thing have been done in a much ſhorter and eaſier way? Why might not God the Father,—ſo graciouſly diſpoſed towards all his creatures, have ſingly had the honour of pardoning, reſtoring, raiſing, and judging mankind? Or, ſuppoſing both the Father and the Son joined in the work, why ſhould it be left as it were unfiniſhed, and incomplete, though in the hands of both, without the concurrence of the Holy Ghoſt?—Can any doubt be made, whether God the Father ſingly was able or willing to do all that the Holy Ghoſt has done for us;—to work miracles, to ſhed gifts, to ſanctify man's nature, and to qualify him for the enjoyment of God?—Theſe things muſt appear ſtrange and unaccountable; full of darkneſs and impenetrable myſtery.

But our wonder ceaſes, as ſoon as we conſider that mankind were to be gradually let into the knowledge of three divine Perſons, and not one only: That we were to be equally obliged to every one of them, that ſo we might be trained up to place our love, our fear, our truſt in all, and pay acknowledgments ſuitable to their high quality and perfections. This is the reaſon of that long train, and vaſt preparation in man's redemption: And with this view there appears ſo many characters of conſummate wiſdom all the way, that nothing can furniſh us with a more charming and auguſt idea of the divine diſpenſations, from firſt to laſt. Let us conſider but a little our Lord's conduct, when he was going to take leave of his diſciples, and what he ſaid to them upon the occaſion, reſpecting the ſending to them a Comforter; (John xvi. 7. and xiv. 16.) and then aſk what is the meaning of all this?—Could the diſciples want any other Comforter, when he had told them in the ſame chapter, that He himſelf, and the Father, ſhould come and make their abode with them; John xiv. 23. and when he had determined himſelf to be with them alway, even to the end of the world; Matth. xxviii. 20? What occaſion could they have for any other Comforter? Or what Comforter could do more or greater things than the Father or Son could do, by their conſtant preſence with them?—But the reaſon of the whole procedure is very plain and manifeſt. The Holy Ghoſt, the third Perſon of the ever-bleſſed Trinity, was to be introduced with advantage, to do as great and ſignal things for mankind as either Father or Son had done; that ſo He likewiſe might partake of the ſame divine honours, and ſhare with them in glory; and thus Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt be acknowledged as one God, bleſſed for ever.

In this faith was the church of Chriſt originally founded; in this faith have the renowned martyrs and confeſſors of old lived and died; and in the ſame faith are all the churches of the Chriſtian world inſtructed and edified at this day. Be it therefore our eſpecial care and concern to continue in this faith firm and ſtedfaſt; never to be moved from it by the diſputers of this world, who are permitted for a while to gainſay and oppoſe it for a trial and exerciſe to others, and that they who are approved may be made manifeſt. May we perſevere in paying all honour, worſhip, and praiſe, to the three bleſſed Perſons of the Godhead: knowing how great and how divine they are, and how ſecurely they may be confided in! And let the intimate union they have one with another, put us in mind of that brotherly love and union which ought to prevail amongſt Chriſtians; that ſo we may become as it were one heart, and one ſoul, knit in and ſtriving together for the faith of the Goſpel, in the unity of the Spirit, and the bond of peace. So may the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the love of God the Father, and the communion of the Holy Ghoſt, be with us all now and for evermore! Amen.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

CHAP. I.

He wondereth that they have ſo ſoon left him and the goſpel; and pronounceth a malediction on thoſe that preach any other goſpel than he did: he learned the goſpel not of men, but of God: and ſheweth what he was before his calling, and what he did preſently after it.

PAUL an apoſtle, (not of men, neither by man, but by Jeſus Chriſt, and God the Father, who raiſed him from the dead;)

Ver. 1. Ver. 11, 12. Tit. i. 3. Acts ii. 24.

GALATIANS.] The ſubject and deſign of this Epiſtle is much the ſame with that of the Epiſtle to the Romans; but treated in ſomewhat a different manner. The buſineſs of it, ſays Mr. Locke, is to dehort and hinder the Galatians from bringing themſelves under the bondage of the Moſaical law. Dr. Taylor is of opinion, that the two Epiſtles have relation to different ſorts of Jews; that of the Romans, to Jews who totally oppoſed and rejected the whole Goſpel, as unneceſſary; this of the Galatians, to Jews who, while they believed the Goſpel, urged that a ſubmiſſion to the law of Moſes was at the ſame time neceſſary. But, ſays he, as the principles of thoſe Jews did in ſome things coincide, and their ſentiments were the ſame, with regard to the perpetual obligation of the law of Moſes; ſo there may be an affinity and agreement in the arguments which the Apoſtle advances in confutation of the one and the other. The Galatians were deſcended from thoſe Gauls who had formerly invaded Greece, and afterwards ſettled in Lower Aſia. St. Paul was the firſt who preached the Goſpel amongſt them; and therefore referring ch. i. 8, 9. to what he had before taught them, he does not in this Epiſtle lay down at large the doctrine of the Goſpel, as he does in that to the Romans; for as they were converted by others, he did not know how far they were inſtructed in all thoſe particulars, which, on the occaſion of his writing to them, it might be neceſſary for them to underſtand; and therefore, writing to the Romans, he ſets before them a large and comprehenſive view of the chief heads of the Chriſtian religion. He alſo ſpeaks with greater freedom and vehemence to the Galatians than he does to the Romans; to whom, being a ſtranger, he writes not in ſo familiar a ſtile; nor in his reproofs and exhortations uſes ſo much the tone of a maſter. St. Paul firſt preached to the churches in Galatia about the year 51. and in his progreſs through that province, A. D. 54. he had an opportunity of confirming them in the faith which he had planted among them. As the Apoſtle expreſſes his wonder that the Galatians were ſo ſoon perverted, he muſt have written this Epiſtle not long after his firſt journey; and as there is no hint that he had been with them more than once, it is reaſonable to conclude, that it was written before his ſecond journey, and conſequently not later than A. D. 53. Though the ſubſcription commonly placed at the end of this Epiſtle aſſerts its being written from Rome, yet, allowing the lateſt date aſſigned to it, which fixes it to A. D. 58. this could not be the place from whence he wrote, as St. Paul did not go to Rome till after that period. This ſhews therefore that this ſubſcription, like moſt of the others, is ſpurious. Michaelis thinks that this Epiſtle was written in the year 51, ſoon after St. Paul left the Galatians, and before he departed from Theſſalonica; though others date it about the end of the year 52, or in the very beginning of the year 53, before St. Paul ſet out to go to Jeruſalem by way of Epheſus. The following diſorders had crept into the churches of Galatia: Firſt, Some zealots for the Jewiſh conſtitution had very nearly perſuaded the Galatians out of their Chriſtian liberty, and made them willing to ſubmit to circumciſion, and all the ritual obſervances of the Jewiſh church, as neceſſary under the Goſpel. ch. i. 7. iii. 3. iv. 9—21. v. 1—10. Secondly, Their diſſentions and diſputes in this matter had raiſed great animoſities among them, to the diſturbance of their peace, and the ſetting them at ſtrife one with another. ch. v. 6—15. The reforming them in theſe two points ſeems to be the main buſineſs of this Epiſtle; wherein St. Paul endeavours to eſtabliſh them in a reſolution to ſtand firm in the freedom of the Goſpel, which exempts them from the bondage of the Moſaical law; and labours to reduce them to a ſincere love and affection one of another: concluding with an exhortation to liberality and general benevolence. ch. vi. 1—10. Theſe being the matters about which he had it in his mind to write to them, he ſeems here as if he had finiſhed; but upon mentioning, ver. 11. how large a letter he had written to them with his own hand, the former argument concerning circumciſion, which filled and warmed his mind, broke out again into what we find ver. 12 to 17 of the 6th chapter. See Locke, Taylor's Key, p. 110. Michaelis, Lardner, &c.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. Paul an Apoſtle] The four firſt verſes contain the preface or introduction to this Epiſtle: The general view of it plainly ſhews St. Paul's chief deſign to be, to keep the Galatians from hearkening to thoſe Judaizing ſeducers, who had almoſt perſuaded them to be circumciſed. Theſe perverters of the Goſpel of Chriſt, as St. Paul himſelf calls them, ver. 7. had, as may be gathered from ver. 8 and 10. and from ch. v. 11. and other paſſages of this Epiſtle, made the Galatians believe that St. Paul himſelf was for circumciſion. Till he had ſet them right in this matter, and convinced them of the faſhood of this aſperſion, it was in vain for him by other arguments to attempt the re-eſtabliſhing of the Galatians in the Chriſtian liberty, and in that truth which he had preached to them. His firſt endeavour therefore was, to remove this calumny; and to that purpoſe the preſent introduction,—different from what we find in any other of his Epiſtles,—is extremely well adapted. He declares here, at the entrance, very expreſly and emphatically, that he was not ſent by men, on their errands; nay, that Chriſt, in ſending him, did not ſo much as convey his apoſtolical power to him by the miniſtry or intervention of any man; but that his commiſſion and inſtructions were all intirely from God, and Chriſt himſelf by immediate revelation. This of itſelf was an argument ſufficient to induce them to believe, firſt, that what he taught them, when he firſt preached the Goſpel to them, was the truth, and that they ought to adhere firmly to it. Secondly, that he changed not his doctrine, whatever might be reported of him. He was Chriſt's choſen officer, and had no dependence on mens opinions, nor regard to their authority or favour in what he preached; and therefore it was not likely that he ſhould preach one thing at one time, and another thing at another.

Not of men] Not ſent by men at their pleaſure, or by their authority; not inſtructed by men what to ſay or do, as we ſee Timothy and Titus were, when ſent by St. Paul; and Judas and Silas, when ſent by the church of Jeruſalem. Neither by men; that is, his choice and ſeparation to his miniſtry and apoſtleſhip was ſo wholly an act of God and Chriſt, that there was no intervention of any thing done by any man in the caſe, as there was in the election of Matthias. We may ſee all this explained at large, ver. 10—12, 16, 17. and ch. ii. 6—9. It is with great propriety that the Apoſtle mentions here the reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead, as perfectly agreeable to the main point he had in view, which was, to aſſert the doctrine of juſtification by faith in Chriſt; ſince God declared, by raiſing him from the dead, that he accepted the atonement Chriſt had made, and gave him a diſcharge from any further claim upon him, for the ſatisfaction of his juſtice: and as it is this which is the great foundation of our faith in Chriſt, ſo the Apoſtle ſays elſewhere that he was raiſed again for our juſtification. Rom. ix. 25. Locke, Doddridge, and L'Enfant.

2 And all the brethren which are with me, Unto the churches of Galatia:

3 Grace be to you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt,

4 Who gave himſelf for our ſins, that he might deliver us from this preſent evil world, according to the will of God and our Father:

5 To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

6 I marvel, that ye are ſo ſoon removed from him that called you into the grace of Chriſt, unto another goſpel:

7 Which is not another; but there be ſome that trouble you, and would pervert the goſpel of Chriſt.

8 But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other goſpel unto you, than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accurſed.

9 As we ſaid before, ſo ſay I now again, If any man preach any other goſpel unto you, than that ye have received, let him be accurſed.

10 For do I now perſuade men, or God? or do I ſeek to pleaſe men? for if I yet pleaſed men, I ſhould not be the ſervant of Chriſt.

Ver. 2. And all the brethren, &c.] Not all believers in general, but thoſe who accompanied St. Paul in his travels, and aſſiſted him in preaching the Goſpel. Such were Timothy, Clement, and others, who are denominated fellow-labourers in other places. See Philip. iv. 21, 22. When St. Paul writes to the Chriſtians of any particular city, he generally uſes the ſingular number, the church: but the province of Galatia contained ſeveral cities and churches. This was an evident ſeal of his Apoſtleſhip, ſince in Galatia, a ſmall province of the Leſſer Aſia, he had, after no long ſtay amongſt them, planted ſeveral diſtinct churches. It is remarkable, that the Apoſtle does not make uſe of any of the endearing epithets, as the beloved, the ſaints, the brethren, &c. and there might be good reaſon for it. The Galatians had ſuffered his very miſſion to be called in queſtion, without attempting any vindication of it, and had given countenance to doctrines which were ſubverſive of the very foundation of Chriſtianity. See Locke, Wall, and Hammond.

Ver. 3. Grace be to you, &c.] Theſe words are both a Chriſtian ſalutation, and an Apoſtolical benediction. As they are a ſalutation, they expreſs a wiſh and deſire of the beſt bleſſings in behalf of thoſe ſaluted: From whence we may learn, that religion doth not aboliſh and deſtroy, but ſpiritualize and improve civility, humanity, and common courteſy. The heathens wiſhed health to their ſaluted friends; the Jews, peace; that is, all manner of good: But the Chriſtians, grace and peace. Again, the words may be underſtood as an apoſtolical and miniſterial bleſſing. The Apoſtles were the patriarchs of the church of the New Teſtament; and as a ſpiritual father, St. Paul here bleſſes his children, wiſhing them firſt grace, then peace. Peace muſt be ſought after grace, and not expected before it: peace without grace is no peace; there can be no peace with the Creator, no ſanctified peace with the creatures, except we are firſt made partakers of the gracious love and favour of Almighty God, through Jeſus Chriſt. See Calmet and Henry.

Ver. 4. From this preſent evil world] "From the vicious cuſtoms and practices of the world." The original is ambiguous: ſome would render it from the evil of this preſent world. Mr. Locke argues from 1 Cor. ii. 6, 8. that Αἰὼν ὀυτος ſignifies the Jewiſh nation, under the Moſaic conſtitution; and ſuppoſes theſe words to contain an intimation, that God intended to take the Jews themſelves out of it, ſo far was he from any purpoſe of bringing the Gentiles under it. But it is certain that Αἰῶν often ſignifies the ſame with κοσμος, that is, the world. See Matth. xiii. 39, 40. 2 Cor. iv. 4. Tit. ii. 12. Tillotſon, Heylin, Locke.

Ver. 6.] We have before obſerved, that St. Paul's firſt endeavour in this Epiſtle was to ſatisfy the Galatians, that the report ſpread of him that he preached circumciſion was falſe. Till this obſtruction which lay in his way was removed, it was to no purpoſe for him to go about to diſſuade them from circumciſion, though that be what he principally aims at in this Epiſtle. To ſhew them that he promoted not circumciſion, he calls their hearkening to thoſe who perſuaded them to be circumciſed their being removed from him; and thoſe that ſo perſuaded them, perverters of the Goſpel of Chriſt, ver. 6, 7. He further aſſures them, that the Goſpel which he preached every where, was that and that only which he had received by immediate revelation from Chriſt, and no contrivance of man; nor did he vary it to pleaſe men; that would not conſiſt with his being a ſervant of Chriſt, ver. 10. And he expreſſes ſuch a firm adherence to what he had received from Chriſt, and had preached to them, that he pronounces an anathema upon himſelf, ver. 8, 9. or any other man, or angel, that ſhould preach any thing elſe to them. To make out this to have been all along his conduct, he gives an account of himſelf for many years backwards, even from the time before his converſion; wherein he ſhews, that from a zealous perſecuting Jew he was made a Chriſtian, and an Apoſtle by immediate revelation; and that having no communication with the Apoſtles, or with the churches of Judea, or any man for ſome years, he had nothing to preach but what he had received by immediate revelation. Nay, when fourteen years after he went up to Jeruſalem, it was by revelation; and when he there communicated the Goſpel which he preached among the Gentiles, Peter, James, and John approved of it, without adding any thing, but admitted him as their Fellow-Apoſtle. So that in all this he was guided by nothing but divine revelation, which he inflexibly adhered to ſo far, that he openly oppoſed St. Peter, for his judaizing at Antioch. All which account of himſelf tends clearly to ſhew, that St. Paul made not the leaſt ſtep towards complying with the Jews in favour of the law; nor did, out of regard to man, deviate from the doctrine he had received by revelation from God, ch. i. 6.—ii. 21. Locke.

That ye are ſo ſoon removed] See the introductory note. From him that called you into the grace of Chriſt, might be rendered with equal propriety, called you by, or through the grace of Chriſt. Theſe words plainly point out St. Paul himſelf. See ch. v. 8. But then one might wonder how he came to uſe theſe words; ſince it would have ſounded better to have ſaid, Removed from the Goſpel I preached to you, to another goſpel, than Removed from me, who preached to you to another goſpel. But if it be remembered that St. Paul's deſign here is to vindicate himſelf from the aſperſion caſt on him, that he preached circumciſion, nothing could be more ſuitable to that purpoſe than this way of expreſſing himſelf. Mr. Saurin, obſerving that the Galatians were a colony of the Gauls, (i. e. of the ancient inhabitants of France,) ſays, that they have been always reproached with taking impreſſions eaſily, and as eaſily ſuffering them to be effaced. See his Sermons, tom. xi. p. 46. and Locke.

Ver. 7. Which is not another] I take the Greek here to ſignify, ſays Mr. Locke, which is not any thing elſe; Ὁ ὐκ ἔςιν ἄλλο. The words themſelves, the context, and the buſineſs the Apoſtle is upon, do all concur in this ſenſe. For firſt, if Ὁ had referred to εὐαγγέλιον, it would have been more natural to have kept to the word ἕτερον, and not have changed it into ἄλλο. Secondly, it can ſcarce be ſuppoſed by any one who reads what St. Paul ſays in the following words of this verſe, and the two adjoining, and in ch. iii. 4. and v. 2—7. that St. Paul ſhould tell them, that what he meant to preſerve them from, is not another goſpel. Thirdly, it is ſuitable to St. Paul's deſign here to tell them, that to their being removed to another goſpel no body elſe had contributed, but it was wholly owing to thoſe judaizing ſeducers. Dr. Heylin renders this and the preceding verſe as follows: I wonder you have ſo ſoon deſerted unto another goſpel from me, who called you by the grace of Chriſt; which comes only from this, that there are ſome who perplex your minds, and would ſubvert the Goſpel of Chriſt.

Ver. 8. Though we, or an angel from heaven] Some have imagined, that the Apoſtle uſes this expreſſion as a prophetical prevention againſt crediting the pretences of Cerinthus and Mahomet, who both pretended to have received their revelations by the miniſtry of an angel. It may likewiſe glance at the manner of giving the law, which, according to the Apoſtle, was by the miniſtration of angels. By preaching any other goſpel, he means the preaching any thing as goſpel beſides what he had preached. See Clarke, Calmet, and Henry.

Ver. 9. Let him be accurſed] Though we may look upon the repetition of the anathema here to be for the adding of force to what he ſays; yet we may obſerve, that by joining himſelf with an angel in the foregoing verſe, he does as good as tell them, that he is not guilty of what deſerves that anathema: ſkilfully inſinuating to the Galatians, that they might as well ſuſpect an angel ſhould preach to them a doctrine different from his, i. e. a falſe goſpel, as that he himſelf ſhould; and then in this verſe he lays the anathema wholly and ſolely upon the judaizing ſeducers. See Locke, and on 1 Cor. xvi. 22.

Ver. 10. Do I now perſuade men] Do I now court the favour of men;—or, Do I ingratiate myſelf with men, rather than with God? Wat. The words now and yet cannot be underſtood without a reference to ſomething in St. Paul's paſt life. What that was which he had particularly then in his mind, we may ſee by the account he gives of himſelf in what immediately follows; namely, that before his converſion he was employed by men in their deſigns, and made it his buſineſs to pleaſe them, as may be ſeen Acts ix. 1, 2. But when God called him, he received his commiſſion and inſtructions from Him alone, and immediately entered upon his office, without conſulting any man whatſoever; preaching that and that only which he had received 11 But I certify you, brethren, that the goſpel which was preached of me, is not after man.

12 For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jeſus Chriſt.

13 For ye have heard of my converſation in time paſt, in the Jews religion, how that beyond meaſure I perſecuted the church of God, and waſted it:

14 And profited in the Jews religion above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers.

15 But when it pleaſed God, who ſeparated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace,

16 To reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not with fleſh and blood:

17 Neither went I up to Jeruſalem, to them which were apoſtles before me; but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damaſcus.

18 Then after three years I went up to Jeruſalem, to ſee Peter, and abode with him fifteen days.

19 But other of the apoſtles ſaw I none, ſave James the Lord's brother.

20 Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not.

21 Afterwards I came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia;

22 And was unknown by face unto the churches of Judea, which were in Chriſt:

23 But they had heard only, That he which perſecuted us in times paſt, now preacheth the faith which once he deſtroyed.

24 And they glorified God in me.

CHAP. II.

He ſheweth when he went up again to Jeruſalem, and for what purpoſe: that Titus was not circumciſed: and that he reſiſted Peter, and told him the reaſon, why he and others, being Jews, do believe themſelves in Chriſt to be juſtified by faith, and not by works: and that they live not in ſin who are ſo juſtified.

THEN fourteen years after I went up again to Jeruſalem, with Barnabas, and took Titus with me alſo.

ceived from Chriſt; ſo that it would be ſenſeleſs folly in him, and no leſs than the forſaking his Maſter Jeſus Chriſt, if he ſhould now, as was reported of him, mix any thing of man's with the pure doctrine of the Goſpel, (which he had received immediately by revelation from Jeſus Chriſt,) to pleaſe the Jews, after he had ſo long preached only that; and to avoid all appearance or pretence of the contrary, had ſo carefully ſhunned all communication with the churches of Judea; and had not, till a good while after his converſion, and that very ſparingly, converſed with any, and thoſe but a few of the Apoſtles themſelves, ſome of whom he openly reproved for their judaizing. This is a plain aſſertion of the divinity of the doctrine which he had preached. Πείθω, tranſlated perſuade, is ſometimes uſed for making application to any one to obtain his good-will or friendſhip. Hence, Acts xii. 20. πείσαντες Βλάϛον, is tranſlated, having made Blaſtus their friend. The meaning therefore is agreeable to Dr. Waterland's rendering. See 1 Theſſ. ii. 4. Locke, Grotius, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 11. The Goſpel which was preached of me] This being ſpoken indefinitely, muſt be underſtood "in general,—every where," and ſo gives us the import of the foregoing verſe. Locke.

Ver. 13. In the Jews religion] This does not ſignify the religion originally taught by Moſes, but that which was practiſed among the Jews at this time, and much of it built upon the tradition of the elders. L'Enfant and Grotius.

Ver. 14. And profited—my equals in, &c.] And made proficiency—my cotemporaries of, &c. MS. and Wat.

Ver. 15. Who ſeparated me] See Jer. i. 5. and the hiſtory of this Apoſtle's call, Acts ix. 1, &c.

Ver. 16. That I might preach him among the heathen] This was undoubtedly the ſcheme of Providence concerning St. Paul, who has been accordingly diſtinguiſhed by the name of The Apoſtle of the Gentiles. Dr. Wells and ſome others underſtand the laſt clauſe of this verſe as if the Apoſtle had ſaid, "Immediately after the recovery of my ſight, without conferring with any man in the world, or ſo much as applying to Ananias himſelf for advice, I retired by divine direction into the deſart of Arabia; where, after ſome time ſpent in devotion, I had a full revelation made to me of the moſt important facts and doctrines of Chriſtianity; [which ſome ſuppoſe to be the rapture referred to, 2 Cor. xii. 3.] and then, after my return from thence, preached at Damaſcus for the firſt time." Mr. Locke too inſiſts, that εὐθέως here does not refer to St. Paul's immediately engaging in the work of the miniſtry, without applying for advice to any man; but to his going into Arabia: But the ſame word is uſed by St. Luke, in his hiſtory of the Acts, who, without taking any notice of St. Paul's departure into Arabia, ſays, that after he recovered ſtrength, he tarried certain days at Damaſcus, and (εὐθέως) immediately preached Chriſt in the ſynagogues, Acts ix. 19, 20. So that it ſeems moſt probable that after his converſion, St. Paul was ſo well inſtructed in the knowledge of the Goſpel by the revelation that was then made to him, that he immediately began, without conſulting any man, to preach the word at Damaſcus, before he went from thence into Arabia: Which is moſt ſuitable to the natural order of the words, and beſt agrees with the account in the Acts of his firſt entering on his miniſtry. Fleſh and blood is uſed for man. Comp. Epheſians vi. 12. and ſee Wells, Bengelius, and Locke.

Ver. 17. Neither went I up to Jeruſalem] What the Apoſtle ſays in this and the preceding, verſe is to evidence to the Galatians the full aſſurance he had of the truth and perfection of the Goſpel, which he had received from Chriſt by immediate revelation; and how little he was diſpoſed to have any regard to the pleaſing of men in preaching it; inſomuch that he did not even communicate or adviſe with any of the Apoſtles about it, to ſee whether they approved it or not. Locke.

Ver. 18. After three years] That is, from his converſion. The Apoſtle ſeems to have uſed great caution, to prevent any ſuſpicion that he had gone even to Peter for the ſake of inſtruction; for he ſays, firſt, that he went only to ſee him, and then that he abode with him; but ſays not a word of having been taught by him. See Locke and Grotius.

Ver. 19. James, the Lord's brother] He was the ſon of Alpheus and Mary, the ſiſter of the virgin; ſo that he was couſin-germain to Jeſus. See on John xiv. 22. and on Mark iii. 18.

Ver. 20. Before God I lie not] A revelation of the facts and doctrines of Chriſtianity immediately from Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, without the aſſiſtance of any human teacher, ſo wonderfully agreeing in all its branches with that which Jeſus Chriſt had taught on earth, both before and after his reſurrection, was ſo extraordinary an event, and of ſo great importance to thoſe whom St. Paul viſited, and to whom he wrote, that one cannot wonder he ſhould think proper to aſſert it in ſo ſolemn a manner. We have great reaſon, while we read the atteſtation he has given to the truth of what he ſays, to acknowledge that it is of a piece with the many ſigns and wonders attending both his converſion and his miniſtry. See lord Lyttelton on St. Paul's Converſion.

Ver. 22. Which were in Chriſt] That is, "believing in Chriſt." See Rom. xvi. 7. What he takes ſuch particular notice of here, does not tend to the proving that he was a true Apoſtle; but ſerves very well to ſhew, that in what he preached he had no communication with thoſe of his own nation, nor took any care to pleaſe the Jews. Locke.

Ver. 24. In me] On my account. Doddridge.

Chap. II. Ver. 1. Fourteen years after] This was the time when he went up to Antioch with the council at Jeruſalem, about the queſtion whether the Gentiles were to be circumciſed. See Acts xv. 4, &c. This is the earlieſt mention we meet with of Titus; for he

2 And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that goſpel which I preach among the Gentiles; but privately to them which were of reputation, leſt by any means I ſhould run, or had run in vain.

3 But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumciſed:

4 And that becauſe of falſe brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to ſpy out our liberty, which we have in Chriſt Jeſus, that they might bring us into bondage.

5 To whom we gave place by ſubjection, no not for an hour; that the truth of the goſpel might continue with you.

6 But of thoſe, who ſeemed to be ſomewhat (whatſoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth no man's perſon:) for they who ſeemed to be ſomewhat, in conference added nothing to me:

7 But contrariwiſe, when they ſaw that the goſpel of the uncircumciſion was committed unto me, as the goſpel of the circumciſion was unto Peter;

8 (For he that wrought effectually in Peter is no where mentioned by St. Luke in the Acts; and what we read of him in the ſecond Epiſtle to the Corinthians, as well as in the ſecond to Timothy, was later by ſome years. He is here ſaid to have been a Greek, (or Gentile,) and being born of Gentile parents, was not circumciſed; but where or when he was converted is uncertain; only we may conclude he was converted by St. Paul, from the title he gives him of his own ſon, after the common faith. Tit. i. 4. And as he now took Titus with him from Antioch to Jeruſalem, ſo he employed him afterwards on ſeveral occaſions, and appears to have regarded him with great affection and endearment. See Wall, Doddridge, and Witſius.

Ver. 2. I went up by revelation] Some ſuppoſe, that this means only that he went up according to the revelation which he mentions as having received, ch. i. 12. But it ſeems rather to be here implied, that in their ſending Paul and Barnabas to Jeruſalem, the church at Antioch were directed by a revelation, made either immediately to Paul himſelf, or to ſome other of the prophets there. The conference which he had in private with the chief of the church of Jeruſalem concerning the Goſpel which he preached among the Gentiles, ſeems not to have been barely concerning the doctrine of their being free from the law of Moſes: that had been openly and warmly diſputed at Antioch, and was known to be the buſineſs they came about to Jeruſalem. But it is probable it was to explain to them the whole doctrine he had received by revelation, by the fullneſs and perfection whereof [for it is ſaid, ver. 6. that in the conference they added nothing to it—] and by the miracle he had done in confirmation of it, (ver. 8.) they might ſee and own what he preached to be the truth, and him to be one of themſelves, both by commiſſion and doctrine; as indeed they did. Ἀυτοῖς, them, ſignifies thoſe at Jeruſalem: κατ' ἰδίαν δὲ τοῖς δοκȣ̃σι are exegetical, ſhewing the particular manner and perſons, and import, but privately to the more eminent. It was ſufficient for his purpoſe to be owned by thoſe of greateſt authority; and ſo we ſee he was by James, Peter, and John, ver. 9. and therefore it was ſafeſt and beſt to give an account of the Goſpel he preached in private to them, and not publickly to the whole church. St. Paul uſes the word running for "taking pains in the Goſpel." Comp. Col. ii. 16. The metaphor is probably taken from the Olympic games. He ſeems here to give two reaſons, why at laſt, after fourteen years, he communicated to the chief of the Apoſtles at Jeruſalem the Goſpel which he preached to the Gentiles; when, as he ſhews to the Galatians, he had formerly declined all communication with the converted Jews. Firſt, he appears to intimate, that he did it by revelation. Secondly, he gives another reaſon; namely, that if he had not communicated as he did with the leading men there, and ſatisfied them of his doctrine and miſſion, his oppoſers might unſettle the church he had or ſhould plant, by urging, that the Apoſtles knew not what it was that he preached, nor had ever owned it for the Goſpel, or him for an Apoſtle. Of the readineſs of the judaizing ſeducers to take any ſuch advantage againſt him, he had lately an example in the church at Corinth. See Locke and Whitby.

Ver. 3. Was compelled to be circumciſed] Ὀυκ ἠναγκάσθη is rightly tranſlated was not compelled; a plain evidence to the Galatians, that the circumciſing of the convert Gentiles was no part of the Goſpel which he laid before theſe men of note, as what he preached to the Gentiles; for if it had, Titus muſt have been circumciſed, for no part of his Goſpel was blamed or altered by them. ver. 6. It is difficult to diſcover of what other uſe the mentioning of Titus here can be, than to ſhew to the Galatians that what he preached contained nothing of circumciſing the convert Gentiles. If it were to ſhew that the other Apoſtles and church at Jeruſalem diſpenſed with circumciſion, and other ritual obſervances of the Moſaical law, that was needleſs, as having been ſufficiently declared by their decree, Acts xv. which was made and communicated to the churches before this Epiſtle was written; Acts xvi. 4. Much leſs was this example of Titus of any force to prove that St. Paul was a true Apoſtle, if that were what he was here labouring to juſtify: But conſidering his aim to be the clearing himſelf from a report tha the preached up circumciſion, there could be nothing more to his purpoſe than this inſtance of Titus, whom, uncircumciſed as he was, he took with him to Jeruſalem; uncircumciſed he kept with him there; and uncircumciſed he took back with him when he returned. This was a ſtrong and pertinent inſtance to perſuade the Galatians that the report of his preaching circumciſion was a mere aſperſion. Locke.

Ver. 4. Into bondage] What this bondage was, ſee Acts xv. 1. v. 10.

Ver. 5. To whom we gave place, &c.] The neither in the 3d verſe, according to propriety of ſpeech, ought to have an or to anſwer it; and accordingly, in this verſe, the ȣ̓δὲ ſhould be ſo rendered, Neither was Titus compelled—nor did we yield to them a moment. The point thoſe falſe brethren contended for was, that the law of Moſes was to be kept: See Acts xv. 5. St. Paul, who upon other occaſions was ſo condeſcending, that to the Jews he became as a Jew, &c. 1 Cor. ix. 19—22. yet when ſubjection to the law was claimed as due in any caſe, he would not yield in the leaſt matter. This appears to be the meaning of the expreſſion, we gave not place by ſubjection; for where compliance was deſired of him, upon account of expediency, and not of ſubjection to the law, we do not find him ſtiff and inflexible, as may be ſeen Acts xxi. 18—26. which was after the writing of this Epiſtle. In the next clauſe of this verſe he gives us the reaſon why he yielded not to thoſe judaizing falſe brethren: it was that the true doctrine which he had preached to the Gentiles, or their freedom from the law might ſtand firm: a convincing argument to the Galatians that he preached not circumciſion. See ver. 14. and ch. iii. 1. Dr. Heylin connects this and the 4th verſe in the following manner; ver. 4. And as to the falſe brethren, who inſidiouſly crept in to ſpy out our liberty, &c. ver. 5. I would not yield to them by ſubjection, &c. "Much had been done on ſeveral occaſions, ſays this writer, in condeſcenſion to weakneſs, and from the motive of charity; but when things indifferent were required abſolutely, and as a neceſſary ſubjection, then St. Paul reſiſted, as became him."

Ver. 6. But of thoſe who ſeemed to be ſomewhat] St. Paul having ſhewn in the preceding verſes what paſſed between the falſe brethren and him, now proceeds to ſhew what paſſed between the chief of the brethren and himſelf; and therefore ſome introduce the verſe with theſe words: Thus we behaved ourſelves towards the falſe brethren; but of thoſe, &c. However the words who ſeemed to be ſomewhat, may anſwer the original, they certainly carry to an Engliſh ear a diminiſhing and ironical ſenſe, contrary to the meaning of the Apoſtle, who ſpeaks here of thoſe for whom he had a real eſteem, and who were truly of the firſt rank; for it is plain by what follows, that he means Peter, James, and John. Beſides, οἱ δοκȣ̃ντες being taken in a good ſenſe, ver. 2. and tranſlated thoſe of reputation, the ſame mode of expreſſion ſhould have been retained when the ſame term occurs. Every one ſees that there is ſomething to be ſupplied to make up the ſenſe at the beginning of this verſe. Moſt commentators add the words, I learned nothing; but this enervates the reaſon ſubjoined at the cloſe of the verſe;—I learned nothing of them,—for they taught me nothing: But it is very good reaſoning, and ſuited to his purpoſe to ſay, that it was nothing at all to him how much thoſe great men were formerly in Chriſt's favour; "But as for thoſe who were really men of eminence,—what they were heretofore, it matters not at all to me; God accepts not the perſon of any man, but communicates the Goſpel to whom he pleaſes, as he has done to me by revelation without their help: For in their conference with me, they added nothing to me;—they taught me nothing new, nor had they any thing to object againſt what I preached to the Gentiles." Peter, James, and John, who appear from ver. 9. to be the perſons here ſpoken of, ſeem of all the Apoſtles to have been moſt in eſteem and favour with their Maſter, during his converſation upon earth: "But yet that, ſays St. Paul, is of no moment now to me. The Goſpel which I preach, and which God, who is no reſpecter of perſons, has been pleaſed to commit to me by immediate revelation, is not the leſs true, nor is there any reaſon for me to recede from it in a title: for theſe men of the firſt rank could find nothing to add, alter, or gainſay it." This is ſuitable to St. Paul's deſign here, to let the Galatians ſee, that as he in his carriage had never favoured circumciſion, ſo neither had he any reaſon, by preaching circumciſion, to forſake the doctrine of liberty in the law, which he had preached to them as a part of that Goſpel delivered to him by revelation. See Locke and Doddridge.

Ver. 8. He that wrought effectually] This may be underſtood to ſignify both the operation of the Spirit upon the mind of St. Peter to the apoſtleſhip of the circumciſion, the ſame was mighty in me towards the Gentiles:)

9 And when James, Cephas, and John, who ſeemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowſhip; that we ſhould go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumciſion.

10 Only they would that we ſhould remember the poor; the ſame which I alſo was forward to do.

11 But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withſtood him to the face, becauſe he was to be blamed.

12 For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew, and ſeparated himſelf, fearing them which were of the circumciſion.

13 And the other Jews diſſembled likewiſe with him; inſomuch that Barnabas alſo was carried away with their diſſimulation.

14 But when I ſaw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the goſpel, I ſaid unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, liveſt after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compelleſt thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?

15 We who are Jews by nature, and not ſinners of the Gentiles,

16 Knowing that a man is not juſtified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jeſus Chriſt; even we have believed in Jeſus Chriſt, that we might be juſtified by the faith of Chriſt, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law ſhall no fleſh be juſtified.

17 But if while we ſeek to be juſtified by Chriſt, we ourſelves alſo are found ſinners, is therefore Chriſt the miniſter of ſin? God forbid!

18 For if I build again the things which I deſtroyed, I make myſelf a tranſgreſſor.

and St. Paul, in ſending them the one to the Jews, the other to the Gentiles; and alſo the Holy Ghoſt beſtowed on them, whereby they were enabled to do miracles for the confirmation of their doctrine; in neither of which St. Paul, as he ſhews, was inferior, and ſo had as authentic a ſeal of his miſſion and doctrine, as they had of theirs. Locke. Inſtead of was mighty, the MS properly reads, wrought effectually.

Ver. 9. And when James, Cephas, and John, &c.] And, being ſenſible of the grace wherewith I am endowed, James, Cephas, and John, who were eſteemed main ſupports of the church in Judea, embraced me and Barnabas, as their aſſociates; and agreed that we ſhould go to the Gentiles, and they to the Jews: Heylin: who is of opinion with father Hardouin and others, that "Cephas here mentioned was, in all probability, a different perſon from Peter, juſt before named. Peter, Paul, James, Cephas, and John, are five different perſons. Cephas was one of the ſeventy diſciples, as appears by Euſebius and others; and if Peter had been here deſigned by that name, he would have been put firſt as uſual. Now the Vulgate and beſt MSS have Cephas, and not Peter, in ver. 11, 14. "and ſo the ancients did certainly read it," ſays the learned Pearſon; "for if Πετρος had been the reading in thoſe verſes, there never could have been any diſpute, as there was, whether it was the Apoſtle, or one of the ſeventy diſciples, that Paul withſtood at Antioch." Diſ. 1. de ſucceſ. prim. epiſc. Peter's whole character is quite oppoſite to the timid and mean compliances here imputed to Cephas: In his natural man he was poſitive even to raſhneſs, and as an Apoſtle he firſt was inſtructed by viſion, that the diſtinction between Jews and Gentiles was at an end. Acts x. He accordingly firſt broke down the pale of Judaiſm, by eating with Cornelius and his family: In Acts xi. he juſtifies his doing ſo by expreſs command from heaven: And Acts xv. preſiding in the aſſembly of the Apoſtles, convened upon this very ſubject, he determined the debate by declaring, that God had put no difference between Jews and Gentiles; and in conſequence of his deciſion letters were written to that effect. There are many other arguments (concludes Dr. Heylin) which I think evince that the Apoſtle Peter could not here be meant by Cephas." See F. Hardouin's diſſertation on the ſubject, and Saurin's ſermons, tom. ii. p. 49.

Ver. 10. That we ſhould remember the poor] "That we ſhould entreat all believers whom we meet with in our travels, to ſend ſome relief to the Chriſtians in Jeruſalem, who were at this time in great want and diſtreſs."

Ver. 11. Peter] This, according to father Hardouin, is to be underſtood of Cephas, and ſo likewiſe, ver. 14. Had St. Peter, or the perſon here underſtood, obſerved the law of Moſes himſelf, St. Paul would not have blamed him for that. What he blamed him for was, his acting as if the Gentiles were obliged to live as did the Jews, in order to their being the people of God, and partakers of the bleſſings and honours of his kingdom. See Taylor, and on Rom. vii. 6.

Ver. 14. According to the truth of the Goſpel] That is, "That freedom from the law of Moſes, which was a part of the true doctrine of the Goſpel." In this ſenſe he uſes the word truth throughout the Epiſtle; inſiſting on it, that this doctrine of freedom from the law was the true Goſpel. Had this been matter only of private offence, certainly St. Paul would have known that duty required him to expoſtulate with Peter privately upon it, before he referred it to ſuch an aſſembly. But as it was a public affair, in which great numbers were ſo ſenſibly affected, this method was moſt proper. Probably this happened after public worſhip; and it would ſeem the leſs ſurprizing, conſidering the conferences which uſed to be held in the Jewiſh ſynagogues, before the aſſembly was broke up. It has been very juſtly obſerved, that had any impoſture been carrying on, the contention of theſe two great managers would probably have been an occaſion of diſcovering it. See Locke, Jefferys, and Doddridge's Eſſay on Inſpiration.

Ver. 15. We who are Jews, &c.] We Jews, and not Gentiles, by nature ſinners. Wat. and Elſner. Others underſtand it of Jews by natural deſcent. What the Jews thought of themſelves, in contradiſtinction to the Gentiles, See Rom. ii. 17—23. Dr. Heylin obſerves, that ſinner here, and ver. 16, 17. and often elſewhere, ſignifies, "a man in the ſtate of nature, before that application of the merits of Chriſt, which is termed juſtification." Chriſt is not the miniſter of ſin, (as ver. 17.) to ſave ſuch, while they continue in that ſtate. He ſaves only thoſe, who renouncing themſelves, are reſigned to his Spirit for their purification. Theſe laſt he juſtifies from their entrance into ſuch reſignation of themſelves, which is in Scripture called faith. See what kind of perſons they are in the ſequel, where St. Paul deſcribes himſelf, and by conſequence all who are in that ſtate.

Ver. 17. If—we ourſelves alſo are found ſinners] Thoſe who are under the law, having once tranſgreſſed, remain always ſinners, unalterably ſo, in the eye of the law; which excludes all from juſtification. The Apoſtle in this place argues thus: "We Jews, who are by birth God's holy people, and not, as the profligate Gentiles, abandoned to all manner of pollution and uncleanneſs,—not being, nevertheleſs, able to obtain righteouſneſs by the deeds of the law, have believed in Chriſt, that we might be juſtified by faith in him. But if even we, who have betaken ourſelves to Chriſt for juſtification, are ourſelves found to be unjuſtified ſinners, liable ſtill to wrath, as all are under the law, to which we ſubject ourſelves; what deliverance have we from ſin by Chriſt?—None at all: We are as much concluded under ſin and guilt, as if we did not believe in him. So that by joining him and the law together for juſtification, we ſhut ourſelves out from juſtification, which cannot be had under the law; and we make Chriſt the miniſter of ſin, and not of juſtification;—which God forbid!" Locke; and ſee the Reflections.

Ver. 18. I make myſelf a tranſgreſſor] M. L'Enfant and others conſider this verſe as a continuation of St. Paul's ſpeech at Antioch, and would render and connect it thus: "On the contrary, ſo far are we from being made ſinners, by neglecting juſtification by the law, that if we taught the neceſſity of its works, we ſhould become tranſgreſſors, in building again the things which we deſtroyed." But if this interpretation was to be admitted, we ſhould not only find it hard to clear up the argument, but muſt ſuppoſe the following verſes likewiſe are part of the ſpeech to St. Peter; which would make them much leſs pertinent and natural, than if we ſuppoſe them the overflowings of St. Paul's devout heart in addreſſing the Galatians. His

19 For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God.

20 I am crucified with Chriſt: nevertheleſs I live; yet not I, but Chriſt liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the fleſh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himſelf for me.

21 I do not fruſtrate the grace of God: for if righteouſneſs come by the law, then Chriſt is dead in vain.

Ver. 19. Rom. viii. 2. Rom. vi. 14. vii. 4, 6. Rom. vi. 11. 2 Cor. v. 15. 1 Theſſ. v. 10. 1 Pet. iv. 2.—V. 20. Rom. vi. 6. Ch. v. 24. 2 Cor. v. 15. 1 Theſſ. v. 10. 1 Pet. iv. 2. Ch. i. 4. Epheſ. v. 2. Tit. ii. 14.—V. 21. Hebr. vii. 11. See Rom. xi. 6. Ch. v. 4.

ſpeech to St. Peter rather ſeems to have gone no further than the foregoing verſe; and γὰρ is often uſed with ſuch a latitude, that we might take it in the beginning of this verſe to ſignify now,—as the MS before me reads it; and ſo conſider St. Paul as ſhewing here, that whatſoever ſome inſinuated to his prejudice, there was no inconſiſtency in his doctrine and practice, with what he had then ſo openly declared. See L'Enfant, Doddridge, and Locke.

Ver. 19. Through the law] By the tenor of the law itſelf. See ch. iii. 24, 25. iv. 21, &c. Rom. iii. 21. and vi. 14. comp. with vii. 4. What St. Paul ſays here ſeems to imply, that living under the law was to live not acceptably to God;—a ſtrange doctrine certainly to the Jews! and yet it was true now under the Goſpel: For God having put his kingdom in this world wholly under his Son, when he raiſed him from the dead, all who, after that, would be his people in his kingdom, were to live by no other law but the Goſpel, which was now the law of his kingdom; and we ſee that God caſt off the Jews, becauſe, cleaving to their own conſtitution, they would not have this man to reign over them. So that what St. Paul ſays here is in effect this: "By believing in Chriſt, I am diſcharged from the Moſaical law, that I may wholly conform myſelf to the rule of the Goſpel; which is now the law to be owned and obſerved by all thoſe, who, as God's people, would live acceptably to him." This appears viſibly to be the Apoſtle's meaning, though the accuſtoming himſelf to antitheſes may poſſibly be the reaſon why, after having ſaid, I am dead to the law, he expreſſes his putting himſelf under the Goſpel by living to God. Locke.

Ver. 20. I am crucified with Chriſt] See this explained, Rom. vii. 4. and vi. 2—14. The general meaning of the verſe is, "The whole management of myſelf is conformable to the doctrine of the Goſpel, of juſtification in Chriſt alone, and not by the deeds of the law." This, and the former verſe, ſeem to be ſpoken in oppoſition to St. Peter's owning a ſubjection to the law of Moſes by his walking, mentioned ver. 14. Locke.

Ver. 21. Grace of God] See ch. i. 6, 7. to which this ſeems here oppoſed: The latter part of this verſe will be found explained in St. Paul's own words, ch. v. 3—6.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. II. 17.

One of the greateſt and moſt plauſible objections alledged by unbelievers, againſt the divine inſtitution of the Chriſtian religion, is the ſmallneſs of the influence it may ſeem to have upon the lives and manners of its profeſſors. If God condeſcended to give men an expreſs revealed law, and to ſend ſo extraordinary a Perſon as his own Son to promulgate that law upon earth; it were natural to expect it ſhould have ſome very viſible and remarkable effects in the world, anſwerable to the dignity of the thing itſelf, and worthy of its great Author. They who are bleſſed with ſuch ſingular advantages, what manner of perſons, as St. Peter expreſſes it, ought they to be in all holy converſation and godlineſs!

"And are there then,—will unbelievers be apt to ſay,—are there to be met with in the lives and manners of Chriſtians, any conſiderable diſtinguiſhing characters, whereby to judge that they are really under the influence and peculiar guidance of ſuch a divine Director?—Is there among thoſe who call themſelves Chriſtians, leſs of impiety and profaneneſs towards God, leſs of fraud and injuſtice towards men, than is found among the profeſſors of other religions? Is there not too plainly the ſame boundleſs ambition, the ſame inſatiable covetouſneſs, the ſame voluptuouſneſs and debauchery of manners, to be found among them, as amongſt other men? Nay, have not moreover the pretences even of religion itſelf been the immediate occaſion of the bittereſt animoſities, of the moſt bloody wars, of the moſt inhuman perſecutions?—Have not the greateſt immoralities of all kinds received too plain an encouragement, from the reliance upon a power of repeating continually certain periodical abſolutions; and much more from an imagination that the practices of a vicious life may be compenſated before God by the obſervance of certain ridiculous ceremonies, and ſuperſtitious commutations?—Laſtly, and beyond all this, hath not even the grace of God, as the Apoſtle urges, been itſelf too frequently turned into wantonneſs? That is, hath not the fundamental grace of the Goſpel,—the gracious promiſe of pardon upon true repentance and amendment, been itſelf abuſed into an encouragement of wicked living, in a dependance upon the formalities of a death-bed repentance?"

Very great, and very juſt reproaches indeed, are theſe upon many who profeſs themſelves to be followers of Chriſt: But, that ſuch objections have no concluſive conſequence at all againſt Chriſtianity itſelf, is what the Apoſtle, after a very affectionate manner, declares in the words above propoſed for our reflection, and which he cloſes with a generous God forbid!—For, If, ſays he, I build again the things which I deſtroyed, I MAKE MYSELF A TRANSGRESSOR.

We will therefore endeavour to ſhew from his words, 1. "That the wickedneſs of the lives of thoſe who call themſelves Chriſtians, is no argument againſt the truth and excellency of the Chriſtian religion itſelf."

Now, natural and neceſſary cauſes always and neceſſarily produce effects proportional to their natural powers; ſo that from the degree or quantity of the effect, may always certainly be judged the degree of power and efficacy in the cauſe. But in moral cauſes the caſe is neceſſarily and eſſentially otherwiſe. In theſe, how efficacious ſoever the cauſe be, yet the effect always depends upon the will of the perſon upon whom the effect is to be wrought, whether the cauſe ſhall at all produce its proper effect, or no.

The Chriſtian religion affords men the moſt perfect inſtructions poſſible in the ways of virtue, and arguments infinitely ſtrong to enforce the practice of it. The effect of this doctrine upon the lives of men in the primitive times, before worldly corruptions entered into the church, was very great and conſpicuous: And if we underſtand the prophecies rightly, which relate to things yet to come, this effect will be much more remarkable in the latter ages; when the corruptions which now prevail among Chriſtians, ſhall be reformed, and the earth ſhall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the channels of the ſea. As things at preſent ſtand, there are great numbers of men,—many more than are taken notice of in the noiſe and hurry of the buſy world,—who, upon the foundation of a well-ſettled belief in the Goſpel of Chriſt, go on regularly in the courſe of a virtuous life, with a perpetual uniform ſenſe of God upon their minds, and an aſſured expectation of a future judgement: Nay, and even among thoſe who value themſelves upon deſpiſing the aſſiſtance of revelation, and rely intirely upon their own natural abilities in matter of religion, it is very plain, that the greateſt part of thoſe right notions concerning God and virtue, about which they can now ſo readily and ſo clearly diſcourſe, are really almoſt wholly borrowed from the light of that revelation which they are ſo deſirous ſhould be thought intirely needleſs. This, I ſay, is very plain, from the extreme ignorance of the heathen world, notwithſtanding there are not wanting among them men of excellent natural abilities; and from the right notions of God and virtue to be found among Chriſtians, in numbers of perſons, even of the loweſt capacities and meaneſt employments, to a degree which few, exceeding few, even of the greateſt philoſophers, were ever able to arrive at. So very different a thing is it to diſcern the reaſonableneſs of moral obligations, after they have been once clearly revealed; and to be able, without any aſſiſtance, to diſcover at firſt the ſame obligations by the mere ſtrength of nature and reaſon.

But however this be, and ſuppoſing the effect of Chriſtianity in the world had been much ſmaller than it has been, ſtill this would be no argument at all againſt the truth and excellency of the doctrine itſelf: Becauſe, as was before obſerved, "in all moral cauſes it muſt always depend on the will of the perſon upon whom the effect is to be wrought, whether even the moſt powerful cauſe ſhall at all produce its proper effect, or no." When God himſelf calls men in the ſtrongeſt and moſt efficacious manner that is conſiſtent with his calling them at all, it is ſtill in their own power not to hearken to that call; not to be in any reſpect the better,—nay, to be the worſe for it; much worſe than if they had never known the way of righteouſneſs. For as, where no law is, there is no tranſgreſſion; ſo, on the other hand, and for the ſame reaſon, "where there is a law, not obeyed, that law worketh wrath; and ſin, by this commandment, becomes exceeding ſinful." Was therefore the effect always to be the meaſure in judging of the goodneſs and excellency of a cauſe, the beſt and wiſeſt laws would often, upon account of their very excellency, be the worſt: the law of God would be chargeable with the malignity of ſin, and God himſelf as the real and immediate author of evil. See Rom. vi. 10.

The ſame may in proportion be ſaid concerning reaſon itſelf, even the abſolute and neceſſary reaſon of things. But if it be no objection againſt the excellency of reaſon itſelf, that it very often is not able to make men act reaſonably; and no diminution to the divine commandments in general, that they frequently not only fail of reforming mens manners, but even, on the contrary, do moreover make ſin to become the more exceeding ſinful; then, for the ſame reaſon, neither againſt the truth and excellency of Chriſtianity in particular, can any argument be drawn from the wickedneſs of their lives who profeſs themſelves Chriſtians.

But, ſecondly, though the practice of any wickedneſs whatſoever affords no real argument againſt Chriſtianity itſelf, yet it is always matter of very great and juſt reproach to the Profeſſors of this holy religion; as being the utmoſt contradiction, and the higheſt poſſible inconſiſtency with their profeſſion. Nay, every vice that any Chriſtian is guilty of, tends to defeat every end of the Goſpel of grace, and brings diſhonour upon the name, and upon the religion of Chriſt; For hence unbelievers are confirmed in their infidelity, and ſcoffers are encouraged to make a ſcorn of every thing ſacred. See Rom ii. 24. Ezek. xxvi. 20. It muſt needs happen, indeed, corrupt as the nature of mankind is, that ſuch offences as theſe will come; but woe be to that

CHAP. III.

He aſketh what moved them to leave the faith, and depend upon the law. They that believe are juſtified, and bleſſed with Abraham. And this he ſheweth by many reaſons.

O Fooliſh Galatians! who hath bewitched you, that ye ſhould not obey the truth, before whoſe eyes Jeſus Chriſt hath been evidently ſet forth crucified among you?

2 This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

3 Are ye ſo fooliſh? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the fleſh?

4 Have ye ſuffered ſo many things in vain? if it be yet in vain.

5 He therefore that miniſtereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

6 Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteouſneſs.

Ver. 1. Ch. v. 7.—V. 2. Acts ii. 38. viii. 15. xv. 8. Epheſ. i. 13. Hebr. vi. 4. Rom. x. 16, 17.—V. 4. 2 John 8. Or, ſo great. V. 5. 2 Cor. iii. 8.—V. 6. Gen. xv. 6. Rom. iv. 3. Jam. ii. 23.

man, ſaith our Saviour, through whom the offence cometh! Every ſuch perſon, whatever his profeſſion may be, is an enemy to Chriſt, and a reproach to his religion.

3. From what has been ſaid, we are led, thirdly, to a very plain and eaſy rule, by which we may judge of the malignity and dangerouſneſs of any error in matters of religion. In proportion as the error tends to reconcile any vicious practice with the profeſſion of religion; or, as St. Paul expreſſes it, to make Chriſt the miniſter of ſin;—in the ſame proportion is the doctrine pernicious, and the teachers of it juſtly to be deemed corrupt. And this is the reaſon why our Lord, when he warns Chriſtians to beware of falſe teachers, who ſhould come to them in ſheeps cloathing, but inwardly were ravening wolves; gives us this one mark only, by which for ever to diſtinguiſh them:—By their fruits ye ſhall know them. All other teſts may poſſibly be deceitful: fair ſpeeches, great learning and abilities, fervent zeal, numbers, authority, ſtrict obſervance of ceremonies,—even worldly auſterities, and the appearances of the moſt devotional piety;—all theſe may poſſibly accompany a very falſe and very wicked religion: But the fruits of virtue and true goodneſs, theſe are marks which admit no counterfeit. If the courſe of a man's life be virtuous and charitable, and his doctrine leads men towards no ſuperſtition, towards nothing but virtue and juſtice, goodneſs and charity, in expectation of that righteous judgement to come, which the light of nature itſelf gave men reaſon to look for, and which God has now abſolutely aſſured to them by the Goſpel of Chriſt; this is a mark or character, to which nothing has any ſimilitude but what is itſelf really and truly the ſame.

All other doctrines and pretences of religion may poſſibly be very conſiſtent with making Chriſt the miniſter of ſin: If they be ſo, they are at beſt uncertain or uſeleſs doctrines; and if they have any direct tendency to encourage and promote this evil, then it is infallibly certain, that they are falſe and pernicious.

Hence, for inſtance, we may very eaſily know what judgement we ought to frame of thoſe, who at any time ſet themſelves againſt the uſe of reaſon in matters of religion, making a principal part of the obedience of the Goſpel to conſiſt, in profeſſing confidently to believe, and in zealouſly contending to maintain certain opinions, of which they have no underſtanding; which is evidently the eaſieſt thing in the world for the wickedeſt and moſt worthleſs of men to do.

By the ſame rule may eaſily be underſtood the true nature and ground of all thoſe inhuman perſecutions practiſed by the church of Rome under pretences of religion, in ſuch a manner, as if they thought the deſign of the Son of man's coming was, not to ſave mens lives, but to deſtroy them; and as if they underſtood that prophecy of his, not concerning an eventual corruption, but concerning the real end and intent of his religion;—Think not that I am come to ſend peace upon earth; I came not to ſend peace, but a ſword.—By the ſame rule likewiſe it is obvious to judge, of what dangerous conſequence muſt be thoſe confeſſions to the prieſt and formal abſolutions repeated in a perpetual circle, by which men may for ever be penitents, without ever repenting, and be continually doing penance, without ever amending their lives and manners at all.

Laſtly, By the ſame rule may no leſs plainly be diſcerned, how great and fatal a deluſion it is, which among proteſtants alſo has but too generally prevailed, when, confeſſing their ſins to God himſelf, in like manner as the Romaniſts do to the prieſt, they look upon themſeves as abſolved of courſe, and return to the practice of the ſame ſins again; grounding perverſly upon the gracious promiſes of the Goſpel a falſe and deceitful notion of repentance, very much like to that of thoſe in the Apoſtle's days, who continued in ſin, that grace might abound: a horrible practice,—which is a deſtroying the very nature and neceſſity of virtue; which is the higheſt contempt and mockery of God, turning his very mercy into an encouragement of diſobedience; and which, inſtead of reforming the world, actually corrupts it, and literally makes Chriſt the miniſter of ſin!

Chap. III. Ver. 1. O fooliſh Galatians!] By the account St. Paul has given of himſelf in the foregoing chapters, the Galatians being furniſhed with evidence ſufficient to clear him in their minds from the report of his preaching circumciſion, He comes now, the way being thus opened, directly to oppoſe their being circumciſed, and ſubjecting themſelves to the law. The firſt argument he uſes is, "That they received the Holy Ghoſt, and the gifts of miracles by the Goſpel, and not by the law." ver. 1—5. Inſtead of who hath bewitched you? ſome would render ἐβάσκανε, who hath enchanted you? and others, who hath envied your happineſs? The word ſtrongly expreſſes the unreaſonable turn their minds had taken, ſo that one would imagine they had been deprived of the regular uſe even of their natural faculties. That you ſhould not obey the truth, means, "That you ſhould not ſtand faſt in the liberty of the Goſpel. See on ch. ii. 14. St. Paul mentions nothing to them here but Chriſt crucified, as knowing that when formerly he had preached Chriſt crucified to them, he had ſhewn them, that by his death on the croſs, believers were ſet free from the law, and the covenant of works was removed, to make way for that of grace. This we may find him inculcating upon his other Gentile converts, Epheſ. ii. 15, 16. Col. ii. 14, 20. and accordingly he tells the Galatians, ch. v. 2, 4. that if by circumciſion they put themſelves under the law, they were fallen from grace, and Chriſt ſhould profit them nothing at all. There is no room to object here, that what St. Paul urges is merely an argument to the paſſions; for in proportion to the affecting ſenſe they had of the love of Chriſt, in ſubmitting to crucifixion for them, would be the rational ſenſe of the obligations they were under to him, to preſerve his Goſpel pure, and his church free and happy. Dr. Waterland leaves out the words, that you ſhould not obey the truth. Dr. Heylin renders the laſt clauſe, You,—to whoſe view the crucifixion of Jeſus Chriſt hath been ſo lively repreſented. And Muſculus and Bengelius read, before whoſe eyes Jeſus Chriſt hath been ſet forth crucified among you. See Locke, Wolfius, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 2. Received ye the Spirit, &c.] There is no doubt but that it was on their becoming Chriſtians that they received the Spirit, and therefore that it could not be aſcribed to the law, to which they were ſtrangers till afterwards; but muſt be owing to that faith in which they were inſtructed by the Goſpel, on their embracing Chriſtianity. Nor can it juſtly be objected that they ſtill retained the Chriſtianity by which the Spirit was received; for they were now perverted to a different ſyſtem by their new teachers; and that which Paul had preached at firſt amongſt them was a Chriſtianity, of which Judaiſm made no part. See Doddridge, Wall, and Beza.

Ver. 3. Spirit—fleſh] It is a way of ſpeaking very familiar to St. Paul, in oppoſing the law to the Goſpel, to call the law fleſh, and the Goſpel Spirit; the reaſon whereof is ſufficiently plain to any perſon converſant in his Epiſtles.

Ver. 4. Have ye ſuffered ſo many things in vain?] Should it be ſaid, that, notwithſtanding the Galatians were for adding the obſervation of the law to the Goſpel, it would not neceſſarily deſtroy their hopes as Chriſtians, nor deprive them of the reward of that courage which they had hitherto ſhewn in its defence; yet it muſt be allowed, that ſome degree of their reward might be loſt, as it might derogate from their future glory, to have been, through inconſideration and prejudices raſhly admitted, acceſſary to the corruption and conſequent obſtruction of the Goſpel; and alſo that, as much perſecution might be declined by admitting this mixture of Judaiſm, there was reaſon to fear that a regard to their own preſent eaſe and convenience led them to it; (comp. ch. v. 11. and vi. 12.) Which was in a manner cancelling the good effect of their former reſolution; and indeed any thing which looked like a ſinful temporizing, in thoſe who had before been confeſſors for the truth, might occaſion peculiar ſcandal, and endanger many others. See Doddridge, Calmet, and Bengelius.

Ver. 5. He—that miniſtereth, &c.] The perſon meant here by he that miniſtereth, and ch. i. 6. by he that called, is plainly St. Paul himſelf; though, out of modeſty, he declines making uſe of his own name. It was certainly a great diſplay of the divine wiſdom to ſuffer ſuch contentions to ariſe early in the church, as ſhould make it neceſſary for the Apoſtles to appeal to the miracles wrought before and upon thoſe, who were afterwards in ſome degree alienated from them; that future ages might be convinced of the certainty of thoſe miracles as matters of fact, beyond all poſſibility of contradiction. See Locke, and Baxter's Practical Works, vol. ii. p. 118.

Ver. 6.] St. Paul's next argument againſt circumciſion and ſubjection to the law is, "That the children of Abraham, intitled to the inheritance and bleſſing promiſed to Abraham and his ſeed, are ſo

7 Know ye therefore, that they which are of faith, the ſame are the children of Abraham.

8 And the ſcripture foreſeeing that God would juſtify the heathen through faith, preached before the Goſpel unto Abraham, ſaying, In thee ſhall all nations be bleſſed.

9 So then they which be of faith, are bleſſed with faithful Abraham.

10 For as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curſe: for it is written, Curſed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

11 But that no man is juſtified by the law in the ſight of God, it is evident: for, The juſt ſhall live by faith.

12 And the law is not of faith: but, The man that doeth them ſhall live in them.

13 Chriſt hath redeemed us from the curſe of the law, being made a curſe for us: for it is written, Curſed is every one that hangeth on a tree:

14 That the bleſſing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jeſus Chriſt; that we might receive the promiſe of the Spirit through faith.

15 Brethren, I ſpeak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man diſannulleth, or addeth thereto.

16 Now to Abraham and his ſeed were the promiſes made. He ſaith not, And to ſeeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy ſeed; which is Chriſt.

17 And this I ſay, that the covenant that was confirmed before of God in Chriſt, the law which was four hundred and thirty by faith, and not by being under the law, which brings a curſe upon thoſe who are under it." ver. 6—18. Beza is of opinion, that the 7th verſe ſhould not begin a ſentence, but depend on the foregoing. As Abraham believed,—ver. 7. ye therefore know, &c.

Ver. 8. In thee ſhall all nations be bleſſed] It may perhaps be aſked, "What evidence there is that this promiſe meant the converſion of Jews and Gentiles to Chriſtianity, rather than converting the Gentiles to Judaiſm, and ſo bleſſing them with a participation of the privileges originally granted to the natural ſeed of Abraham?"—But, beſides what the Apoſtle afterwards ſays for clearing up this point, it may be anſwered,—that the Moſaic œconomy was ſo conſtituted, that it could never be univerſal; and that when it was conſidered what ſort of a perſon Chriſt in fact was, there would appear reaſon to believe that this promiſe referred to him, even ſeparate from the authority of the Apoſtle in aſſerting it, and how dubious ſoever the ſenſe of the oracle might appear, till it was illuſtrated by the event. See Gen. xii. 3. xviii. 18. xxii. 18. and Bp. Chandler on the Prophecies.

Ver. 10. The works of the law] They of faith, ver. 9. and they of the works of the law, are ſpoken of as two races of men; the one the genuine poſterity of Abraham, heirs of the promiſe, the other not. There is alſo another diviſion in theſe two verſes, of the bleſſed, and thoſe under the curſe; whereby is meant, ſuch as are in a ſtate of life, or acceptance with God, and ſuch as are expoſed to his wrath, and to death. See Deut. xxx. 19. Dr. Whitby proves, that the law of Adam was attended with a curſe, as well as that of Moſes; and that it is the more general curſe which is here intended, as illuſtrated by what Moſes expreſſed as the ſanction of his inſtitutions. See Locke, Whitby, and Deut. xxvii. 26.

Ver. 11. The juſt ſhall live by faith] A diſpute aroſe between St. Paul and the judaiſing Chriſtians, concerning what it was which juſtified a man before God, or intitled him to that eternal life brought to light by the Goſpel. They held it to be the works of the law, believing that the text, Levit. xviii. 5. had a reſpect to the life to come. St. Paul, on the contrary, affirms, that it was faith in Jeſus the Meſſiah: and thus he argues: But that no man is juſtified by the law, is evident; for The juſt ſhall live by faith; and the law is not of faith, but The man that doth them, ſhall live in them, As much as to ſay, "That no man can obtain life by virtue of the law, is evident from one of your own prophets, Habakkuk, who expreſly holds, that the juſt ſhall live by faith. Now by the law no rewards are promiſed to faith, but to works only;—The man that DOTH, (ſays the law, Lev. xviii. 5.) ſhall LIVE in them." See Rom. i. 17. iii. 28. Heb. ii. 4, and Warburton's Div. Leg. vol. iv. p. 328.

Ver. 12. And the law is not of faith] As the Apoſtle ſhews here, that there was no obtaining life by the law, without a perfect obedience; faith, which is uſed here in oppoſition to it, muſt ſignify a firm belief of the promiſe of God, and acting according to it in a dependance upon Chriſt for righteouſneſs: which is the way of juſtification revealed by the Goſpel. Doddridge.

Ver. 13. Chriſt hath redeemed us from the curſe of the law] The curſe of the law, from which Chriſt hath redeemed us, was that which doomed us to eternal miſery; From whence it hath been very plauſibly inferred, that the law of Moſes was eſtabliſhed on the ſanction of future puniſhments. But perhaps it may be ſolidly anſwered, That the Apoſtle, arguing with reſpect to the law of God in general, the breach of which did certainly render men obnoxious to future puniſhments, may mention the circumſtance of the Moſaic law's leaving every preſumptuous offender to die under a curſe, as an intimation of thoſe melancholy proſpects, with regard to futurity, which we muſt grant it certainly gave, even though we ſhould not ſuppoſe that it contained an expreſs threatening of ſuch puniſhments. And further, it is evident, that the courſe of the Apoſtle's argument here implies, that all true believers are redeemed from the curſe, and conſequently that he ſpeaks of a curſe to which all, as ſinners, were liable: whereas the Gentiles, being under no obligation to the Moſaic law at all, could not poſſibly be affected directly by its curſe; nor could indeed be at all affected by it, otherwiſe than in the latitude in which we have explained this paſſage. Chriſt was made a curſe for us, by enduring the penalty which our ſins had deſerved; for ſuch was the death which he bore in our ſtead, not only when conſidered as a capital puniſhment, which univerſally implies ſome thing of this kind, but as thus ſtigmatized by the expreſs declaration of the law, Deut. xxi. 23. See Doddridge, Div. Leg. and Peter Whitfield's "Chriſtianity of the New Teſtament."

Ver. 14. That the bleſſing, &c.] That bleſſing, ver. 8, 9, 14. juſtification, ver. 11. righteouſneſs, ver. 21. life, ver. 11, 12, 21. inheritance, ver. 18. and being the children of God, ver. 26. are in effect all the ſame on the one ſide; and that the curſe, ver. 13. is the direct contrary, on the other ſide, is ſo plain in St. Paul's diſcourſe here, that nobody who reads it with the leaſt attention can be in any doubt. His argument to convince the Galatians that they ought not to be circumciſed, or to ſubmit to the law, on account of their having received the Spirit from him, on embracing the Goſpel which he preached to them, ſtands thus: "The bleſſing promiſed to Abraham and his ſeed, was wholly upon account of faith, ver. 7. There were not different ſeeds who ſhould inherit the promiſe,—the one by the works of the law, and the other by faith; for there was but one ſeed, which was Chriſt, (ver. 16.) and thoſe who ſhould claim in and under him by faith. Amongſt theſe there was no diſtinction of Jew and Gentile: They, and they only who believed, were all one and the ſame true ſeed of Abraham, and heirs according to the promiſe, ver. 28, 29. And therefore the promiſe made to the people of God, of giving them the Spirit under the Goſpel, was performed only to thoſe who believed in Chriſt:—A clear evidence that it was not by putting themſelves under the law, but by faith in Jeſus Chriſt, that they were the people of God, and heirs of the promiſe." It has been obſerved, that the plentiful effuſion of the Holy Spirit of God had been ſo frequently promiſed by the prophets, as the great bleſſing of the latter day, that it is here uſed as ſynonimous to the bleſſing of Abraham. From whence the great importance of the Spirit may be inferred; ſince the imparting it is repreſented as the great bleſſing by which the curſe is removed: And hence it follows, that the withdrawing and with-holding it, is the great calamity which falls upon men by their apoſtaſy from God. See Locke, Diodati, and Howe's works, vol. i. p. 237.

Ver. 16. And to ſeeds] By ſeeds here, ſays Mr. Locke, St. Paul evidently means thoſe of faith, and thoſe of the works of the law, ſpoken of ver. 9, 10. as two diſtinct ſeeds or deſcendants claiming from Abraham. Others underſtand that the promiſes made to Abraham were not appropriated to one line of his deſcendants,—that is to thoſe by Iſaac; but centred in one illuſtrious perſon, with regard to whom the reſt are made partakers of the great bleſſing exhibited in the Abrahamick covenant. Locke, Doddridge, and Burnett's four diſcourſes, p. 66.

Ver. 17. Four hundred and thirty years after] The firſt celebrated promiſe was made to Abraham, when he was 75 years old, Gen. xii. 3, 4. and from this date of it, to the birth of Iſaac, when Abrayears after, cannot diſannul, that it ſhould make the promiſe of none effect.

18 For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promiſe: but God gave it to Abraham by promiſe.

19 Wherefore then ſerveth the law? It was added becauſe of tranſgreſſions, till the ſeed ſhould come, to whom the promiſe was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator.

20 Now a mediator is not a mediator of one; but God is one.

21 Is the law then againſt the promiſes of God? God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteouſneſs ſhould have been by the law.

22 But the ſcripture hath concluded all under ſin, that the promiſe by faith of Jeſus Chriſt might be given to them that believe.

23 But before faith came, we were kept under the law, ſhut up unto the faith which ſhould afterwards be revealed.

24 Wherefore the law was our ſchool-maſter, to bring us unto Chriſt, that we might be juſtified by faith.

25 But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a ſchool-maſter.

26 For ye are all the children of God by faith in Chriſt Jeſus.

27 For as many of you as have been baptized into Chriſt, have put on Chriſt.

28 There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Chriſt Jeſus.

ham was 100 years old, Gen. xxi. 5. was 25 years. Iſaac was 60 when Jacob was born; Gen. xxv. 26. Jacob went into Egypt at 130; Gen. xlvii. 9. And the Iſraelites ſojourned there (according to the LXX, Exod. xii. 40.) 215 years; which compleats the number. See Acts vii. 6. Whitby, Calmet, and Bedford.

Ver. 19.] In anſwer to the objection, To what then ſerveth the law? the Apoſtle ſhews that the law was not contrary to the promiſe; but ſince all men were guilty of tranſgreſſion, ver. 22. the law was added, to ſhew the Iſraelites the fruit and inevitable conſequence of their ſin, and thereby the neceſſity of betaking themſelves to Chriſt: But, as ſoon as men had received Chriſt, they had attained the end of the law, and ſo were no longer under it. This is a further argument againſt circumciſion. ver. 19—25.

It was added becauſe of tranſgreſſions] "It was added after the promiſe to Abraham was made." As the law given by Moſes neither did nor could diſannul the covenant made with Abraham, to which the Jews undoubtedly had a claim, the deſign of that law muſt therefore have been to engage thoſe of his deſcendants who came under it, to ſee their need of that covenant, and more effectually to recommend the promiſe to them. And as the writing of the book of Geneſis gave them a further account of it than tradition had preſerved, the law might be ſaid to be added to that account, becauſe of tranſgreſſions, as their tranſgreſſions not only of the ceremonial, but alſo of the moral precepts, would appear more exceedingly ſinful and dangerous in proportion to the perſpicuity of theſe precepts, and the aweful ſolemnity with which they were delivered.—That the law was given by the miniſtration of angels, is apparent from many paſſages of Scripture; (comp. Pſ. lxviii. 17. Acts vii. 53. and Heb. ii. 2.) Though the Logos did undoubtedly preſide amongſt them, and it was in his name that the proclamation was made by the angels, as his heralds and attendants. The mediator here meant was Moſes, who was particularly authorized by the Jewiſh people, as well as conſtituted by God, to mediate in the affair of receiving the law, which he tranſacted once for all. See Deut. v. 5. Lev. xxvi. 46. where it is ſaid that the law was made between God and the children of Iſrael, by the hand of Moſes. See Locke, Doddridge, and the Div. Leg.

Ver. 20. Now a mediator, &c.] To underſtand this verſe, we muſt carry in our minds what St. Paul is here doing: And from ver. 17. it is manifeſt, that he is proving that the law could not diſannul the promiſe; and he does it upon this known rule, that a covenant or promiſe once ratified cannot be altered or diſannulled by any other, but by both the parties concerned. Now, ſays he, God is but one of the parties concerned in the promiſe; the Gentiles and Iſraelites together made up the other, ver. 14. But Moſes, at the giving of the law, was a mediator only between the Iſraelites and God, and therefore could not tranſact any thing to the diſannulling the promiſe which was between God and the Iſraelites and Gentiles together, becauſe God was but one of the parties to that covenant; the other, which was the Gentiles as well as Iſraelites, Moſes appeared or tranſacted not for. And ſo what was done at mount Sinai by the mediation of Moſes, could not affect a covenant made between parties, whereof one only was there. How neceſſary it was for St. Paul to add this we ſhall ſee, if we conſider that without it his argument of 430 years diſtance would have been deficient and hardly concluſive. For if both the parties concerned in the promiſe had tranſacted by Moſes the mediator, (as they might, if none but the nation of the Iſraelites had been concerned in the promiſe made by God to Abraham) they might by mutual conſent have altered or ſet aſide the former promiſe, as well four hundred years as four days after. That which hindered it was, that at Moſes' mediation at mount Sinai, God, who was but one of the parties to the promiſe, was preſent. But the other party, Abraham's ſeed, conſiſting of Iſraelites and Gentiles together, was not there. Moſes tranſacted for the nation of the Iſraelites alone; the other nations were not concerned in the covenant made at mount Sinai, as they were in the promiſe made to Abraham and his ſeed, which therefore could not be diſannulled without their conſent: For that both the promiſe to Abraham and his ſeed, and the covenant with Iſrael at mount Sinai, was national, is in itſelf evident. Locke.

Ver. 21. Which could have given life] Which could have put into a ſtate of life. Ζωοποιῆσαι, ſignifies, to make alive: St. Paul conſiders all men here as in a mortal ſtate; and to be put out of that mortal ſtate into a ſtate of life, he calls being made alive. He ſays the law could not do this, becauſe it could not confer righteouſneſs. By the law, means, by works, or obedience to that law, which tended towards righteouſneſs, as well as the promiſe, but was not able to reach to, or confirm it. See Rom. viii. 3. and Locke.

Ver. 22. All] Τὰ πάντα is uſed here for all men. In Rom. iii. 9, 19. the Apoſtle expreſſes the ſame thing by πάντας, all men, and πᾶς ὁ κόσμος, all the world. But, ſpeaking in the preſent verſe of the Jews in particular, he ſays We; meaning thoſe of his own nation, as is evident from ver. 24, 25. Hath concluded all under ſin, means, "hath ranked them all together as one guilty race of ſinners." See this proved Rom. i. 18, &c. iii. 9. To the ſame purpoſe of putting both Jews and Gentiles into one ſtate, St. Paul uſes, Hath ſhut them up all together, Rom. xi. 32. See Locke. Inſtead of, under the law, the MS reads, by the law. Dr. Waterland's rendering is,—We were kept ſhut up under the law, till the future faith ſhould be revealed.

Ver. 24. Our ſchool-maſter] The original does not ſignify a ſchool-maſter, but "one who leads or conducts children to ſchool." The ancients generally employed a perſon for this purpoſe; and if the Apoſtle be ſuppoſed to allude to this cuſtom, his reaſoning will appear more plain and concluſive. See the next verſe, and on Romans x. 4.

Ver. 26.] As a further argument to diſſuade them from circumciſion, St. Paul tells the Galatians that by faith in Chriſt, all, whether Jews or Gentiles, are made the children of God; and ſo they ſtood in no need of circumciſion. It may perhaps be objected, "We might have been the children, or the ſons of God, though we had ſtill continued under a ſchool-maſter:" But we ſhould not then have appeared under the character of ſuch, as the Apoſtle argues in the beginning of the next chapter. But perhaps the particle γὰρ may here ſignify now, as it does frequently; and ſo it may introduce the following application of the premiſes laid down before in more general terms. See Locke, Doddridge, and Mintert.

Ver. 27. Have put on Chriſt] This at firſt ſight may ſeem a very bold metaphor; but if we conſider what St. Paul has ſaid ver. 16 and 26. we ſhall find it admirably adapted to expreſs his thoughts in few words. He ſays, ver. 16. that the ſeed to which the promiſe was made was but one, and that one was Chriſt; and ver. 26. he declares, that by faith in Chriſt they all become the ſons of God. To lead them into an eaſy conception of this, he here tells them, that by taking on them the profeſſion of the Goſpel, they have, as it were, put on Chriſt. So that to God now looking on them, there appears nothing but Chriſt. They are, as it were, covered all over with Him, as a man is with the clothes he hath put on; and hence he ſays in the next verſe, that they are all one in Chriſt; as if there were but that one Perſon. Locke.

Ver. 28. There is neither Jew nor Greek] Nor Gentile. MS, and Wat. "All diſtinctions are now put an end to, by this happy union; all are equally accepted in Chriſt Jeſus; and being made one 29 And if ye be Chriſt's, then are ye Abraham's ſeed, and heirs according to the promiſe.

CHAP. IV.

We were under the law till Chriſt came, as the heir is under his guardian till he be of age. But Chriſt freed us from the law: therefore we are ſervants no longer to it. He remembereth their good will to him, and his to them; and ſheweth that we are the ſons of Abraham by the free woman.

NOW I ſay, that the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a ſervant, though he be lord of all;

2 But is under tutors and governors, until the time appointed of the father.

3 Even ſo we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world:

4 But when the fulneſs of the time was come, God ſent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law,

5 To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of ſons.

6 And becauſe ye are ſons, God hath ſent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father.

body in him, believers of whatever nation, ſex, or condition, are all cemented in the bonds of holy friendſhip, and animated with the views of the ſame happineſs."

Ver. 29. And if ye be Chriſt's] The Clermont copy reads, And if ye are one in Chriſt Jeſus; which ſeems more ſuitable to the Apoſtle's argument; for, as he ſays in the preceding verſe, Ye are all one in Chriſt Jeſus, the inference in the following words of the Clermont copy is natural: And if ye are one in Chriſt Jeſus, then are ye Abraham's ſeed, &c. Our preſent reading, however, may be well juſtified: If ye be Chriſt's,—that is, if ye are united by faith to Him, who is the promiſed ſeed, then are ye the true ſeed of Abraham, and in conſequence of this, heirs according to the promiſe. See Locke, Mill, and Wetſtein.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. III.

With what gratitude ſhould we reflect that, through the amazing goodneſs of God, we ſhare in the ſame great privilege with the Galatians, and have Jeſus Chriſt crucified evidently ſet forth amongſt us. ver. 1. Let us make the object familiar to our view, and to our hearts; and may we all feel its powerful influence to engage us to obey the truth, and to comply with the practical deſign of the Goſpel, ſpite of all the faſcinating enchantments of this vain and deluſive world! May thoſe eſpecially who have begun in the Spirit, and perhaps have ſuffered many difficulties already in the cauſe of religion, be concerned that they may not ſuffer ſo many things in vain; and after all their pretenſions and hopes, make an end in the fleſh, by forſaking that excellent cauſe! ver. 3, 4.

That we may be deemed the children of Abraham, let us be careful to obtain and cultivate the ſame faith with him; that ſo, believing in God as he did, and truſting in the promiſed Meſſiah, we may attain that righteouſneſs, which it is impoſſible to attain by the deeds of the law; that law, which inſiſts upon perfect obedience, and paſſeth ſentence upon every one that has tranſgreſſed it. ver. 6, 7. Nothing can be more important than to endeavour to impreſs our ſouls with this fundamental truth; "That if we are of the works of the law, and truſt in theſe for juſtification, we are under a curſe." ver. 10. O that God may graciouſly thunder that curſe into the ears of ſleeping ſinners, and make them ſenſible of their guilt and danger; that as priſoners of juſtice, yet in ſome meaſure priſoners of hope, they may flee for refuge to lay hold on the hope ſet before them in the Goſpel! Zech. ix. 12. Heb. vi. 18.

Nor need we go far for help: No ſooner are we wounded, as it were, in one verſe, than we find proviſion for our healing in another: For Chriſt hath redeemed us from the curſe of the law, ver. 13. And this in a method never ſufficiently to be admired; even by making himſelf a ranſom, yea, and becoming a curſe for us: Submitting not only to great infamy and wretchedneſs in his life, but to an ignominious and accurſed death, being ſlain and hanged on a tree. Acts v. 30. x. 39.

To him let us apply, that the curſe may be removed; and with humble confidence in him, lift up our eyes in chearful expectation, that though by birth we are Gentiles, the bleſſing of Abraham will come upon us, and that through faith we ſhall receive the promiſe of the Spirit. ver. 14. And what promiſe can be more valuable than this? What bleſſing more deſirable than to be enlightened, quickened, ſanctified, and comforted by the Spirit of the living God? ver. 11. As the juſt, may we live by faith; and make it our daily requeſt at the throne of grace, that God will implant and increaſe that divine principle in our hearts; even ſuch a faith as ſhall work by love, and prove the genuine baſis of ſincere and univerſal obedience.

Rejoicing in thoſe ſpiritual promiſes to which all true Chriſtians are now equally intitled, and charging our ſouls with thoſe obligations which neceſſarily attend them, let us look upon ourſelves as the children of Abraham, as intitled to the nobleſt of thoſe promiſes which God made to that excellent ſaint, even to that great and comprehenſive promiſe, (which is all the ſalvation, and all the deſire of every true child of Abraham,) namely, that God will be a God unto us. Gen. xvii. 7, 8. Let us approve ourſelves his genuine offspring, by imitating his faith; and always bear in mind, that having been baptized into Chriſt, we have ſo put on Chriſt, as to be obliged to reſemble him in his temper and character. ver. 26, 27, 29.

If we deſire to ſhare the bleſſings and glories of that one body, whereof Chriſt is the great and glorious head, let us not lay a diſproportionate ſtreſs upon any thing, by which one Chriſtian may be diſtinguiſhed from another; but endeavour, as one in Chriſt Jeſus, to be one in affection and friendſhip to each other: and let thoſe who ſeem to have the greateſt advantages, condeſcend to them who ſeem moſt their inferiors. ver. 28.

Giving up all expectations of life from the law, ſince that of Moſes could not give it, let us look for glory, honour, and immortality by the Goſpel; truly thankful for the knowledge we have of the Mediator of a better covenant than that in which Moſes was appointed to mediate: ver. 20, 21. And as the law was given, not to diſannul the covenant of promiſe, but with a view to be ſubſervient to it, and to point out Chriſt; let us apply to Him for righteouſneſs and life; and in Him—as that one ſeed of Abraham, in whom all the families and nations of believers were to be bleſſed,—let us center our hopes, and be very ſolicitous that by faith we may be united to him, and ſo have a claim under him to all the privileges of the promiſe. ver. 16—21.

Thus let us continue to make uſe of the law, not as the foundation of our hope towards God, but as our ſchool-maſter to bring us to Chriſt, by the diſcovery it has given of our need of him: and being ſenſible that it hath ſhut up all under ſin, from which we cannot be delivered but by the faith which the Goſpel hath revealed, may we be led ſo to ſeek the benefit of the promiſe, that being ſons of God by faith in Chriſt Jeſus, we may be joyful inheritors of eternal life and bleſſedneſs.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1.] The Apoſtle goes on further to prove, that the law was not againſt the promiſe, in that the child is not diſinherited by being under tutors: But his chief deſign is to ſhew, that though both Jews and Gentiles were intended to be the children of God, and heirs ofthe promiſe by faith in Chriſt, yet they both of them were left in bondage; the Jews to the law, ver. 3. and the Gentiles to falſe gods, ver. 8. till Chriſt in due time came to redeem them both; and therefore it was folly in the Galatians, being redeemed from one bondage, to go backwards, and put themſelves again into a ſtate of bondage, though under a new maſter.

The word Δοῦλος ſignifies properly and ſhould be rendered bondman or bond-ſervant; and unleſs it be ſo tranſlated, ver. 1, 7, 8. bondage in ver. 3, 9. will ſcarce be underſtood by an Engliſh reader; but St. Paul's ſenſe will be loſt to a perſon who by ſervant underſtands not one in a ſtate of bondage. Locke and Waterland. Bengelius thinks, that this ſhould connect with what precedes, and not begin a new chapter:—What I mean is, that as long as, &c.

Ver. 3. Even ſo we] It is plain that St. Paul ſpeaks here in the name of the Jews or Jewiſh church, which, though God's peculiar people, yet was to paſs a nonage,—ſo St. Paul calls it,—under the reſtraint and tutelage of the law, and not to receive the poſſeſſion of the promiſed inheritance till Chriſt came. He calls rhe law ϛοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, elements, or rudiments of the world, becauſe the obſervances and diſcipline of the law, which had reſtraint and bondage enough in it, led them not beyond the things of this world, into the poſſeſſion or ſtate of their ſpiritual and heavenly inheritance. Some obſerve, that the Jewiſh rituals might be called as above, not only on account of the relation which they had to worldly things, by which they were adapted to the low conceptions of children, who are moſt affected with ſenſible objects, and have no taſte for ſpiritual and heavenly things; but alſo becauſe the ſame kind of things had before obtained in the world, and were in uſe among the heathen; though under the Moſaic law they were directed to a better object and end. See Locke, and Warburton's Div. Leg. b. vi. ſect. 3.

Ver. 4, 5. God ſent forth his Son] Theſe verſes ſhould be read and underſtood thus: God ſent forth his Son, made of a woman, (made under the law, to redeem them that are under the law) that we might receive the adoption of ſons. Caſtalio, Bengelius, and Hammond.

Ver. 6. God hath ſent forth the Spirit, &c.] St. Paul uſes the ſame argument of proving their ſonſhip from having the Spirit, Rom. viii. 16.

7 Wherefore thou art no more a ſervant, but a ſon; and if a ſon, then an heir of God through Chriſt.

8 Howbeit, then when ye knew not God, ye did ſervice unto them which by nature are no gods.

9 But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye deſire again to be in bondage?

10 Ye obſerve days, and months, and times, and years.

11 I am afraid of you, leſt I have beſtowed upon you labour in vain.

12 Brethren, I beſeech you, be as I am; for I am as ye are: ye have not injured me at all.

13 Ye know how through infirmity of the fleſh I preached the goſpel unto you at the firſt.

14 And my temptation which was in my fleſh, ye deſpiſed not, nor rejected; but received me as an angel of God, even as Chriſt Jeſus.

15 Where is then the bleſſedneſs ye ſpake of? for I bear you record, that if it had been poſſible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me.

16 Am I therefore become your enemy, becauſe I tell you the truth?

17 They zealouſly affect you, but not well; yea, they would exclude you, that ye might affect them.

18 But it is good to be zealouſly affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am preſent with you.

16. And he that will read 2 Cor. iv. 17. to v. 6. and Epheſ. i. 11—14. will find, that the Spirit is looked upon as the ſeal and aſſurance of the inheritance of life to thoſe who have received the adoption of ſons, as St. Paul ſpeaks here, ver. 5. The force of the argument ſeems to lie in this, that as he who has the ſpirit of a man in him, has an evidence that he is the ſon of man; ſo he that hath the Spirit of God, has thereby an aſſurance, that he is the Son of God. Conformable hereto, it was the opinion of the Jews, that the Spirit of God was given to none but themſelves, they alone being the people or children of God: for God calls the people of Iſrael his ſon, Exod. iv. 22, 23. And hence we ſee, that when, to the aſtoniſhment of the Jews, the Spirit was given to the Gentiles, the Jews no longer doubted that the inheritance of eternal life was alſo conferred upon them. comp. Acts x. 44—48. with Acts xi. 15—18. It was not allowed to ſlaves amongſt the Jews to uſe the title of abba, father, in addreſſing the maſter of the family to which they belonged, or the correſpondent title of imma, mother, when ſpeaking to the miſtreſs of it. See Locke, Selden, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 7. And if a ſon, then an heir, &c.] From the Galatians having received the Spirit, as appears ch. iii. 2. St. Paul argues, that they are the Sons of God without the law; conſequently, heirs of the promiſe without the law: "For, ſays he, ver. 1—6. the Jews themſelves were obliged to be redeemed from the bondage of the law by Jeſus Chriſt, that as ſons they may attain to the inheritance; but you, Galatians (he goes on,) have by the Spirit which is given you through the miniſtry of the Goſpel, an evidence that God is your Father; and being ſons, are free from the bondage of the law, and heirs without it." St. Paul uſes the ſame ſort of reaſoning to the Romans, ch. viii. 14—17.

Ver. 8. Ye did ſervice unto them, &c.] Ye were in bondage unto thoſe which, &c. MS. and ſee on ver. 1. It is evident here, that though theſe Chriſtians had before their converſion been idolatrous Gentiles, the judaizing teachers were deſirous of ſubjecting them to the yoke of the Moſaic ceremonies.

Ver. 9 Are known of God] Are approved of God. MS. It has been before obſerved how apt St. Paul is to repeat his words, though ſomething varied in their ſignification: we have here another inſtance of it. Having ſaid, ye have known God, he ſubjoins, or rather are known of him, in the Hebrew latitude of the word known; in which language it ſometimes ſignifies, "knowing with choice and approbation." See Amos iii. 2. 1 Cor. viii. 3. The law is here called weak, becauſe it was not able to deliver a man from bondage and death into the glorious liberty of the Sons of God; and it is called beggarly, or poor, becauſe it kept men in the poor eſtate of pupils, from the full poſſeſſion and enjoyment of the inheritance. ver. 1—3. The Apoſtle makes it matter of aſtoniſhment how they who had been in bondage to falſe gods, having been once ſet free, could endure the thoughts of parting with their liberty; of returning into any ſort of bondage again; much more to a bondage under the weak and wretched external inſtitutions of the Moſaical law, which was not able to make them ſons, and inſtate them in the inheritance. For in ver. 7. he expreſly oppoſes bondage to ſonſhip; ſo that all who are not in the ſtate of ſonſhip, are in the ſtate of bondage. Πάλιν, again, evidently refers here, not to elements which the Galatians had never been under hitherto; but to bondage, which he tells them, ver. 8. they had been in to falſe gods. See Rom. viii. 3. Heb. vii. 8. Locke, Beza, and Calmet.

Ver. 11. I am afraid of you, &c.] There was the greater reaſon for this apprehenſion, as the fixing the time for the Jewiſh feaſts depended upon the great Sanhedrim; ſo that their obſerving them would bring them into ſuch an intercourſe with, and dependance upon that court, as might be greatly to the hazard of their Chriſtianity. See Calmet and Selden.

Ver. 12. For I am as ye are] The original words κἀγω ὡς ὑμεῖς are ambiguous, and may either ſignify I am, or I have been, as ye are. Our tranſlation takes them in the former ſenſe, and ſo they muſt expreſs his unanimity with them, which he urges as an argument for their unanimity with him, and affection to him; and this certainly very well ſuits the connection with the ſubſequent part of the verſe. The latter ſenſe, however, ſeems preferable, as more weighty, copious, and ſtriking, and perhaps more natural too: for it is certain that many of them were much prejudiced againſt him, while he was moſt tenderly affected towards them. See ver. 16. ch. i. 6. Locke, and Heylin.

Ver. 14. My temptation which was in the fleſh] What this weakneſs and trial in the fleſh was, ſays Mr. Locke, ſince it has not pleaſed the Apoſtle to mention, it is impoſſible for us to know: But it may be remarked here, as an inſtance, once for all, of the unavoidable obſcurity of ſome paſſages in epiſtolary writings, without any fault in the author; for ſome things neceſſary to the underſtanding of what is written, are uſually of courſe and juſtly omitted, becauſe already known by the perſon to whom the letter is written; and it would be often ſuperfluous, and ſometimes very ungraceful particularly to mention them. We may, however, juſt obſerve, that this ſeems to be the ſame as the infirmity of the fleſh, ver. 13. and it is very probably ſuppoſed by many to be what he ſpeaks of 2 Cor. xii. 7. See alſo 2 Cor. x. 10.

Ver. 15. Where then is the bleſſedneſs, &c.] What benedictions did you then pour out upon me! Locke: who obſerves, that the context makes this ſenſe of the words ſo neceſſary and viſible, that it is to be wondered how any one could overlook it. Several commentators, however, do not agree with Mr. Locke; but think that by bleſſedneſs here, we are to underſtand the ſenſe they had of their own happineſs, in being enlightened by St. Paul in the knowledge of the Goſpel. See Rom. iv. 6, 9. Dr. Waterland renders it, What, or how kind a ſalutation was that of yours! For I bear you witneſs, &c.

Ver. 17. They would exclude you] Some copies and ſeveral expoſitors read us, which certainly appears more natural and eaſy; and as there is no doubt but that the Apoſtle refers here to the endeavours uſed by the falſe teachers to alienate their affections from him, it may induce us to prefer this reading:—which is put by our tranſlators in the margin. See Doddridge, Heylin, Mill, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 18. In a good thing] That by καλῳ here, he means a perſon, and himſelf, the ſcope of the context evinces. In the preceding verſes he ſpeaks only of himſelf, and the change of their affection to him ſince he left them. There is no other thing mentioned, as peculiarly deſerving their affection, to which the rule given in this verſe could refer. He had ſaid, ver. 17. they affect you, and that you may affect them. This is only of perſons, and therefore ζηλοῦσθαι ἐν καλῳ, which immediately follows, may beſt be underſtood of a perſon; elſe the following part of the verſe, though joined by the copulative and, will make but a broken ſenſe with the preceding. But there can be nothing more coherent than this, which ſeems to be St. Paul's ſenſe: "You were very affectionate to me when I was with you; you are ſince eſtranged from me. It is the artifice of the ſeducers, who have cooled you to me; but if I am the good man you took me to be, you will do well to continue the warmth of your affection to me, when I am abſent, and not to be well-affected towards me only when I am preſent amongſt you." Though this be his meaning, yet the way he has taken to expreſs it is much more elegant, modeſt, and grace-

19 My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, until Chriſt be formed in you,

20 I deſire to be preſent with you now, and to change my voice; for I ſtand in doubt of you.

21 Tell me, ye that deſire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law?

22 For it is written, that Abraham had two ſons, the one by a bond-maid, the other by a free-woman.

23 But he who was of the bond-woman, was born after the fleſh; but he of the free-woman was by promiſe.

24 Which things are an allegory: for theſe are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar.

25 For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and anſwereth to Jeruſalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children.

26 But Jeruſalem which is above, is free, which is the mother of us all.

27 For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren, that beareſt not; break forth and cry, thou that travaileſt not: for the deſolate hath many more children than ſhe which hath an huſband.

28 Now we, brethren, as Iſaac was, are the children of promiſe.

29 But, as then he that was born after the fleſh, perſecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even ſo it is now.

30 Nevertheleſs, what ſaith the ſcripture? Caſt out the bond-woman and her ſon: for the ſon of the bond-woman ſhall not be heir with the ſon of the free-woman.

ful. Let any one read the original, and he will be fully ſatisfied that it is ſo. Locke. Dr. Waterland connects this with the following verſe thus;—and not only when I am preſent with you, my little children, of whom, &c. until Chriſt be formed in you: ver. 20. But I deſire, &c.

Ver. 20. And to change my voice] This ſeems to ſignify the ſpeaking higher or lower; changing the tone of the voice ſuitably to the matter delivered, whether it be advice, commendation, or reproof; for each of theſe have their diſtinct voices. St. Paul wiſhes himſelf with them, that he might accommodate himſelf to their preſent condition and circumſtances. Locke. Dr. Heylin underſtands it differently, and tranſlates, that I might addreſs you in another manner, (vivâ voce) for I am in great perplexity upon your account.

Ver. 21.] The Apoſtle exhorts the Galatians to ſtand faſt in the liberty with which Chriſt hath made them free; ſhewing thoſe who are ſo zealous for the law, that if they mind what they read in the law, they will there find, that the children of the promiſe, or of the new Jeruſalem, were to be free; but the children after the fleſh, of the earthly Jeruſalem, were to be in bondage, to be caſt out, and not have the inheritance. Inſtead of hear the law, the Vulgate and ſome MSS have it read the law. See Locke and Wetſtein.

Ver. 24. Which things are an allegory] The original may be rendered, Which things are allegorical, or have been allegorized. It ſeems to have been in compliance with the diſpoſition of the Jewiſh Chriſtians, who were fond of allegoric interpretations, that St. Paul, above all the other Apoſtles, uſed that way. He ſeems to intimate as much, when upon the allegory of Abraham's two ſons he argues for the diſcharge of the believing Gentiles from the legal rites. He had in his former chapter offered them ſeveral good reaſons in proof of their liberty, before he comes to this, which he introduces with the preface, "My little children, &c." ver. 19, 20. That is, "As I once begot you to Chriſt, ſo again I am in a ſort of travail, till the true doctrine be formed in you. I could wiſh that I were preſent in perſon, that I might learn how to accommodate my arguments beſt to your capacity and liking, as nurſes do their language to froward children; for I am in doubt what words or reaſons will ſuit you, or how I ſhall addreſs you to reclaim you." He goes on, "I will try what an allegory will do. Tell me, you who deſire, &c." St. Paul had no intention to prove by this allegory the truth of Chriſtianity to the unbelieving Jews, but to ſhew the Chriſtian exemption from Jewiſh rites, to Jews who profeſſed themſelves Chriſtians. To ſuch perſons his arguments built upon this paſſage in Moſes's writings might be very proper and convincing, becauſe they againſt whom he diſputed approved of this ſort of reaſoning upon Scripture hiſtory, and admitted the general principles upon which this and other allegorical principles were built. They had learned that all things happened to their fathers in a figure, and that things in the law included a myſtery relating to future times. And when an exact coincidence of all the circumſtances in the hiſtory and ſome after-event was made out, it was to them a good argument, becauſe it ſuited their genius, and was a method of proof to which they had been accuſtomed. Whether the application of Abraham's two ſons to the two covenants was wholly St. Paul's own, or whether he took it from ſome received Midraſh, cannot be certainly determined, under our loſs of the Jewiſh writings. In Philo we ſee this hiſtory allegorized to a moral ſenſe; Sarah being put for virtue by that author, in his book of allegories; and Agar, for that knowledge of the ſciences which ought to be ſubſervient to virtue, or elſe to be expelled: and who can ſay that this hiſtory was not allegorized by others in St. Paul's ſenſe? eſpecially as there is an obvious analogy between the family of Abraham, the father of the faithful, and the church of the faithful; which St. Paul might improve, in comparing all the parts of that hiſtory with the ſtate of the preſent Chriſtian and Jewiſh church, to accommodate the whole to the ſubject of their controverſy. Be this as it may, the Galatians could not miſtake him, as if he was about to impoſe a falſe ſenſe of the law upon them, after he had forewarned them in what ſenſe he interpreted that hiſtory. He does not give the leaſt intimation that the words in Geneſis literally ſignified the two covenants. On the contrary, he tells them, theſe things being allegorized, have this ſenſe. And if they were allegorized, then they were tranſferred from their genuine ſignification to other things illuſtrated in the figure. The hiſtory did not predict, but figured the other by unforced accommodation. See Chandler's Defence of Chriſtianity, p. 267, &c. Bp. Chandler's Defence and Vindication, and the writers againſt Collins.

Theſe are the two covenants] That is, "Theſe two perſons, Hagar and Sarah, may well be conſidered as repreſenting the two covenants, or diſpenſations of the law and the Goſpel. This Hagar, I ſay, (ver. 25.) whoſe name ſignifies a rock, is a repreſentation of thoſe who are under the law, given from mount Sinai in Arabia; in the deſarts of which the Hagarenes, who deſcended from Iſhmael, were ſettled: And it anſwers in the allegory to the preſent ſtate of the earthly Jeruſalem, which, with her children, is in bondage under the law." The particle γὰρ cannot have its illative force in ver. 25, ſince it would be very injurious to the Apoſtle to ſuppoſe he meant to argue thus: "Mount Sinai is Agar; for this Agar is mount Sinai." It muſt therefore ſignify the ſame with I ſay, and only introduce the repetition of a thought which the Apoſtle was deſirous to inculcate; as it often does elſewhere. To remove the difficulties in the paſſage before us, ſome underſtand and read it thus: Which things, ver. 24. concerning the bond and free-woman, are allegorized by Iſai. liv. 1. For theſe women are there the two covenants; the one covenant from mount Sinai, gendering, or generating unto bondage;—which is Agar, ver. 25, (for the word Agar is, or ſignifies mount Sinai in Arabia) and ranks in the ſame ſeries of the allegory under Jeruſalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. But the Jeruſalem above is the free woman, which is the mother of us;"—Πάντων, all, being better omitted, as in ſeveral manuſcripts. See Bentley, Mill, Wetſtein, Markland, and Bowyer's Conjectures.

Ver. 26. Jeruſalem which is above] Under the name of Jeruſalem is underſtood the Goſpel covenant, as will appear from the very etymology of the word; which ſignifies the ſeeing, or poſſeſſing of peace, or the peace-maker: A name highly applicable to the covenant of the Meſſiah, who is ſtiled "The prince of Salem, or, of peace." The Apoſtle here refers to the free genius of Chriſtianity; which, when compared with Judaiſm, made it evidently fit, in the illuſtration of this allegory, to conſider the free-woman, that is, Sarah, as repreſenting the church under this nobler form. The temple of God, and the new Jeruſalem, under the Chriſtian diſpenſation, is the whole collective body, the univerſal church, conſiſting of converts from Jews and Gentiles. See Doddridge, Pierce's Diſſertation, Sharpe's Sermon on the riſe and fall of Jeruſalem, and Sykes on the truth of Chriſtianity, p. 198, &c.

Ver. 29. Born after the fleſh] That is, Iſhmael; in whoſe birth there was nothing beyond the common courſe of nature. He that was born after the ſpirit is Iſaac; who was produced as the ſpiritual ſeed, by the eſpecial energy of God's miraculous power. See Gen. xxi. 3. 2 Cor. x. 3.—Even ſo is it now: That is, "So the carnal Jews, who are the ſeed of Abraham after the fleſh, abuſe and perſecute us Chriſtians, who are Abraham's ſeed after the ſpirit, becauſe we will not conform to the obſervance of legal ceremonies." The expreſſions, born after the fleſh, and born after the ſpirit, have in their original brevity, with regard to the whole view wherein St. Paul uſes them, an admirable beauty and force. See Doddridge, Grotius, and Locke.

31 So then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-woman, but of the free.

CHAP. V.

He moveth them to perſiſt in their liberty, and Ver. 31. John viii. 36. Ch. v. 1, 13.

Ver. 31. So then, brethren] The Apoſtle by this allegorical hiſtory ſhews the Galatians, that they who are ſons of Agar, i. e. under the Law given at mount Sinai, are in bondage, and intended to be caſt out; the inheritance being deſigned for thoſe only who are the free born ſons of God, under the ſpiritual covenant of the Goſpel. And thereupon he exhorts them in the following words, to preſerve themſelves in that ſtate of freedom; for the exhortation in ver. 1. of the following chapter is ſo evidently grounded on what the Apoſtle has been ſaying here, that it ſhould by all means be connected with it. It is made the cloſe of this chapter in three of Stephens's copies; which ſeems to be much more proper, than to make it the beginning of another chapter. See Locke, Bengelius, and Wetſtein. We ſhall ſubjoin here a few obſervations to prove that the time when Chriſtianity was made known was the fitteſt period poſſible,—by way of

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. IV. 4.

The goodneſs of God is not only eminently diſplayed in the great and ſignal bleſſings which he hath conferred on mankind; but it may appear likewiſe in the very time fixed upon for beſtowing his favours. We all know, from our own experience, that the deferring a benefit, frequently enhances the value of it, and of conſequence heightens our obligation to the benefactor; and that an over-haſty officious act of goodneſs may miſs of that valuable end by being the tranſport of a firſt ſentiment, or the effect of inſtinct, which in all probability it would have attained, if it had been more ſlow and deliberate. This reaſoning may well be applied to the argument now under conſideration.

Captious men have been apt to abound in vain inquiries; and among others of a like nature, to aſk this queſtion:—“Why the Chriſtian revelation, if it be really divine, was not communicated ſooner?” To which St. Paul has plainly intimated in the words before us this ſolid and ſufficient anſwer; “That preceding ages of the world were not ſo proper for it; for, in the fulneſs of time, God ſent forth his Son: That is, at the time preſcribed and pointed out in the ancient prophecies; not from mere arbitrary pleaſure, but becauſe it was in itſelf the fitteſt.”

Indeed, if the Chriſtian religion was abſolutely neceſſary, in the nature of the thing itſelf, to enable mankind to know and practice what it is their indiſpenſable duty to know and practice, we ſhould have had reaſon to conclude, that it muſt have ſubſiſted from the beginning, or as ſoon as this neceſſity commenced. But this is not the juſt ſtate of the caſe; becauſe the infinitely wiſe and righteous Governor of the world can require nothing of his creatures, but what he has given them a capacity to perform. The natural conſequence of which is, that every man does his duty, and anſwers the end of that particular ſtation wherein he is placed, who acts up to the light and advantages which he enjoys, whatever they are. Chriſtianity, therefore, was only highly expedient, and a ſingular bleſſing, but not, ſtrictly and univerſally, neceſſary.

And hence it follows, that we cannot infer either from the wiſdom or goodneſs of God, that he was, in a proper ſenſe, obliged to grant it to the world at all: For, let us ſee how the argument ſtands: “The Chriſtian revelation was a ſignal benefit, and extremely deſirable;—and therefore God was obliged to communicate it.”—But why this concluſion?—Are there not infinite other things which, we are apt to imagine, would be of great advantage to particular parts of the creation, that are never granted?—And why ſhould it not be ſo? Has not the ſupreme Being the abſolute diſpoſal of what is a matter of pure favour? Or do we make no diſtinction between acts of favour, and of juſtice? Surely there is a vaſt difference between them; for the one only may, the other muſt be performed; The one is neceſſary at all times, the other may be proper at very few; or fit to be granted at certain ſeaſons, and not at others.

The granting a revelation, therefore, was not a point of equity, but merely a conſideration of wiſdom. So that at whatever time it ſhould appear to have been moſt likely to anſwer its grand deſign, that was, without doubt, the moſt expedient and ſeaſonable for the promulgation of it. We proceed therefore to ſhew,—“That the time mentioned by St. Paul, was the fitteſt period for infinite wiſdom to fix upon, becauſe it was the moſt proper for the propagation of Chriſtianity; and that for two reaſons of inconteſtable weight; Firſt, that it could be more eaſily ſpread from one nation to another; and ſecondly, that it might make a larger, and more extenſive progreſs.”

To this end it is proper to remember, that the greateſt part of the known world was now united in one empire, under the Roman power; ſo that the intercourſe between mankind was more univerſal, and travelling to remote nations more eaſy and commodious than it had ever been under any other of the great monarchies. In this period likewiſe the world enjoyed a degree of peace and tranquillity, for a long while before unknown; which was another very favourable circumſtance for the propagation and ſettlement of the Goſpel:—For, amidſt the horrors and deſolations of war, the minds of men are diſtracted, and their thoughts fluctuating and confuſed. The general attention is engaged by victories and triumphs, or by ſcenes of devaſtation and ruin. The fate of nations is the point to be decided: the principal queſtion depending, which employs ſpeculations and inquiries, hopes and fears, is, “Which ſhall be eſtabliſhed—liberty or ſervitude?” And it is not to be ſuppoſed, that the generality will be ſedate enough to examine and purſue truth, with diſorder and confuſion all around them. The preachers of new doctrines muſt then eſpecially be obnoxious to the ſuſpicions and reſentments of the governing powers; every innovation will be repreſented as in a peculiar degree dangerous, and is likely to be ſuppreſſed by all imaginary methods of craft and violence: not to mention that the communication between countries of oppoſite pretenſions and intereſts being ſhut up, the propagation of true religion can be but imperfect and partial.

Now all theſe inconveniencies which attend a ſtate of war in general, were the real ſituation and ſtate of things for a long time before our bleſſed Saviour's appearance: But, after the moſt polite and flouriſhing parts of the world had for ſeveral centuries been diſquieted and ſhaken by frequent revolutions of empire, and harraſſed with almoſt perpetual wars, in the reign of Auguſtus Cæſar theſe competitions and convulſions ceaſed;—And THEN the Saviour of the world, the prince of peace was born;—the ſubſtance of whoſe commiſſion was, to aſſert the glory of the one eternal God, and promote peace among men; that amiable and generous ſpirit of unconfined benevolence, which, if it prevailed, would make cruelty relent, bend ſtubborn pride, and allay the raging heat of ambition.—And it is farther obſervable, that the peace which now ſubſiſted, was not only more univerſal, but continued longer than had been often known in the hiſtory of preceding times; by which means, among others, Chriſtianity became more eſtabliſhed, till at length that Roman power, which had ſeverely oppreſſed and perſecuted the profeſſors of it, ſubmitted, and owned its authority. Thus then we ſee that our bleſſed Saviour appeared at that period of time beſt fitted for trying, examining, proving, enforcing, and conveying his doctrines to all parts of the world, and to all ſucceeding ages and generations.

Again, one reaſon why his coming was ſo long delayed, was probably in order to juſtify the conduct of God, in his diſpenſations to mankind, and to enable us to anſwer the cavil ſo often urged againſt the Chriſtian diſpenſation—“Where was the neceſſity of this extraordinary ſtep?—Could nothing leſs than the Son of God inform and inſtruct the world, and redeem mankind from their ſins?”

To this the anſwer is now obvious: “All other methods of effecting that purpoſe had been tried, and all found ineffectual.”—When the preaching of Noah for an hundred years together was found utterly fruitleſs for the amendment of the old world,—God deſtroyed it by a flood.—When longevity, and the experience of ages were found only to inſpire mankind with confidence and ſecurity in ſinning, God contracted their lives from period to period, until he reduced them to the preſent pittance.—When the example and influence of Noah, and the recent judgements of God upon the earth, could not reſtrain his ſons from the vanity and evil tendencies of building the city and tower of Babel, God at once, by a ſignal interpoſition, confounded their language and their devices. The terrors of this judgement could ſcarce be abated, before the ſignal bleſſings of God upon Abraham, and his judgements upon Sodom, became an open monition to mankind of divine favour and protection to piety, and vengeance upon wickedneſs. When Egypt began to grow eminent over the other empires of the world, God ſignally interpoſed for the manifeſtation of the true religion, by the miniſtry of Joſeph; from whom there is good reaſon to believe, that they learnt, or were renewed at leaſt in the worſhip of the true God, and the duties they owed him. And when this nation became corrupt, through length of time, and the increaſe of power and wealth, God again interpoſed for the deliverance of his people from amongſt them, with a mighty hand, and ſtretched-out arm; to the terror of the whole world, and the manifeſtation of his more immediate providence and dominion over the affairs of men.

From this time his peculiar people ſubſiſted, in the midſt of their enemies, by little leſs than a ſeries of miracles, until they became, under David and Solomon, the greateſt empire of the earth; and then the luſtre and glory of the true religion was amply exhibited to the whole world around them.

As they became corrupt, the Egyptian monarchy prevailed, and principally upon their ruins;—as they repented, they were redeemed;—and as they returned to their corruptions, they were gradually and proportionably oppreſſed by the ſucceeding monarchies: But ſtill, in each of theſe,—in the Egyptian, Aſſyrian, Babylonian, Perſian, and Grecian, God ſignally interpoſed, by prophets, by miracles, by viſions, and by ſignal judgements from heaven, for the manifeſtation of the true religion;—and laſt of all,—when all theſe mercies, miracles, judgements, deliverances, monitions, viſions failed, and were found ineffectual; when the wiſeſt and the divineſt poets failed; when law-givers, politicians, philoſophers, and prophets proved inſufficient for the inſtruction and amendment of the world;—The Divine Wiſdom once more interpoſed, by ſending down THE SON OF GOD from heaven. From all theſe reaſons united, it ſeems therefore clearly evident, that the period when Chriſt ſo came was the fitteſt ſeaſon,—the fulneſs of time for ſending a Saviour into the world.

And now, from what we have ſeen with reſpect to the paſt, we may extend our view to future times. For as the Supreme Being muſt be at liberty to confer favours which could not be claimed, and as he has been pleaſed actually to communicate a revelation,—we have ſome ground to hope, that it hereafter may be, (though we cannot from hence alone conclude, that it certainly will be) more univerſally diffuſed. And if there be any ſuch future period, we may juſtly preſume, from what we are convinced was the caſe at the firſt promulgation not to obſerve circumciſion; but rather love, which is the ſum of the law. He reckoneth up the works of the fleſh, and the fruits of the Spirit; and exhorteth to walk in the Spirit.

STand faſt therefore in the liberty wherewith Chriſt hath made us free, and be not intangled again with the yoke of bondage.

2 Behold, I Paul ſay unto you, that if ye be circumciſed, Chriſt ſhall profit you nothing.

3 For I teſtify again to every man that is circumciſed, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.

4 Chriſt is become of no effect unto you, whoſoever of you are juſtified by the law; ye are fallen from grace.

5 For we, through the Spirit, wait for the hope of righteouſneſs by faith.

6 For in Jeſus Chriſt, neither circumciſion availeth any thing, nor uncircumciſion; but faith which worketh by love.

7 Ye did run well, who did hinder you, that ye ſhould not obey the truth?

8 This perſuaſion cometh not of him that calleth you.

9 A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.

mulgation of the Goſpel, "that there will be ſufficient evidence to convince thoughtful inquirers that this alſo is the fitteſt ſeaſon which could be fixed upon to anſwer the gracious deſign of Providence."

There are ſeveral circumſtances already opened to our view, which demonſtrate, that even now Chriſtianity might be ſpread vaſtly farther than it could ever be during the continuance of the Roman empire.—A great part of the globe is planted by colonies of nominal Chriſtians, which but a few ages ago was utterly unknown; And beſides the late diſcoveries and ſettlements in America, the commerce and trade of Chriſtendom has extended itſelf to very remote eaſtern nations, where the Roman arms never penetrated; nay, and where it is probable that the very name of heathen Rome, even in the height of its power and ſplendor, was never heard of. Add to this,—the conſiderable modern improvements in navigation, which procure us ſo eaſy an acceſs to theſe newly-diſcovered countries;—the intercourſe which we are capable of maintaining with the inhabitants, by the help of perſons ſkilled in their ſeveral languages; together with the invention of printing,—that moſt effectual method of improving, and the eaſieſt of diſperſing knowledge:—and all theſe concur to facilitate the propagation of the Goſpel, beyond what could reaſonably be expected in preceding ancient times.

But notwithſtanding all theſe, the critical period for making Chriſtianity the univerſal religion does not ſeem to be yet come. Many obſtacles remain, and ſeveral neceſſary preparations for this great event are ſtill wanting. However, we ourſelves can eaſily imagine a certain conjuncture, which would be proper;—a conjuncture which it is far from being extravagant preſumption to believe, may happen, —conſidering the frequent, and at ſome times the ſurpriſing viciſſitudes and revolutions in the courſe of human affairs.

"For, (to conclude theſe remarks) if the uſe of printing became eſtabliſhed, and of conſequence ingenuity and freedom of inquiry gained ground in the vaſt Turkiſh empire,—and both were transferred from thence to other Mahometan ſtates;—and if thoſe Chriſtians who are converſant with infidel nations would behave towards them with juſtice and generoſity, and treat them like men, and not, as if they were of an inferior ſpecies, like brutes, or SLAVES: if they would ceaſe from corrupting the morals of the Mahometan or of the pagan idolater, while they were perſuading him to turn to their religion; if they would give ſubſtantial and ſhining proofs that they were not wholly intent on worldly gain,—not influenced by a rapacious ambition, nor fond of luxury, nor devoted to intemperance: if, on the contrary, they honoured their profeſſion, by the practice of thoſe engaging virtues which the Goſpel inculcates, and were aſſiduous to improve in the minds of thoſe whom they call Indian ſavages, exact notions of morality, and to inſtruct them in the principles of natural religion, as the firſt ſtep towards their embracing the Chriſtian: and if, building on this foundation, they gave only ſuch accounts of Chriſtianity as were connected and rational, inſtead of diſcouraging faith by unnatural and barbarous repreſentations of the Deity, and affronting reaſon by ſenſeleſs and incredible myſteries,—Then we might juſtly apprehend, that the time was drawing nigh, when over ALL the earth, as the prophet hath foretold, there ſhall be ONE Lord, and his NAME one; (Zech. xiv. 9.) or in the language of St. Paul, when the fulneſs of the Gentiles ſhall come in, and ALL Iſrael ſhall be ſaved. Rom. xi. 25, 26."

Chap. V. Ver. 2] It is evident from ver. 11, that the better to prevail with the Galatians to be circumciſed, it had been reported that St. Paul himſelf preached up circumciſion. The Apoſtle, therefore, without taking expreſs notice of this calumny, ch. i. 6.—ii. 21. gives an account of his paſt life in a large train of particulars, which all concur to make ſuch a character of him, as renders it very incredible that he ſhould ever declare for the circumciſion of the Gentile converts, or for their ſubmiſſion to the law. Having thus prepared the minds of the Galatians to give him a fair hearing, as a fair man, (ζηλῦσθαι ἐν καλῷ,) he goes on to argue againſt their ſubjecting themſelves to the law: And having eſtabliſhed their freedom from the law by many ſtrong arguments, he comes here, at laſt, openly to take notice of the report that had been raiſed of him, that he preached circumciſion,—and directly confutes it; 1. By poſitively denouncing to them himſelf very ſolemnly, that they who ſuffered themſelves to be circumciſed, put themſelves into a perfect legal ſtate, out of the covenant of grace, and could receive no benefit by Jeſus Chriſt; ver. 2—4. 2. By aſſuring them that he, and thoſe that followed him, expected juſtification only by faith; ver. 5—6. 3. By telling them that he had put them in the right way, and that this new perſuaſion came not from him that converted them to Chriſtianity: ver. 7, 8. 4. By inſinuating to them that they ſhould agree to paſs judgement on him that troubled them with this doctrine: ver. 9, 10. 5. By his being perſecuted for oppoſing the circumciſion of the Chriſtians; For this was the great offence which ſtuck with the Jews, even after their converſion: ver. 11. 6. By wiſhing thoſe cut off, that trouble them with this doctrine: ver. 12. This will, I doubt not, by whoever weighs it, be found a very ſkilful management of the argumentative part of this Epiſtle; which ends here. For though he begins with ſapping the foundation on which the judaizing ſeducers ſeemed to have laid their main ſtreſs, (viz. the report of his preaching circumciſion) yet he reſerves the direct and open confutation of it to the end; and ſo leaves it with them, that it may have the more forcible and laſting impreſſion on their minds. ver. 2—13. Locke.

Behold] This word is uſed to fix their attention. I, Paul;—"I the ſame Paul, who am reported to preach circumciſion,—teſtify again, (ver. 3.)—continue my teſtimony, to every man; to you, and all men." This very emphatical way of ſpeaking may well be underſtood to have regard to what he takes notice of ver. 11. as being caſt upon him; namely, his preaching circumciſion; and is a very ſignificant vindication of himſelf. If ye be circumciſed, means, "If ye ſubmit to circumciſion, and depend on that, and the obſervance of the reſt of the Jewiſh rites, for juſtification and ſalvation." It muſt have been allowed that either Judaiſm or Chriſtianity was neceſſary to ſalvation. If Judaiſm had been neceſſary, Chriſtianity could not be ſo; and vice verſa. It was plain, therefore, that if the obſervance of circumciſion and other Jewiſh rites was obligatory, all that Chriſt had done and ſuffered would have been of no advantage to them; for, if the ſoul could not repoſe its confidence in Him for ſalvation, its divided regards would be rather an affront, than an act of homage. See Locke, Doddridge, and Grotius.

Ver. 5. For we] It is evident from the context that St. Paul here means himſelf; but we is a more graceful way of ſpeaking than I, though he be vindicating himſelf alone from the imputation of ſetting up circumciſion. See ch. xxxiii. and Locke.

Ver. 6. Faith, which worketh by love] There is ſome degree of ambiguity in the original:—Δι᾽ ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη. It may be rendered either which operates, and works by love; or, which is wrought, inſpired and perfected by love. Some have preferred the latter ſenſe; and have taken occaſion from hence to ſhew, how much charity tends to eſtabliſh and perfect faith: But the former, which is the more uſual ſenſe, appears preferable, and to be authorized by the uſe of the ſame word, Epheſ. iii. 20. and Coloſſ. i. 29. See Doddridge, L'Enfant, and Calmet.

Ver. 7. Who did hinder you, &c.] Ἀνέκοψε, rendered hinder, is an Olympic expreſſion, anſwerable to the word rendered ye did run: And it properly ſignifies, "Coming acroſs the courſe, while a perſon is running in it, in ſuch a manner as to juſtle, and throw him out of the way." See Wolfius, Wetſtein, and Mintert.

Ver. 8. Of him that calleth you] He uſed this expreſſion before, ch. i. 6. and in both places means himſelf; and here declares that this πεισμονὴ, whether taken for perſuaſion, or for ſubjection, (as it may well be in St. Paul's ſtyle, conſidering πείθεσθαι at the end of the foregoing verſe) came not from him; for he called them to liberty from the law, and not ſubjection to it. See ver. 13. His argument runs thus: "You were going on well in the liberty of the Goſpel; who ſtopped you?—I, you may be ſure, had no concern in it; for you know that I called you to liberty, and not to ſubjection to the law; and therefore you can by no means ſuppoſe that I ſhould preach up circumciſion." From the two following verſes, it looks as if all the diſorders here complained of aroſe from one man. Locke.

10 I have confidence in you, through the Lord, that ye will be none otherwiſe minded: but he that troubleth you, ſhall bear his judgement, whoſoever he be.

11 And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumciſion, why do I yet ſuffer perſecution? then is the offence of the croſs ceaſed.

12 I would they were even cut off which trouble you.

13 For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only uſe not liberty for an occaſion to the fleſh, but by love ſerve one another.

14 For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf.

15 But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not conſumed one of another.

16 This I ſay then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye ſhall not fulfil the luſt of the fleſh.

17 For the fleſh luſteth againſt the Spirit, and the Spirit againſt the fleſh; and theſe are contrary the one to the other: ſo that ye cannot do the things that ye would.

18 But if ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law.

19 Now the works of the fleſh are manifeſt, which are theſe; Adultery, fornication, uncleanneſs, laſciviouſneſs,

20 Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, ſtrife, ſeditions, hereſies,

Ver. 10. Will be none otherwiſe minded] "Will beware of this leaven, ſo as not to be put into a ferment, nor ſhaken in your liberty, in which you ought to ſtand faſt: And to ſecure it, I doubt not, (ſuch confidence I have in you) will with one accord caſt out him that troubleth you. For, as for me, you may be ſure I am not for circumciſion, in that the Jews continue to perſecute me." This is evidently the Apoſtle's meaning, though not ſpoken out; but managed warily, with a very ſkilful and moving inſinuation: For,—as he ſays himſelf, ch. iv. 20.—he knew not at that diſtance what temper they were in. Κρῖμα, judgement here, ſeems to mean expulſion by a church cenſure, cutting off from church communion; ſee ver. 12. We ſhall be more inclined to this opinion, if we conſider that the Apoſtle uſes the ſame argument of a little leaven leavening the whole lump, 1 Cor. v. 6. where he would perſuade the Corinthians to purge out the fornicator. Some, however, would extend the meaning to the ſolemn account which this troubler of the church's peace ſhould give to God, and to the condemnation he ſhould certainly receive, if he perſiſted in the endeavours he was uſing to ſubvert the truth. See Locke, Doddridge, Calmet, and on 1 Cor. iv. 21.

Ver. 11. Perſecution] The perſecution St. Paul was ſtill under, was a convincing argument that he was not for circumciſion and ſubjection to the law; for it was from the Jews upon that account, that at this time aroſe all the perſecutions which the Chriſtians ſuffered;—as may be ſeen throughout the hiſtory of the Acts: Nor are there wanting clear footſteps of it in ſeveral other places of this Epiſtle: as ch. iii. 4. vi. 12—14. Locke.

Ver. 12. I would they were even cut off which trouble you] Who ſubvert or unſettle you. MS and Wat. It by no means agrees with the gentle genius of Chriſtianity to ſuppoſe, that this Apoſtle, who underſtood it ſo well, and cultivated it ſo much, ſhould mean by this to intimate that he wiſhed theſe troublers dead, or that any bodily evil were inflicted upon them by human violence. All arguments therefore which are drawn from this text in favour of perſecuting principles, muſt be very inconcluſive; but when we conſider the particular circumſtances in which theſe ſeducing teachers oppoſed the Apoſtle, it will appear, that they very well deſerved that eccleſiaſtical cenſure, which he here wiſhes to be pronounced againſt them. Some, following a different reading, render this verſe, They ought to be cut off, and ſhall in reality be cut off, who trouble you. See Le Clerc, Mill, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 13. Only uſe not your liberty] From the mention of liberty, to which St. Paul tells them they are called under the Goſpel, he takes occaſion to caution them reſpecting the uſe of it, and ſo exhorts them to a ſpiritual or true Chriſtian life; ſhewing the difference and contrariety between that and a carnal life, or a life after the fleſh. ver. 13—26. The word δουλεύετε, rendered ſerve, has a greater force in the Greek than our Engliſh word ſerve expreſſes, in the common acceptation; for it ſignifies the oppoſite to ἐλευθερία, and ſo the Apoſtle elegantly informs them, that though by the Goſpel they are called to a ſtate of liberty from the law, yet they were ſtill as much bound and ſubjected to their brethren, in all the offices and duties of love and good-will, as if in that reſpect they were their vaſſals and bondmen. Locke.

Ver. 16, 17. Walk in the Spirit] That which in theſe verſes he calls Spirit, in Rom. vii. 22. he calls the inward man; 23. the law of the mind; 25. the mind. There can be nothing plainer than that the ſtate which St. Paul deſcribes in theſe two verſes is painted by him more at large in the above chapter to the Romans. He ſuppoſes two principles in every man; one he calls fleſh, the other Spirit: though there are other appellations given them, theſe are their moſt common and uſual names in the New Teſtament. By fleſh, is meant all thoſe vicious and irregular appetites, inclinations, and habitudes, whereby a man is turned from his obedience to that eternal law of right, the obſervance whereof God always requires, and is pleaſed with. This is very properly called fleſh; this bodily ſtate being the ſource whence all our deviations from the ſtrait rule of rectitude for the moſt part take their riſe, or elſe ultimately terminate in. On the other ſide, Spirit is that part of a man which is endowed with light from God to know and ſee what is righteous, juſt, and good; and which, being conſulted and hearkened to, is always ready to direct and prompt us to that which is good. The fleſh then, in the Goſpel language, is that principle which inclines and carries men to ill; the Spirit, that principle which dictates what is right, and inclines to good: and as this principle was much weakened and almoſt extinct in the Gentiles, (ſee Epheſ. iv. 17, 21,) he exhorts them to be renewed in the Spirit of their minds, ver. 23. to put off the old man, i. e. fleſhly corrupt habits, and to put on the new man, which he tells them, ver. 24. is created in righteouſneſs and true holineſs. This is alſo called renewing of the mind, Rom. xii. 2. and renewing of the inward man, 2 Cor. iv. 16. which is done by the aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God, Epheſ. iii. 16. Locke. Inſtead of you ſhall not fulfil, ver. 16. the MS reads ye ſhall in no wiſe fulfil; and ver. 17. inſtead of ſo that ye cannot do, &c.—ſo that you do not whatſoever ye would.

Ver. 18. But if ye be led by the Spirit] "But if ye give yourſelves up to the conduct of the Goſpel by faith in Chriſt, ye are not under the law:" For they who are led by the Spirit of God, are the ſons of God; and ſo heirs, and free, without the law,—as he argues here, ch. iii. and iv. This is plainly the ſenſe of the Apoſtle, who teaches all along, in the former part of this Epiſtle, as well as of that to the Romans, that thoſe who put themſelves under the Goſpel, are not under the law. The queſtion then that remains, is only about the phraſe led by the Spirit; with reſpect to which it is eaſy to obſerve, how natural it is for St. Paul, having in the foregoing verſes more than once mentioned the Spirit, to continue the ſame word, though ſomewhat varied in the ſenſe. In St. Paul's phraſeology, as the irregularities of appetite, and the dictates of right reaſon are oppoſed, under the titles of fleſh and Spirit, ſo the covenant of works, and the covenant of Grace, law and Goſpel, are oppoſed, under the titles of fleſh and Spirit: In 2 Cor. iii, 6, 8. he calls the Goſpel Spirit; and Rom. vii. 5. in the fleſh, ſignifies, "in the legal ſtate." But we need go no farther than ch. iii. 3. of this very Epiſtle, to ſee the law and the Goſpel oppoſed by St. Paul, under the titles of fleſh and Spirit. The reaſon of thus uſing the word Spirit is very apparent in the doctrine of the New Teſtament; which teaches, that thoſe who receive Chriſt by faith, with him receive his Spirit, and its aſſiſtance againſt the fleſh. See Rom. viii. 9—11. Accordingly, for the obtaining of ſalvation, St. Paul joins together belief of the truth, and ſanctification of the ſpirit, 1 Theſſ. ii. 13. and ſo ſpirit here may be taken for the ſpirit of their minds, but renewed and ſtrengthened by the Spirit of God. See Epheſ. iii. 16. iv. 23. and Locke.

Ver. 19. Now the works of the fleſh are manifeſt] If fleſh be taken for the irregularities of the appetite,—for that natural corruption which infects the faculties of man, it extends to the mind, as well as to the appetites of the body; and there will be no difficulty in aſcribing each of the particular crimes here enumerated to the fleſh, as they all proceed from that corruption, by means of which even the mind and conſcience is defiled. Titus i. 15. See Doddridge and Whitby.

Ver. 20. Witchcraft] Some would render the word φαρμακεία by poiſoning; but ſurely this is comprehended under the word murders; nor is there any reaſon to believe the fleſh ſo particularly inclined to this one kind of murder, as that it ſhould be ſpecified, rather than any other. It is certain, that on account of the drugs made uſe of in ſome ſuppoſed magical compoſitions, this word is often uſed to expreſs thoſe practices, in which combinations with inviſible malignant powers were ſo believed and intended; and to which, whether they had or had not that real foundation which has generally been ſuppoſed, it is well known the Gentiles, even in the moſt learned nations, were very much addicted. We render the word διχοστασίαι ſeditions; but as the original word ſeems more general, ſome would expreſs it more largely by diviſions of a party ſpirit, among thoſe who ought to be united in one intereſt and affection. Perhaps, however, by this word the Apoſtle means to point out diviſions in the ſtate, as by the next he refers to diviſions in religion; hereſies in religious communities, by which profeſſing Chriſtians are induced to ſeparate from each other, and to form ſects, which inſtead of maintaining true candour and benevolence, renounce and condemn each other. See Locke, Doddridge, Hallett, and Weſton's "Rejection of Chriſtian Miracles," ch. vii.

Ver. 21. Revellings] Κῶμοι, or revellings among the Greeks, were a diſorderly ſpending of the night in feaſtings, with a licentious indulging to wine, good cheer, muſic, dancing, &c. See Rom. xiii. 13. 1 Pet. iv. 3. and Locke.

Ver. 22. Faith] Fidelity; which the word πίστις undoubtedly ſignifies in many places. See on Matth. xxiii. 23. So that we may underſtand it of the faithfulneſs of God, or his fidelity to his promiſes, Rom. iii. 3. and where it is applied to ſervants, we expreſly render it fidelity: Titus ii. 10. And though it generally ſignifies the grace of faith, or the confidence repoſed in another, yet where we find it joined, as in the place before us, with other moral virtues, it may be rather taken to denote fidelity. See 1 Tim. iv. 12. vi. 11. 2 Tim. ii. 22. iii. 10. and Rev. ii. 19.

Ver. 23. Againſt ſuch there is no law] They have ſo manifeſt and evident a goodneſs in them, that they never were forbidden by any human inſtitution. Doddridge.

Ver. 24. They that are Chriſt's] Theſe are the ſame with thoſe who are led by the Spirit, ver. 18. and are oppoſed to thoſe who live after the fleſh; Rom. viii. 13. where it is ſaid, conformably to what we find here, They through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body. That principle in us, from whence ſpring vicious inclinations and actions, is, as we have obſerved above, ſometimes called the fleſh, ſometimes the old man: The ſubduing and mortifying of this evil principle, ſo that the force and power wherewith it is uſed to rule in us is extinguiſhed, the Apoſtle, by a very engaging accommodation to the death of our Saviour, calls crucifying the fleſh; and in Rom. vi. 6. crucifying the old man. It is likewiſe called mortifying the members which are on the earth; Col. iii. 5. See alſo ii. 11. Epheſ. iv. 2. Rom. viii. 13. and Locke.

Ver. 25. If we live in the Spirit, &c.] Living in the Spirit, expreſſes in terms nearly reſembling thoſe in Acts xvii. 28. our continual dependance on its influences; and alſo illuſtrates the ſignificancy of the word στοιχῶμεν, in the latter part of the verſe. Let us walk in the Spirit,—"in a regular and orderly manner; taking every ſtep according to rule, and under his influence; regulating our whole life and actions by his light and dictates." See Locke, and Howe on the Spirit, vol. i. p. 237.

Ver. 26. Envying one another] Whether the vain-glory and envying here were about their ſpiritual gifts, (a fault whereof the Corinthians were guilty, as we may ſee at large 1 Cor. xii, xiii, xiv.) or upon any other occaſion, or on any other account, and ſo contained in ver. 15. of this chapter, is not very important to enquire: Either way the ſenſe of the words will be much the ſame; and accordingly this verſe may either end the preſent, or begin the next chapter. See Locke, and Bengelius.

REFLECTIONS ON VERSE 13.

There is not a more valuable bleſſing in human life than liberty: Civil liberty is the baſis of all ſocial happineſs, and liberty of conſcience the only foundation of a rational religion. When this latter is reſtrained, we are treated rather like brutes than men;—that is, creatures endued with moral powers, and accountable for their actions:—And therefore it is one of the chief excellencies of the Chriſtian religion, and very far from the air and ſpirit of an impoſture, that it preſerves the rights of conſcience ſacred and inviolable.

But, becauſe the world is apt to run into extremes, the writers of the New Teſtament, like perſons who had a thorough knowledge of human nature, have taken care in this reſpect, as well as in all others, to guard againſt exceſs and irregularity. Thus St. Paul adviſes theſe Galatians not to miſtake licentiouſneſs for Chriſtian liberty; or, in other words, not to imagine, that becauſe they were freed from the expenſive and burthenſome obſervances of the Moſaic inſtitution, (which are elegantly deſcribed as a ſtate of ſervitude) they were diſcharged likewiſe from moral obligations; which are an eternal and immutable law to all rational beings.

It may not be unſeaſonable, to conſider the ſubject in a light ſuited to the complexion and genius of the preſent age; and to enquire into ſome of the chief abuſes of free-thinking; by which it happens that what is really the peculiar honour, and greateſt advantage of our intelligent nature, becomes a reproach to it, and is attended with the moſt injurious conſequences.

1. And firſt, Embracing the principle of liberty, has ended with many in infidelity, or a diſbelief of all religion. It is moſt evident, that infidelity never more abounded than in this age of free enquiry; and that thoſe who are moſt looſe in their ſentiments, with reſpect to the obligations of religion in general, and of Chriſtianity in particular, are in profeſſion, at leaſt, enemies to bigotry and implicit faith. Nay, it may be allowed further, that it is likely they would never have gone ſuch a length as to throw off all religion, if they had continued in a blind attachment to the principles of their education, and to eſtabliſhed and popular opinions.

Whence now can this ariſe?—We, who believe that religion, in all the parts of it, is ſtrictly rational, can never allow that it is the natural conſequence of a free and impartial examination of it; but muſt ſuppoſe, on the contrary, that the more thoroughly it is conſidered, and the more nicely weighed in the balance of true and unbiaſſed reaſon, it will be the more heartily believed and ſubmitted to. Indeed this melancholy event may be ſufficiently accounted for from other cauſes; and ſhewn not to proceed from a ſuperior underſtanding, or more adequate and enlarged views of things, but from ignorance, ſuperficial enquiry, and even from that prejudice and implicit faith, which the monopolizers of reaſon and free-thinking ſo loudly diſclaim.

It is by no means intended by any thing here advanced, to diſcourage the moſt rational and free examination of all religious principles, be they ever ſo ſacred and venerable, and tranſmitted down with ever ſo much awe and ſolemnity by our forefathers; neither is it deſigned to aſſert, that any man is obliged to receive a revelation, which, upon mature deliberation, appears to be unworthy of God, and repugnant to the reaſon and nature of things. The preſent purpoſe is only to point out briefly ſome falſe principles, which are all an abuſe of the true principle of liberty; and by which, it is highly probable, many of its profeſſed admirers, and zealous eſpouſers, have been led to a diſregard both of revealed and natural religion.

It frequently happens that after men have rejected ſome principles, (which before they looked upon as very important, nay, eſſential parts of Chriſtianity) upon being convinced that they have as little foundation in the Chriſtian religion, as in the reaſon of things; yet they ſtill retain others, equally repugnant both to reaſon and Scripture. In ſome time they are perſuaded, either by converſation, or reading, or their own inward reflections, that theſe likewiſe are abſurd and irrational; but, inſtead of enquiring, as becomes honeſt ſearchers after truth, take it for granted all the while that they are real doctrines of Chriſtianity. The conſequence of which is, that the Chriſtian religion itſelf is rejected as falſe, becauſe ſuch doctrines, which are erroneouſly reckoned as parts of it, cannot be true.

But why this concluſion?—May not Chriſtians miſrepreſent the doctrines of the religion which they profeſs? Or is it fit that any religion ſhould be condemned before it is examined, merely by hearſay?—Is this freedom of thought, and rational enquiry?—Far from it. It is rank prejudice, under the cover of that amiable name; and a prejudice, which, if it was ſuffered to prevail in all caſes, would render it impoſſible for men to form a right judgement of things, and leave no way by which to diſtinguiſh between true and falſe religions.

Again, when men, upon a rational and free enquiry, have found ſome of the principles in which they were educated to be falſe; inſtead of reſting here, they draw this moſt unjuſt and unnatural inference,—That the whole of religion is deceit and impoſture. Thus they ruſh at once to a concluſion, without having any premiſes to ſupport it, and draw conſequences from things which have no relation to, or connection with each other; and yet, all the while, ſet up for cloſe reaſoners, and free enquirers! Never, ſurely, was the name of rational liberty ſo groſsly abuſed, as by a conduct like this; which at once argues a very ſhallow judgement, great confuſion of thought, and ſtrong prejudice and partiality.

Some, again, ſeem to miſtake liberty, for a right to diſpute every thing; and cavil at all religious principles which are commonly received, merely to ſhew that they are free-thinkers. Now it is certain, every one has an undoubted right to debate in his mind upon all principles, before he receives them, whether they are true or falſe; and no wiſe man will take up any opinion implicitly, how powerfully ſoever it may be recommended by great names, and worldly advantages;

provoking one another, envying one another.

CHAP. VI.

He moveth them to deal mildly with a brother that hath ſlipped, and to bear one another's burden; to be liberal to their teachers, and not weary of well-doing: he ſheweth what they intend that preach circumciſion: he glorieth in nothing, ſave in the croſs of Chriſt.

BRethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are ſpiritual reſtore ſuch an one in the ſpirit of meekneſs; conſidering thyſelf, leſt thou alſo be tempted.

2 Bear ye one another's burdens, and ſo fulfil the law of Chriſt.

3 For if a man think himſelf to be ſomething, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himſelf.

4 But let every man prove his own work, and then ſhall he have rejoicing in himſelf alone, and not in another.

5 For every man ſhall bear his own burden.

6 Let him that is taught in the word, communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things.

advantages: but it alſo is certain, that diſputing only for the ſake of cavilling, is not an honeſt and ingenuous frame of mind, but humour, pride, and ſingularity. Such men think, perhaps, by this means, to paſs for perſons whoſe underſtandings are enlarged from vulgar prejudices, and who, in their purſuits after knowledge, are under no bias, nor influenced by any conſideration, but the abſtract reaſon and truth of things. And thus, what was at firſt only vanity, may by degrees be confirmed and ſettled infidelity: For the oppoſition ſuch perſons frequently meet with, will make them more eager in oppoſing, more tenacious of what they have advanced, and more inclined to maintain it; till at length, what they aſſerted and urged only for cavilling ſake, or from the ſpirit of contradiction too natural to eager diſputants, they fancy themſelves obliged in honour to ſtand by, as their own genuine ſentiments.

2. Another abuſe of the principle of liberty is this, That it has led many, who have not proceeded ſo far as a downright diſbelief of all religion, to pay little or no regard to inſtrumental and poſitive duties. Impartial enquirers into things have diſcovered the folly and miſchief of ſuperſtition and enthuſiaſm;—they have ſeen that reading, hearing, praying, &c. can anſwer no valuable purpoſes farther than as they influence men to govern their paſſions, and to behave with juſtice and univerſal benevolence to their fellow-creatures;—and that the placing all religion in inward impulſes, a warm and lively imagination, and heats and raptures of devotion, has been of vaſt diſſervice to the cauſe of ſolid and uſeful virtue: And undoubtedly, ſo far our rational and free enquiries have been of great uſe to us, by teaching us wherein the ſubſtance of true religion conſiſts, and guarding us againſt dangerous errors.

But from hence it has been ſtrangely and inconſiſtently inferred, that the inſtrumental duties of piety are not only unneceſſary, but hurtful; and that an inward veneration and eſteem of the Deity, improved by frequent ſerious meditation, is ſufficient, without any outward ſtated acts of worſhip, and is all that is fit for us to perform, or our Maker to expect;—an inference, for which there is not the leaſt colour of reaſon, nor can there be any thing more forced and unnatural.

And indeed the ill effects of this notion are but too viſible. For, thoſe who have thus neglected all external religion, have in general been ſo far from improving, that they have rather declined in their zeal for the practice even of moral virtue, in proportion as they have grown remiſs with reſpect to the ſolemn worſhip of their Maker, and the inſtrumental duties of piety.

3. Freedom of thought, and impartial enquiry into the principles of religion, have alſo been abuſed and perverted in the preſent age, by degenerating into a light, trifling frame of mind, and a humour of treating things ſacred with ridicule. With people who affect this way, liberty is nothing elſe but a free bold manner of treating all ſubjects ludicrouſly, and turning them into a jeſt. They have a great inclination to ſhew their wit, eſpecially upon points which affords the leaſt room for it; for this diſcovers an uncommon genius!—But ſuch empty triflers ought to know, "That there can be no true wit, which has not reaſon for its foundation;—that ridiculing what is in itſelf good, uſeful, and venerable, fixes a certain reproach upon him who attempts it, either as to his underſtanding or his morals;—that jeſting with things of the higheſt conſequence is folly and madneſs;—that it is an eaſy matter, by miſrepreſenting, to make any thing appear ridiculous; and conſequently, that this talent is as far from being a demonſtration that the perſon who poſſeſſes it is a wit, as it is from being an evidence of his good breeding, that in violation of all the rules of decency, he banters and treats with ſcurrility that eſtabliſhed religion of his country, for which all around him have a high value and regard."

From what has been ſaid we learn, that there are no things in themſelves ſo excellent, but what are capable of being abuſed; and, be their natural conſequences ever ſo friendly and beneficial to mankind, may be made to produce the moſt miſchievous effects. And yet, as this great and melancholy abuſe is no juſt objection to the wiſdom and goodneſs of the Creator of mankind, ſo neither is it any argument againſt the excellency and uſefulneſs of the things themſelves;—no more than it is an argument againſt the neceſſary ſupports of life, that they are frequently abuſed to exceſs and intemperance; or againſt reaſon itſelf, that it is ſometimes madly perverted to the purpoſes of vice and immorality. Indeed, ſtrictly ſpeaking, perverting the nature of things, in every inſtance, is nothing elſe but an abuſe of reaſon; and therefore if it concludes any thing, it muſt be againſt that noble faculty, which is our chief dignity, and only ſuperiority to the animal creation.

Since then this principle of freedom of thought, and an honeſt and impartial examination into the nature and evidence of religious matters, is the ſupreme prerogative of our intelligent being, eſſential to all rational religion, and in a peculiar manner honourable and advantageous to the Chriſtian; let us, notwithſtanding accidental abuſes, to which the beſt things are liable, conſtantly aſſert and vindicate it: Ever remembering, that though we are called to liberty, both theſe rules have the ſame foundation in reaſon, and are of equal authority in the Chriſtian revelation:—Stand faſt in the liberty wherewith Chriſt hath made you free;—but, Uſe not your liberty for an occaſion to the fleſh.

Chap. VI. Ver. 1. Brethren] The Apoſtle here exhorts the ſtronger to gentleneſs and meekneſs towards the weak: "If a man by frailty or ſurpriſe be overtaken in a fault, do you who are eminent in the church for knowledge, practice, and gifts, raiſe him up again, and ſet him right with gentleneſs and meekneſs;—conſidering thyſelf." The ſudden tranſition from the plural number to the ſingular adds a great deal of beauty and force to the caution: for it is as if the Apoſtle ſhould have ſaid, "Let every particular perſon among you remember, that he alſo may be in danger through his own frailty; and by thus looking to himſelf, he will be induced to behave with greater tenderneſs and benevolence to others." See Locke, Whitby, and Blackwall's Sacred Claſſics, vol. i. p. 133.

Ver. 2. Bear ye one another's burdens] "Bear with one another's frailties and infirmities; help to ſupport each other, under the neceſſary burdens and evils of life;—and ſo fulfil the law of Chriſt." See Rom. xv. 1. and 1 Theſſ. v. 14. There were ſome among them very zealous for the law of Moſes: St. Paul here puts them in mind of a law which they were under, and were obliged to obſerve; and he ſhews them how to do it; namely, by helping to bear one another's burdens, and not increaſing their burdens by the obſervance of the Levitical law. Though the Goſpel contains the law of the kingdom of Chriſt, St. Paul doth not any where call it the law of Chriſt, but in this place, where he mentions it in oppoſition to thoſe who thought a law ſo neceſſary, that they would retain that of Moſes under the Goſpel. See John xiii. 34, 35. xiv. 12. and Locke.

Ver. 4, 5. Shall he have rejoicing, &c.] Shall he have whereof to glory. MS. So Mr. Locke would tranſlate καύχημα here,—as καυχησωνται is tranſlated in ver. 13. the Apoſtle in both places meaning the ſame thing; namely, glorying in another, for having brought him to circumciſion, and other ritual obſervances of the Moſaic law; for thus he ſeems to me to diſcourſe in the verſes before us: "Brethren, there be ſome among you who would bring others under the ritual obſervances of the Moſaic law;—a yoke which was too heavy for us and our fathers to bear. They would do much better to eaſe the burdens of the weak; this is ſuitable to the law of Chriſt, which they are under, and is the law which they ought ſtrictly to obey. If they think, becauſe of their ſpiritual gifts, that they have power to preſcribe in ſuch matters, I tell them, that they have not, and do but deceive themſelves: let them rather take care of their own particular actions, that they be right, and ſuch as they ought to be; this will give them matter of glorying in themſelves, and not vainly in others, as they do, when they prevail with them to be circumciſed; for every man ſhall be anſwerable for his own actions."

Ver. 6.] St. Paul having laid ſome reſtraint upon the authority and forwardneſs of the teachers and leading men amongſt them, who were, as it ſeems, more ready to impoſe what they ought not on the Galatians, than to keep them forward in the practice of Goſpel obedience, He here takes care of them in reſpect of their maintenance; and exhorts the Galatians to liberality towards them, and in general towards all men, eſpecially Chriſtians. ver. 6—10. The word communicate here ſignifies to give liberally. All good things may imply, not

7 Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatſoever a man ſoweth, that ſhall he alſo reap.

8 For he that ſoweth to his fleſh, ſhall of the fleſh reap corruption; but he that ſoweth to the Spirit, ſhall of the Spirit reap life everlaſting.

9 And let us not be weary in well-doing: for in due ſeaſon we ſhall reap, if we faint not.

10 As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, eſpecially unto them who are of the houſhold of faith.

11 Ye ſee how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand.

12 As many as deſire to make a fair ſhew in the fleſh, they conſtrain you to be circumciſed; only leſt they ſhould ſuffer perſecution for the croſs of Chriſt.

13 For neither they themſelves who are circumciſed keep the law; but deſire to have you circumciſed, that they may glory in your fleſh.

14 But God forbid that I ſhould glory, ſave in the croſs of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.

only maintenance and ſubſiſtence, but likewiſe other branches of benevolence and reſpect. Locke.

Ver. 7. Be not deceived] The Apoſtle here, with great propriety and force, expoſes the evaſions ſome would make uſe of to excuſe themſelves from acts of liberality; by which, however they might impoſe on others, they would egregiouſly deceive themſelves, as every circumſtance lies open to an all-ſeeing God, and they aſſuredly ſhould reap accordingly as they ſowed; (a metaphor which he employs elſewhere to excite to liberality, 2 Cor. ix. 6.) the thought whereof muſt ſilence every vain pretence that may be brought againſt ſo plain a duty, and is moſt admirably ſuited to regulate and heighten the proportion, as well as to enforce the practice of it.. Inſtead of πλανᾶσθε, ſome would read πλανᾶτε, "Do not act the part of deceivers; it is in vain: God is not mocked." See Conſtantine's Lexicon, and Bowyer's Conjectures.

Ver. 10. Unto them who are of the houſhold of faith] "To them who are united to us in the bonds of Chriſtian faith and love; and who, on that account, as belonging to one family, and heirs of the ſame hope, have certainly the firſt claim to our regard and aſſiſtance." See Doddridge.

Ver. 11. Ye ſee how large a letter, &c.] Theſe words have been taken in a different ſenſe by interpreters both ancient and modern. The Vulgate has it, with what letters; Caſtalio, with how many letters; Eraſmus, how large a letter; and Beza, how long a letter; who likewiſe obſerves, that ſome interpreters refer this expreſſion to the ſublimity of the Apoſtle's ſentiments, as Hilary; others to the ſize of the letters, which were large, as Jerome; others to the deformity of the characters, as if St. Paul could not write the Greek characters well, as Theophylact and St. Chryſoſtom have both aſſerted. Thus Phavorinus informs us that the Greek word which we have rendered large, denotes the ſize and deformity of the characters; and paraphraſes the Apoſtle's words to this effect: "You ſee in what large and ſhapeleſs characters I have written unto you with mine own hand; as if he had ſaid, not knowing how to write well or fairly." Dr. Whitby remarks, "That St. Paul elſewhere uſes the word ἐπιστολαὶ ſeventeen times, but never γράμματα in ſpeaking of his own Epiſtles. And this inaccuracy in forming Greek characters, may, as he thinks, be the moſt probable account why all his other Epiſtles were written by another hand; though out of his great concern for the Galatians at that time, he choſe to write to them himſelf."—It is plain, however, that the ſacred writers uſe the word γράμματα in the plural number, not only to expreſs the characters of a writing, but likewiſe the writing itſelf. In St. Luke, the ſuperſcription upon our Saviour's croſs is ſaid to have been written γράμμασι,—in letters; where it denotes the different characters. But in John v. 47. it ſignifies a written account, as diſtinguiſhed from a verbal or real relation and diſcourſe. In the Acts it is uſed for a letter or Epiſtle; and St. Paul applies this word to the whole body of the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament, 2 Tim. iii. 15. Wherefore, thoſe who interpret this paſſage by a metonymy, and take the original word to denote the writing and not the characters, may be juſtified from other inſtances in the New Teſtament, where that word is ſo uſed. Nor is there any impropriety in calling this Epiſtle a large or a long letter, as in order of time it was written next to thoſe of the Theſſalonians, and is longer than either of them. But if the Greek word be taken in the literal ſenſe, as deſigned to ſignify the characters, why muſt the words rendered a large letter, ſtand for deformed and ill-ſhapen letters? Is it not as reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that large and plain letters might be intended, in order to prevent any ambiguity or miſunderſtanding in a letter of that importance? And might not the Apoſtle rather chooſe the word γράμματα than ἐπιστολὴ in this place, to intimate as much, and conciliate a greater regard to what he had himſelf written with ſo much care and attention. But which ſoever of theſe ſenſes may be thought the moſt probable, there is certainly no room from this paſſage to admit of the notion that St. Paul not only could not write Greek, but did not underſtand it; and conſequently, that he had not the gift of tongues, and was not inſpired: For it is evident from this Epiſtle, that he could write it in ſuch characters as were at leaſt intelligible, and therefore it is abſurd to ſuppoſe that he did not underſtand it. Beſides, as he was born at Tarſus, a Greek colony, that may be ſaid to have been in a manner his native language. It is true indeed, at the ſame time that he mentions Tarſus as his birth-place, he ſays likewiſe, that he was brought up at Jeruſalem, at the feet of Gamaliel; but that muſt have been when he was paſt his childhood. Strabo, ſpeaking of Tarſus in his time, ſays, "The inhabitants are ſo addicted to the ſtudy of philoſophy, and the whole circle of the ſciences, that they excel even Athens and Alexandria, and many other places that have been famous for the ſchools of philoſophers and polite literature." Now Strabo muſt have been living when St. Paul was born; ſo that if the ſtudy of philoſophy and the liberal arts was then ſo cultivated at Tarſus, the Greek language muſt have been ſpoken there with a good degree of purity at that time; and therefore to ſuppoſe that St. Paul, even without inſpiration or the gift of tongues, could have been unacquainted with it, muſt be a groundleſs imagination, as it ſeems equally groundleſs to ſuppoſe that he could not write the characters of a language he was ſo well acquainted with. St. Paul mentions his writing with his own hand, as an argument of his great regard for the Galatians. And as it was not uſual for him to write his Epiſtles with his own hand, excepting the concluſion, or ſome important ſentence, he might very well ſay, that, in compariſon with his uſual cuſtom, he had written a very large letter, and might urge the largeneſs of the letter as a proof of his ſincere regard for their intereſt. See Ward's Diſſert. li. and Locke.

Ver. 12. Only leſt they ſhould ſuffer perſecution] This ſeems to open the main ſecret ſpring of that zeal for the Jewiſh ceremonies in ſome who profeſſed themſelves Chriſtians, which occaſioned ſo much uneaſineſs in the apoſtolic churches. The perſecuting edicts of the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, whoſe influence extended to remote ſynagogues, had induced many, who ſecretly believed in Chriſt, to decline an open acknowledgment of him: (John ix. 22. xii. 42. xix. 38.) But afterwards, when a ſcheme aroſe for blending Judaiſm with Chriſtianity, it may be ſuppoſed that this would blunt the edge of perſecution, eſpecially with reſpect to thoſe who urged the Gentile converts to conform to the Jewiſh rites.. St. Jerome obſerves, that Tiberius and Caius Cæſar made laws to authorize the Jews who were diſperſed throughout the Roman empire, to follow the rites of their religion, and the ceremonies tranſmitted from their fathers. Circumciſed Chriſtians were therefore, by the pagans, looked upon as Jews; while thoſe who made profeſſion of the Goſpel, and were not circumciſed, were violently perſecuted both by pagans and Jews. Nay, the Jews even took the pains to ſend perſons into all countries, to accuſe the Chriſtians of atheiſm and other crimes, to make them as odious as they could, and ſubject them to the cognizance and puniſhment of the civil magiſtrate. To avoid all theſe inconveniences, ſome puſillanimous Chriſtians conformed to the Jewiſh ceremonies; and though they did not chooſe to renounce Chriſtianity, yet they were to all outward appearance the profeſſors of a religion which Chriſtianity was to aboliſh, and with which it was incompatible. See Tillotſon's works, vol. ii. p. 367. Jortin's Diſcourſes, p. 35. and Saurin's Sermons, tom. xi. p. 49, &c.

Ver. 13. That they may glory in your fleſh] "May glory in this mark of circumciſion fixed in your fleſh, and boaſt of the many converts to Judaiſm which they have had the intereſt and addreſs to make." See on ver. 4.

Ver. 15. But a new creature] Καινὴ κτίσις, a new creation;—which ſtrongly expreſſes the greatneſs of the change made in men by Chriſtianity, thoroughly entertained. Tillotſon.

Ver. 16. And as many as walk, &c.] St. Paul having aſſerted, in the foregoing verſe, that it is the new creation alone which puts men into the kingdom of Chriſt, and into the poſſeſſion of the privileges thereof, this verſe may be underſtood alſo as aſſertory,—peace ſhall be on them, rather than as a prayer, unleſs there were a verb which expreſſed this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Iſrael of God.

17 From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jeſus.

18 Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with your ſpirit. Amen.

Unto the Galatians, written from Rome.

Ver. 16. Rom. ii. 29. iv. 12. Ch. iii. 9, 29. Phil. iii. 3.—V. 17. 2 Cor. iv. 10.

preſſed it;—eſpecially conſidering that he writes this Epiſtle to encourage them to refuſe circumciſion.—To which end, the aſſuring them that thoſe who do ſo ſhall have peace and mercy from God, is of more force than to tell them, he prays that they may have peace and mercy. And for the ſame reaſon I underſtand the Iſrael of God to be the ſame with thoſe who walk by this rule, though joined with them by the copulative και, and; which is no very unuſual way of ſpeaking. Locke.

Ver. 17. I bear in my body] Achbp. Potter thinks, that the Apoſtle here alludes to the ϛιγματα, or brands, with which the Greeks uſed to mark thoſe who were appointed to ſerve in the wars, leſt they ſhould attempt to make their eſcape. Others ſuppoſe, that the reference may be to thoſe marks by which the votaries of particular deities were diſtinguiſhed. Mr. Blackwall conſiders it as an alluſion to an Egyptian cuſtom; according to which, any man's ſervant, who fled to the temple of Hercules, and had the ſacred brands or marks of that deity impreſſed upon him, was ſuppoſed to be under his immediate care and protection, and by that to be privileged from all violence and harſh treatment. In this view St. Paul's words are to be underſtood thus: "Let no man, who profeſſes veneration and faith in our common Saviour, give me, his fellow-ſervant, any diſturbance or vexation, in the courſe of my miniſtry, and diſcharge of my duty, ſince I bear in my body his ſacred marks:—The bruiſes and impreſſions of violence and cruelty, which I have received in his glorious ſervice, will be upon me till I go down to the grave; therefore I eſteem myſelf as ſacred, and devoted to my divine Maſter; and may as juſtly claim the civility and charity of all the worſhippers and lovers of the Lord Jeſus in ſincerity, as I firmly hope and depend on the gracious acceptance and protection of our great Lord himſelf." The Ethiopic verſion turns ϛιγματα by dolorem, the pains of Chriſt; the marks of thoſe ſtripes and wounds received for the ſake of the Goſpel. See Potter's Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 7. Doddridge's "Sermons to young Perſons," Numb. 4. at the beginning; Blackwall's Sacred Claſſics, vol. ii. p. 55. and Herodot. lib. ii. p. 129.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VI.

The exhortations here urged by the Apoſtle cannot be expreſſed in more lively terms, and it is ſcarcely poſſible to preſent them in clearer and plainer language. The great difficulty here, and in other ſuch inſtances is, to bring our hearts to ſubmit to what our underſtandings muſt ſo readily apprehend and approve. Let us earneſtly pray, that God would diffuſe more of his Spirit on all profeſſing Chriſtians; that beholding each other with undiſſembled and fervent love, every one may affectionately endeavour to advance the happineſs of all: And inſtead of ſeverely cenſuring one another, let us endeavour for mutual reformation, by ſuch exhortations and advices as different circumſtances may require; doing all in the Spirit of Chriſtian meekneſs, and in an humble ſenſe of our own infirmities. ver. 1, 2.

There is as certain a connection between our conduct here and our ſtate hereafter, as there is between the kind of grain ſown, and the harveſt to be reaped from it. The generality, alas! are ſowing to the fleſh, and the harveſt to ſuch will be ſhame and corruption: Let us then, for our parts, ſow to the Spirit, liberally and largely, and have our fruit unto holineſs, that ſo we may at length inherit everlaſting life; and whenever we may be ready to faint under our toil, let us encourage ourſelves and each other with the bleſſed proſpect of that day, when, though the ſeed-time may be attended with tears, we ſhall come again rejoicing, and bring with us rich ſheaves of honour and of joy. Pſ. cxxvi. 5, 6. It is in due ſeaſon; it is at the time which God hath wiſely appointed, that we ſhall receive this reward of grace; let us then wait for it, as we well may, with patience and humility. ver. 7—9.

The day is coming, when every one ſhall bear his own burden, and each of us ſhall anſwer for himſelf;—that awful day, when every one ſhall reap the fruit of his own way, and receive according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. 2 Cor. v. 10. Be it our care, therefore, not to deceive ourſelves with a vain imagination, that we are ſomething, when we are nothing; and not be ſo ſatisfied to reſt in the good opinion which others have of us, as to have our rejoicing in them. Whatſoever duty may be required of us, let us not amuſe ourſelves with trifling excuſes, which never can deceive that God who is not to be mocked; but earneſtly ſet ourſelves continually to cultivate true inward religion, even that of the heart, in the ſight of Him who ſearcheth it: ſo will the teſtimony of our conſcience be a ſource of joy, and we ſhall find that joy ſolid and permanent. ver. 3—7.

Nor, if God bleſs the miniſters of his Goſpel, as the inſtruments of bringing this joy to the ſoul, will it fail being attended with that readineſs which the Apoſtle requires, to communicate to them in all good things; ver. 6. While, if they underſtand their character and office, there will be in them that moderation and deſire on the one hand, and that zeal and love for ſouls on the other, which will render it a thouſand times more pleaſant to communicate ſpirituals, than to receive temporals,, even from thoſe who give with the moſt willing mind, and ſo double the gift, whether it be greater or leſs.

What meanneſs is there in thoſe views and objects, in which the generality of mankind are ſo apt to glory! How little ſatisfaction can there be in making proſelytes to a party, and ſpreading forms and notions, when compared with the joy of promoting true religion in the hearts of men, and thereby advancing the glory of God, and the ſalvation of immortal ſouls! And of what little ſervice will it be to make a fair appearance, and to be zealous for the externals of religion, ſo as to gain the applauſe of men, and to have many followers, if at the ſame time we have ſo little veneration for the croſs of Chriſt as to be afraid or aſhamed of owning the neceſſity of relying on his righteouſneſs alone for juſtification, leſt we ſhould ſuffer perſecution upon that account, or be expoſed to the reproaches of the world about us! ver. 12, 13.

May divine grace teach us to eſteem the croſs of Chriſt more highly, and to glory in nothing but our knowledge of it, and our hopes and expectations from it! May we all feel its vital efficacy, to crucify us to the world, and the world to us; that we may look upon the world but as a thing dead and worthleſs, which neither can afford us any advantage, nor yield any pleaſure to engage our hearts to chooſe it for our portion: ver. 14. Thus, being crucified and dead to all things in it, may we be ſo intirely weaned from all affection thereto, as to make it no more our principal deſign and ſtudy to purſue it: but, being indifferent both to its ſmiles and frowns, may we be neither moved by any proſpect of ſelf-intereſt on the one hand, nor terrified by the fear of perſecution on the other!

Nor let us lay the ſtreſs of our religion on the name we bear, or ground the hope of our acceptance on being of this or that denomination of Chriſtians. Let it rather be our chief concern to experience a thorough change of heart and life, and to obtain that renovation of ſoul, that new creation, without which, neither circumciſion nor uncircumciſion can avail any thing, and with which the one as well as the other will be accepted of God. ver. 15.

It is the written word of God which is the rule we are to go by, both in the doctrines and the precepts of it: Let us be careful to walk according to it, and regulate our principles and conduct by its ſacred inſtitutes; then will God acknowledge us as his true Iſrael, and mercy and peace ſhall crown our Chriſtian warfare. ver. 16. And ſurely, how diligently ſoever we obſerve this rule, how exactly ſoever we conform to its direction, how much ſoever we may ſuffer for our adherence to it, yet ſtill we depend upon mercy for the communication of peace, and muſt aſcribe all our hopes of happineſs to pardoning clemency and free grace. May that grace ever be with our ſpirit, to ſanctify, to quicken, and to chear us; and may we always be ready to maintain the honour of that, which is indeed our very life! Amen.

EPHESIANS.

CHAP. I.

After the ſalutation, and thankſgiving for the Epheſians, he treateth of our election, and adoption by grace, which is the true and proper fountain of man's ſalvation. And becauſe the height of this myſtery cannot eaſily be attained unto, he prayeth that they may come to the full knowledge and poſſeſſion thereof in Chriſt.

PAUL, an apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, by the will of God, to the ſaints which are at Epheſus, and to the faithful in Chriſt Jeſus:

2 Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

3 Bleſſed be the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who hath bleſſed us with all ſpiritual bleſſings in heavenly places in Chriſt:

Ver. 1. 2 Cor. i. 1. Rom. i. 7. 2 Cor. i. 3. 1 Cor. iv. 17. Ch. vi. 21. Col. i. 2.—V. 2. Gal. i. 3.—V. 3. 2 Cor. i. 3. 1 Pet. i. 3. Or, things, ch. vi. 12.

EPHESIANS.] In the note on Acts xix. 1. we have ſpoke at large concerning Epheſus. St. Paul paſſed through it in the year 54, but without making any ſtay: The following year he returned thither again, and ſtayed three years. During his abode there, he compleated a very flouriſhing church of Chriſtians; the firſt foundations of which had been laid by ſome inferior teachers. As Epheſus was frequented by perſons of diſtinction from all parts of Aſia Minor, St. Paul took the opportunity of preaching in the adjacent countries; and the other churches of Aſia were conſidered as the daughters of the church of Epheſus: So that an Epiſtle to the Epheſians was in effect an Epiſtle to the other churches of Aſia at the ſame time. St. Paul was carried priſoner to Rome, for the firſt time, in the year 61; and during his confinement there, which was not very cloſe, he wrote the Epiſtles to Philemon, the Coloſſians, the Epheſians, and Philippians: Hence all theſe Epiſtles bear a great reſemblance in their ſtile and manner. Of theſe four Dr. Lardner thinks the Epiſtle to the Epheſians was the firſt written by the Apoſtle, in the ſpring A. D. 61, as ſoon as conveniently could be after his friends at Rome had taken a lodging for him, and he was ſettled in it. This Epiſtle was intended to eſtabliſh the Epheſians in the faith; and for that purpoſe, to give them more exalted views of the love of God, and of the excellency and dignity of Jeſus Chriſt; to ſhew them, that they were ſaved by grace; and that the Gentiles, however wretched they had been once, now enjoyed equal privileges with the Jews; to encourage them by declaring, with what ſteadineſs the Apoſtle himſelf ſuffered for the truth, and with what earneſtneſs he prayed for their eſtabliſhment and perſeverance in it: And finally, to engage them to the practice of thoſe duties, which became them as Chriſtians. The city of Epheſus was diſtinguiſhed by peculiar vices and ſins, which are alluded to in this Epiſtle, and in thoſe to Timothy. Firſt, it was the genuine ſeat of the idolatrous worſhip of Diana, who was called Σωτεῖρα, or, "The Saviour-Goddeſs;" in oppoſition to which St. Paul calls the true Deity Σωτὴρ, or, "the Saviour-God," in his firſt Epiſtle to Timothy, ch. i. 1. ii. 3. Secondly, the Epheſians were remarkable for the practice of ſuperſtitious acts, Acts xviii. 18, 19. Thirdly, they were vain in their dreſs; 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. Fourthly, they were remarkable for lewdneſs and drunkenneſs, and gloried in obſcenity of language: Epheſ. v. Michaelis thinks the Chriſtians of Epheſus were alſo tainted with the errors of the Eſſenes; an account of which the reader will find in the introduction of the firſt Epiſtle to Timothy. If it be remembered that the moſt flouriſhing ſects of philoſophers were ſettled in this place, and in its neighbourhood; that Pythagoras was here; that Samos, where he was born, was an iſland of Ionia; and that the followers of Parmenides, Zeno, and Democritus, were to be found there, even in the time of Chryſoſtom; it is not to be doubted that the Apoſtle would make uſe of extraordinary caution in writing; and it is evident that this Epiſtle is full of the ſublimeſt doctrines, and written in a ſtile equal to the nobleneſs of his ſentiments, and the learning of thoſe to whom it was addreſſed. Though this, perhaps, at firſt ſight may render his meaning a little obſcure, yet by the aſſiſtance of the two following Epiſtles,—which were both written while he was in the ſame circumſtances, upon the ſame occaſion, and to the ſame purpoſe;—the ſenſe and doctrine of the Apoſtle here may be ſo clearly ſeen, and ſo perfectly comprehended, that there can be hardly any doubt left about it, to any one who will examine them diligently, and carefully compare them together. See Locke, Lardner, Doddridge, and Michaelis.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. To the faithful in Chriſt Jeſus] Thoſe who believe in Him as the only Saviour. See on 1 Cor. i. 2. Coloſſ. i. 2. and comp. Coloſſ. ii. 16, 20.

Ver. 3.] The two firſt verſes contain St. Paul's inſcription, or introduction to his Epiſtle; and from hence to ver. 14. he proceeds to thank God for his grace and bounty to the Gentiles; wherein he ſo ſets forth both God's gracious purpoſe of bringing the Gentiles into his kingdom under the Meſſiah, and his actual beſtowing on them bleſſings of all kinds in Jeſus Chriſt, for their compleat reinſtation in that his heavenly kingdom, that there could be nothing ſtronger ſuggeſted to make the Epheſians, and other Gentile converts, give up all thoughts of the law; and that much inferior kingdom of his, eſtabliſhed upon the Moſaic inſtitution, and adapted to a little canton of the earth, and a ſmall tribe of men, as now neceſſary to be retained under this more ſpiritual inſtitution, and celeſtial kingdom elected under Jeſus Chriſt;—a kingdom intended to comprehend men of all nations, and to extend itſelf to the utmoſt bounds of the earth, for the greater honour of God; or, as St. Paul ſpeaks, to the praiſe of his glory. Locke.

Bleſſed be the God, &c.] The ſentence before us runs through twelve verſes; a length of period remarkable even in St. Paul's writings, which are frequently obſcure on that account. Under the words us and we, in this period, the Apoſtle doubtleſs includes the Epheſians to whom he wrote,—the greateſt part of whom were Gentile converts,—as ſharing with him and the Jewiſh Chriſtians in their Evangelical privileges; and by thus beginning his Epiſtle with aſcribing thanks to God for his mercies to them, he at once declares his firm perſuaſion of the calling of the Gentiles, and his hearty joy for it. We have often obſerved, that it is frequent with this Apoſtle to make uſe of the ſame words in the ſame ſentence, in a different ſenſe from that in which they occurred before. Thus the word bleſs, in the beginning of this verſe, ſignifies to praiſe; and in the next ſentence, to do good, or, "to confer a bleſſing upon:" And for this reaſon,—that both of them are the effects of a benevolent mind. All ſpiritual bleſſings principally refer, not to extraordinary

4 According as he hath choſen us in him, before the foundation of the world, that we ſhould be holy, and without blame before him in love:

5 Having predeſtinated us unto the adoption of children by Jeſus Chriſt to himſelf, according to the good pleaſure of his will,

6 To the praiſe of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved:

7 In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveneſs of ſins, according to the riches of his grace;

8 Wherein he hath abounded toward us, in all wiſdom and prudence;

9 Having made known unto us the myſtery of his will, according to his good pleaſure, which he hath purpoſed in himſelf:

10 That in the diſpenſation of the fulneſs of times, he might gather together in one all things in Chriſt, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him:

11 In whom alſo we have obtained an inheritance, being predeſtinated according to the purpoſe of him who worketh all things after the counſel of his own will:

12 That we ſhould be to the praiſe of his glory, who firſt truſted in Chriſt.

and miraculous gifts, but to the ſanctifying and ſaving graces of the Spirit; ſuch as juſtification by grace,—the adoption of children,—the illumination of the Spirit,—and all the graces of the Chriſtian life: Theſe are bleſſings in the heavenlies, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, or in heavenly things, as it ſhould be rendered, rather than places; as they are things which have a manifeſt relation to heaven, and a tendency to fit us for it. See Doddridge, Whitby, and Locke.

Ver. 4. In him] That is, in Chriſt. See the preceding verſe, which, together with this, makes up the following ſenſe: "As it was in conſideration of Chriſt alone, that God heretofore, before the foundation of the world, deſigned us Gentiles to be his people; ſo now that the Meſſiah is come, all the bleſſings and benefits we are to receive in his heavenly kingdom, are laid up in him, and to be had only by our faith and dependance on him, without any reſpect to the law, or any other conſideration." The Apoſtle cannot be underſtood to intimate here, that every one of the perſons who belonged to the church of the Epheſians, or elſewhere to other Chriſtian ſocieties, in the bonds of external communion, was by a particular decree of God, perſonally choſen to eternal life; for he could have no evidence that this was the caſe with regard to each, without ſuch a revelation as none we believe ever pretended to, and as would very ill agree with other paſſages relating to the apoſtaſy of ſome, who once made a very forward profeſſion; and with the many exhortations and cautions which every where occur in his writings; or with the declarations which Chriſt had made concerning the final ruin which would in fact attend many who called themſelves Chriſtians, and ſome who bore the higheſt offices in the church, and wrought the moſt extraordinary works. See Matth. vii. 22, 23. Luke xiii. 26, 27. We conclude, therefore, that he ſpeaks of whole ſocieties in general, as conſiſting of ſaints and believers, becauſe this was the predominant character; and he had reaſon, in the judgement of charity, to believe that the greater part were ſuch. See Philip. i. 7. Nor did he always judge it neceſſary to make exceptions, in reference to a few hypocrites who crept in among them. In this view he ſays of them in general, that whether they were Jews or Gentiles, they were indiſcriminately choſen, not only to thoſe preſent privileges which they all, as profeſſing Chriſtians, enjoyed, but to real holineſs, and everlaſting life. The word rendered foundation, is ſpoken of the foundation of a building, and is here applied to the creation of the world. The Jews date their election from Abraham; but in the divine diſpenſations Chriſt was prior to Abraham; and it is declared in other places of the New Teſtament, as well as this, that even before the creation of Adam, the divine mercy had provided a remedy for his fall. In love, means, "to all the ſaints," as appears from ver. 15.—comp. alſo Coloſſ. i. 4. Love is very often inſiſted on in this Epiſtle; the reaſon of which is, perhaps, to intimate that now, when the partition wall was broken down, (ſee ch. ii. 11, 22.) it was of the higheſt importance to cultivate mutual affection, without any regard to the Jewiſh or Gentile character. See Locke, Doddridge, and Whitby.

Ver. 5. Having predeſtinated us] It was not by the obſervances of the law, but by faith alone in Jeſus Chriſt, that God pre-determined to take the Gentiles into the ſtate of ſonſhip or adoption. This was another particular, for which St. Paul bleſſes God in the name of the Gentiles; the conſideration whereof was fit to raiſe the thoughts of the Epheſians above the law, and keep them in firm adherence to the liberty of the Goſpel. Adoption, or ſonſhip, belonged only to the Jews, before the coming of the Meſſiah; Rom. ix. 4. for after the nations of the earth had revolted from God, their Lord and Maker, and became ſervants and worſhippers of the devil, God abandoned them to the vaſſalage they had choſen, and owned none of them for his but the Iſraelites, whom he had adopted to be his children and people. See Exod. iv. 22. Jer. xxxi. 9. Luke i. 54. Gen. xvii. 7. According to the good pleaſure of his will, is ſpoken here in the ſame ſenſe with what is ſaid Rom. ix. 18, 23, 24. God, under the law, took the nation of Iſrael to be his people, without any merit in them; and ſo it is of his mere good pleaſure, that he even then purpoſed to enlarge his kingdom under the Goſpel, by admitting all, of every nation, to come in and ſubmit themſelves, not to the law of Moſes, but to the rule and dominion of his Son Jeſus Chriſt; and this, as it is ſaid in the next words, For the praiſe of the glory of his grace.

Ver. 6. Wherein he hath made us accepted] Nothing can be imagined of greater force to raiſe the minds of the Epheſians above the Jewiſh ritual, and to keep them ſteady in the freedom of the Goſpel, than what St. Paul ſays here; namely, that God, before the foundation of the world, freely determined within himſelf to admit the Gentiles into his kingdom, for the manifeſtation of his free grace to all the world; and this only for the ſake of his beloved Son Jeſus Chriſt. Therefore, it was to miſtake or pervert the end of the Goſpel, and to debaſe this glorious diſpenſation, to make it ſubſervient to the Jewiſh ritual, or to ſuppoſe that the law of Moſes was to ſupport, or be ſupported by, the kingdom of the Meſſiah; which was to be of larger extent, and ſettled upon another foundation, whereof the Moſaical inſtitution was but a narrow, faint, and typical repreſentation. Locke.

Ver. 8. In all wiſdom and prudence] Having with infinite wiſdom contrived a way to glorify all his attributes in the ſalvation of men,—even thoſe, who ſeemed to have the moſt different claims; diſpenſing mercy in a way of judgement, and awakening an humble awe and reverence in the ſoul, by the very method which is uſed for granting pardon and peace. See Doddridge, Col. i. 9, 10, 28. and ii. 2, 3.

Ver. 9. The myſtery of his will] St. Paul's ſo often terming God's purpoſe of calling the Gentiles a myſtery, and ſo emphatically declaring it to be concealed from ages, and particularly revealed to himſelf, (as we find in this Epiſtle, where it is ſo called five times, and four times in that to the Coloſſians) cannot be by chance, or without ſome particular reaſon. The queſtion was, "Whether the converted Gentiles ſhould hearken to the Jews,—who would perſuade them it was neceſſary for them to ſubmit to circumciſion and the law,—or to St. Paul, who had taught them otherwiſe." Now, there can be nothing of more force to deſtroy the authority of the Jews in this caſe, than the ſhewing that they knew nothing of the matter;—that it was a perfect myſtery to them, concealed from their knowledge, and made manifeſt in God's good time at the coming of the Meſſiah, and particularly diſcovered to St. Paul by immediate revelation;—to be communicated by him to the Gentiles, who therefore had a reaſon to continue ſtedfaſt to this truth, and not to be led away from the Goſpel which he had taught them. See Locke, and ch. iii. 9.

Ver. 10. He might gather together] He would, &c. Wat. Ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι, rendered gather together, properly ſignifies, to recapitulate, recollect, or put together the heads of a diſcourſe, and to unite again under one head. Both angels and men were at firſt in harmonious ſubjection to the Son of God, their common Creator; but man having broken himſelf off from this ſociety, the Son of man, by his humiliation and ſuffering recovers and reunites all who believe in him, and in his human nature preſides over the kingdom to which in the world of glory they and his angels belong. No view can be nobler than that which this interpretation preſents. See ch. iii. 10. Col. i. 16, 20. Philip. ii. 10. Doddridge, and Locke.

Ver. 11. We have obtained an inheritance] Mr. Locke would render ἐκληρώθημεν, are become his inheritance; alluding to Deut. xxxii. 9. and interprets it as referring to the admiſſion of the Gentiles into the church, which is God's heritage. But as we, in this and the next verſe, ſeems oppoſed to you in the 13th, it muſt probably ſignify the Jews, who firſt truſted in Chriſt, or the body of the Chriſtian church, who were incorporated long before the Epheſians were brought into it. The laſt clauſe of this verſe certainly expreſſes God's taking ſuch methods to anſwer his purpoſe, as he knows will in fact be ſucceſsful; but it does not prove any thing like an overbearing impulſe on men's minds, to determine them in ſuch a manner as to deſtroy the natural freedom of their volitions, and ſo to prevent their being juſtly accountable to God for ſuch actions. See Locke, and Doddridge.

13 In whom ye alſo truſted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the goſpel of your ſalvation: in whom alſo, after that ye believed, ye were ſealed with that holy Spirit of promiſe, 14 Which is the earneſt of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchaſed poſſeſſion, unto the praiſe of his glory.

15 Wherefore I alſo, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jeſus, and love unto all the ſaints,

20 Which he wrought in Chriſt when he raiſed him from the dead, and ſet him at his own right hand in the heavenly places,

21 Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name

Ver. 13. Ye were ſealed] In Rev. vii. 3. mention is made of God's ſealing the foreheads of his ſervants, that they might be known to be his; alluding to the cuſtom of marking the foreheads of ſlaves, by which the purchaſers did in a manner take poſſeſſion of them. So St. Paul here ſays, that God ſealed with his Spirit thoſe who believed in him, to mark them for his own. See 2 Tim. ii. 19. and Locke.

Ver. 14. Which is the earneſt, &c.] "In which Holy Spirit you have a certain pledge and token of your being by ſpecial adoption intitled to the future inheritance; to encourage and animate you under all the difficulties of your way, till you receive the complete redemption of the people he hath ſo dearly purchaſed for his poſſeſſion. To them he hath promiſed everlaſting happineſs, and he will certainly beſtow it upon them in the day of his final appearance, which will at length open with a luſtre that ſhall fully repay ſo long an expectation, and abundantly conduce to the praiſe of his glory." What we render till the redemption of the purchaſed poſſeſſion, Dr. Whitby would render, till the redemption of life: (See Rom. viii. 23.) and Beza, nearly to the ſame ſenſe, till the redemption of vindication; that is, "till we are ſet intirely at liberty, and receive complete deliverance and ſalvation." Dr. Waterland reads it, until [the time of] the ſalutary redemption. The interpretation given in the paraphraſe above ſeems the moſt juſtifiable; underſtanding περιποίησις here for "the people whom Chriſt has purchaſed to be his peculiar property;" which is very agreeable to the ſignification of the word elſewhere. Comp. Mal. iii. 17. LXX. Acts xx. 28. 1 Tim. iii. 13. 1 Pet. ii. 9. and ſee Bos, Bengelius, and Calmet.

Ver. 15.] Having in the foregoing verſes thanked God for the great favours and mercies, which from the beginning he had purpoſed for the Gentiles under the Meſſiah, in ſuch a deſcription of that deſign of the Almighty as was fit to raiſe their thoughts above the law; having taken notice of their ſtanding firm in the faith which he had taught them, and thanked God for it;—the Apoſtle here goes on to intreat of God, that he would enlighten the minds of the Epheſian converts, to ſee fully the great things which were actually done for them, and the glorious eſtate they were in under the Goſpel; of which he gives us ſuch a draught from this verſe to ch. ii. 10. as in every part of it ſhews, that in the kingdom of Chriſt they are ſet far above the Moſaical rites, and enjoy the ſpiritual and incomprehenſible benefits of it, not by the tenour of a few outward ceremonies, but by their faith alone in Jeſus Chriſt, to whom they are united, and of whom they are members; who is exalted to the height of all dignity, dominion, and power, and they with him their head. Locke.

After I heard of your faith] Some have argued from hence, that this Epiſtle, if directed to the Epheſians, muſt have been written before St. Paul's long abode at Epheſus; ſince he would not have ſpoken of their faith as only known by report, if he had not for two years and a half been converſant with them, and ſeen the effects of it. To this it has been anſwered by ſome, that ακουω ſignifies not only to hear, but to underſtand, by whatever means the knowledge be attained. And others have ſaid, that this Epiſtle was intended not only for the church of Epheſus, but for other Aſian churches in the neighbourhood. But perhaps the eaſieſt and moſt ſolid anſwer is, that as it was now five or ſix years ſince St. Paul quitted Epheſus, he might judge it proper thus to expreſs his complacency on hearing that they continued, in the midſt of ſo many circumſtances of temptation, to behave in a manner ſo worthy what he had perſonally obſerved amongſt them. See the introductory note on ch. i. Col. i. 4. Philip. i. 3, 27. 1 Theſſ. i. 5, 6. iii. 6. Locke, Doddridge, and Calmet. Inſtead of faith, the MS reads faithfulneſs.

Ver. 17. The Father of glory] An Hebrew expreſſion, which cannot well be changed, ſince it ſignifies his being glorious in himſelf,—the fountain from whence all glory is derived,—and to whom all glory is to be given. In all which ſenſes it may be taken here, where there is nothing that appropriates it in particular to any one of them. Wiſdom is evidently uſed in this verſe for "a right conception and underſtanding of the Goſpel." Revelation is uſed by St. Paul, not only for immediate inſpiration, but, as it is meant here, and in moſt other places, for ſuch truths, as could not have been found out by human reaſon, but had their firſt diſcovery from revelation; though men afterwards came to the knowledge of thoſe truths by reading them in the ſacred Scripture, where they are ſet down for their information. Locke.

Ver. 18. The eyes of your underſtanding being enlightened] And would give you to have the eyes of your underſtanding enlightened. Doddridge and Wat. more agreeable to the original.

Ver. 19. To us-ward] Us here, you, ch. ii. 1. and us ch. ii. 5. plainly ſignify the ſame; namely, thoſe who, being dead, partook of the energy of that great power which raiſed Chriſt Jeſus; and all thoſe glorious things, which in ver. 18—23, he intimates to them, by praying that they may ſee them, he here, in this verſe, tells us, are beſtowed on them as believers, and not as obſervers of Moſaical rites. The admirable beauty of this paſſage, and the ſtrong emphaſis and force of the expreſſions in the original, can ſcarcely be paralleled in any author, and are ſuperior to what our language can reach. See on this head Blackwall's Sacred Claſſics. vol. i. p. 235. and Bp. Pearſon on the Creed, p. 519. 4to edition.

Ver. 20. From the dead, and ſet him, &c.] From the dead: And he ſet him, &c. Wat. Inſtead of heavenly places, both here and ver. 3. the margin reads things, which perhaps will be thought better, (as we have there remarked above,) if we compare the 22d verſe. He ſet him at his right hand,—that is, transferred on him his power;—ἐν ἐπουρανίοις, that is, in his heavenly kingdom.—"He ſet him at the head of his heavenly kingdom." See ver. 22. This kingdom is called in the Goſpel indifferently the kingdom of God, and the kingdom of heaven. God had before a kingdom and people in this world; namely, that kingdom which he erected to himſelf, of the Jews, ſelected and brought back to himſelf out of the apoſtatized maſs of revolted and rebellious mankind. With this his people he dwelt; among them he had his habitation, and ruled as their king in a peculiar kingdom: and therefore we ſee, that our Saviour calls the Jews the children of the kingdom, Math. viii. 12. But that kingdom, though God's, was not yet the kingdom of heaven; That came with Chriſt. See Matth. iii. 2. and x. 7. The former was but ἐπίγειος, of the earth, compared to this ἐπουράνιος, heavenly kingdom, which was to be erected under Jeſus Chriſt; and in this kind of diſtinction our Saviour ſeems to uſe the words earthly and heavenly, John iii. 12. where, in his diſcourſe with Nicodemus, he tells him, Unleſs a man were born again, he could not ſee the kingdom of God. This being born again not being underſtood by Nicodemus, Our Lord remonſtrates with him, as being a teacher in Iſrael, yet not underſtanding that which belonged to the Jewiſh conſtitution; wherein to be baptized for admittance into that kingdom was called and counted to be born again; and therefore, ſays he, "If having ſpoken to you τὰ ἐπίγεια,—things relating to your own earthly conſtitution,—you comprehend me not, how ſhall you receive what I ſay, if I ſpeak to you τὰ ἐπουράνια, heavenly things; that is, purely heavenly:" And according to this, St. Paul's words here and in ver. 10. (which are in heaven, and which are on earth; which occur again ch. iii. 15. Col. i. 16, 20.) may perhaps not unfitly be interpreted of the ſpiritual heavenly kingdom of God, and of the earthly one of the Jews; whoſe rites and poſitive inſtitutions St. Paul calls elements of the world, Gal. iv. 3. Col. ii. 8, 9. Kingdoms, which were both, at the coming of the Meſſiah, conſolidated into one, and together re-eſtabliſhed under one head, Chriſt Jeſus: For the whole drift of this and the two following chapters is, to declare the union of Jews and Gentiles into one body, under Chriſt, the head of the heavenly kingdom. He that compares ch. ii. 16. with Col. i. 20. in both which places it is evident the Apoſtle ſpeaks of the ſame thing, (namely, God's reconciling both Jews and Gentiles by the croſs of Chriſt,) will be led to think, that things in heaven, and things on earth, ſignify the people of the one and the other of theſe kingdoms. Locke.

Ver. 21. All principality, &c.] Theſe abſtract names are frequently uſed in the New Teſtament, according to the ſtile of the eaſtern languages, that is named, not only in this world, but alſo in that which is to come:

22 And hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church,

23 Which is his body, the fulneſs of him that filleth all in all.

CHAP. II.

By comparing what we were by nature with what we are by grace, he declareth that we are made for good works; and being brought near by Chriſt, ſhould not live as Gentiles and foreigners in time paſt, but as citizens with the ſaints, and the family of God.

AND you hath he quickened, who were dead in treſpaſſes and ſins;

2 Wherein in time paſt ye walked, according to the courſe of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the ſpirit that now worketh in the children of diſobedience:

3 Among whom alſo we all had our converſation in times paſt, in the luſts of our fleſh, fulfilling the deſires of the fleſh, and of the mind; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others.

4 But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, languages, for "thoſe veſted with power and dominion, &c. and that not only here in earth amongſt men, but in heaven amongſt ſuperior beings;" and ſo are often taken to expreſs ranks and degrees of angels. Though they are generally agreed to do ſo here, yet there is no reaſon to exclude earthly potentates out of this text, when πάντα, all, neceſſarily includes them; for that men in authority are one ſort of principalities and powers in a Scripture ſenſe, our Saviour's own words ſhew, Luke xii. 11. xx. 2. Beſides, the Apoſtle's chief aim here being to ſatisfy the Epheſians that they were not to be ſubjected to the law of Moſes, and the government of thoſe who ruled by it, but were called to be of the kingdom of the Meſſiah; it is not to be ſoppoſed that here, where he ſpeaks of Chriſt's exaltation to a power and dominion paramount to all other, he ſhould not have an eye to that earthly and inferior government of the Jews, to which it was beneath the ſubjects of ſo glorious a kingdom as that of Chriſt to ſubmit themſelves: And this is further enforced by the next verſe. Locke.

Ver. 23. Fulneſs] Fulneſs is here taken in a paſſive ſenſe, for "a thing to be filled or compleated;" as appears by the following words, —of him that filleth all in all. That is, "It is Chriſt the head, who perfecteth the church, by ſupplying and furniſhing all things to all the members, to make them what they are and ought to be in that body." See ch. v. 18. Col. ii 10. iii. 10, 11. Bp. Sherlocke obſerves upon this paſſage, from ver. 17. "What can be added to this deſcription of power and authority? And yet the Apoſtle, you obſerve, founds all this upon Chriſt's reſurrection, and his exaltation conſequent to it. Then were all things put under his feet, then was he given to be head over the church, and ſet above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named. The Scripture abounds in evidence of this kind; and I think there is nothing plainer in the Goſpel than that Chriſt Jeſus is our Lord, becauſe he hath redeemed us; that he is our King, being raiſed by the Father to all power and authority; and that he is our Mediator and Interceſſor, being ſet down on the right-hand of God in the heavenly places." See his Diſcourſes, vol. iv. p. 62.

Chap. II. Ver. 1. And] This particle gives us the thread of St. Paul's diſcourſe, which is impoſſible to be underſtood without ſeeing the train of it: Without that view it would be like a rope of gold duſt; all the parts would be excellent and of value, but would ſeem heaped together without order or connection. This and here, it is true, ties the parts together, and points out the connection and coherence of St. Paul's diſcourſe; but yet it ſtands ſo far from the verb ſet, in ver. 20 of the foregoing chapter, and quickened in ver. 5. of this, which are the two verbs it couples together, that it would ſcarce be obſerved or admitted by one unacquainted with St. Paul's ſtile; and therefore it may not be amiſs to lay it in its due light before the reader. In ver. 18, 20. the Apoſtle prays, that the Epheſians may be ſo enlightened, as to ſee the great advantages they received by the Goſpel: Thoſe which he ſpecifies are, 1. What great hopes it gave them. 2. What an exceeding glory accompanied the inheritance of the ſaints. 3. The mighty power exerted by God on their behalf, which bore ſome proportion to that which he employed in the raiſing Chriſt from the dead, and placing him at his right-hand: Upon the mention of which, his mind being full of that glorious image, he lets his pen run into a deſcription of the exaltation of Chriſt, which laſts to the end of the chapter, and then reſumes the thread of his diſcourſe, which runs briefly thus: "I pray God that the eyes of your underſtanding may be enlightened, that you may ſee the exceeding great power of God, which is employed upon us who believe; correſponding [κατὰ τὴν] to that energy wherewith he raiſed Chriſt from the dead, and ſeated him at his right-hand; for ſo likewiſe has he raiſed you, who were dead in treſpaſſes and ſins: Us, I ſay, who were dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, hath he quickened and raiſed together with Chriſt, and ſeated together with him in his heavenly kingdom." This is the train and connection of his diſcourſe from ch. i. 18 to ch. ii. 5. though it be interrupted by many incident thoughts, which, after his uſual manner, he enlarges upon by the way, and then returns to the main ſubject: For here again we muſt obſerve, that having, in the verſe before us, mentioned their being dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, he proceeds to enlarge upon that forlorn eſtate of the Gentiles before their converſion; and then comes to what he deſigned, namely, that God, out of his great goodneſs, quickened, raiſed, and placed them together with Chriſt in his heavenly kingdom:—In all which it is plain, he had more regard to the things he declared to them, than to a nice grammatical conſtruction of his words. Locke.

Ver. 2. Wherein in time paſt ye walked] The Epheſians were remarkable, in the midſt of all their learning, for a moſt abandoned character. They baniſhed Hermodorus merely for his virtue; thereby in effect making a law, that every modeſt and temperate man ſhould leave them. The word αἰών, rendered world, may be obſerved in the New Teſtament to ſignify the laſting ſtate and conſtitution of things in the great tribes or collections of men, conſidered in reference to the kingdom of God; whereof there were two moſt eminent, and principally intended by the word αἰῶνες, when that is uſed alone; and that is ὁ νῦν αἰών, this preſent world, which is taken for that ſtate of the world wherein the children of Iſrael were God's people, and made up his kingdom upon earth; the Gentiles, i. e. all the other nations of the world, being in a ſtate of apoſtaſy and revolt from him, the profeſſed vaſſals and ſubjects of the devil, to whom they paid homage; and αἰὼν μελλῶν, the world to come,—i. e. the time of the Goſpel, wherein God, by Chriſt, broke down the partition-wall between Jew and Gentile, and opened a way for reconciling the reſt of mankind, and taking the Gentiles again into his kingdom under Jeſus Chriſt, under whoſe rule he had put it. The phraſe, prince of the power of the air, refers to a Jewiſh notion, that the air was inhabited by evil ſpirits, and intimates, that Satan was inveſted with great power; and conſequently that our Saviour's virtue, which was able to ſtruggle with and conquer him, both in the wilderneſs, and in the garden of Gethſemane, was inconceivably great, and remarkably illuſtrious. The original, which we render now worketh in the children of diſobedience, is very ſtrong and emphatical,—both in the denomination it gives to the heathen, as children of rebellion and obſtinacy, who would yield to no perſuaſion which would urge them to a better courſe of life (as the etymology of ἀπειθεία imports;) and in the forcible manner in which it expreſſes the influence of Satan over them,—as if they were inſpired and poſſeſſed by him; for it is well known the word ἐνεργȣ́μενοι among the ancients ſignified the ſame with demoniacs. It might be rendered here, Even that ſpirit who now operates powerfully in the children of diſobedience. See Locke, Sharpe, Mede, Doddridge, and Goodwin's Works, vol. i. p. 7.

Ver. 3. Among whom alſo we, &c.] The Apoſtle changing the expreſſion from ye to we, ſeems plainly to declare, that he meant to include himſelf and all other Chriſtians in what he here ſays. See Rom. iii. 9. Inſtead of the deſires of the fleſh and of the mind, ſome render the Greek, the dictates of the fleſh, and of the paſſions; obſerving that the word θελήματα here made uſe of, expreſſes a kind of dictatorial power, and the plural διανοιῶν, which we render mind, as it cannot here ſignify its intellectual powers, muſt denote the various paſſions, according to the prevalence of which our minds take as it were different colours and forms, and become ſtrangely different from themſelves. Some think, that the meaning of the phraſe, by nature children, &c. is only that they were ſo truly and indeed. But though Dr. Taylor has taken great pains to eſtabliſh this interpretation, it appears much more reaſonable, upon the whole, to underſtand the words of the original apoſtaſy and corruption, in conſequence of which men do, according to the courſe of nature, fall early into perſonal guilt, and ſo become obnoxious to the divine diſpleaſure: And we may venture to affirm, that the word φύσει, by nature, ſignifies a natural diſpoſition, and not merely an acquired habit. See Locke, Doddridge, Whitby, Limborch's Theology, lib. iii. cap. 4. and Taylor's "Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin," part ii. p. 114.

Ver. 4. But God] This connects the preſent verſe admirably well with that immediately preceding, and makes the parts of that incident diſcourſe cohere; which ending in this verſe, St. Paul, in the beginning of verſe 5, takes up the thread of his general diſcourſe again, as if nothing had come between. See on ver. 1. and Locke.

5 Even when we were dead in ſins, hath quickened us together with Chriſt, (by grace ye are ſaved;)

6 And hath raiſed us up together, and made us ſit together in heavenly places in Chriſt Jeſus:

7 That in the ages to come he might ſhew the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindneſs towards us, through Chriſt Jeſus.

8 For by grace are ye ſaved, through faith; and that not of yourſelves: it is the gift of God:

9 Not of works, leſt any man ſhould boaſt.

Ver. 5. Rom. v. 6, 8, 10. Rom. vi. 4, 5. Col. ii. 12, 13. iii. 1, 3. Or, by whoſe grace: See Acts xv. 11. Tit. iii. 5.—V. 8.

xi. 6. 1 Cor. i. 30, 31. 2 Tim. i. 9. Tit. iii. 5.

Ver. 5. Even when we were dead, &c.] "So under the power and dominion of ſin, ſo helpleſs in that ſtate, into which for our apoſtaſy we were delivered up by the juſt judgement of God, that we had no more thought, nor hope, nor ability to get out of it, than men dead and buried have to get out of the grave: (See Coloſſ. ii. 13.) But God quickened us;"—that is, by the Spirit given to thoſe who by faith in Chriſt were united to him, became his members, and Sons of God, partaking of the adoption. By which Spirit they were put into a ſtate of life, (ſee Rom. viii. 9—15.) and made capable, if they would, to live to God, and not to obey ſin in the luſts thereof, nor to yield their members inſtruments of ſin unto iniquity; but to give up themſelves to God, as men alive from the dead. See Rom. vi. 11—13. Locke, and concerning the laſt clauſe of this verſe, the Reflections.

Ver. 6. And hath raiſed us up, &c.] What the Apoſtle here ſays does not merely ſignify our being raiſed to the hope of pardon and glory by the reſurrection and aſcenſion of Chriſt, but ſeems to refer to that union which there is between him and all true believers; by virtue of which they may look on his reſurrection, aſcenſion, and glory, as a pledge and ſecurity of ſomething of a ſimilar nature, to be accompliſhed in due time in and upon them. Thus we are taught to conſider Chriſt as a public perſon, the elder brother of the family, and the guardian of the younger branches of it, who may, by a very eaſy and beautiful figure, be ſaid to have received their inheritance in him. It is juſtly obſerved by Mr. Locke, that ch. i. 20. and ii. 5, 6. anſwer to each other; but the Apoſtle's mind being filled with theſe grand ideas, and tranſported with love to Chriſt, he lets his pen run looſe to enlarge upon them, though with ſome interruption to the natural conſtruction. See Rom. vi. 1—10. Doddridge, and Locke.

Ver. 8. Ye are ſaved through faith] He that reads St. Paul with attention, cannot but obſerve, that, ſpeaking of the Gentiles, he calls their being brought back again from their apoſtaſy into the kingdom of God, their being ſaved. Before they were thus brought to be the people of God again under the Meſſiah, they were, as they are here deſcribed, aliens,—enemies,—without hope,—without God, —dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; and therefore, when by faith in Chriſt they came to be reconciled, and to be in covenant again with God, and his ſubjects, and liege people, they were in the way of ſalvation; and if they perſevered, could not miſs of attaining it, though they were not yet in actual poſſeſſion. The Apoſtle, whoſe aim it is in this Epiſtle, to give them an high ſenſe of God's extraordinary grace and favour to them, and to raiſe their thoughts above the mean obſervances of the law, ſhews them that there was nothing in them, no deeds or works of theirs, nothing they could do, to prepare and recommend themſelves, which contributed aught to the bringing them into the kingdom of God under the Goſpel; that it was all purely the work of Grace, for they were all dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, and could not make one ſtep, or the leaſt motion towards it. Faith, which alone gained them admittance, and alone opened the kingdom of heaven to believers, was the ſole gift of God. Men, by their natural faculties, could not attain to it: It is faith which is the ſource and beginning of this new life; and the Gentile world, who were without ſenſe, without hope of any ſuch thing, could no more help themſelves, or do any thing to procure it, than a dead man can do any thing to procure himſelf life. It is God here who does all.—By a revelation of that, which they could never diſcover by their own natural faculties, he beſtows on them the knowledge of the Meſſiah, and the faith of the Goſpel; which, as ſoon as they have received, they are in the kingdom of God, in a new ſtate of life; and being thus quickened by the Spirit, may, as men alive, work if they will. Hence St. Paul ſays, Rom. x. 17. that faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God; having in the foregoing verſes declared, that there is no believing without hearing, and no hearing without a preacher, and no preacher unleſs he be ſent; that is, the good tidings of ſalvation by the Meſſiah, and the doctrine of faith, was not, could not be known to any, but thoſe to whom God communicated it by the preaching of his prophets and Apoſtles, to whom he revealed it, and whom he ſent on his errand with this diſcovery. And thus God now gave faith to the Epheſians, and the other Gentiles, to whom he ſent St. Paul, and others his fellow-labourers, to beſtow on them the knowledge of ſalvation, reconciliation, and reſtoration to his kingdom of the Meſſiah: all which, though revealed by the Spirit of God in the writings of the Old Teſtament, yet the Gentile world was kept wholly ſtrangers from the knowledge of it, by the ceremonial law of Moſes, which was the wall of partition that kept the Gentiles at a diſtance, aliens, and enemies: This wall God, according to his gracious purpoſe before the erecting it, having now broken down, communicated to them the doctrine of faith, and admitted them upon their acceptance of it, to all the advantages and privileges of this kingdom: all which was done of his free grace, without any merit or procurement of theirs;—He was found of them who ſought him not, and was made manifeſted to them that aſked not after him. He that would clearly underſtand this ſecond chapter of the Epheſians, ſhould read carefully with it Rom. x. and 1 Cor. ii. 9—16. where he will ſee, that faith is wholly owing to the revelation of the Spirit of God, and the communication of that revelation by men ſent by God, who attained this knowledge, not by the aſſiſtance of their own natural parts, but from the intimation of the Spirit of God. Thus faith, we ſee, is the gift of God; and with it, when men by baptiſm are admitted into the kingdom of God, comes the Spirit of God, which brings life with it: For the attaining this gift of faith, men do, and can do nothing; grace hitherto does all, and works are wholly excluded. God himſelf creates them unto good works; but when by him they are made living creatures, in this new creation, it is then expected that, being quickened, they ſhould act; and from hence forward works are required, not as the meritorious cauſe of ſalvation, but as a neceſſary indiſpenſable qualification of the ſubjects of God's kingdom under his Son Jeſus Chriſt; it being impoſſible that any one ſhould at the ſame time be a rebel, and a good ſubject too. And though none can be ſubjects of the kingdom of God but thoſe who, continuing in the faith which has once been beſtowed on them, ſincerely endeavour to conform themſelves to the laws of their Lord and Maſter Jeſus Chriſt; and though God gives eternal life to all thoſe, and to thoſe only who do ſo, yet eternal life is the gift of God, the gift of free grace; ſince their works of ſincere obedience afford no manner of title to it, their righteouſneſs is imperfect; that is, they are all unrighteous, and ſo deſerve death; but God gives them life upon the account of his righteouſneſs, (ſee Rom. i. 17.) the righteouſneſs of faith which is by Jeſus Chriſt, and ſo they are ſtill ſaved by grace.

Now, that when God hath, by calling them into the kingdom of his Son, thus quickened men, and they are by his free grace created in Chriſt Jeſus unto good works,—that then works are required of them, is evident from hence, that they are called upon and preſſed (1 Theſſ. ii. 12.) to walk worthy of God, who hath called them to his kingdom and glory. And to the ſame purpoſe, ch. iv. 1. Philip. i. 17. Col. i. 10—12. So that of thoſe who are in the kingdom of God, who are actually under the covenant of grace, good works are ſtrictly required, under penalty of the loſs of eternal life. See Rom. vi. 11, 13. viii. 13. Indeed this is the tenor of the whole New Teſtament; the apoſtate heathen world were dead, and were of themſelves in that ſtate not capable of doing any thing to procure their tranſlation into the kingdom of God; that was purely the work of grace: but, when they received the Goſpel, they were then made alive by faith, and by the Spirit of God; then they were in a ſtate of life, and working and works were expected of them. Thus grace and works are conſiſtent without any difficulty; and that which hath cauſed the perplexity and ſeeming contradiction, has been mens miſtake concerning the kingdom of God. God, in the fulneſs of time, ſet up his kingdom in this world under his Son, into which he admitted all thoſe who believed on him, and received Jeſus the Meſſiah for their Lord. Thus by faith in Jeſus Chriſt men became the people of God, and ſubjects of his kingdom; and being by baptiſm admitted into it, were from henceforth, during their continuance in the faith, and profeſſion of the Goſpel, accounted ſaints,—the beloved of God,—the faithful in Chriſt Jeſus,—the people of God,—ſaved, &c.—for in theſe terms and the like the Sacred Scripture ſpeaks of them. And indeed, thoſe who were thus tranſlated into the kingdom of the Son of God, were no longer in the dead ſtate of the Gentiles; but having paſſed from death to life, were in the ſtate of the living, in the way to eternal life, which they were ſure to attain, if they perſevered in that life which the Goſpel required, viz. faith and ſincere obedience. But yet this was not an actual poſſeſſion of eternal life in the kingdom of God in the world to come; for by apoſtaſy or diſobedience, this, though ſometimes called ſalvation, might be forfeited and loſt; whereas he that is once poſſeſſed of the other, hath actually an eternal inheritance in the heavens, which fadeth not away. Theſe two conſiderations of the kingdom of heaven ſome men have confounded, and made one; ſo that a man being brought into the firſt of theſe wholly by grace without works, (faith being all that was required to inſtate a man in it) they have concluded, that for the attaining eternal life, or the kingdom of God in the world to come, faith alone, and not good works are required,—contrary to the expreſs words of Scripture, and the whole tenor of the Goſpel: But yet, not being admitted into that ſtate of life eternal for our good works, it is by grace here too that we are ſaved, our righteouſneſs after all being imperfect, and we by our ſins liable to condemnation and death. It is by grace that we are made partakers of both theſe kingdoms; it is only into the kingdom of God in this world, that we are admitted by faith alone without works; but for our admittance into the other, both faith and obedience are requiſite, in a ſincere endeavour to perform all thoſe duties,—all thoſe good works which are incumbent upon us, and come in our way to be performed, from the time of our believing until the hour of death. See Locke and the Reflections.

Ver. 9. Leſt any man] That no one. Wat.

10 For we are his workmanſhip, created in Chriſt Jeſus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we ſhould walk in them.

11 Wherefore remember, that ye being in time paſſed Gentiles in the fleſh, who are called Uncircumciſion by that which is called the Circumciſion in the fleſh made by hands;

12 That at that time ye were without Chriſt, being aliens from the commonwealth of Iſrael, and ſtrangers from the covenants of promiſe; having no hope, and without God in the world:

13 But now in Chriſt Jeſus, ye, who ſometimes were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Chriſt.

14 For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us;

15 Having aboliſhed in his fleſh the enmity, even the law of commandments, contained in ordinances, for to make in himſelf, of twain, one new man, ſo making peace;

16 And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the croſs, having ſlain the enmity thereby:

17 And came and preached peace to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh.

Ver. 10. We are his workmanſhip] "In this new ſtate in the kingdom of God, we are, and ought to look upon ourſelves, not as deriving any thing from ourſelves, but as the mere workmanſhip of God, created in Chriſt Jeſus, to the end we ſhould do good works, for which he hath prepared and fitted us to live in them. It is not by any works of the law, nor in conſideration of our ſubmitting to the Moſaical inſtitution, or having any alliance with the Jewiſh nation, that we Gentiles, more eſpecially, are brought into the kingdom of Chriſt: We are in this entirely the workmanſhip of God; we are as it were created therein, framed and fitted by him to the performance of thoſe good works in which we were thenceforth to live; and ſo owe nothing of this our new being, in this new ſtate, to any preparation or fitting we received from the Jewiſh church, or any relation we ſtood in thereunto." That this is the meaning of the new creation under the Goſpel is evident from St. Paul's own explanation of it, 2 Cor. v. 16—18. The latter part of the verſe before us is conformable to what he ſays, ver. 5, 6. that thoſe who were dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, God quickened with Chriſt; they being by faith united to him, and partaking of the ſame ſpirit of life, which raiſed him from the dead; whereby, as men brought to life, they were enabled, if they would not reſiſt or quench that Spirit, to live unto God in righteouſneſs and holineſs, as before they were under the abſolute dominion of Satan and their luſts. Locke.

Ver. 11.] From the foregoing doctrine, that God of his free grace, according to his purpoſe from the beginning, had quickened and raiſed the convert Gentiles together with Chriſt, and ſeated them with him in his heavenly kingdom, St. Paul draws this inference to keep them from Judaizing, That though they, as was the ſtate of the heathen world, were heretofore, by being uncircumciſed, ſhut out from the kingdom of God, ſtrangers to the covenants of promiſe, without hope, and without God in the world, yet they were by Chriſt,—who had taken away the ceremonial law, that wall of partition, which kept them in that ſtate of diſtance and oppoſition,—now admitted to be the people of God, without being ſubjected to the law of Moſes; and were with the Jews now created into one new man, or body of men; ſo that they were no longer to look on themſelves as aliens, or as more remote from the kingdom of God than the Jews themſelves: ver. 11—22. The terms circumciſion and uncircumciſion, in the abſtract, are put for perſons circumciſed or uncircumciſed, as in Rom. ii. 26. iii. 30. and iv. 9. See Locke. Dr. Waterland reads the verſe thus: In time paſt Gentiles (who are called uncircumciſion in the fleſh, by that, &c.

Ver. 12. That—ye were without Chriſt] "Without any knowledge of the Meſſiah, or any expectation of deliverance or ſalvation by him." Though the covenant, for ſubſtance, was one and the ſame, the Apoſtle ſpeaks of it in the plural number, covenants, as it was delivered at ſeveral times, with various explications and enlargements, to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, and afterwards to the whole body of the Iſraelites: And as the promiſes it contained centered in the great promiſe of the Meſſiah, and of ſalvation by him, St. Paul therefore ſpeaks of them in the ſingular number, as but one promiſe; which is agreeable to the Scripture ſtyle in other places. Some propoſe to render this paſſage, Strangers from the covenants,—having no hope of the promiſe. The Gentiles were without God in the world, as they neither knew nor ſerved the true God. It is in this ſenſe that they are here called Ἄθεοι, for there were few of them Atheiſts in our ſenſe of the word; i. e. deniers of a ſuperior power, and many of them acknowledged one ſupreme eternal God; but, as St. Paul ſays, Rom. i. 21. Even when they knew God, they glorified him not as God: They owned not him alone; but turned from the inviſible God to the worſhip of images, and the falſe gods of their countries. It has been obſerved upon the clauſe of this verſe, having no hope, that though a general knowledge and uncertain idea of a future ſtate prevailed amongſt the heathens, yet it is certain that they reaſoned very weakly upon the ſubject; that they had no well-grounded hope of future happineſs, and that they were but very little impreſſed with it: So that they had no deity to which they prayed for eternal life, as the fathers often remonſtrate; and by far the greater part of their moſt learned philoſophers either expreſly denied, in private lectures to their pupils, the doctrine of future rewards and puniſhments, or taught principles quite inconſiſtent with it. See Locke, Whitby, Leland's Neceſſity of Revelation, vol. i. and Div. Leg. vol. ii.

Ver. 13. Are made nigh by the blood of Chriſt] There ſeems to be an evident alluſion here to the privilege of thoſe Iſraelites, who were not under any ceremonial pollution, or who were cleanſed from their guilt by the blood of atonement; and ſo had free liberty of entering the temple, and converſing with God: Upon which account they are called, "A people near unto him;" Pſ. cxlviii. 14. comp. Exod. xix. 4, 6. Lev. x. 3. Pſ. lxv. 4. and ſee Col. ii. 14.

Ver. 14. He is our peace] Mr. Locke would have this to be the ſame with your peace, and to be meant of the Gentile converts, of whom the Apoſtle had been ſpeaking juſt before; but it is evident the reconciliation, as well as the enmity was mutual; and the Jews were at leaſt as ſtrongly prejudiced againſt the Gentiles, as the Gentiles againſt the Jews. The Apoſtle therefore, with conſummate propriety, makes uſe of terms which were intended to include all true believers, whether originally belonging to the one or the other. The middle wall of partition, or ſeparation, is mentioned in reference to that wall in the temple which was called the Chel, and ſeparated the court of the Gentiles from that into which the Jews only were allowed to enter, and of which we have the moſt authentic account in Joſephus. See Jewiſh War, b. v. ch. 5. ſect. 2. and Acts xxi. 28.

Ver. 15. Having aboliſhed—the enmity] It was the ritual law of the Jews, which kept them and the Gentiles at an irreconcileable diſtance, ſo that they could come to no terms of a fair correſpondence: the force whereof was ſo great, that even after Chriſt was come, and had put an end to the obligation of that law, yet it was almoſt impoſſible to bring them together; and this was that which in the beginning moſt obſtructed the progreſs of the Goſpel, and diſturbed the Gentile converts. The Apoſtle ſays, that Chriſt aboliſhed that part of the law which conſiſted in poſitive commands and ordinances, that ſo he might make or frame the two, namely, Jews and Gentiles, into one new ſociety or body of God's people, in a new conſtitution under himſelf,—ſo making peace between them. This appearing to be the Apoſtle's meaning, it may not be amiſs to look into the reaſon why he expreſſes it in this more figurative manner, To make in himſelf, of twain, one new man; which being more ſuitable to the ideas he had, was in fewer words more lively and expreſs to his purpoſe. He always has Jeſus Chriſt in his mind, as the head of the church, which was his body; from and by whom alone, by being united to him, the whole body, and every member of it received life, vigour, and ſtrength, and all the benefits of that ſtate: which admirably well ſhews, that whoever were united to this head, muſt needs be united to each other; and alſo that all the privileges and advantages they enjoyed were wholly owing to their union with, and adherence to him, their head; which were the two things that he was here inculcating on the convert Gentiles of Epheſus, to ſhew them that now, under the Goſpel, men became the people of God, merely by faith in Jeſus Chriſt, and having him for their head, and not at all by keeping the ritual law of Moſes, which Chriſt had aboliſhed, and ſo had made away for the Jews and Gentiles to become one in him; ſince now faith in him alone united them into one body under that head, without the obſervance of the law; which is the meaning of ſo making peace. This note may lead ordinary readers into an underſtanding of St. Paul's ſtile, and, by making them obſerve the reaſon, give them an eaſier entrance into the meaning of his figurative expreſſions. See Locke.

Ver. 17. To you who were afar off, &c.] To thoſe that were afar off, and to thoſe, &c. that is, Gentiles and Jews. See Junius in Wetſtein.

Ver. 18. We both have acceſs by one Spirit] The word προσαγωγὴ, which we render acceſs, properly refers to the cuſtom of introducing perſons into the preſence of ſome prince, or of any other greatly their ſuperior; in which caſe it is neceſſary they ſhould be uſhered in by one appointed for that purpoſe, to preſerve a becoming decorum. See the Reflections.

Ver. 19. Strangers and foreigners] If there be any diſtinction between theſe two words, ξένοι and πάροικοι, the latter ſignifies ſomething more than the former, and ſeems plainly to allude to the caſe of ſojourning ſtrangers among the Jews, who were not incorporated by complete proſelytiſm into the body of the Jewiſh people, and made, as ſuch proſelytes were, fellow-citizens, with equal privileges: and perhaps, when οἰκεῖοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, domeſtics of God, is added, it may have ſome relation to that peculiar nearneſs to God, in which the Jewiſh prieſts ſtood, and refer to that great intimacy of unreſtrained converſe with God, to which we, as Chriſtians, are admitted. In which reſpect our privileges ſeem to reſemble not only thoſe of the people praying in the common court of Iſrael, but alſo of the prieſts, worſhipping in the houſe itſelf: Nay, it is elſewhere added, by a figure which ſeems beautifully to riſe even on this, that we have confidence to enter into the holieſt of all, by the blood of Jeſus; Heb. x. 19. See Doddridge, Poole, and Calmet.

Ver. 20. And are built upon the foundation, &c.] It is obſerved by Lord Shafteſbury, "that the Apoſtle accommodates himſelf to the taſte of the Epheſians, who were extremely fond of architecture,—by frequent alluſions to building, and to the majeſty, order, and beauty, of which their temple conſecrated to Diana was ſo celebrated a maſterpiece. See ch. iii. 17, 18. and iv. 16, 29.

Ver. 22. In whom ye alſo are builded together] I take the ſenſe of this allegory to be as follows, ſays Mr. Locke. It is plain from the atteſtation of the Apoſtles and prophets, that the Gentiles who believe in Chriſt are thereby made members of his kingdom, united together under him their head into ſuch a well-framed body, wherein each perſon has his proper place, rank, and function, to which he is fitted, that God will accept and delight in them as his people; and live amongſt them as in a well-framed building dedicated to him, whereof the Gentiles make a part; and without any difference put between them, are framed in equality, and promiſcuouſly with believing Jews by the Spirit of God, to be one people, amongſt whom he will dwell, and be their God.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. VIII. AND XVIII.

St. Paul, in the beginning of this chapter, is ſpeaking of the condition in which the Epheſians were before their converſion from a ſtate of heatheniſm to the belief of the Goſpel, and magnifying God's mercy and the exceeding riches of his grace towards them, from the firſt to the eighth verſe; in which he goes on to make them ſenſible of their obligations to God, who had thus quickened them who were dead in ſins: For by grace are ye ſaved; that is, "For it is very fit you ſhould know and conſider, that it is by the mere grace, or favour, or mercy of God (as the word ſignifies) that ye are ſaved through faith; that ye are put into a method and ſtate of ſafety and ſalvation, by means of your receiving the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt. It is his own act, his mere mercy, that you have terms of acceptance offered you, upon your believing in Chriſt. The being ſaved, I ſay, in this method is by the grace or mercy of God; not of yourſelves, that is, by no contrivance or appointment of your own;—not owing to yourſelves; but it is the gift, the free contrivance, and offer of God to you, that ye ſhould be put into this happy ſtate by the Goſpel." This is the meaning of the expreſſion,—and that not of yourſelves; not, (as it may ſound in our tranſlation) "and that faith, or believing is not of yourſelves, but intirely the gift of God;" (for the word that, in the Greek, is of the neuter gender, and ſo cannot eaſily be ſuppoſed to relate to the word faith going before:) But, "that or this whole matter,—this your being ſaved by faith, this being called into a ſtate of ſalvation by the Goſpel, is not of yourſelves, but the gift, the favour, the offer of God, previous to all deſign and thought of your own." Then follow thoſe words, ver. 9. Not of works, leſt any man ſhould boaſt: That is, "And as the propoſal of this gracious method of ſalvation was not owing to yourſelves and your contrivance, ſo neither was ſuch a favour merited at the hands of God by any paſt perfection, by any good behaviour of your own preceding it: For, as I have told you already, ver. 1 and 5, you were dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, when ye were called to the knowledge of this merciful diſpenſation. And this I add, Leſt any of you ſhould boaſt, as if you had deſerved at the hands of Almighty God, by your paſt behaviour, ſo merciful a diſpenſation, ſo gracious a propoſal as is made to you in the Goſpel." And then he goes on to aſſure them farther, that their happy condition is owing intirely to God, who had, without any contrivance or deſert of theirs, ſo ordered affairs by his good providence, that they were now believers in Jeſus Chriſt, and had the offers of ſalvation upon the terms of the Goſpel brought home to them.

This therefore is the manifeſt deſign of the Apoſtle in the text;—To raiſe the gratitude of the Epheſians to Almighty God, and to inſpire them with all poſſible regard to him, by putting them in mind, that they were formerly in an helpleſs and miſerable condition,—dead in ſins, void of the true life of reaſonable creatures; that they had no thought themſelves of ſuch ſalvation as had been offered them by the Chriſtian religion; that they had no merit to engage the Almighty to make them ſuch an offer, and preach to them ſuch a ſtate of reconciliation and ſalvation; that it was of his grace, or favour, that they were ſaved from their former evil condition of ſin and ignorance, by believing and receiving the Goſpel; for which they were obliged therefore to magnify the exceeding riches of God's mercy towards them in Chriſt, and not to attribute any thing to themſelves, who were before this void of every thing that could be pleaſing to Almighty God, or influence him to ſhew them ſo great and remarkable a kindneſs. "It is by grace that ye are delivered from your former miſerable condition; it is an act of grace that ye are ſaved by faith, or put into a ſtate of ſalvation by believing the Goſpel; and this being ſaved by this method, and by means of this believing, is not of yourſelves, but wholly owing to the good-will of God, whoſe free offer and gift it is."

Having thus guarded againſt any erroneous or pernicious ſenſe, in which Chriſtians may be led to underſtand the paſſage in queſtion, it may not be improper to conſider briefly in what ſenſe it is that Chriſtians can be ſaid to be ſaved by faith, or by believing in Jeſus Chriſt.

And 1ſt, It may well be ſaid of them, becauſe it is their faith or believing which ſaves them from the guilt of all their ſins committed before this faith; a privilege which peculiarly belonged to the firſt Chriſtians, converted at years of diſcretion from a life of ſin and impurity: And therefore this firſt juſtification is often inculcated by St. Paul in his Epiſtles, and attributed to faith. This particular, however, doth not concern thoſe who have been educated and inſtructed in the knowledge of the Chriſtian religion: The guilty ſinner in thoſe days knew not whither to fly from the guilt of his ſins, till his belief intitled him to this favour; which God annexed to it, and which the Apoſtles continually promiſed.

2dly, We may well be ſaid to be ſaved through faith, becauſe it is by believing in Chriſt, that we come to know and embrace thoſe terms which are offered by God for our ſalvation and happineſs. He came to ſave us, and by cloſing in with his propoſals we muſt be ſaved: And this we cannot do, without believing him to be ſent of God, and receiving him as ſuch. This, therefore, being abſolutely neceſſary, we may well find ſalvation attributed to this, which is the firſt moving principle towards it; and without which we ſhould not go one ſtep forward in that way to ſalvation, which he came to point out to us. He is the way, and the truth, and the life; and without knowing him and believing in him, how ſhould we know the way, or the path to that eternal life, which he came to unfold to us; who otherwiſe muſt have wandered every one after the peculiar imagination and humour of our own hearts?—As ſalvation, therefore, comes in the method propoſed by Chriſt, ſo may it well be attributed to the believing in him, becauſe that alone can put us into the method propoſed by him.

3dly, Chriſtians are ſaved by faith, becauſe it is the foundation of their obedience, and of all their good actions. It is the tree which bears that good fruit; without which there could be no ſalvation: and conſequently, what is ſo neceſſary, and ſo uſeful to the production of good works, is itſelf intitled to thoſe rewards and happy conſequences which follow them.

In theſe ſenſes, therefore, and on theſe accounts, amongſt others, great things might well be ſaid of faith in the New Teſtament, and ſalvation attributed to it; but the great point in which we are concerned, is, not to be deceived in a matter of ſuch importance; and to that end, not to interpret any one expreſſion of the New Teſtament ſo, as to contradict its plaineſt and moſt repeated declarations.

Let the concluſion, therefore, of this firſt head of our Reflexions be to this effect:—"Faith is an act of the mind, moſt acceptable to God; faith in his Son ſaves us, as it puts us in the ſecure way to ſalvation, if we be ſincere, and as it is the foundation of all our Chriſtian graces, and of all our beſt, and moſt godlike behaviour. This faith alone,—that is, the method propoſed in the Goſpel, without the works of the ceremonial law of Moſes, is ſufficient to ſecure to us our future happineſs: But faith alone,—that is, a belief in Chriſt, without obedience to his laws; an empty unfruitful faith, accompanied with an impenitent life, will condemn us at laſt. We

CHAP. III.

The hidden myſtery, that the Gentiles ſhould be ſaved, was made known to Paul by revelation: and to him was that grace given, that he ſhould preach it: he deſireth them not to faint for his tribulation, and prayeth that they may perceive the great love of Chriſt toward them.

FOR this cauſe, I Paul, the priſoner of Jeſus Chriſt for you Gentiles;

2 If ye have heard of the diſpenſation of the grace of God, which is given me to you-ward:

3 How that by revelation he made known unto me the myſtery (as I wrote afore in few words,

4 Whereby when ye read ye may underſtand my knowledge in the myſtery of Chriſt,)

5 Which in other ages was not made known unto the ſons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apoſtles and prophets by the Spirit;

6 That the Gentiles ſhould be fellow-heirs, and of the ſame body, and partakers of his promiſe in Chriſt, by the Goſpel:

Ver. 1. Ch. iv. 1. Phil. i. 7, 13, 14, 16. Col. iv. 3. Col. i. 24. 2 Tim. ii. 10.—V. 2. 1 Cor. iv. 1. Ch. iv. 7. Acts ix. 15. xiii. 2. Gal. i. 16.—V. 3. Acts xxii. 17, 21. Gal. i. 12. Rom. xvi. 25. are ſaved through faith, or by believing in Chriſt, no otherwiſe than by being influenced by it; For faith is required in order to practice. Faith is indiſpenſably neceſſary in order to ſalvation; and ſo likewiſe is a good life indiſpenſably neceſſary, in order to ſalvation: or, in other words, a faith working by love, and manifeſting itſelf by good works, is that alone which will be of any account to us at the laſt; for as the body without the ſpirit is dead, ſo faith without works is dead alſo."

The words in verſe 18. rightly underſtood, will give us a diſtinct conception of the nature of the Chriſtian religion, as it ſtands diſtinguiſhed from all others, whether natural, or pretending to revelation. All religions pretend to give acceſs to God, by inſtructing men in what manner to approach him by prayer and ſupplication; how to pleaſe him, and obtain his favour and protection, by ſuch works as each religion accounts to be holy and acceptable to God; and how to reconcile ourſelves to him, after having offended him by our tranſgreſſions, through ſorrow and repentance, and ſuch other means as have been deviſed and inſtituted as effectual to this end. But the acceſs to God which the Goſpel opens to us, is to be had only under the guidance and direction of his Holy Spirit, and in the name, and through the mediation of God's own Son. This acceſs is the only one which the Chriſtian religion knows any thing of; for we cannot come to God, but by his Holy Spirit, and through his Son, and this is what no other religion does, or can pretend to.

To give us a diſtinct conception of theſe words, and of the different offices of the Son and the Spirit, we muſt conceive the Spirit of God as always preſent with us, the Son as always in the preſence of the Father. The Spirit dwells with the faithful to guide and direct them, to ſecond and encourage all their good deſires, to help them in overcoming their infirmities: in a word, to labour together with them in the works of their ſalvation, to make their calling and election ſure. The Son of God is at the right-hand of the Majeſty on high; there he is our advocate; he intercedes for us; he receives and offers up our prayers; he obtains for us the remiſſion of our ſins, in virtue of the one oblation which he once made of himſelf upon the croſs, the memorial of which is ever in the ſight of God.

This will teach us what it is to have acceſs by the Spirit through Chriſt; for the Spirit abideth with us, he is at our right-hand, and by his happy influence it is that we draw near to Chriſt, and by him approach to the Father. The Son is our High-prieſt, cloathed with majeſty and power, and ſeated at the right-hand of God, able to ſave all who will come to him; through whoſe powerful and always prevailing interceſſion, the way is opened to pardon and reconciliation. The Spirit is our Comforter, given us to dwell and abide with us, to be a new principle of life within us, to quicken our mortal bodies, that, dying to ſin, we may live unto God through holineſs. To draw men to God is the work of the Spirit, who therefore reſides and dwells with men; to reconcile God to man is the work of our high-prieſt, who lives in the glory of God, making continual interceſſion for us.

And now, conſider the calamitous condition of mankind under what view you pleaſe, you will always find a proper remedy provided by the mercy of God. If you reflect upon the holineſs of God, and his hatred of ſin, and begin to fear that he can never be reconciled to ſinners; Take courage; the work is difficult,—but the Son of God has undertaken it; and how great ſoever the diſtance between God and you is, yet through the Son you may have acceſs unto him. If ſtill you fear, that all may again be loſt, through your own weakneſs and inability to do good; Even here help is at hand; the Spirit of God is your ſupport, he is the pledge and earneſt of your redemption. See Hoadly's Diſc. ii. ſerm. ix. and Sherlock's Diſc. vol. ii. p. 22.

Chap. III. Ver. 1.] This chapter gives a great light to thoſe foregoing, and more clearly opens the deſign of this Epiſtle: for St. Paul here in plain words tells them, that he was by particular favour and appointment ordained a preacher of the doctrine, which was a myſtery till now, being hid from former ages; namely, that the Gentiles ſhould be coheirs with the believing Jews, and making one body or people with them, ſhould be equally partakers of the promiſes under the Meſſiah. Whereupon he exhorts them not to be diſmayed, or to depart in the leaſt from the belief or profeſſion of this truth, upon his being perſecuted and in bonds on that account; for his ſuffering for it, who was the preacher and propagator of it, was ſo far from being a juſt diſcouragement to them from ſtanding firmly in the belief of it, that it ought to be to them a glory, and a confirmation of this eminent truth of the Goſpel which he peculiarly taught: And thereupon he tells them, he makes it his prayer to God that they may be ſtrengthened herein, and be able to comprehend the extent of the love of God in Chriſt; not confined to the Jewiſh nation and conſtitution, as the Jews imagined, but far ſurpaſſing the thoughts of thoſe, who, preſuming on their own knowledge, would confine it to ſuch only as were members of the Jewiſh church, and obſervers of their ceremonies. Locke. We have here again a remarkable inſtance of a length of ſentence: for what begins this chapter is reſumed again, ver. 14. and not ended till the cloſe of chap. iv. 3. To prevent this length of ſentence, Dr. Waterland would read this verſe, I Paul, am a priſoner, &c.

Ver. 2. If ye have heard] Since, or foraſmuch as ye have heard. MS, Locke, Doddridge, &c.

Ver. 3. The myſtery (as I wrote before, &c.] Though St. Peter was by a viſion from God ſent to Cornelius a Gentile, Acts x. yet we do not find that this purpoſe of God's calling the Gentiles to be his people equally with the Jews, without any regard to circumciſion, or the Moſaical rites, was revealed to him, or any other of the Apoſtles, as a doctrine which they were to preach and publiſh in the world; neither indeed was it needful that it ſhould be any part of their commiſſion, to mix that in their meſſage to the Jews, which ſhould make them ſtop their ears, and refuſe to hearken to the other parts of the Goſpel, which they were more concerned to know and be inſtructed in. It may be aſked, "To what purpoſe is that contained in the parentheſis in this and the following verſe concerning himſelf?"—And indeed, without having an eye on the deſign of this Epiſtle it is difficult to give an account of it; but that being carried in view, there is nothing plainer nor more pertinent and perſuaſive: For what could be of more force to make them ſtand firm in the doctrine he had taught them, of their being exempt from circumciſion, and the obſervances of the law? "If you have heard,—and I aſſure you in my Epiſtle, that this myſtery of the Goſpel was revealed in a particular manner to me from heaven,—the very reading of this is enough to ſatisfy you, that I am well inſtructed in that truth; and that you may ſafely depend upon what I have taught you concerning this point, notwithſtanding I am in priſon for it; which is a thing wherein you ought to glory, ſince I ſuffer for a truth wherein you are ſo nearly concerned." See ch. vi. 19. and Locke.

Ver. 4. Whereby when ye read] By attending to which. It has been obſerved, that what follows is the higheſt encomium made by the Apoſtle on any of his own writings; and from thence it has been concluded, that this is the richeſt and nobleſt of all the Epiſtles; which it is thought was peculiarly intended to be ſo, to reward the generous zeal of the Epheſians in burning their curious books, by a book of divine knowledge, incomparably more valuable than any or all of them. See Acts xix. 19. Whitby, and Goodwin's Works, vol. i. p. 2.

Ver. 5. Which in other ages was not made known] The following verſe ſo plainly determines this paſſage to the calling of the Gentiles, that there can be no controverſy as to the general ſenſe of it. It was indeed known long before that the Gentiles were to be added to the church; but it was not known that they ſhould be heirs of the ſame inheritance, and partakers of the promiſe of the Spirit. The Jews rather thought of their being ſlaves to them; and leaſt of all did they imagine, that the middle wall of their ceremonies ſhould be broken down, and the Gentiles admitted to the full privileges of God's people, without circumciſion and obedience to the Moſaic law; which the Chriſtian converts among them heard of at firſt with great amazement. See Acts x. 45. xi. 18. Doddridge, and Locke.

Ver. 6. Partakers of his promiſe] Namely, of the Spirit. Comp. Gal. iii. 14. Διὰ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, rendered by the Goſpel, ſignifies in the time of the Goſpel. See Rom. iv. 11. vii. 5.

7 Whereof I was made a miniſter, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me, by the effectual working of his power.

8 Unto me, who am leſs than the leaſt of all ſaints, is this grace given, that I ſhould preach among the Gentiles the unſearchable riches of Chriſt;

9 And to make all men ſee, what is the fellowſhip of the myſtery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jeſus Chriſt:

10 To the intent, that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known, by the church, the manifold wiſdom of God,

11 According to the eternal purpoſe which he purpoſed in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord:

12 In whom we have boldneſs and acceſs with confidence by the faith of him.

13 Wherefore I deſire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory.

14 For this cauſe I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt,

15 Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named,

16 That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be ſtrengthened with might, by his Spirit in the inner man;

17 That Chriſt may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye being rooted and grounded in love,

18 May be able to comprehend with all ſaints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height;

Ver. 7. Whereof I was made a miniſter] Though St. Paul does not in expreſs words deny others to be made miniſters of this doctrine, (for it neither ſuited his modeſty, nor the reſpect he had for the other Apoſtles to do ſo;) yet his expreſſion here will be found ſtrongly to imply it, eſpecially if we read attentively the two following verſes: For this was a neceſſary inſtruction to one who was ſent to convert the Gentiles, though ſuch as were ſent to their brethren the Jews were not appointed to promulgate it. This one Apoſtle of the Gentiles, by the ſucceſs of his preaching to the Gentiles, the atteſtation of miracles, and the gift of the Holy Ghoſt, joined to what St. Peter had done by ſpecial direction, in the caſe of Cornelius, would be enough in due ſeaſon to convince the other Apoſtles of this truth, as we may ſee it did, Acts xv. and Gal. ii. 6—9. And of what conſequence, and how much St. Paul thought the preaching of this doctrine his peculiar buſineſs, may be ſeen by what he ſays, ch. vi. 19, 20. where any one may obſerve by the different treatment which he received from the reſt of the Apoſtles,—being in bonds upon that account, that his preaching herein differed from theirs. See Acts xxi. 17, &c. 1 Tim. ii. 9. It is upon the account of his preaching this doctrine, and diſplaying to the world this concealed truth, which he calls every where a hidden myſtery, that he gives to what he had preached the diſtinguiſhing title of my Goſpel; (Rom. xvi. 25.) in which he is concerned that God ſhould eſtabliſh them. The inſiſting ſo much on this,—that it was the ſpecial favour and commiſſion of God, to him in particular, to preach this doctrine of God's purpoſe of calling the Gentiles to the word,—was not out of vanity or boaſting, but was of great uſe to his preſent purpoſe; as carrying with it a ſtrong reaſon why the Epheſians ſhould rather believe him, to whom, as their Apoſtle, it was made manifeſt, and committed to be preached, than the Jews, from whom it had been concealed, and kept as a myſtery; and was in itſelf inſcrutable by men, though of the beſt natural parts and endowments. See Gal. ii. 8. 1 Cor. xv. 9, 10. and Locke.

Ver. 8. Who am leſs than the leaſt] The Apoſtle here makes a new word, which, as grammarians would ſpeak, is the comparative degree of the ſuperlative,—ἐλαχιστοτέρω, which no tranſlation can fully equal, or very happily expreſs. No doubt he refers to what he had been formerly, when he perſecuted the church of God. The unſearchable riches of Chriſt, means that abundant treaſure of mercy, grace, and favour, laid up in Jeſus Chriſt, not only for the Jews, but for the whole heathen world; which was beyond the reach of human ſagacity to diſcover, and could be known only by revelation. See Locke, Calmet, and Goodwin.

Ver. 9. And to make, &c.] And ſhould make all men ſee what is the diſpenſation, &c. Wat. Some would tranſlate the following clauſe, Which has been hid from the ages; i. e. from the former ages of the world; but as in ver. 11. it is called an eternal purpoſe, and is here ſaid to be hid in God, there does not appear to be any need of varying the tranſlation, where the phraſe is the ſame; though to be ſure this interpretation includes the ſenſe of the other. It is evident that here is an alluſion to the burying a treaſure in ſome ſecret place; (comp. Joſh. vii. 21. and Matth. xiii. 44. where the ſame word is uſed;) as there may alſo be in the word ἀνεξιχνίαστοι, ver. 8. which properly ſignifies, what cannot be traced out; and it is certain, that though ſomething is now known concerning this glorious myſtery, yet there is an incomparably greater part, concerning which we only know in the general, that it is a rich treaſure; without particularly knowing either what, how much, or where it is. Mr. Locke, in an elaborate note, pleads, as Diodati hath done before him, that the latter clauſe of this verſe refers not to the creation of the world, but to the renovation of it; (ſee ch. ii. 10.) and ſo may be conſidered as an intimation, that God always intended Chriſt ſhould have the honour of forming all things anew; and therefore concealed the myſtery in himſelf, till after Chriſt was come. But the words, if taken in the moſt extenſive ſenſe, contain both a certain and a pertinent truth. See Doddridge, Locke, Diodati, and Wolfius.

Ver. 10. The principalities, &c.] The prophecies of the Old Teſtament gave ſtrong intimations, at leaſt, of the intended calling of the Gentiles into the church; and the angels ſeem expreſly to refer to it in what they ſaid to the ſhepherds, and in their anthem at the nativity of Chriſt. Luke ii. 10, 14. We ſuppoſe, therefore, that the Apoſtle here would lead the thoughts of his readers to the ſeries of divine diſpenſations, as gradually opening this great diſcovery, and not merely to what he preached concerning it; though doubtleſs that greatly illuſtrated the ſcheme. Mr. Locke ſeems, rather unnaturally, to explain this clauſe of the Jewiſh principalities and powers. See his note.

Ver. 11. According to the eternal purpoſe] Mr. Locke would render the Greek, According to that pre-diſpoſition of the ages, or ſeveral diſpenſations which he made in Chriſt Jeſus; which, by the pre-ordination of God's purpoſe, were all regulated and conſtituted in him: And Dr. Whitby, taking it in the ſame ſenſe, explains it of Chriſt's being promiſed in the firſt age to Adam, typified in the ſecond to the Jews, and in the laſt age preached to all the world. See their notes.

Ver. 12. In whom we have boldneſs, &c.] "Through whom we have freedom of ſpeech in our approaches to the throne of grace, and have acceſs with confidence of being heard, as being aſſured of audience and acceptance through faith in him." See Doddridge, and Heylin.

Ver. 14. Unto the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt] In the foregoing chapter, ver. 19. St. Paul tells the Epheſians that now they believe in Chriſt, they are no longer ſtrangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the ſaints, and of the houſhold of God: Here he goes on, and tells them they are of the family and lineage of God, being jointly with Jeſus Chriſt, who is already in heaven, the ſons of God. Nothing could be of greater force to continue them ſtedfaſt in the doctrine which he had preached to them, and in which he makes it his whole buſineſs here to confirm them; namely, that they needed not be circumciſed, and ſubmit to the law of Moſes, as they were already, by faith in Chriſt, the ſons of God, and of the ſame family with Chriſt himſelf, who was already, by that title, poſſeſſed of his inheritance in glory. Locke.

Ver. 15. Of whom the whole family] As Chriſt is the laſt perſon mentioned before the words of whom, it ſeems reaſonable to interpret this clauſe as referring to him; though others rather chooſe to underſtand it of the Father, who is the principal ſubject of the foregoing ſentence. The word heaven may be here taken in a great latitude, for all the regions of happineſs in the inviſible world. The Jewiſh writers call heaven the upper, and earth the lower family of God. See L'Enfant, Locke, and Diodati.

Ver. 16. The riches of his glory] His glorious riches: The glorious abundance of graces which he hath to beſtow. Heylin.

Ver. 18. The breadth, and length, and depth, and height] It has often been obſerved that this text is extremely emphatical.—Bodies are well known to have only three dimenſions, length, and breadth, and thickneſs; but the Apoſtle divides this laſt into its depth downwards, and its height upwards, meaſuring from the middle point; and ſo makes uſe of it to expreſs the depth of miſery, from which the love of God delivers us; as well as the height of glory, to which it exalts us. See Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, vol. i. p. 350. and Calmet.

19 And to know the love of Chriſt, which paſſeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulneſs of God.

20 Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we aſk or think, according to the power that worketh in us,

21 Unto him be glory in the church by Chriſt Jeſus, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

CHAP. IV.

He exhorteth to unity; and declareth that God therefore giveth divers gifts unto men, that his church might be edified and grow up in Chriſt: he calleth them from the impurity of the Gentiles, to put on the new man, to caſt off lying, and corrupt communication.

I Therefore, the priſoner of the Lord, beſeech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called,

2 With all lowlineſs and meekneſs, with long-ſuffering, forbearing one another in love;

3 Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

4 There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling;

5 One Lord, one faith, one baptiſm,

6 One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all.

7 But unto every one of us is given grace, according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt.

8 Wherefore he ſaith, When he aſcended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.

10 He that deſcended, is the ſame alſo that aſcended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things.)

Ver. 19. And to know the love of Chriſt] There ſeems to be no reaſon why we ſhould confine the interpretation of this text merely to the love of Chriſt in calling the Gentiles. Well may we recollect on this occaſion, all that love which Chriſt has diſplayed in redeeming his church out of every nation and kingdom under heaven, Gentiles as well as Jews, from final miſery, and exalting it to eternal glory: And this is ſo remarkable and admirable, that the moſt extenſive explication of this text muſt certainly be the moſt proper. Nor can the phraſe of its ſurpaſſing knowledge, merely ſignify its exceeding the Jewiſh diſpenſation, which is ſeldom, if ever, called knowledge; but its exceeding our moſt elevated conceptions. By knowing is meant our experiencing, or knowing experimentally; and to know what paſſeth knowledge, is a figure called catachreſis, which greatly enhances the beauty of the expreſſion. It has been obſerved, that there is in this verſe an alluſion to the temple; expreſſing the Apoſtle's wiſh, that the foundation might be ſo extenſively and deeply laid, that a ſuperſtructure may be raiſed, extending itſelf to ſuch a magnificent length, and breadth, and height, as to be fitted to receive and lodge the ſacred gueſt, that he might dwell, as it were, uncrouded in their hearts; and in this view the train of thought appears truly noble. The phraſe, fulneſs of God, means, "ſuch fulneſs as God is wont to beſtow;" i. e. wherein there is nothing wanting to any one, but every one is filled to the utmoſt of his capacity;—a fulneſs of all thoſe gifts which any one ſhall need, and which may be uſeful to him or the church. See Locke, Doddridge, and Franckii Manuduct. ad Sacr. Scrip. p. 191.

Ver. 21. Throughout all ages, &c.] The original contains one of St. Paul's ſelf-invented, and moſt expreſſive phraſes, which we may defy any verſion fully to expreſs;—through all the ſucceſſions of an endleſs eternity, may come ſomething near it; but even this, emphatical as it may ſeem, falls very ſhort of the ſublimity and ſpirit of the original. See Doddridge, and Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, vol. i. p. 83.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1.] St. Paul having concluded the ſpecial part of his Epiſtle with the foregoing chapter, comes in this, as his manner is, to practical exhortations. He begins with unity, love, and concord; which he preſſes upon them from a conſideration which he makes uſe of in more of his Epiſtles than one; that is, their being all members of one and the ſame body, whereof Chriſt is the head: ver. 1—16. Some have obſerved of this Epiſtle, and of the others which were written by St. Paul in his impriſonment, (namely, thoſe to the Coloſſians and Philippians, to Philemon, and the 2d to Timothy) that they are more eſpecially remarkable for their excellence, and diſcover a peculiar ſavour of the things of God; by which it may be ſeen, that, while his ſufferings did abound, his conſolations alſo did much more abound. It is however manifeſt, that this Epiſtle,—as it ſets forth in the preceding part, the gracious deſign of God in the Goſpel diſpenſation; and repreſents the benefits and privileges which belong to all the faithful in Chriſt Jeſus, as well Gentiles as Jews,—is caſt into a ſtrain of thankſgivings and prayers, and written as it were all in a rapture, in a ſublime and elevated ſtile, flowing from a mind tranſported with the conſideration of the unſearchable wiſdom and goodneſs of God in the work of redemption, and of the amazing love diſplayed in Chriſt towards the Gentile world. The remaining part of it is no leſs admirable, for the engaging manner in which he improves what he had before delivered, urging the duties which became their character with the greateſt tenderneſs, in expreſſions full of love and endearment; adding the ſtrongeſt arguments to enforce them, and making mention of his bonds to recommend the exhortations which he offered to them. The priſoner of the Lord ſignifies for the ſake, or on account of the Lord. See Locke, Doddridge, and Grotius.

Ver. 2. With long-ſuffering] As there is no copulative between meekneſs and long-ſuffering, it ſeems moſt natural to connect the latter with the following clauſe, with long-ſuffering forbearing one another in love. And if the exhortation be thus rendered, it will prevent the ſoleciſm, which would ariſe from connecting the word forbearing (ἀνεχόμενοι) with ὑμᾶς, ye, in the verſe before; to which we ſhould be led by our tranſlation. See Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, vol. i. p. 98.

Ver. 6. And in you all] And in us all. Wat.

Ver. 7. Is given grace] "A different charge, or office in the church." So χάρις here ſignifies, as appears by the ſequel and other parallel paſſages. The reaſon is, becauſe it is a favour to be ſo choſen for ſuch office and miniſtry; and that choice was in the beginning accompanied with the gift of talents proper to diſcharge it. That their differing in ſome reſpects, though united in ſo many, might not be urged as any plea for ſelf-eſteem, or neglect of others who wanted ſuch diſtinguiſhing advantages, the Apoſtle properly inſiſts upon it, that all is communicated to us by way of free gift, and ſovereign liberality. See Heylin and Doddrige.

Ver. 9, 10. (Now, that he aſcended, &c.] St. Paul's argumentation in theſe two verſes is ſkilfully adapted to the main deſign of his Epiſtle. The convert Gentiles were attacked by the unconverted Jews, who were declared enemies to the thoughts of a Meſſiah who ſhould die. St. Paul, to enervate that objection, proves by a paſſage out of the Pſalms (ver. 8.) that he muſt die, and be buried. Beſides the unbelieving Jews, ſeveral of thoſe who were converted to the Goſpel, or at leaſt profeſſed to be ſo, attacked the Gentile converts on the other ſide, perſuading them that they could not be admitted to be the people of God in the kingdom of the Meſſiah, nor receive any advantage by him, unleſs they were circumciſed, and put themſelves wholly under the Jewiſh conſtitution. He had ſaid a great deal in the three firſt chapters to free them from this perplexity; but yet takes occaſion here to offer them a new argument, by telling them, that Chriſt, the ſame Jeſus who died, and was laid in his grave, was exalted to the right-hand of God, above all the heavens, in the higheſt ſtate of dignity and power; that he himſelf, being filled with the fulneſs of God, believers, who were all his members, might receive immediately from him, their head, a fulneſs of gifts and graces, upon no other terms but barely as they were his members. Inſtead of into the lower parts of the earth, Dr. Waterland reads, into theſe lower regions of the earth. See Locke, and on Pſalm xlviii. 18. Bp. Pearſon on the Creed, p. 229. and Vitring. in Iſai. vol. ii. p. 489.

Ver. 12. For the perfecting of the ſaints] For the fitting out holy perſons,—to the edifying, &c. Wat. and Blackwall.

the work of the miniſtry, for the edifying of the body of Chriſt:

13 Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the meaſure of the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt:

14 That we henceforth be no more children, toſſed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the ſleight of men, and cunning craftineſs whereby they lie in wait to deceive;

15 But, ſpeaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Chriſt:

16 From whom the whole body, fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint ſupplieth, according to the effectual working in the meaſure of every part, maketh increaſe of the body, unto the edifying of itſelf in love.

17 This I ſay therefore, and teſtify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind,

18 Having the underſtanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in them, becauſe of the blindneſs of their heart:

Ver. 13. The unity of the faith, &c.] We may obſerve here, that faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God are the ſame. Unto a perfect man, means one who is arrived to the years of diſcretion and maturity, to the full ſtrength of his body, and the exerciſe of his rational faculties. The Apoſtle, in the next phraſe, may poſſibly allude to that ſtandard in the fulneſs or height, which qualified a perſon to ſerve in an army. He carries this alluſion further, applying it to thoſe internal qualifications and graces which fit us to become as it were the reſidence of Chriſt, ſo as to be filled with the moſt glorious tokens of his preſence and favour. Dr. Heylin renders this verſe as follows: Till we all become united in the faith and knowledge of the Son of God, grow up to maturity, and arrive at the meaſure of perfection to which the fulneſs that is in Chriſt will raiſe. See v. 10. and ch. iii. 19.

Ver. 14. By the ſleight of men, &c.] The word κυϐεία, rendered ſleight, properly ſignifies the artifice of thoſe infamous gameſters, who know how to cog the dice. The next clauſe may be rendered, and ſubtlety in every method of deceit.—Dr. Waterland reads it, And cunning craftineſs, as to the art or method of deceit. The word rendered cunning craftineſs implies all the various degrees of ſubtlety, diſſimulation, and inſidiouſneſs, by which men endeavour to deceive. It is to be hoped that no reader, and particularly none of the ſacred order, will fail to obſerve what the Apoſtle ſo plainly aſſerts in the beginning of the next verſe, namely, that it was the deſign of the miniſtry to preſerve peace and charity, as well as orthodoxy, regularity, and diſcipline in the church;—to maintain the truth in love. See Doddridge, Grotius, Hammond, and Blackwall.

Ver. 16. From whom the whole body] The ſum of this whole figurative diſcourſe is, that Chriſtians, all as members of one body, whereof Chriſt is the head, ſhould each in his proper ſphere, according to the gifts beſtowed upon him, labour with concern and good-will for the benefit and increaſe of the whole, till it be grown up to that fulneſs which is to compleat it in Chriſt Jeſus. This ſenſe of the exhortation carries with it a ſtrong inſinuation (eſpecially if we take in the reſt of the admonitions to the end of the Epiſtle) that the Moſaical obſervances were no part of the buſineſs or character of a Chriſtian, but were wholly to be declined and laid aſide by the ſubjects of Chriſt's kingdom. Locke. The Apoſtle conſiders Chriſt, in the alluſion before us, not only as the head, but likewiſe as the heart of the church; from whence the blood and ſpirits are derived, through many canals and tubes which communicate together, to the extreme parts, where the increaſe and nouriſhment of thoſe parts which want it is produced. Bengelius tranſlates this verſe as follows: In whom the whole frame, joined together and compacted, receives increaſe of the body from every connection of ſupply, by an operation proportionate to each part or member, for the building up of itſelf in love. See Grotius and Calmet.

Ver. 17.] From hence to ver. 24. the Apoſtle exhorts the Epheſians wholly to forſake the former converſation, in which they had paſſed their lives, whilſt they were Gentiles; and to take up that which became them, and was proper to them, now they were Chriſtians. The vanity of mind ſpoken of in this verſe appears from Rom. i. 21, &c. to be the apoſtatiſing of the Gentiles from the true God to idolatry; and in conſequence thereof, to all that profligate way of living which followed thereupon, and is deſcribed in the place referred to by St. Paul. Locke. Inſtead of other Gentiles, Dr. Waterland reads the Gentiles.

Ver. 18. Being alienated, &c.] This alienation was, from owning ſubjection to the true God, and the obſervance of the laws which he had given to thoſe of mankind who continued and profeſſed to be his people. See ch. ii. 12. The life of God ſeems to ſignify more than a life preſcribed by God to his people, as ſome underſtand it. It intimates a life conſiſting in a righteous and holy imitation of his perfections, and a conſtant devotedneſs to his ſervice; and perhaps it may alſo intimate its being originally derived from him: (ſee ver. 24.) being alienated in affection as well as in practice from the life of God, that noble principle of true religion, which is indeed the divine life in the ſoul, forming it to the ſervice and imitation of him, by whom it is implanted. Though the laſt clauſe of this verſe may certainly refer to the Gentiles in their unconverted ſtate; yet it is equally true of the natural blindneſs of men in their unregenerate ſtate. If the words rendered mind, underſtanding, and heart are to be diſtinguiſhed, the firſt may ſignify the mind in general, comprehending the underſtanding, or intellectual faculties; and the heart may imply the affections and paſſions, by the irregularity and obſtinacy of which the underſtanding is often obſcured, and led into falſe and irrational judgements. See Locke, Whitby, Chryſoſtom, and Owen.

Ver. 19. With greedineſs] Πλεονεξία, rendered greedineſs, in its common acceptation, is "The letting looſe our deſires to that which we have no right to by the law of juſtice:" But St. Paul, in ſome of his Epiſtles, uſes it for "intemperate and exorbitant deſires of carnal pleaſures." See ch. v. 3. Col. iii. 5. 1 Theſſ. iv. 5. 1 Cor. v. 10, 11. Thus, the Hebrew word which ſignifies covetouſneſs, the LXX tranſlate by μιασμὸς, which denotes pollution; and in this ſenſe the Apoſtle uſes the word πλεονεξία here; implying a tranſgreſſion of the bounds not only of virtue and decency, but even of natural appetite. See Rom. i. 29. Locke, Hammond, and Mintert.

Ver. 20. But ye have not ſo learned Chriſt] This may perhaps intimate, that there was a manner of learning Chriſt, which might ſeem more conſiſtent with ſuch irregularities; and may glance on ſome teachers, who called themſelves Chriſtians, and yet took very little care to inculcate practical religion. See 2 Tim. iv. 3. and Doddridge.

Ver. 21. If ſo be, &c.] For as much as, or ſeeing ye have heard him, &c. MS. Heylin, and Doddridge. See ch. iii. 2. Beza, Gataker, and others, tranſlate and connect this and the preceding verſe as follows, But it is not ſo with you; you have learned Chriſt; for ye have heard of him, &c.

Ver. 22. That ye put off, &c.] The verbs put off, be renewed, and put on, in this and the following verſes, are in the infinitive mood; which ſhews their connection with the preceding words, and that the ſenſe is, "Ye have been inſtructed to put off the old man, to be renewed, to put on, &c." Dr. Waterland gives the following renderings of this verſe, That, purſuant to your converſion heretofore, you put off, &c.—That you put off, conformably to your firſt converſion, the old man, &c. See Havercamp. Tertull. Apol. p. 7. As particular diſpoſitions of mind are ſometimes expreſſed by particular garments, when a man appears in them, ſo the whole of a good or bad character may be repreſented by a complete dreſs; yea, by the body in which he appears; and vice, alas! being too natural, and getting the firſt poſſeſſion, whereas goodneſs, if it ever ſucceeds at all, is adventitious;—The former may well be called the old, and the latter the new man. Which oppoſite characters may be ſeen clearly delineated in the following part of this, and in ſeveral other of St. Paul's Epiſtles. Some have explained the deceitful luſts ſpoken of in this verſe, of the luſts into which they were led by the artifices of the heathen prieſts, who repreſented them as not diſagreeable to their eſtabliſhed deities; or by the ſophiſtry of their philoſophers, who found out ſo many fallacious excuſes for the groſſeſt vices; but perhaps it is a more important ſenſe to underſtand theſe deceitful luſts of thoſe which generally prevail in the world; which can lead to no rational ſolid happineſs, but delude by vain appearances and fallacious hopes, always ending in ſhame and diſappointment. See Locke, Doddridge, and Whitby.

Ver. 23. In the ſpirit of your mind] The word νȣς, mind, ſeems here to be put for the whole ſoul; and πνευμα, the Spirit, for its intellectual and leading faculty, on which the Spirit of God might chiefly operate; yet not excluſive of ſome influence on the inferior powers. See 1 Theſſ. v. 23. and on ver. 18.

Ver. 24. True holineſs] As this ſtands in a beautiful contraſt to deceitful luſts, ver. 22. we may with great propriety retain our verſion; though Archbp. Tillotſon would tranſlate the clauſe, the holineſs of truth; which is perfectly agreeable to the original: by truth underſtanding the Goſpel, and ſo explaining it of evangelical holineſs, in oppoſition to ſuch mere moral virtues as might be found in an heathen. See his works, vol. ii. p. 349. and Owen on the Spirit, p. 325.

Ver. 25.] After the general exhortation in the foregoing verſes, to renounce the old courſe of life they led when they were heathens, and to become perfectly new men, conformed to the holy rules of the Goſpel,—St. Paul deſcends to particulars; dehorting them from many vices, and preſſing them to the practice of ſeveral important virtues. Τὸ ψεῦδος, rendered lying, might be rendered more properly every lie; and as lying is ſo oppoſite to that ſincerity which becomes a Chriſtian, what is ſaid againſt it may be beſt taken in the moſt extenſive ſenſe. The Apoſtle might poſſibly allude to the doctrine of thoſe heathen moraliſts, who thought that lying might in many caſes be juſtified; as well as to thoſe, who, in order to conciliate the eſteem of the Jews and Gentiles, did not confine themſelves to the rigid truth. See Doddridge, Grotius, and Whitby.

Ver. 26. Be ye angry, and ſin not] It is evident that this is not a command to be angry, but a conceſſion only, with a caution to beware of ſinning in it. Comp. Iſai. viii. 9, 10. Nah. iii. 14, 15. Some would read this interrogatively,—Are ye angry? yet ſin not. The next is an Hebrew expreſſion,—uſed to intimate that a thing neceſſary to be done, ſhould not be prolonged or delayed;—and an alluſion to Deut. xxi. 23. to this effect: "If the puniſhments inflicted by the law were not to be extended to the going-down of the ſun, much leſs ſhould private reſentments be extended longer." This was agreeable to the practice of the Pythagoreans, who uſed always, if the members of their ſect had any difference with each other, to give tokens of reconciliation before the ſun went down. See Whitby, Limborch's Theology, lib. v. c. 45. Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. i. p. 326. and the Reflections.

Ver. 28. Let him that ſtole, ſteal no more] Stealing was a very common vice among the heathens; but, how juſtifiable ſoever the Lacedemonian law relating to it might be, in a political view, it certainly tended to abate the horror which perſons ſhould have of invading, in any reſpect, the property of each other; and to corrupt the minds of youth, by forming them to a ſubtle and knaviſh turn: which, however it might fit them for plundering their enemies in war, would certainly tend to make them bad children, ſervants, and citizens. Inſtead of, Working with his hands the thing which is good, Markland would read, Working with his hands, that he may have good things to give to him, &c. See Whitby, Rollin's Belles Lettres, vol. iii. p. 341, &c. and the Reflections.

Ver. 29. Let no corrupt communication proceed, &c.] This undoubtedly refers to obſcene talk; which is with great propriety called corrupt or putrid, as the word σαπρὸς ſignifies, in direct oppoſition to that which is ſeaſoned with ſalt; and is recommended, Coloſ. iv. 6. as tending to preſerve from ſuch putrefaction and rottenneſs. But that which is good, &c. Dr. Waterland reads, But if any thing be good, to needful edification: As if it were intimated, "that if any uſeful thought ariſe, or an occaſion may be fitly taken to graft an edifying remark on any thing which paſſes in converſation, there ſhould be a readineſs to improve it; that ſo every one may furniſh out his quota, without unprofitable or diſagreeable chaſms of ſilence, or the neceſſity of having recourſe to any thing that is ill, to prevent them; which, unfortunately, is but too often the caſe." See Doddridge, Grotius, and Calmet.

Ver. 30. Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are ſealed] The original is emphatical, Grieve not that holy Spirit of God;—whereby ye are ſealed; i. e. have God's mark ſet upon you, that you are his ſervants; a ſecurity to you, that you ſhall be admitted into his kingdom as ſuch, at the day of redemption; i. e. at the day of reſurrection; when you ſhall be put into the actual poſſeſſion of a place in his kingdom, amongſt thoſe who are his, whereof the Spirit is now an earneſt. See ch. i. 14. The term of ſealing ſeems to be a metaphor taken from merchants putting ſome ſeal or mark upon their commodities, by which they may be known to be theirs. One of the ancients ſomewhere ſays, Delicata res eſt Spiritus Dei;—"There is, if we may ſo expreſs, a certain delicacy in the Spirit of God, which ſhould engage thoſe who deſire his influences, ſolicitouſly to guard againſt every approach to what might be groſly offenſive to him." The day of redemption, in the preſent connection, muſt ſignify the reſurrection, as explained above; (ſee Rom. viii. 23.) which is here mentioned with the greateſt propriety, as the time when they, who in conſequence of this ſealing ſhall be finally owned as the property of God, will be gathered into his treaſury. See Locke, Doddridge, Hammond, and Grotius.

Ver. 31. Let all bitterneſs, &c. be put away] "Do not paſſionately reſent every trifle, nor bitterly inveigh, with all the licentiouſneſs and keenneſs of ſatire, againſt thoſe who have greatly injured you: Nor let your anger be noiſy in its language, venting itſelf in clamorous reproaches and abuſive railings; nor be deeply treaſured up in the mind, to wait for opportunities of revenge,—for all theſe things are moſt contrary to the nature of God, the genius of Chriſtianity, and the character of its great Founder." Such is the meaning of this verſe, if we ſuppoſe each word to have a different idea annexed to it; but if they are only ſynonimous terms, the Apoſtle's deſign in amaſſing them together, might be to ſhew, that he would have them be upon their guard againſt all the malevolent paſſions, and thoſe outrages of ſpeech and expreſſion which they tend to produce. The like remark may be applied to many other paſſages of Scripture, and particularly to thoſe where all kinds of lewdneſs are forbidden in ſuch a variety of phraſe and language. See Doddridge, and Grotius.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. IV.

If divine grace hath taught us to know the hope of our calling, it will ſurely add great weight to the pathetic exhortations of this faithful ſervant and priſoner of Jeſus Chriſt, to walk worthy of it, ver. 1. It will teach us that humility, meekneſs, and long-ſuffering, of which our divine Saviour was ſo glorious an example;—an example, which muſt engage us to the exerciſe of that mutual forbearance, ſo well ſuiting thoſe whom he hath brought into ſo happy a ſtate. ver. 2.

To incite us hereto, let us reflect, "Do we not all indeed belong to one body, however called by different denominations?—Have we not all (ſo far as we are truly called Chriſtians) received one Spirit? Is there not one hope of our common calling,—even that of dwelling together in one and the ſame bliſsful world, with God, and with each other? Have we not one Lord, even Jeſus Chriſt, to whom we all equally profeſs ſubjection; who hath taught us one faith; who hath inſtituted one baptiſm, and who hath introduced and conſecrated us to one God, and Father of all?—And what then are the conſiderations which ſhould prevail ſo far, as to divide us, when compared with ſuch bonds of union as theſe? ver. 4—6.

Let us all, therefore, in the name of this God, who is over all, who operates through all, and in us all; in the name of this one Saviour and one Spirit,—aweful and endearing names! into which we were all baptized;—let us charge it upon our own ſouls, that we not only do nothing through a factious and uncharitable temper to divide his church, but that we ſtudy what we can to heal its breaches, and to promote its growth and edification. ver. 16. And let us pray der-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Chriſt's ſake hath forgiven you.

CHAP. V.

After general exhortations to love, to flee fornication, and all uncleanneſs, not to converſe with the wicked, to walk warily, and to be filled with the Spirit; he deſcendeth to the particular duties: how wives ought to obey their huſbands, and huſbands ought to love their wives, even as Chriſt his church.

BE ye therefore followers of God, as dear children;

2 And walk in love, as Chriſt alſo hath loved us, and hath given himſelf for us, an offering and a ſacrifice to God for a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour.

3 But fornication, and all uncleanneſs,

Ver. 32. Matth. vi. 14. Mark xi. 25.——Ver. 1. Matth. v. 45. Ch. iv. 32.—V. 2. John xiii. 34. xv. 12. 1 Theſſ. iv. 9. 1 John iii. 23. iv. 21. Gal. ii. 20. Hebr. ix. 14. 2 Cor. ii. 15.—V. 3. Col. iii. 5. 1 Theſſ. iv. 3, &c.

that God would guide and ſucceed our endeavours for that purpoſe, and preſerve our hearts in ſuch a ſituation and temper, that we may ſtand continually willing to give up every temporal intereſt, which may interfere with ſuch a deſign; yea, and even to make our own blood, if ſuch were the will of God, the cement of thoſe wounds, at which a body thus intimately united to Chriſt, has ſo long been bleeding almoſt to death.

Remembering our relation to each other, let us ſpeak the truth from our hearts; upon all occaſions treating others with the ſame candour and integrity with which we would ourſelves deſire to be treated. If anger riſe, let it be on juſt occaſions, and in due proportion; ver. 26. for it is plain from the New Teſtament that the Chriſtian religion does not abſolutely forbid anger in all circumſtances, and on all occaſions, but only in its extremes. This indeed may fairly be inferred from the verſe before us; for when the Apoſtle exhorts to be angry and ſin not, or, in other words, to beware of ſinful anger, he gives a clear intimation, that there are certain ſeaſons and degrees, in which this paſſion is not criminal; that there may be indignities of ſo flagrant a nature, as will be a compleat juſtification of it; and ſome inſtances of ſuch heinous abuſe and injury, that the moſt patient and candid temper, the moſt generous and improved benevolence, cannot paſs by them without diſcovering marks of its reſentment. In like manner we find the Apoſtle, James i. 19. adviſing Chriſtians not to extirpate anger intirely,—but only to be ſlow to wrath. To which we may add, that anger is expreſly aſcribed to our Saviour himſelf, who was a pattern of all moral virtues, and eſpecially of gentleneſs and moderation; and chargeable with none of the ſinful imperfections of mankind, with none of the extravagancies of human paſſions. We have the utmoſt reaſon to believe, that every principle which appears to belong to human nature as ſuch, and is not the effect of a high uncommon fermentation of the ſpirits, and a feveriſh heat of blood, may within certain bounds be lawfully indulged. This ſeems to be the caſe as to anger, which may be deſcribed to be an emotion and diſpleaſure of mind, on an apprehenſion of ſome wrong intended or executed againſt ourſelves, or others for whom we are concerned; and ſuch a reſentment of the injury as excites us to procure the puniſhment of the offender, ſo far as it is neceſſary for ſelf-defence, for our future ſecurity, and to promote the general peace, good order, and welfare of ſociety. Such a ſenſe of injuries not only diſcovers itſelf in all mankind, but tends directly to the public good. The firſt emotion, upon any abuſe or indignity offered, ſeems to be an inſtinct implanted in moſt animals, as well as in men; and nothing plauſible can be urged to prove it our duty to ſuppreſs it, becauſe it cannot be done without altering and new modelling the human frame. Nor is it fit indeed that it ſhould be extirpated, ſince it is adapted to anſwer very valuable purpoſes: for as it is a ſtrong intimation that we think ourſelves wronged, it may juſtly be expected in many caſes that it will prevent the further progreſs of the injury; and that the guilty perſon will put ſome reſtraint upon himſelf, for fear of the conſequences of heightening our anger. The wiſdom of God is therefore eminently diſplayed, in making the marks of this paſſion ſo viſible, that we are not able to conceal it; becauſe it is deſigned as an immediate check to rudeneſs and violence. To this may be added, that the firſt emotion is wiſely ordained to ſerve another uſe, and that is, to excite us to repel injuries, in caſes where an immediate reſiſtance is required, by a more warm and vigorous ſelf-defence. As for reſentment of abuſes and wrongs, it is frequently of eminent ſervice to diſcourage inſolence and diſorder, to maintain private right and property, and ſecure to the honeſt and peaceable the advantages of civil life; whereas a tame, unreſenting, unmanly ſubmiſſion under the greateſt provocation, would be treated by perſons of obdurate or arbitrary tempers, or boiſterous paſſions, with ſcorn and contempt. It would probably draw on freſh inſults, ſo that neither virtue nor public happineſs could be ſupported. The warmth and reſentment which we feel on being injured, has a direct tendency to raiſe within us a ſtrong abhorrence of every inſtance of baſe and abuſive conduct; for if we are ſo ſtruck with it in others, when we happen to be affected by it, we muſt naturally condemn it in ourſelves; and there can be no doubt, but that this was one deſign of the God of nature, in making us ſuſceptible of paſſions of this kind.

The words in ver. 28. make up a complete ſenſe, without depending on what goes before, or what follows after. They contain a confirmation and explication of the eighth commandment. For what the Apoſtle enjoins concerning labour and working with our hands, is no more than a neceſſary conſequence of the command, "Thou ſhalt not ſteal." For ſince all men are equal ſharers in the wants and neceſſities of life, and the things which ſhould ſupply theſe wants are unequally divided, ſo that ſome have more than enough, and ſome much leſs; it follows, that the neceſſities of the one muſt be ſupplied from the abundance of the other. Steal you muſt not, and give perhaps you will not. The only way then by which you can come at the things you want, is by purchaſe or exchange; and the only thing a poor man can exchange, is the work and labour of his hands; and therefore it follows, as a conſequence of the law, that, ſince you muſt not ſteal, you muſt work, and purchaſe by your labour and induſtry, the things neceſſary for your ſupport and ſubſiſtence. In all that rich men do, they want the aſſiſtance of the poor; they cannot miniſter to themſelves either in the wants, the conveniencies, or the pleaſures of life: ſo that the poor man has as many ways to ſupport himſelf, as the rich man has wants and deſires; for the wants and deſires of the rich muſt be ſerved by the labours of the poor. But then the rich man has often very wicked deſires, and often delights in ſenſual pleaſures; and though to ſerve the rich be the poor man's maintenance, yet in theſe caſes the poor man muſt not ſerve him; and therefore the Apoſtle adds, that he muſt labour, working with his hands the thing which is good. His poverty obliges him to ſerve man, and therefore he muſt work with his hands; and his reaſon and religion oblige him to ſerve God, and therefore he muſt work only the thing which is good. Labour is the buſineſs and employment of the poor; it is the work which God has given him to do; and therefore a man cannot be ſatisfied in working merely as far as the wants of nature oblige him, and ſpending the reſt of his time idly and wantonly: for if God has enabled him to gain more by his labour than his own wants and the conveniencies of life neceſſary to his ſtation require, he then becomes a debtor to ſuch duties as are incumbent on all to whom God has diſpenſed his gifts liberally. He muſt conſider, that he owes tribute to his Maker for the health that he enjoys; that there are others who want limbs to labour, or ſtrength and underſtanding to arrive at the knowledge of any art or myſtery, whereby to maintain themſelves; and to theſe he is a debtor, out of the abundance of his ſtrength, and health, and knowledge with which God has bleſſed him; and therefore he is obliged to labour, "working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth." See Foſter, Butler, Amory, Doddridge, and Sherlock.

Chap. V. Ver. 1. Be ye therefore] As this is an inference from the laſt verſe of the preceding chapter, it ought by no means to have been ſeparated from it; and as the Apoſtle is purſuing here the exhortation which he there began, to mutual love and forgiveneſs, and does not finiſh it till the end of the next verſe, it would have been much more proper, that the two firſt verſes of this chapter ſhould have been connected with what goes before, and that the fifth chapter ſhould have begun with verſe 31. of the former. See Locke, Doddridge, and Bengelius. Inſtead of followers, Heylin, the MS, and others render μιμηταὶ, imitators.

Ver. 2. An offering, &c.] Some think that the words προσφορὰ and θυσία are uſed in reference to the peace-offering and the ſin-offering, as the truth of both is in the ſacrifice of Chriſt, which appeaſed God, and obtains the bleſſings conſequent upon his favour. The words poſſibly are here uſed in conjunction, to expreſs the compleatneſs of the ſacrifice:—Of a ſweet ſmelling ſavour, was, in Scripture phraſe, ſuch a ſacrifice as God accepted, and was pleaſed with. See Gen. viii. 21. Locke, and Bates's Harmony of the Divine Attributes, p. 254.

Ver. 3. And all uncleanneſs or covetouſneſs] Or any kind of uncleanneſs, or unſatiable deſire. Inſatiable deſire is certainly a literal rendering of the Greek word πλεονεξία, which plainly ſignifies the deſire of having more of any thing, whatſoever it be. And though the word is commonly uſed for covetouſneſs, or an intemperate love of riches; yet the chaſte ſtile of Scriptue makes uſe of it to expreſs the letting looſe of the deſires to irregular venereal pleaſures. The words in connection abundantly prove this to be the ſenſe; for what indecency or unbecomingneſs is it among Chriſtians to name covetouſneſs? Πλεονεξία therefore muſt ſignify the title of ſins that are not fit to be named amongſt Chriſtians; ſo that this and the preceding word ſeem not here to be uſed definitively for ſeveral ſorts of ſins, but as two names of the ſame thing, explaining one another; and ſo this verſe will give us a true notion of the word πορνεία in the New Teſtament; the want whereof, and taking it to mean fornication, in our Engliſh acceptation of that word, ſeems to have perplexed the meaning of ſeveral paſſages of Sacred Scripture: whereas, taken in that large ſenſe in which ἀκαθαρσία and πλεονεξία ſeem here to expound it, the obſcurity which follows from the uſual notion of the fornication applied to it, will be removed. Some men have been forward to conclude, from the or covetouſneſs, let it not be once named amongſt you, as becometh ſaints;

4 Neither filthineſs, nor fooliſh talking, nor jeſting, which are not convenient: but rather giving of thanks.

5 For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean perſon, nor covetous man who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Chriſt and of God.

6 Let no man deceive you with vain words: for becauſe of theſe things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of diſobedience.

7 Be not ye therefore partakers with them.

8 For ye were ſometimes darkneſs, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light:

9 (For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodneſs, and righteouſneſs, and truth;)

10 Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord.

11 And have no fellowſhip with the unfruitful works of darkneſs, but rather reprove them.

12 For it is a ſhame even to ſpeak of thoſe things which are done of them in ſecret.

13 But all things that are reproved, are made manifeſt by the light: for whatſoever doth make manifeſt is light.

14 Wherefore he ſaith, Awake thou that

Apoſtle's letter to the convert Gentiles at Antioch, Acts xv. 28. wherein they find fornication joined with two or three other actions, that ſimple fornication, as they call it, was not much diſtant, if at all, from an indifferent action;—whereby they have very much confounded the meaning of the text. The Jews who were converted to the Goſpel could by no means admit, that thoſe of the Gentiles who retained any of the ancient idolatry, though they profeſſed faith in Chriſt, could by any means be received into the communion of the Goſpel, as the people of God under the Meſſiah; and ſo far they were in the right to be perfectly aſſured, that they fully renounced idolatry. The generality inſiſted upon it that they ſhould be circumciſed, and ſo, by ſubmitting to the obſervances of the law, give the ſame proof with proſelytes, that they were perfectly clear from all remains of idolatry. The Apoſtles thought this more than was neceſſary; but the eating of things ſacrificed to idols, and blood, whether let out of the animal, or contained in it, being ſtrangled, and fornication, in the large ſenſe of the word, as it is put for all ſorts of uncleanneſs, being the preſumed marks of idolatry to the Jews, theſe they forbade the Gentile converts; thereby to avoid the offence of the Jews, and prevent a ſeparation between the profeſſors of the Goſpel upon this account. This therefore was not given to the convert Gentiles by the Apoſtles of the circumciſion, as a ſtanding rule of morality required by the Goſpel;—if that had been the deſign, it muſt have contained a great many other particulars. What laws of morality they were under, as ſubjects of Jeſus Chriſt, they doubted not but St. Paul their Apoſtle had taught them; all that they inſtructed them in here was neceſſary for them to do, ſo as to be admitted into one fellowſhip and communion with the converts of the Jewiſh nation, who would certainly avoid them, if they found that they made no ſcruple of thoſe things, but practiſed any of them. That fornication, or all ſorts of uncleanneſs, were the conſequence and concomitants of idolatry, we ſee Rom. i. 29. and it is known they were favoured by the heathen worſhip: therefore the practice of thoſe ſins is every where ſet down as the characteriſtical heathen mark of the idolatrous Gentiles, from which abomination the Jews, both by their law, profeſſion, and general practice were ſtrangers: and this was one of thoſe things wherein chiefly God ſevered his people from the idolatrous nations, as may be ſeen Levit. xviii. 20, &c. and hence πλεονεξία uſed for licentious intemperance in unlawful and unnatural luſts, is in the New Teſtament called idolatry; and πλεονέκτης, ver. 5. a licentious or intemperate perſon, is called an idolater, as this was the ſure and undoubted mark of ſuch a one. See 1 Cor. v. 11. Col. iii. 5. the note on ch. iv. 19. of this Epiſtle, Hammond, and Locke.

Ver. 4. Nor jeſting] Nor lewd diſcourſe. MS. The full import of the word εὐτραπελία ſeems to be, "lewd turns and ambiguities of expreſſion; indelicate double entendres." Ariſtotle, in his Ethicks, uſing this word, recommends it as what renders converſation agreeable. Dr. Lucas thinks it included wantonneſs, profaneneſs, and keenneſs of ſatire. Some join the next clauſe with it, and render it thus; Nor jeſting about things which are unbecoming. See Lucas's "Inquiry after happineſs," vol. iii. p. 207. Blackwall's S. C. vol. i. p. 135. Luther, Schmidius, and Stockius on the word.

Ver. 5. Nor covetous man] Nor laſcivious libertine, [Locke.] Or licentious perſon. See on ver. 3.

Ver. 6. Let no man deceive you, &c.] One would gueſs by this, that as there were Jews, who would perſuade them, that it was neceſſary for Chriſtians of all denominations to be circumciſed, and obſerve the law of Moſes; ſo there were others, who retained ſo much of their ancient heatheniſm, as to endeavour to make them believe, that thoſe venereal abominations and uncleanneſſes were no other than what the Gentiles eſteemed them; that is, actions perfectly indifferent, not offenſive to God, or inconſiſtent with his worſhip, but only a part of the peculiar and poſitive ceremonial law of the Jews, whereby they diſtinguiſhed themſelves from other people, and thought themſelves holier than the reſt of the world; as they did by their diſtinctions of food into clean and unclean,—the actions being in themſelves as indifferent as thoſe meats;—an opinion which the Apoſtle fully confutes in the following words. Locke. See ch. ii. 2. and Col. iii. 6.

Ver. 8. Ye were ſometimes darkneſs] St. Paul to expreſs the great darkneſs in which the Gentiles were, call them darkneſs itſelf. The kingdom of Satan over the Gentile world was a kingdom of darkneſs. See ch. vi. 12. And ſo we find Jeſus is pronounced by Simeon, a light to lighten the Gentiles. Luke ii. 32. The parentheſis in ver. 9. ſerves to give us the literal ſenſe of all that is here required by the Apoſtle in this allegorical diſcourſe of light. See Col. i. 12, 13. and Locke. Inſtead of Spirit in ver. 9. Dr. Waterland, after ſome few MSS, reads light.

Ver. 11. With the unfruitful works of darkneſs] It is well known that ἀκάρπος in Greek, and inutilis in Latin, are ſometimes uſed to expreſs not only unprofitable, but miſchievous things; and this is undoubtedly the meaning of the word here. See Rom. i. 28. and vi. 21.

Ver. 12. It is a ſhame to ſpeak, &c.] Nothing could be more impure and abominable, than ſome of the religious nocturnal myſteries of the heathens, to which the Apoſtle ſeems here to refer. Bp. Warburton, agreeably to his ſyſtem, aſſerts, that if the lower ſort of myſteries among them were firſt intended by the magiſtrates to impreſs the minds of the people with a belief and ſenſe of future rewards and puniſhments, and the higher ſort of them to inſtruct perſons of more reflection and penetration than the reſt, in the knowledge of the true God, and the other great principles of natural religion, they were long before the Apoſtle's time greatly corrupted, and degraded to the moſt deteſtable purpoſes; ſo that ſome perſons in public characters, by no means remarkable for the purity of their own morals, thought it abſolutely neceſſary, in order to prevent the moſt ſcandalous and profligate diſorders, to prohibit the celebration of them. Monſieur Saurin has obſerved a ſarcaſm in this clauſe ſeldom attended to; as if it were inſinuated here, "They are called αποῤῥητα, things not to be ſpoken of: True, ſays the Apoſtle, they are properly ſo! things not too ſacred, but too infamous to be mentioned." See his Sermons, tom. viii. p. 198. Div. Leg. b. ii. ſect. 4. and Whitby.

Ver. 13. But all things that are reproved] See John iii. 20. The Apoſtle's argument here, to keep the Epheſian converts from being miſled by thoſe, who would perſuade them that the Gentile impurities were indifferent actions,—is to ſhew them that they were now better enlightened: To which purpoſe, ver. 5. he tells them, that no ſuch perſon as there deſcribed, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of God, or of Chriſt. This he tells them, ver. 8, &c. was light, which they had received from the Goſpel; of which before their converſion they knew nothing, but were in perfect darkneſs and ignorance of it: But now they were better inſtructed, and ſaw the difference; which was a ſign of life; and therefore were bound in duty to follow that light, which they had received from Chriſt, who had raiſed them from among the Gentiles, (who were ſo far dead, as to be wholly inſenſible of the evil courſe and ſtate they were in) and had given them light, and a proſpect into a future ſtate, and a way to attain everlaſting happineſs. Locke.

Ver. 14. Wherefore he ſaith, Awake, &c.] "Wherefore, when God is ſpeaking in the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, of the calling of the Gentiles, and of the light which they ſhould have by Chriſt, He ſays in effect to thoſe who are yet in darkneſs, though not exactly in theſe words, Awake thou that ſleepeſt, &c. And this particularly is the moſt natural import of thoſe well-known words in Iſaiah, ch. lx. 1. Ariſe, ſhine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is riſen upon thee. That is to ſay, the Meſſiah, repreſented ſleepeſt, and ariſe from the dead, and Chriſt ſhall give thee light.

by

15 See then that ye walk circumſpectly, not as fools, but as wiſe;

16 Redeeming the time, becauſe the days are evil.

17 Wherefore be ye not unwiſe, but underſtanding what the will of the Lord is.

18 And be not drunk with wine, wherein is exceſs; but be filled with the Spirit;

19 Speaking to yourſelves in pſalms, and hymns, and ſpiritual ſongs, ſinging and making melody in your heart to the Lord;

20 Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father, in the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt;

21 Submitting yourſelves one to another in the fear of God.

22 Wives, ſubmit yourſelves unto your own huſbands, as unto the Lord.

23 For the huſband is the head of the wife, even as Chriſt is the head of the church: and he is the Saviour of the body.

24 Therefore, as the church is ſubject unto Chriſt, ſo let the wives be to their own huſbands in every thing.

25 Huſbands, love your wives, even as Chriſt alſo loved the church, and gave himſelf for it;

26 That he might ſanctify and cleanſe it with the waſhing of water, by the word;

by the glory of the Lord, ſhines in his church; ſhines upon the ſouls of particular perſons: In conſequence of which they ariſe as from the dead, and ſhake off their deep ſleep; they rejoice in the light; they walk in it, and reflect it all around them; ſo that many others are awakened, and transformed by it." See on Iſai. lx. 1. Doddridge, and Saurin's Serm. tom. x. p. 286.

Ver. 16. Redeeming the time] Locke, Grotius, and many other commentators, explain this of the caution to be uſed in avoiding perſecution; that ſo they might draw out their time as long as poſſible, and not provoke their enemies to cut them off. See Dan. ii. 8. Col. iv. 5. This interpretation, however, ſeems to expreſs only a ſmall part of that Chriſtian diligence and prudence, to which the Apoſtle meant to direct and exhort us. The word ἐξαγοραζόμενοι, redeeming, has a peculiar force; and implies, as the French word racheter, and the Engliſh word redeem alſo does, The recovery and purchaſing again what has been loſt. Comp. Gal. iii. 13. iv. 4, 5. "Endeavour to recover, and bring back, as far as poſſible, the time which has been unhappily loſt and thrown away in the enormities of your heathen life, by diligently making uſe of what remains, and ſtudying to improve it to the beſt and moſt valuable purpoſes; for which you ſhould be careful to embrace the preſent opportunity, becauſe the days we live in are evil; in which we are on every ſide ſurrounded with perſecutions and perils, and God only knows how ſoon our liberty or our life may be taken away." See Doddridge, Barrow, Saurin's Sermons, tom. viii. p. 196. and Stockius. Dr. Heylin reads, Improving the time; and he obſerves from Tully, that every hour has its proper duty; nullum tempus vacare officio poteſt. When we diſcharge that duty, we improve, that is, make the beſt of our time. The motive added is, becauſe the days are evil: The frequent diſaſters which happen to us, furniſh materials for the exerciſe of virtue, which is the true improvement of time.

Ver. 17. Wherefore be ye not unwiſe] See ver. 10. The Chriſtian prudence is, upon all occaſions, to conſider what is the will of God. Our duty varies with our circumſtances; and it is a main point of wiſdom to diſcern what are the duties which correſpond to our preſent circumſtances. Heylin.

Ver. 18. Be not drunk with wine] It is highly probable that here may be a particular reference to thoſe diſſolute ceremonies, called the Bacchanalia, which were celebrated by the heathens, in honour of their god of wine. While theſe rites continued, men and women made it a point of religion to intoxicate themſelves, and ran about the ſtreets, fields, and vineyards, ſinging and ſhouting in a wild and tumultuous manner: In oppoſition to theſe extravagant vociferations, the uſe of devout pſalmody is with great propriety recommended. Plato tells us, that there was hardly a ſober perſon to be found in the whole Attican territories, during the continuance of theſe deteſtable ſolemnities. St. Paul dehorts the Epheſians from the too free uſe of wine, becauſe therein is exceſs. The word is ἀσωτία, which may either ſignify luxury or diſſoluteneſs; implying that drinking is no friend to continency and chaſtity, but gives up the reins to luſt and uncleanneſs,—the vice he had been warning them againſt: Or it may ſignify intemperance and diſorder; oppoſite to that ſober and prudent demeanor adviſed, in redeeming the time. Wine is ſo frequently the cauſe hereof, by the ungrateful abuſe of the bounty of Providence in giving it, that the enormity is repreſented, by a ſtrong and beautiful figure, as contained in the very liquor. See Locke, Doddridge, Calmet, and Mintert.

Ver. 19. Singing and making melody in your hearts] "Your hearts and affections correſponding with what is uttered by your mouths; without which no external melody, be it ever ſo exact and harmonious, can be pleaſing to the Lord."

Ver. 20. Giving thanks always, &c.] "Giving thanks to God for all the favours he has beſtowed upon you, and even for your afflictions, as occaſions offer for the trial, the illuſtration, and improvement of your virtue." The words rendered for all things, are tranſlated by ſome for all perſons; and then the meaning will be, "Conſider yourſelves as appointed to return to God the tribute of praiſe due from the whole human race, and addreſs your daily thankſgivings to him, for thoſe bleſſings he is continually ſhowering down on your fellow-chriſtians, and fellow-creatures in general." This is certainly a generous and noble thought, and is ſtrongly expreſſed in that excellent "form of general thankſgiving" in our church liturgy. See Doddridge, Grotius, and Barrow's works, vol. i. p. 257.

Ver. 21. Submitting yourſelves one to another] Though this verſe, in grammatical conſtruction, be joined to the foregoing diſcourſe, yet it ought to be looked upon as introductory to what follows, and to be a general rule given to the Epheſians, to ſubmit to thoſe duties which the ſeveral relations they ſtood in to one another required. After this general exhortation to the diſcharge of relative duties, the Apoſtle proceeds to the particular conſideration of the ſeveral relations of huſbands and wives, parents and children, maſters and ſervants; which he might rather chooſe to inſiſt on, as ſome were ready to imagine that Chriſtian converts were releaſed from any further obligation to thoſe who ſtill continued in a ſtate of heatheniſm. The Apoſtle therefore preſſes it upon them to ſhew a due regard to relative duties, in whatever ſtation they were placed; and to remember, that Chriſtian privileges by no means excuſed them from the duties reſulting from natural and civil relations of life, but rather enforced the obligations they were under to obſerve them: and if theſe duties were incumbent upon Chriſtians towards relations of all kinds, even though they bore the character of unbelievers, much more were they engaged to practiſe them toward ſuch, as were related to them not only by the ties of nature, or of civil inſtitution, but alſo by the more endearing bonds of grace. See 1 Cor. vii. 10—24. 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2. Doddridge, and Locke.

Ver. 22. Wives, ſubmit yourſelves] It is obſervable, that in the ſeveral exhortations given here to the practice of relative duties, as likewiſe in Coloſſ. iii. 18, &c. the Apoſtle firſt begins with the lower relations of wives, and children, and ſervants, before he proceeds in each of theſe inſtances to thoſe of huſbands, and parents, and maſters: which it is probable he might do, becauſe the duties of inferiors are commonly moſt apt to be objected to; as what are thought moſt difficult to be complied with; and where theſe are faithfully performed, the correſpondent duties of ſuperiors will be more readily attended to, and more effectually ſecured. Some would ſupply the word church in the laſt clauſe, as the context ſeems to lead;—as the church unto the Lord. See the next verſe, and Bowyer's Conjectural Emendations.

Ver. 23. The huſband is the head of the wife] It is from the head that the body receives both health and life: St. Paul here pronounces this of Chriſt, as the head of the church; that by the parallel which he makes uſe of to repreſent the relation between huſband and wife, he may both ſhew the wife the reaſonableneſs of her ſubjection to her huſband, and the duty incumbent on the huſband to cheriſh and preſerve his wife; as we ſee he purſues it in the following verſes. Locke.

Ver. 26. Cleanſe it with the waſhing of water] The Apoſtle probably alludes here to the methods taken in eaſtern countries, to purify the virgins who were to be preſented to the royal bed: (comp. Eſth. ii. 3, 9, and 12. and Ezek. xvi. 7—14.) And no doubt proper care was alſo taken to cultivate their minds, and to form them to ſuch knowledge, as might render them more fit to become the dignity intended for them; which was the more neceſſary, as ſome of thoſe who appeared as candidates on ſuch occaſions, were of low birth and education. The purifying of men is aſcribed ſo much throughout the New Teſtament to the word, i. e. the preaching of the 27 That he might preſent it to himſelf a glorious church, not having ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing; but that it ſhould be holy, and without blemiſh.

28 So ought men to love their wives, as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife, loveth himſelf.

29 For no man ever yet hated his own fleſh; but nouriſheth and cheriſheth it, even as the Lord the church:

30 For we are members of his body, of his fleſh, and of his bones.

31 For this cauſe ſhall a man leave his father and mother, and ſhall be joined unto his wife, and they two ſhall be one fleſh.

32 This is a great myſtery: but I ſpeak concerning Chriſt and the church.

33 Nevertheleſs, let every one of you in particular, ſo love his wife even as himſelf; and the wife ſee that ſhe reverence her huſband.

Ver. 27. That he might preſent it to himſelf] The Alexandrine and other copies read, That he himſelf might preſent to himſelf the church, glorious, without ſpot, &c. And this ſeems more ſuitable to the Apoſtle's meaning; who, to recommend to huſbands love and tenderneſs towards their wives, in imitation of Chriſt's affection to the church, ſhews, that whereas other brides take care to embelliſh and ſet off their perſons, in order to recommend themſelves to their bridegrooms; Chriſt himſelf, at the expence of his own pains and blood, purified and prepared for himſelf his ſpouſe, the church, that he might preſent it to himſelf without ſpot or wrinkle. How bright an idea does this verſe give us of the grand plan and deſign of Chriſtianity;—to bring all the millions of which the church conſiſts to ſuch a ſtate of perfect virtue and glory, that when the penetrating eye of Chriſt, its great and holy Bridegroom, ſhall ſurvey it, there ſhall not be one ſpot, or wrinkle, or any thing like it, in the leaſt to impair its beauty, or offend his ſight! Where is ſuch a ſcheme of thought to be found in the world, but in the New Teſtament, and thoſe who have been taught by it?—See Locke, Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 28. So ought men] So alſo ought huſbands. Wat. So alſo, or, anſwerably to this, ought men. MS.

Ver. 30, 31. For we are members, &c.] Theſe two verſes mav ſeem to ſtand here diſorderly, ſo as to diſturb the connection, and make the inferences disjointed, and very looſe and inconſiſtent, to any one who more minds the order and grammatical conſtruction of St. Paul's words written down, than the thoughts which poſſeſſed his mind when he was writing. It is plain the Apoſtle had here two things in view; the one was, to preſs men to love their wives, by the example of Chriſt's love to his church; and the force of the argument lay in this, that a man and his wife were one fleſh, as Chriſt and his church were one; but this latter being a truth of the greater conſequence of the two, he was as intent on ſettling it upon their minds, though it were but an incident, as the other, which was the argument he was upon: And therefore having ſaid, ver. 29. That every one nouriſheth and cheriſheth his own fleſh, as Chriſt doth the church, it was natural to ſubjoin the reaſon; viz. Becauſe we are members of his body, of his fleſh, and of his bones: This propoſition he took as much care to have believed, as that it was the duty of huſbands to love their wives; and this doctrine of Chriſt and his church being one, when he had ſo ſtrongly aſſerted in the words of Adam concerning Eve, Gen. ii. 23. (which he, in his conciſe way of expreſſing himſelf, underſtands both of the wife, and of the church) he goes on with the words in Gen. ii. 24. which makes their being one fleſh a reaſon, why a man was more ſtrictly to be united to his wife, than to his parents, or any other relations. Locke. Inſtead of, For this cauſe, ver. 31. ſome would render the Greek, Anſwerably thereto, or on the other hand. See Matth. xix. 4—7.

Ver. 32. This is a great myſtery] It is plain by the foregoing verſes, and by the application of the words in Gen. ii. 23. to Chriſt and the church, that the Apoſtles underſtood ſeveral paſſages in the Old Teſtament in reference to Chriſt, and the Goſpel; which evangelical or ſpiritual ſenſe was not underſtood, till by the aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God, the Apoſtles ſo explained and revealed it. This is that which St. Paul, (as we ſee he does here) calls myſtery: He who is deſirous to have a true notion of this matter, ſhould carefully read 1 Cor. ii. where the Apoſtle very particularly explains it. See Locke. Dr. Doddridge paraphraſes the verſe thus: "This is indeed a great myſtery, which was long unknown, and now it is in ſome meaſure diſcovered, is a matter of much admiration: But you will eaſily perceive that in ſaying this, I ſpeak not of the union between a man and his wife, but of that betwixt Chriſt and the church: For, that the Son of God ſhould unite himſelf to a ſociety of mortal men, and regard them as making a part of himſelf, on account of the intimacy with which they are joined to him in a community of Spirit and of intereſt, can never be ſufficiently admired." This ſublime doctrine which had been long concealed, and cannot now be fully comprehended, may with the greateſt propriety be called a myſtery in every ſenſe of the word.

Chap. VI. Ver. 2. Which is the firſt commandment with promiſe] The church of Rome would argue from hence, that the ſecond commandment, which forbids the worſhip of images, having a promiſe added to it, of God's ſhewing mercy to thouſands, in them that love him, and keep his commandments, can be no longer obligatory under the Goſpel; ſince this which relates to honouring of parents, is ſaid to be the firſt commandment with promiſe. But it is eaſy to diſcern the fallacy and weakneſs of this argument, as what is annexed to the ſecond commandment apparently relates to the whole law, and is a general declaration of the mercy God would ſhew to thoſe who kept, not only that, but all his commandments; while this of which the Apoſtle ſpeaks, is the firſt and only precept of the decalogue, which has a particular promiſe annexed to it peculiar to himſelf. See Calmet, Menochius, and Doddridge.

Ver. 3. That—thou mayeſt live long, &c.] It has been obſerved, that the Apoſtle does not ſay upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, that he might not encourage a vain hope in the Jews of continuing in the land of Canaan. But when it is conſidered that thoſe to whom he was writing were chiefly Gentile converts, the clauſe would very properly be omitted in this view, as it muſt better ſuit the caſe of the whole church, to expreſs the promiſe in a general way. See Whitby, Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 4. Ye fathers, provoke not your children, &c.] "Ye fathers, be careful not to exaſperate your children, by an overbearing and tyrannical behaviour; by rigorous ſeverity; leſt by this means you ſhould excite them to ſuch a ſecret indignation, as may make it difficult for them to reſtrain thoſe expreſſions of wrath, which in ſuch a relation would be very indecent; and among other evil conſequences of ſuch a conduct, there is great reaſon alſo to conclude, that it would naturally prejudice them againſt Chriſtianity, and thus would bring upon yourſelves a ſhare in the guilt of their diſobedience, and their ruin." By the nurture and admonition of the Lord is meant, "Such a courſe of diſcipline and inſtruction, as properly belongs to a religious education; which ought to be employed in forming them for the Lord, by laying a reſtraint upon the firſt appearances of every vicious paſſion; and nouriſhing them with the words of faith, and of good doctrine." See 1 Tim. iv. 6.

6 Not with eye-ſervice, as men-pleaſers, but as the ſervants of Chriſt, doing the will of God from the heart;

7 With good will doing ſervice, as to the Lord, and not to men:

8 Knowing that whatſoever good thing any man doeth, the ſame ſhall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond, or free.

9 And, ye maſters, do the ſame things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Maſter alſo is in heaven; neither is there reſpect of perſons with him.

10 Finally, my brethren, be ſtrong in the Lord, and in the power of his might.

11 Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to ſtand againſt the wiles of the devil.

12 For we wreſtle not againſt fleſh and blood, but againſt principalities, againſt powers, againſt the rulers of the darkneſs of this world, againſt ſpiritual wickedneſs in high places.

13 Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withſtand in the evil day, and having done all, to ſtand.

14 Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breaſt-plate of righteouſneſs;

15 And your feet ſhod with the preparation of the goſpel of peace;

16 Above all, taking the ſhield of faith, wherewith ye ſhall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked.

17 And take the helmet of ſalvation, and the ſword of the ſpirit, which is the word of God:

18 Praying always with all prayer and ſupplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perſeverance, and ſupplication for all ſaints;

Ver. 6. Not with eye-ſervice] "Not as attending on their buſineſs only while their maſter's eyes are upon them." Grotius takes notice of the great elegance of the compound words made uſe of here in the original; which our tranſlators have endeavoured to imitate: But as the Greek abounds more in ſuch compound words than any other language, ſo St. Paul has frequently introduced them in his writings, with a peculiar elegance and beauty. See Grotius, and Blackwall's Sacr. Claſ. vol. i. p. 239.

Ver. 9. Forbearing threatening] "Forbearing not only cruel and dangerous blows, but all ſevere and vigorous threatening; and every thing of an over-haſty and tyrannical conduct." Doddridge. Mr. Locke paraphraſes it: "Forbearing the roughneſs even of unneceſſary menaces." Dr. Waterland reads the next clauſe, Knowing that both their and your Maſter alſo is in heaven.

Ver. 11. Put on the whole armour of God] The word in the original is πανοπλία, panoply, which includes all ſorts of armour, whether offenſive or defenſive. This the Apoſtle applies to the exerciſe of all thoſe Chriſtian graces, with which we are furniſhed by God, to be made uſe of in his ſtrength, as well to annoy the enemy, as to defend ourſelves; and it appears by the particular deſcription which the Apoſtle here proceeds to give of it, to be a ſuit of armour every way complete, and properly adapted to the defence of every part; with this exception, that none is provided for the back; to hint to us, as ſome have obſerved, that we muſt always face the enemy, or we ſhall ſoon lie open to his attacks, and have no defence from dangers. The reader will find in Gurnall's "Chriſtian in complete armour," a very large and practical improvement of this portion of Sacred Scripture.

Ver. 12. Principalities and powers] Theſe are put here for thoſe revolted angels, who ſtood in oppoſition to the kingdom of God. The rulers of the darkneſs of this world, ſeems to mean thoſe who have long uſurped a dominion over the world, and who in the preſent age hold men in the chains of hereditary ſuperſtition and deſtructive errors, which have been delivered down to them through many ſucceeding generations. There is ſomewhat peculiar in the original of the next clauſe, which Mr. Locke paraphraſes "the ſpiritual managers of the oppoſition to the kingdom of God." There is no doubt but it refers to thoſe revolted ſpirits who are continually employed in propagating wickedneſs. Some, however, would render the laſt words ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, about heavenly things; as ſignifying that we wreſtle with them to ſecure to ourſelves thoſe ſpiritual and eternal bleſſings, of which they would endeavour to deprive us. See Whitby, and Goodwin's Works, vol. i. p. 45.

Ver. 14. Having your loins girt about, &c.] It has often been obſerved, that the military girdle was not only an ornament, but a defence; as it hid the gaping joints of the armour, and kept them cloſe and ſteady, as well as fortified the loins of thoſe who wore it, rendering them more vigorous, and fit for action. The chief difficulty here is to know, whether truth refers to the true principles of religion, or to integrity in our conduct; and how, on the latter interpretation, to keep it diſtinct from the breaſt-plate of righteouſneſs; or, on the former, from the ſhield of faith: But perhaps it may rather ſignify ſome virtue of the mind, as do all the other parts of the armour enumerated, and then it muſt refer to that uprightneſs and ſincerity of intention, which produces righteouſneſs, or an holy and equitable conduct, as its proper fruit. See Doddridge and Gurnall.

Ver. 15. Your feet ſhod with the preparation of the Goſpel] "With that peaceful and benevolent temper which is ſo much recommended by the Goſpel, as an eſſential part of the Chriſtian character; and which, like the boots worn by ſoldiers, will bear you unhurt through the many difficulties and trials, which like ſharp-pointed thorns may lie in your way, and dangerouſly obſtruct your progreſs." Mr. Locke underſtands by this, an habitual readineſs to walk in the way of the Goſpel of peace; as if it were intended as a general injunction to obey all its precepts: But it evidently appears to be deſigned in a particular manner to point our the preparation which the Goſpel makes for our defence, by that peaceful temper which it ſo often teaches and inculcates. See Doddridge, Locke, and Gurnall. Dr. Waterland, following Gauſtenius, reads, with the ſandal of the Goſpel.

Ver. 16. Above all] Beſides all. MS. Over and above all. Blackw. and Wat. This laſt tranſlation beſt anſwers to the particle ἐπὶ here uſed, and beſt expreſſes the alluſion to the ſituation of the ſhield, as covering the other pieces of the armour;—which has here a beautiful propriety, as truth, righteouſneſs, and peace, are ſheltered, as it were by faith, from the aſſaults which might otherwiſe overbear them. Many commentators ſuppoſe, that the Apoſtle, in the laſt clauſe of this verſe, be able to quench, &c. refers to an ancient cuſtom, ſtill prevailing among the Indians and other barbarous nations, to dip their arrows in the blood and gall of aſps and vipers, and other poiſonous preparations, which fire the blood of thoſe who are wounded with them, occaſion exquiſite pain, and make the leaſt wound mortal. And ſome Greek writers tell us, that it was uſual for ſoldiers to have ſhields made of raw hides, which immediately quenched them. It is alſo certain, that ſome arrows were diſcharged with ſo great a velocity, that they fired in their paſſage. If the Apoſtle alludes to theſe, he may mean to hint thoſe furious ſuggeſtions which the wicked-one may ſometimes diſcharge into the mind, like ſo many envenomed arrows or darts, which kindle by the ſwiftneſs of their paſſage. See Goodwin's "Child of Light," p. 101. Raphelius and Gurnall.

Ver. 17. And take the helmet of ſalvation] Some would read this, And for an helmet, the hope of ſalvation, as it is expreſſed 1 Theſſ. v. 8. And inſtead of all prayer and ſupplication, in the next verſe, they would read with all attention [προσόχης] and prayer. See Bowyer's Conjectures.

Ver. 18. Watching thereunto with all perſeverance] "Improving the gift of prayer by continual exerciſe, and collecting fit materials for addreſſes to God, by reading, converſation, meditation, &c." See on Philip. iv. 6. and Bp. Wilkins on Prayer, p. 39. Mr. Locke obſerves, that in the foregoing allegory concerning the Chriſtian armour, there is no need curiouſly to explain wherein the peculiar correſpondence between thoſe pieces of armour and the ſeveral virtues conſiſted; it being ſufficiently plain, upon the whole, what the Apoſtle means, and wherewith he would have believers armed for their welfare.

19 And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the myſtery of the goſpel:

20 For which I am an ambaſſador in bonds: that therein I may ſpeak boldly, as I ought to ſpeak.

21 But that ye alſo may know my affairs, and how I do, Tychicus a beloved brother, and faithful miniſter in the Lord, ſhall make known to you all things:

22 Whom I have ſent unto you for the ſame purpoſe, that ye might know our affairs, and that he might comfort your hearts.

23 Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith from God the Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

24 Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jeſus Chriſt in ſincerity. Amen.

Ver. 19. And for me, that utterance may be given me] "And for me in particular, that I may with freedom and plainneſs of ſpeech preach the word." See Locke, and Blackwall, vol. i. p. 145.

Ver. 20. For which I am an ambaſſador in bonds] Some would render πρεσβεύω ἐν ἁλύσει, I grow old in a chain; comp. Philem. ver. 9. where Παῦλος πρεσβύτης ſignifies Paul the aged. But it is certain that the common verſion of this paſſage may be juſtified. As the perſons of ambaſſadors were always ſacred, the Apoſtle ſeems to refer to the outrage which was done to his divine Maſter in this violation of his liberty. See Raphael, Doddridge, and on Acts xii. 4.

Ver. 21. Tychicus a beloved brother] He was one of Paul's friends and fellow-labourers, and had been his companion in the laſt interview he had with the elders of Epheſus, when he ſent for them to come to him at Miletus. See Acts xx. 4, 17.

Ver. 24. In ſincerity] The Greek word ſignifies in incorruption, ἀφθαρσίᾳ. St. Paul cloſes all his Epiſtles with this benediction, Grace be with you; but this here is ſo peculiar a way of expreſſing himſelf, that it may give us ſome reaſon to inquire what thoughts ſuggeſted it. It has been remarked more than once, that the chief buſineſs of his Epiſtles is that which fills his mind and guides his pen in his whole diſcourſe. In this to the Epheſians he ſets forth the Goſpel as a diſpenſation, ſo much in every thing ſuperior to the law, that it was debaſing, corrupting, and deſtroying the Goſpel, to join circumciſion and the obſervance of the law, as neceſſary to it. Having written this Epiſtle to this end, the ſame thought being ſtill upon his mind, he here, in the concluſion, pronounces favour on all thoſe who love the Lord Jeſus Chriſt in incorruption; that is, without mixing or joining any thing with him, in the work of our ſalvation, which may render the Goſpel uſeleſs and ineffectual; for thus he ſays, Gal. v. 2. If ye be circumciſed, Chriſt ſhall profit you nothing. But this I ſubmit, ſays Mr. Locke with his uſual candour, to the conſideration of the judicious reader. Accordingly, ſome commentators are of opinion, that the word ἀφθαρσία rather expreſſes that uprightneſs of heart, which is oppoſed to the putting on falſe pretences, and may with great propriety be underſtood, as a general deſcription of a true Chriſtian: and indeed it is manifeſt, that wherever this unfeigned, this inviolable love to Chriſt prevails, there will of courſe be all the other eſſential parts of the Chriſtian character.

REFLECTIONS.

The love of our bleſſed Redeemer to his church ought daily to be celebrated with the moſt cordial gratitude, and that infinite condeſcenſion adored, by which he hath been pleaſed to unite us to himſelf in ſuch dear and inſeparable bonds. He is the Saviour of the body;—and in how wonderful a manner is he become ſo!—He hath given himſelf for us,—hath bought us from ſervitude and miſery, at the expence of his own life, and hath waſhed us from our ſins in his own blood, as well as cleanſed us in the laver of baptiſmal water; and intending us for the eternal diſplays of his love, as well as for the participation of his glory, he hath ſanctified us by his Spirit, and formed us for it by his word; and thus is preparing us for that bleſſed day, when the whole body of his elect ſhall be brought forth, as the bride, the Lamb's wife, to thoſe public eſpouſals, which ſhall have their conſummation in compleat and everlaſting happineſs. ch. v. 23—26.

O that noble and illuſtrious day! when the eye of Chriſt ſhall ſurvey all the millions of his people, and placing them in his preſence as one with himſelf, ſhall look with full complacency and delight, on all the various members of that glorious church, and behold neither ſpot, nor wrinkle, nor any ſuch thing; but all comely, fair and lovely; all anſwering that perfect idea which he had formed; that ſcheme which he had laid for raiſing them by perfect holineſs to perfect felicity! ver. 27. In the mean time, let us think with delight on the proofs which he gives of his conſtant love. He nouriſhes and cheriſhes the church, and with the moſt affectionate regard is tender of it, as we are of the members of our own body, of our fleſh, and of our bones. ver. 29, 30. O that we may have a more ſenſible communion with him, as our great head, and derive more continual influences from the rich fountain of his fulneſs!

For his ſake, let us love one another; nor let thoſe who are joined in the conjugal relation fail to conſider it in the view here repreſented: Let huſbands ſee to it, that their love to their wives bears ſome reſemblance to that which Chriſt avows and manifeſts to the church; let wives pay a reverence to their huſbands, like that which the church is required to pay to Chriſt; and let both carefully maintain that wiſdom and ſanctity in the whole of their behaviour, which may ſuit the relation they bear to each other, in their common head, as well as render their intimate alliance happy,—which it can never be, but by an union of hearts, as well as of hands. ver. 24, 25, 33. Vain will it be to think of dividing their intereſts, when their perſons are thus joined in ſuch a manner, as to become one fleſh. ver. 31. And can there be a ſtronger argument to the moſt tender love?—He that loveth his wife, loveth himſelf: ver. 28. She that loveth her huſband, and from love obeys him, loveth herſelf too: and every inſtance of unkindneſs, on the one hand or the other, is but arming the members with weapons againſt the head, or employing the head in contrivances againſt the members.

It is matter of thankful acknowledgment that the Almighty God condeſcends in his word to give us particular inſtructions, ſuited to the circumſtances in which we are reſpectively placed. Children and ſervants are not forgotten. Let them attend to thoſe gracious leſſons which are here given by the ſupreme Parent and Maſter, who while he teaches them, pleads their cauſe, and interpoſes his high authority to vindicate them from oppreſſion and abuſe.

Much of the happineſs of ſociety evidently depends on the temper and conduct of thoſe who are placed in theſe lower relations. Let children therefore learn to be ſubject to their parents, with all dutiful and humble reſpect, from a ſenſe of the reaſonableneſs of the command, and of the goodneſs which has annexed ſuch a promiſe to it; a promiſe which ſhall ſtill be efficacious, ſo far as long life would be indeed a bleſſing to a pious child. ch. vi. 1—3.

Servants, with all godly ſimplicity and uprightneſs of heart, ſhould revere the authority of Chriſt in them that are their maſters according to the fleſh; and exerciſe a good conſcience towards them upon all occaſions, not only when under their eye, but in their abſence; well knowing that God is always preſent, and always attentive to the conduct of every rational creature, in whatſoever rank. Let them cheriſh that inward good-will, and benevolence of heart, which renders every act of ſervice uniform and ſteady, and makes it in a degree obliging, even when performed by thoſe from whom authority might have extorted it: nor let the certain and important reward which will aſſuredly follow every good action, whether great or ſmall,—whether performed by perſons in more elevated or inferior ſtations of life, fail to animate us all to a zealous diligence in well-doing, whatever diſcouragement may at preſent attend us. ver. 5—8.

Thoſe who bear the ſuperior relations in life ſhould remember, that the command of a much higher Parent and Lord requires alſo of them a tender regard to their inferiors. Let Parents therefore govern their own paſſions, that they may not terrify and oppreſs the tender ſpirits of their children; or if they are otherwiſe than tender, may not teach them an evil leſſon againſt themſelves, and by their own example ſtrengthen them in thoſe exceſſes, which may be a diſgrace and detriment to the family; and when age has broken all the vigour of the parents, may bring down their grey hairs with ſorrow to the grave. A conſcientious care to educate and train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, if duly attended to, will teach a better conduct; and the meekneſs and gentleneſs of Chriſt will have a happy influence on both. ver. 4.

Again, let the thoughts of that great impartial Maſter in heaven, awe maſters upon earth; and the expectation, the certain expectation of giving an account to Him, engage them to make the yoke of ſervitude, which God hath been pleaſed to lay on thoſe, who are nevertheleſs their brethren, as light and eaſy as they can; (ver. 9.) chuſing, even when they might command with authority, rather to intreat with love: Not doing or ſaying any thing unneceſſarily rigorous or ſevere; not threatening, reviling, or reproaching, but treating their ſervants like thoſe whom they conſider as partakers with them in the ſame hope, or whom they earneſtly deſire, by all prudent condeſcenſion and tenderneſs, to lead into the way of ſalvation.

Let the heart of every Chriſtian ſoldier be at once awakened and animated by the important charge which the Apoſtle, as it were, ſtill ſounds in our ears. ver. 10—18. He knew the weakneſs of the Chriſtian, and the dangers of his way; how inſufficient for the ſpiritual ritual warfare we are in ourſelves, and that our only ſtrength is in the Lord, and in the power of his might, by whom alone we can be kept in ſafety, and may be made even more than conquerors in all things: And therefore, pointing us to this, at the ſame time that he ſets forth the difficulty of the combat, and ſounds a charge to the battle; He ſhews us the proviſion made for our defence, and calls us to put on the complete armour of God; an armour, which will ſerve for every part; which will ſupply us both with offenſive and defenſive weapons, and help us to withſtand, and even to ſurmount the greateſt oppoſition. Let us ſee to it then, that we both put on, and that we uſe it all.

And when we conſider the greatneſs and number of our enemies, their reſtleſs and unwearied malice, and their inconceivable ſubtilty, —have we not enough to engage us in the application of this divine panoply? Fleſh and blood have too, too frequently worſted us; how then ſhall we ſtand againſt principalities and powers; againſt the rulers of the darkneſs of this world, and againſt ſpirits of wickedneſs, who make it ſtill their buſineſs to draw others into that ſpiritual wickedneſs, which they were firſt ſo daring as to ſhew in heavenly places?

Indeed, it will be impoſſible we ſhould at any time be ſafe from danger, if every direction here given be not diligently attended to; Having ſuch a numerous and mighty hoſt of enemies combined againſt us, we ſhall never be able to withſtand and overcome them, —if the girdle of truth be looſened,—if the breaſt-plate of righteouſneſs be not put on,—if the preparation of the Goſpel of peace do not ſecure our ſteps;—if the helmet of ſalvation do not guard our head,—if the ſhield of faith be not our defence and ſhelter, and the ſword of the Spirit our weapon. And vainly ſhall we labour to obtain this armour by any other method, if fervent prayer and ſupplication in the ſpirit, under the aids and influences of his grace, be not addreſſed to the God of heaven, whoſe work and whoſe gift this celeſtial armour is: So that if ever we would have it, and uſe it aright, let us perſiſt in ſeeking it with holy importunity and perſeverance, and the deſired anſwer ſhall not always be denied.

To conclude; let us often contemplate the great Apoſtle St. Paul, as diſcharging his embaſſy in a chain, that ſo we may learn to ſubmit to whatever affronts and injuries, whatever hardſhips and ſufferings we may be called to endure, on the account of religion: (ver. 20.) Concerned about nothing ſo much, as that we may approve our fidelity in the ſight of God; and, loving the Lord Jeſus Chriſt in ſincerity, may be partakers of the bleſſings of his grace, with all that have a true affection for him. ver. 23, 24. All that appear to be of ſuch a character, may we ever moſt affectionately love, whatever their particular ſentiments, or forms of worſhip may be; for thus, a ſhare of this mercy and favour, with all the bleſſed fruits of peace and proſperity, of love and faith, ſhall be infallibly our own, and be communicated in a rich abundance to our ſouls, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Amen.

PHILIPPIANS.

CHAP. I.

He teſtifieth his thankfulneſs to God, and his love toward them, for the fruits of their faith, and fellowſhip in his ſufferings; daily praying to him for their increaſe in grace: he ſheweth what good the faith of Chriſt had received by his troubles at Rome, and how ready he is to glorify Chriſt, either by his life or death: exhorting them to unity, and to fortitude in perſecution.

PAUL and Timotheus, the ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, to all the ſaints in Chriſt Jeſus which are at Philippi, with the biſhops and deacons:

2 Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

3 I thank my God upon every remembrance of you,

4 (Always in every prayer of mine for you all making requeſt with joy,)

5 For your fellowſhip in the goſpel from the firſt day until now;

6 Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you, will perform it until the day of Jeſus Chriſt:

7 Even as it is meet for me to think this of you all, becauſe I have you in my heart; inaſmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the goſpel, ye all are partakers of my grace.

8 For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all, in the bowels of Jeſus Chriſt.

PHILIPPIANS] Philippi was a city of no great extent in Macedonia, on the borders of Thrace. The Chriſtian religion was firſt planted there about the year 51 by St. Paul, (ſee Acts xvi. 12.) who left St. Luke and Timothy to carry on the work. He afterwards paid them a ſecond viſit; Acts xxi. 6. and it is probable ſaw them afterwards a third time. This Epiſtle was ſent at the ſame time with the preceding, A. D. 62, or 63. The deſign of it is to comfort the Philippians, under the concern they had expreſſed for his impriſonment at Rome; to check a party ſpirit which had crept in among them; and to promote on the contrary an intire union and harmony of affection;—to guard them againſt being ſeduced from the purity of the Chriſtian faith by judaizing teachers; to ſupply them under the trials with which they ſtruggled; and above all, to inſpire them with a concern to adorn their holy profeſſion by the moſt eminent attainments in the divine life. See Grotius, Hammond, Lardner, Michaelis, and Peirce.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. Paul and Timotheus] This and the following verſe contain the inſcription or introduction of this Epiſtle. St. Paul might chooſe to join Timothy with him, as he not only had attended the Apoſtle in his general travels into theſe parts, but had aſſiſted in preaching the Goſpel at Philippi. Comp. Acts xvi. 1, 3, 12. Some have inquired why St. Paul does not ſtile himſelf an Apoſtle here, and in his two Epiſtles to the Theſſalonians, and in that to Philemon, as he does in all the other Epiſtles which bear his name; and have accounted for it by obſerving, That no objection had been made to his character at Theſſalonica or Philippi; and that, having received a preſent from them, he might not ſeem to be burdenſome as an Apoſtle of Chriſt. Perhaps it rather was, becauſe Timothy and Silas, who were neither of them Apoſtles, are joined with him here, and in the Epiſtles to the Theſſalonians. See Doddridge, Peirce, and Whitby.

Ver. 3. I thank my God] From hence to verſe 11. the Apoſtle acquaints the Philippians with the ſatiſfaction he had in them, and how much he thanked God upon their account, and what was the matter of his prayers to God for them. Inſtead of, upon every remembrance of you, Dr. Heylin reads, as often as I make mention of you: and he obſerves, that it was the cuſtom, as well of the Jews as of the Chriſtians, to name in their prayers thoſe for whom they had a great regard: 1 Macc. xii. 11. Epheſ. vi. 18. We retain ſome traces of this in our own public worſhip. Others, however, underſtood the paſſage as referring to the kind remembrance which the Philippians had of St. Paul.

Ver. 4. Always in every prayer, &c.] It is not to be ſuppoſed that St. Paul never made any prayer, public or private, wherein he did not expreſly mention the caſe of the Philippians: The meaning of the paſſage therefore only is, "Always in every prayer of mine, which I put up for you all, praying with joy; which joy is on account of your fellowſhip, &c."

Ver. 5. For your fellowſhip, &c.] Your contribution to the Goſpel. Wat. Your participation in the Goſpel. MS, Doddridge, and Heylin; who obſerves that the meaning is, "the part you have in the Goſpel;—obeying its precepts, and profiting by the graces which accompany it." See Cor. i. 9. 2 Cor. viii. 4. xiii. 13.

Ver. 6. Until the day of Jeſus Chriſt] See ver. 10. The meaning of the clauſe is, "He who hath begun the good work of grace in you, will finiſh it in your ſouls, until he raiſe it to full perfection in the day of Jeſus Chriſt, when he ſhall appear in all his glory."

Ver. 7. Even as it is meet, &c.] As it is juſt in me to be thus affected towards you all; becauſe you have me in your hearts, both in my bonds, and in my defence and confirmation of the Goſpel, being all partakers with me of its grace. Doddridge. Dr. Heylin renders the verſe more paraphraſtically thus; And it is but juſt that I ſhould have this opinion of you all, being intimately conſcious as I am of the intereſt you take in the favour God does me, with reſpect to my confinement, and the defence and confirmation of the Goſpel. See Peirce.

Ver. 8. God is my record, &c. "God is my witneſs that I long to ſee you with that peculiar tenderneſs of affection, which nothing but

9 And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge, and in all judgement;

10 That ye may approve things that are excellent; that ye may be ſincere and without offence till the day of Chriſt;

11 Being filled with the fruits of righteouſneſs, which are by Jeſus Chriſt, unto the glory and praiſe of God.

12 But I would ye ſhould underſtand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me, have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the goſpel;

13 So that my bonds in Chriſt are manifeſt in all the palace, and in all other places;

14 And many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to ſpeak the word without fear.

15 Some indeed preach Chriſt even of envy and ſtrife; and ſome alſo of good will:

16 The one preach Chriſt of contention, not ſincerely, ſuppoſing to add affliction to my bonds:

17 But the other of love, knowing that I am ſet for the defence of the goſpel.

18 What then? notwithſtanding every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Chriſt is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

19 For I know that this ſhall turn to my ſalvation through your prayer, and the ſupply of the Spirit of Jeſus Chriſt, 20 According to my earneſt expectation, and my hope, that in nothing I ſhall be aſhamed, but that with all boldneſs, as always, ſo now alſo, Chriſt ſhall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life or by death.

21 For to me to live is Chriſt, and to die is gain.

theſe bonds of mutual faith and love centering in him can be capable of producing, and which greatly reſemble the compaſſion which Chriſt himſelf feels for thoſe whom his grace hath made the members of his body." Bowels is a term which denotes the moſt intenſe, ardent, and ſincere affection. Dr. Heylin renders the verſe, For God is my witneſs, that I love you all with a truly Chriſtian affection.

Ver. 9. In knowledge, and in all judgement] The former of theſe is explained of ſpeculative, the latter of practical knowledge; but the doctrine between the ideas ſuggeſted by the original would be much better preſerved, by rendering the laſt word αἰσθήσει, perception, or diſcernment. He wiſhes that they might not only know the principles which recommend candour and benevolence, but feel their influence on their hearts; which daily experience and obſervation ſhews, in ſome great pretenders to this kind of knowledge, is a very different thing. See Doddridge, Heylin, and Peirce.

Ver. 10. That ye may approve, &c.] So as to prove things which differ:—"To prove by experience, and know by trial, how incomparably excellent the Chriſtian character is beyond any other." See 1 Theſſ. v. 21. and Howe on the Spirit, vol. i. p. 271. Dr. Waterland reads it, That you may diſcern things that differ. The word rendered without offence, is of doubtful ſignification. Sometimes it implies, "the not giving offence to others;" 1 Cor. x. 32. But, conſidering the word ſincere with which it is here joined, the Apoſtle's meaning rather ſeems to be, "that they might do nothing to offend themſelves," to wound or grieve their own conſciences, but might have ἀπρόσκοπον συνείδησιν, a conſcience void of offence. Acts xxiv. 16. Peirce.

Ver. 11. Being filled, &c.] "Being filled with all the genuine fruits and effects of righteouſneſs, which are produced by virtue of a living faith in Jeſus Chriſt."

Ver. 12. But I would ye ſhould underſtand] The Philippians, from the great affection they bore to St. Paul, being much concerned on account of his preſent ſufferings, he labours from this to the 26th verſe to abate their concern, by repreſenting to them how uſeful his bonds had been to promote and ſpread the Goſpel; how calm and eaſy he was under all his trouble, and how intirely reſigned to the will and ſervice of Chriſt: and withal lets them know, he was verily perſuaded that he ſhould be freed from his bonds, and have another joyful opportunity of viſiting them. Peirce.

Ver. 13. So that my bonds in Chriſt are manifeſt] "So that my bonds in or for Chriſt are manifeſted and taken notice of in all the palace of Cæſar, and all other places in and about the city; and have ſeemed ſo remarkable, that many have been excited to inquire, much to their own ſatisfaction and advantage, what there was in this new and unknown religion, which could animate me ſo chearfully to endure hardſhips and perſecution in its defence; for they ſoon traced up my ſufferings to this, as their only cauſe." Mr. Peirce would render this verſe, So that it is manifeſt, both in the Pretorium and elſewhere, that my bonds are for Chriſt; that is, "that I ſuffer only for the ſake of Chriſtianity, and not for any real crime." And Dr. Heylin gives nearly the ſame interpretation:—So that my impriſonment for the ſake of Chriſt is now publickly known at the court, and in all other places.

Ver. 14. Waxing confident in my bonds, &c.] Encouraged by my bonds, preach the word with greater freedom and intrepidity. See Heylin and Doddridge.

Ver. 15. Some indeed preach Chriſt, &c.] It is very proper here to inquire who theſe preachers were, the rightly ſtating whereof may give ſome light to this Epiſtle. There can be no doubt that they muſt have been profeſſed converts to the Chriſtian religion; for no unconverted Jews or Gentiles would ever give themſelves the trouble to preach Chriſt; and in all probability theſe preachers muſt have been converts from Judaiſm; for, firſt, by comparing what St. Paul ſays in his other Epiſtles, it appears, that the greateſt oppoſition, diſturbance, or hindrance he met with from any who profeſſed themſelves Chriſtians, was from them: nor could he indeed well be oppoſed by any others but Jewiſh converts, or ſuch as were ſeduced by, and fell in with them. Secondly, who beſides theſe were likely to endeavour to add affliction to St. Paul's bonds?—He continually repreſents the cauſe of his bonds to be his preaching and aſſerting the liberty of the Gentiles. Now they who were moſt diſpleaſed with that conduct, which brought his ſufferings upon him, were likely enough to be moſt forward in endeavouring to aggravate his trouble under them;—and who can they be, but the Jewiſh converts? Peirce.

Ver. 16. Not ſincerely] This may refer to the matter of their preaching: It was not ſincere, pure, and uncorrupted Goſpel; but they adulterated it, by mixing Judaiſm with it; and ſo they perverted the Goſpel of Chriſt. Gal. i. 7. Or it may refer to the intentions of the preachers: they acted not ſincerely in what they did; but while they pretended their great end was to preach Chriſt, inſtead of that, they made it their chief buſineſs to preach down the Apoſtle, and to leſſen his reputation. The next words ſeem to ſupport the latter ſenſe, as does what he ſays in ver. 18. See Peirce and Doddridge. Dr. Waterland, following a different reading, renders the clauſe, ſuppoſing to ſtir up affliction, &c.

Ver. 17. I am ſet, &c.] Some would render the word κεῖμαι, I lie, i. e. in bonds for the Goſpel, in order to make an Apology for it before Nero; and this they think a more moving conſideration, and one which would ſooner excite love and tenderneſs, than what is expreſſed in our tranſlation;—that he was ſet, called, raiſed up, for the defence of the Goſpel. Heylin renders it, Knowing that I am reduced to this ſtate, for the defence of the Goſpel.

Ver. 19. This ſhall turn to my ſalvation] My deliverance. Wat. Mr. Peirce alſo gives the ſame interpretation, and thinks, that as they who preached Chriſt out of love, made more friends for the Apoſtle, ſo they who preached him out of envy, gave his friends an opportunity of repreſenting his perſecutors as proceeding upon principles of malice. But, as ſuch an event could ſcarcely be ſaid to proceed from the ſupply of the Spirit of Jeſus Chriſt, by ſalvation may be meant the Apoſtle's eternal happineſs; and his perſuaſion might be, that all the deſigns of his adverſaries againſt him ſhould be ſo over-ruled, that through the ſupplies of the Holy Spirit all ſhould work together for good; and his eternal ſalvation be advanced thereby, through the concurrence and aſſiſtance of their prayers. See Doddridge, Pierce, Pyle, and Grotius.

Ver. 20. With all boldneſs] With all openneſs, or in the moſt public manner. See John vii. 4. and Peirce.

Ver. 21. To me to live is Chriſt, &c.] "He is the ſupreme end of life, and I value it only as it is capable of being referred to the purpoſes of his honour; and in conſequence of that, to die is gain: for as that temper argues my intereſt in the friendſhip of that Redeemer, who is the Lord of the inviſible, as well as the viſible world, I am well ſatisfied that he will make ample proviſion for my happineſs, when I quit this tranſitory life, and ſurround me with far more important bleſſings than any which I muſt then reſign. Nor is the utility of my death confined to this; it may be inſtrumental towards 22 But if I live in the fleſh, this is the fruit of my labour: yet what I ſhall chooſe, I wot not.

23 For I am in a ſtrait betwixt two, having a deſire to depart, and to be with Chriſt; which is far better:

24 Nevertheleſs, to abide in the fleſh is more needful for you.

25 And having this confidence, I know that I ſhall abide and continue with you all, for your furtherance and joy of faith;

26 That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jeſus Chriſt for me, by my coming to you again.

27 Only let your converſation be as it becometh the Goſpel of Chriſt: that whether I come and ſee you, or elſe be abſent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye ſtand faſt in one ſpirit, with one mind ſtriving together for the faith of the goſpel;

28 And in nothing terrified by your adverſaries: which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of ſalvation, and that of God.

29 For unto you it is given in the behalf of Chriſt, not only to believe on him, but alſo to ſuffer for his ſake;

CHAP. II.

He exhorteth them to unity, and to all humbleneſs of mind, by the example of Chriſt's humility and exaltation: to a careful proceeding in the way of ſalvation; that they be as lights to the wicked world, and comforts to him their apoſtle, who is now ready to be offered up to God: he hopeth to ſend Timothy to them, whom he greatly commendeth, as Epaphroditus alſo, whom he preſently ſendeth to them.

gaining others over to the religion of Chriſt; ſo that in all caſes, whether I reſpect the honour of Chriſt, or my own eternal condition, To me to live is Chriſt, and to die is gain." Mr. Peirce would render this, For Chriſt is gain to me, living or dying. See his note, Doddridge, and Gataker in Antonin. lib. ix. ſect. ult.

Ver. 22. But if I live in the fleſh] "But if my lot ſhould be to live longer in the fleſh, this magnifying or ſerving Chriſt will be the fruit of my labour, &c." There ſeems to be ſomething emphatical in the Apoſtle's manner of expreſſing himſelf in this and the 24th verſe. It appears to be his intention to ſhew the little value he ſet upon life for its own ſake, and therefore to ſpeak of it by way of contempt and diſparagement: as though he had ſaid, "If I muſt yet live longer in this painful miſerable fleſh." He thought life valuable and important, conſidered with reſpect to Chriſt and his ſervice, as he had ſpoken of it before; but by this variation of his ſtile, or his adding in the fleſh, he may be underſtood to hint, that he was not fond of life, as men commonly are; knowing that his life, if continued, muſt, as formerly, be a life of labour and fatigue. This may be further intimated in the next clauſe,—this is the fruit of my labour; i. e. "of the great toil wherewith my life will be filled up." Inſtead of I wot not, read I know not. See Peirce, Beza, and Blackwall's Sacr. Claſ. vol. i. p. 34.

Ver. 23. For I am in a ſtrait, &c.] "For I am, as it were, borne two different ways; having on the one hand a more earneſt deſire, out of regard to my own immediate happineſs, to be unbound, to weigh anchor, and quitting theſe mortal ſhores, ſet ſail for that happy world, where I ſhall be immediately with Chriſt;—which is better beyond all compariſon and expreſſion, with regard to my own private happineſs." The original is very emphatical; and ſeems, according to the turn given in the paraphraſe, to be an alluſion to a ſhip ſtationed at a particular place, and riding at anchor, and at the ſame time likely to be forced to ſea by the violence of the winds: Which gives us a lively repreſentation of the Apoſtle's attachment to his ſituation in the Chriſtian church, and the vehemency of his deſire to weigh anchor, and ſet ſail for the heavenly country;—that he might be with Chriſt; An expreſſion, which plainly proves that the ſeparate ſpirits of good men are with Chriſt in ſuch a manner, as that their ſtate is far better than while they continue in this preſent world; which a ſtate of inſenſibility cannot poſſibly be. Though this does not tend at all to diſprove that large acceſſion of happineſs after the reſurrection, which other Scriptures plainly declare. See 2 Cor. v. 5—10. The original of what we render far better, is ſo very emphatical, that it cannot be tranſlated literally; Better beyond all expreſſion, in ſome meaſure gives the ſenſe; for indeed the Apoſtle ſeems to labour here for expreſſion, as much as in any part of his writings. See Doddridge, Peirce, Wetſtein, Mill, and Fleming's Chriſtology, vol. iii. p. 530.

Ver. 25. I know that I ſhall abide, &c.] "I am perſuaded that I ſhall live yet longer, and have an opportunity of viſiting you all." Probably the Apoſtle had ſome particular revelation whereupon to ground his confidence. It is not by any means to be imagined that he refers to intimations from the palace how it ſhould go with him. He muſt have known little of princes and courtiers, eſpecially in Nero's reign, to build ſo confidently on ſuch a foundation. Dr. Heylin, upon the laſt words, joy of faith, obſerves, that the preaching of an Apoſtle never fails of producing actual faith in minds diſpoſed like thoſe of the Philippians; and experience teaches that ſuch faith is accompanied with joyous ſenſations. It is luminous, and fills the ſoul with a delectable reliſh of truth. Hence, joy in believing, &c.

Ver. 27.] From hence to ch. ii. 18. St. Paul preſſes upon the Philippians a perſeverance and unanimity in the faith which he had taught them, notwithſtanding the oppoſition they met with on account of it; and withal, he urges them to be peaceable, and condeſcending to one another, and ready to perform all mutual good offices. This he enforces by various affecting conſiderations, and particularly that of the condeſcenſion of Chriſt, and his bleſſed reward; which he ſpeaks of in very ſtrong and lively terms.

There can be no doubt, that having their converſation worthy of the Goſpel of Chriſt, imports in general their living according to the direction of the Goſpel, and anſwerably to the great favour vouchſafed them. See Epheſ. iv. 1. Col. i. 10. 1 Theſſ. ii. 12. iv. 1. But the latter part of this verſe, together with the next, ſhews what he had here principally in view; namely, their continuing ſtedfaſt in the doctrine he had taught them, concerning the liberty which God had granted them as Gentiles. The word rendered, Let your converſation be, ſignifies literally, "to behave as denizens of ſome city or corporation." See Peirce, Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. i. p. 42. and on ch. iii. 20.

Ver. 28. In nothing terrified, &c.] It evidently appears from hence, and from ſeveral other paſſages in this Epiſtle, that the Philippians were now in a ſuffering ſtate: Which is a circumſtance to be borne in mind as we go on, as it illuſtrates ſeveral maſterly ſtrokes in the Apoſtle's addreſs to them. "I ſuppoſe, ſays Dr. Heylin, that the ἥτις, in this verſe, refers to πίςις τȣ ἐυαγγελίȣ, the faith of the Goſpel, in the verſe above; and that the ſenſe is the ſame as in Rom. i. 18. where it is ſaid that in the Goſpel the wrath of God is revealed againſt all impiety and injuſtice of men, &c. Wherever the Goſpel is preached, it is no indifferent thing, even to thoſe who do not receive it; becauſe it is a warning to them from God, of the danger they incur by diſobedience." See on Epheſ. i. 15.

Ver. 29. For unto you it is given, &c.] For it is granted to you as a favour, on the part of Chriſt. Doddridge, Heylin, &c. St. Paul very ſkilfully diverts them from viewing perſecution under its moſt frightful appearance, and leads them to conſider it as a gift and an honour conferred upon them. We may obſerve the like in the diſcourſe of another Apoſtle: 1 Pet. iv. 12—16. Some would read from the words in ver. 28. which is to them, &c. to the end of the preſent verſe, in a parentheſis, and connect the 30th with the former part of the 28th verſe. See the original, Peirce, and Lardner's Credibil. vol. i. p. 417.

Ver. 30. Having the ſame conflict, &c.] "Having in a great meaſure the ſame ſtruggle with the adverſaries of the Goſpel, who labour to overbear it by brutal violence,—As ye ſaw to be in me, when I was among you in Philippi, and was ſtripped, and ſcourged, and laid in the dungeon, and in the ſtocks; and which you now hear to be in me at Rome, whither you know I have been ſent in bonds, as an evil doer; having been obliged to appeal unto Cæſar, for the preſervation of my life." See Doddridge, and Acts xvi. 19, &c.

Chap. II. Ver. 1. If therefore] This therefore ſeems to have a reference to what he had before declared, ch. i. 25, 26. of his willingneſs to continue yet longer in the fleſh for their ſakes; and the connection will ſtand thus: "I am contented, as you may perceive fellowſhip of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies,

2 Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the ſame love, being of one accord, of one mind.

3 Let nothing be done through ſtrife, or vain-glory, but in lowlineſs of mind let each eſteem other better than themſelves.

4 Look not every man on his own things, but every man alſo on the things of others.

5 Let this mind be in you, which was alſo in Chriſt Jeſus:

6 Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God:

Ver. 2. Rom. xii. 16. xv. 5. 1 Cor. i. 10. Ch. iii. 15. 1 Pet. iii. 8.—V. 3. Ch. i. 15, 16. Rom. xii. 10. 1 Pet. v. 5.—V. 4. 1 Cor. x. 24. xiii. 5.—V. 5. Matth. xi. 29. John xiii. 15. 1 Pet. ii. 21. 1 John ii. 6.—V. 6. John i. 1, 2. xvii. 5. John v. 18.

by what I have ſaid, to abide longer in this wearisome and afflicted eſtate, and to be kept from that happineſs, on which I have fixed my moſt earneſt expectation and deſire; and the reaſon why I am eaſy to continue thus here, is, that I may be ſerviceable to you, in improving your faith, and promoting your joy; and ſince ſuch is my affection to you, do you make me a ſuitable return; and therefore take care to comply with the exhortation I give you, that you may be a comfort and a joy to me. The word παράκλησις is uſed ſometimes to ſignify exhortation, and ſometimes conſolation; and where the context does not determine the ſenſe, it is doubtful which way it ſhould be underſtood. If it be taken in the former ſignification, the meaning is, If a Chriſtian exhortation be of any weight with you; if in the latter, the meaning is, If Chriſtianity affords any conſolation. See Peirce, and Heylin.

Ver. 2. Fulfil ye my joy] He had told them, ch. i. 25. that his coming again to them would be for the promotion of the joy of their faith. Now in theſe words he demands of them a ſuitable return; and that they would by their behaviour promote his joy. See Rom. i. 11, 12. Dr Doddridge tranſlates the remaining part of this verſe as follows: That ye may be unanimous, maintaining the ſame love; having your ſouls joined together, in attending to the one great thing.

Ver. 3. In lowlineſs of mind, &c.] It cannot be imagined that St. Paul required Chriſtians of the longeſt ſtanding, and the greateſt eminence in the church, to count themſelves inferior to ſuch as had but juſt entered into it. He certainly can mean no more, than that every one ſhould be lowly and condeſcending, and ready to ſerve the loweſt and meaneſt Chriſtian. This was the temper of St. Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 19. And this was the temper of a greater than he, even our Lord himſelf, who has made his example a rule for us. See Matth. xx. 26—28. and comp. Rom. xii. 10. 1 Pet. v. 5. The Apoſtle in the former verſe exhorts the Philippians to be at peace and unity amongſt themſelves: In this, like a wiſe phyſician, he ſearches to the bottom of the evil which he would cure; and well knowing that pride and vain-glory are the perpetual ſources of ſtrife and contention, he exhorts them to fly from thoſe evils, preſſes them to lowlineſs of mind, and admoniſhes them not to overvalue themſelves, nor undervalue others; but to practiſe humility towards each other. See Peirce, and Sherlock's Diſcourſes, vol. iv. p. 3.

Ver. 4. Look not every man, &c.] "Let no one among you be only ſolicitous for his own profit; but let every one deſire, and as he has opportunity further the profit of others." See ver. 21.

Ver. 5. Let this mind be in you] For let this mind. Wat. For the ſame temper of mind ought to be in you, which was in Chriſt Jeſus. Heylin. To ſupport his doctrine, and to enforce obedience to it, the Apoſtle ſets before the Philippians the example of Chriſt, and in lively colours repreſents his great humility: He ſhews them how much he deſcended below himſelf for their ſakes; how truly great he was, and how truly low he made himſelf; by nature, how much higher than the higheſt; by choice, how much lower than the loweſt. It ſhould be obſerved, that in the ſucceeding verſes the Apoſtle points out to us three different ſtates and conditions of Chriſt: The firſt is his ſtate of dignity from which he deſcended, expreſſed in the words, Who being in the form of God, ver. 6. The ſecond is, the ſtate of humility to which he deſcended, in theſe words, He made himſelf of no reputation: ver. 7. The third is, his ſtate of glory and exaltation, intimated in thoſe words, Wherefore God hath highly exalted him: ver. 9. Theſe three ſtates and conditions of Chriſt are eſſential to the Apoſtle's argument; for take away any one of them, and the example which the Apoſtle would propoſe is loſt. For inſtance, if you remove the firſt ſtate, that of his natural dignity and excellence, the ſecond ſtate will be no longer a ſtate of humiliation, nor Chriſt any longer an example of humility: For if he was not better than a ſervant before he was a ſervant, his being a ſervant was his lot and condition, not his choice; it was owing to the order of nature and Providence, and not to his humility; and he was no more humble in being born to be a ſervant, than others who are born to the ſame ſtate. It is implied in the argument, that he was in poſſeſſion of whatever belonged to his ſtate of dignity and excellence, before he underwent any thing that belonged to his ſtate of humiliation: For his voluntarily deſcending from his dignity to a lower and meaner condition, is the very act and real ground and foundation of his humility. It is likewiſe neceſſarily implied in the argument, that he underwent whatever belonged to his ſtate of humiliation, before he enjoyed any thing that belonged to his ſtate of exaltation; becauſe his exaltation was the effect and reward of his humility; and being purchaſed and obtained by his humility, it could not be antecedent to it. Conſequently it neceſſarily follows, that his natural ſtate of dignity, and his acquired ſtate of exaltation, are two perfectly different ſtates; ſince one was evidently antecedent to, the other as evidently conſequent to, his humiliation: From whence it follows, that his being in the form of God, being the dignity he was poſſeſſed of before his humiliation, does not belong to him in virtue of any thing he did or ſuffered, nor is any part of that glory to which he was exalted, or which he received after, or upon account of his ſufferings. See Sherlock's Diſc. vol. iv. p. 4, &c.

Ver. 6. Who, being in the form of God] In order to ſet forth the great humility of Chriſt in becoming man, the Apoſtle firſt tells us from how great and glorious a ſtate he deſcended; he was in the form of God. The following words, as they ſtand in our tranſlation, go on to deſcribe the excellency of his glory, which was ſo real and tranſcendant a glory, that he thought it no robbery to be, i. e. he thought himſelf entitled to be equal with God. We ſhall not inſiſt upon this tranſlation, for it is more agreeable to the Apoſtle's argument, and to the language he made uſe of, to ſuppoſe him to intend in theſe words, to expreſs the firſt degree and inſtance of his humility; and that the verſe ſhould be rendered to this effect: "Who, being in the form of God, was not fond, or tenacious of appearing as God, but made himſelf of no reputation." But which way ſoever of theſe two the text be underſtood, the words rendered to be equal to God, will be found to belong to Jeſus Chriſt. If he thought it no robbery to aſſume this equality to God, undoubtedly he was equal: Or if it was the effect of his humility that he did not hold or inſiſt upon his equality with God, then certainly he had ſuch an equality; for where is the humility of not inſiſting on, or not retaining an equality, which never did or could belong to us? Some perſons, in tranſlating theſe words, make uſe of expreſſions purpoſely choſen to exclude Chriſt from the dignity here mentioned; for thus they make the Apoſtle ſpeak: "Who being in the form of God, did not arrogate, aſſume, or lay claim to any equality or likeneſs to God;" but it ſeems that this language bears no analogy to the words in the original, nor can be made to agree with the aim and deſign of the Apoſtle. The expreſſion in the original is metaphorical, and alludes to the eagerneſs and tenaciouſneſs with which men catch and retain the prey, which they are afraid will ſlip out of their hands: But no language knows what it is to aſſume, arrogate, or lay claim to a prey: A prey is to be caught, to be held faſt; but not to be aſſumed, arrogated, or laid claim to. Beſides, it is evidently St. Paul's deſign to ſet forth the great humility of Chriſt: In order to this, he ſays, he did not greedily retain his equality with God; which, ſuppoſing the equality to belong to him, is a very great, the greateſt inſtance of humility; But for any perſon, who has no right or title to ſuch equality, to arrogate or lay claim to it, is pride and madneſs. Whatever therefore is meant by the being equal to God, St. Paul evidently ſuppoſes, in his argument, that it did belong to Chriſt before his humiliation, when he was in the form of God. By comparing the ſeveral parts of the Apoſtle's argument together, it may appear that the form of God, and the being equal to God, are expreſſions that relate to the ſame thing, ſo that he who is poſſeſſed of the firſt has a right to the laſt. The foundation of the Apoſtle's argument is this; that Chriſt, enjoying a more exalted ſtate of glory, was not fond or tenacious of that glory, but made himſelf of no reputation: for this argument being wholly ſpent in ſetting forth the humility of Chriſt, there is no occaſion of mentioning any other glory, than that which out of his great humility he laid aſide. The glory therefore which he had, and the glory he laid aſide, are one and the ſame glory,—the glory which belongs to the form of God. But further, let us read this and the next verſe together; "Who being in the form of God, did not eagerly inſiſt to be equal with God; but made himſelf of no reputation, or, as the original ſignifies, he emptied himſelf, and took on him, &c." The humility of Chriſt conſiſted in changing willingly a glorious for an inglorious condition: the glorious condition which he was poſſeſſed of was the form of God; the inglorious condition to which he ſubmitted, was the form of a ſervant; when the Apoſtle therefore ſays, Who being in the form of God, took upon him the form, &c. he plainly intimates that he obſcured or laid aſide the glory belonging to the form of God, when he took upon him the form of a ſervant. The form of God therefore expreſſes all thoſe glories, which Chriſt willingly ſuffered to be hid, in his ſtate of humility. The very ſame thing is expreſſed by the equality with God, here mentioned: for it is ſaid that he did not eagerly inſiſt to be equal with God. Now certainly, that which he did not inſiſt to keep, and that which he emptied himſelf of, is one and the ſame thing. If therefore the glories he laid aſide were the form of God, and if the glories which he did not inſiſt to keep were his equality with God, you muſt neceſſarily ſay, that the form of God, and the equality with God, are one and the ſame. Though what has been ſaid does not diſcover any preciſe notion belonging to each expreſſion, it ſhews evidently that the equality with God did as properly belong to our Lord before his coming into the world, as the form of God did. Beſides, the form of the argument affords us ſtill further evidence, that St. Paul eſteemed theſe characters to be proper and peculiar to Chriſt, his natural and inherent, not his borrowed glories: for conſider what it is that St. Paul exhorts the Philippians to, ver. 4. "Look not every man to his own things, &c." He exhorts them not to look to their own things, but, ſays he, ver. 5. "Let this mind be in you, &c." Then he ſets forth, as his argument requires, how little Chriſt regarded things belonging to himſelf; for being in the form of God, he was not eager of appearing equal with God. This form of God therefore, and his equality with God, were certainly thoſe things of his own, which the Apoſtle intended to ſhew that he did not look to. Suppoſe then that the form of God means the glories proper and peculiar to the preſence of God; and to be equal to God ſignifies only to be clothed with equal glories, to appear in his majeſty and power; yet it deſerves to be conſidered, who and what manner of perſon he is to whom the glories do belong, and do ſo belong as to be his own. Should God communicate his glories to a creature, yet the glories of God ſo communicated, could in no ſenſe be ſaid to be the creature's own glories. Our own glories are thoſe only which are proper and peculiar to our nature. See Eſſay on the Trinity, p. 67, &c. Bos Exerc. p. 196, &c. Ellys's Fortuit. Sacr. 178, &c. and Burnet on the Art. p. 46.

Ver. 7. But made himſelf of no reputation] Nevertheleſs he debaſed, or emptied himſelf, taking the form of a ſervant, by being made in the likeneſs of men. Wat. The form of a ſervant, in this verſe, is plainly oppoſed to the form of God: When he laid aſide the form of God, he took the form of a ſervant. If therefore we can come at the determinate meaning of either of theſe expreſſions, it will certainly lead to the knowledge of the other. The true way to explain this place may be found in Heb. i. 1—7—14. The image which the writer ſeems to have before him, is that of a great houſhold. He conſiders God as the Maſter of the family, the Father of Chriſt, and the Lord and Maker of the univerſe: Chriſt is conſidered as the Son, the heir of all things: other beings are the ſervants and attendants belonging to the family. Under this view, it is not hard to know what the Apoſtle means in the paſſage before us, when he ſays Chriſt took upon him the form of a ſervant. He was truly the Son of the family, the heir of all things, and had the form and majeſty of his Father; but he deſcended from the glories of his Father, and became like one of the family, ſubmitting to take the form and character of a ſervant upon him. The Apoſtle adds, being made in the likeneſs of men: The reaſon and meaning of this addition the Apoſtle will likewiſe teach us, Heb. ii. 16. Verily he took not on him the nature of angels, &c. Angels are ſervants as well as men; therefore by ſaying Chriſt took on him the form of a ſervant, there was room to ſuppoſe him to have taken the nature of angels: to ſhew therefore what nature he took, the Apoſtle ſays, he took the form of a ſervant in the likeneſs of men; that is, in the nature of man. So then, the form of a ſervant is a common mark and character of all the creatures of God; the likeneſs here ſpoken of is the peculiar and proper character of each ſpecies. So that the form of a ſervant, and the likeneſs of a man, make a complete and perfect man. He was not only a man in appearance and in likeneſs, but in reality, having the ſame common nature diſtinguiſhed by the ſame ſpecific differences. See Sherlock as above, p. 29—32.

Ver. 8. And being found in faſhion, &c.] It requires ſome attention to the Apoſtle's argument to diſtinguiſh rightly between the form, the likeneſs, and the faſhion, which are all in this place applied to Jeſus Chriſt. In ver. 6, 7. the Apoſtle ſays, "Who being in the form of God, did not eagerly retain his equality with God, but emptied himſelf." By this equality, which Chriſt did not retain, but emptied himſelf of, we can hardly underſtand any thing elſe, but the divine glories in which he appeared, and which, during the ſtate of his humiliation, he laid aſide. His nature he could not lay aſide; he continued to be the Son of God, though he appeared not like the Son of God; and therefore, the Apoſtle adds, being man, he was found in faſhion as a man, appearing in no greater majeſty or glory than what truly belonged to him as man. The faſhion of a man anſwers to the being equal with God; that equality which he laid aſide being nothing elſe but the faſhion, or truly divine and majeſtic appearance of God. The form of God anſwers both to the form of a ſervant, and the likeneſs of men. The form of a ſervant being common to all the different orders of creatures, it did not ſufficiently expreſs what nature Chriſt took upon him; and therefore the addition, in the likeneſs of men, was but neceſſary. There are no different order of beings to whom the form of God belongs; and therefore the Apoſtle having told us that Chriſt was in the form of God, there wanted no addition to inform us what kind or manner of being he was: For the form of God belongs to God only. The faſhion of a man denotes thoſe diſtinguiſhing characters which belong to a man as ſuch, the true and real appearances of a man. Let us proceed then to conſider what led St. Paul to this expreſſion, and why he might not as well ſay, "Being man he humbled himſelf," as "being found in faſhion of a man, he humbled, &c." For this we muſt look back to the firſt riſe of the Apoſtle's argument. The perſon here ſpoken of, Jeſus Chriſt, was in the form of God, but emptied himſelf. Emptied himſelf of what? Not of his being or nature; but of the glories and majeſties belonging to him. Whatever he was as to nature and eſſence, when he was in the form of God, that he continued to be ſtill, when he became man. But the faſhion, or glories of the form of God, he laid down, and though he continued to be the ſame, yet as to the faſhion or outward dignity and appearance, he was a mere man; being found, as the Apoſtle ſays, in faſhion as a man. Had the Apoſtle conceived Chriſt, while here on earth, to have been a mere man only, in what tolerable ſenſe could he ſay of him, being found in faſhion as a man? For in what faſhion ſhould a man be found? What need was there of this limitation, unleſs in reality he was ſomething more than a man? But if you conſider the man Jeſus Chriſt to be the ſame perſon who was in the form of God, and who had, accordingly, a right to appear in the majeſty and glory of God; it is proper to aſk, How did he appear on earth? And the Apoſtle's words are a proper anſwer to the queſtion; He was found in faſhion as a man. The Apoſtle perhaps had another view in the choice of this expreſſion, with reſpect to what follows; And became obedient unto death: For it might well ſeem ſtrange, that any ſhould attempt the life of him, who was himſelf the Lord of life. He became obedient unto death; but how came he to be called to this obedience? Who was the bold man that laid hands upon this God upon earth, and was vain enough to think of compaſſing his death? To which the Apoſtle gives this previous anſwer: He was found in faſhion as a man, as ſuch his life was attempted, and he became obedient unto death. If you allow the Apoſtle to have had this in view, you muſt needs ſuppoſe that he thought Chriſt more than mortal man, when he is at ſome pains to aſſign a reaſon that could tempt any one to think him liable to death. Let us farther conſider, that the Apoſtle ſays, He humbled himſelf, and became obedient unto death, the death of the croſs. Death is common to all mankind, and if to die be humility, in this reſpect all are equally humble. How comes Jeſus Chriſt then to be diſtinguiſhed by this inſtance of humility? How comes that to be humility in him, which in every body elſe is neceſſity? If you ſpeak of mere man, you may as properly ſay, that he is humble in having two legs or arms, as in ſubmitting unto death, ſince both are equally the cauſe and work of nature: And yet you plainly ſee that the Apoſtle reckons it great humility in Chriſt, that he ſubmitted unto death. What manner of perſon then was Chriſt Jeſus, over whom death had no power, but through his own conſent and ſubmiſſion? Mortal he was, or elſe he could not have died; more than mortal he was, or elſe he could not have avoided death; in which caſe, to die had been no humility. You muſt allow that the Apoſtle ſuppoſes him to be more than mere man. Had he, when he became man, ceaſed to be what he was before, death had been but the natural and neceſſary conſequence of the change: but though he was a man, yet, being Lord of all things, it was always in his power to take up his life, and lay it down; for, as St. Paul ſays of thoſe who put Chriſt to death, they killed the Lord of life, or Prince of life: Being then, even whilſt on earth, and clothed with human fleſh and blood, the very Lord of life, and upholding all things by his power, he was ſuperior to the neceſſity of human nature, and ſubject to death only, becauſe he choſe to die. To die therefore was humility; to die upon the croſs ſtill greater; ſubmitting to thoſe wretches, who, whilſt they were deſtroying, lived only by his power, who was the Prince of life. It was humility therefore to become man: After he was man, it was humility to die; ſince the powers of life were in his own hand, and he could both lay down his life, and take it up. Sherlock, p. 33—49. Inſtead of, and became obedient, Dr. Waterland reads, by becoming obedient.

Ver. 9—11. Wherefore God alſo, &c.] In theſe words the Apoſtle ſets before us the exceeding great glory to which God the Father exalted Chriſt, as the end and reward of his great humility and ſufferings; words which diſcover to us the true foundation of the honour, and worſhip, and glory, which the Chriſtian church has ever, and ſtill continues to pay to our bleſſed Lord. There is a difficulty in conceiving how any acceſſion of glory or honour ſhould be made to him, who was, before his coming into the world, in the form of God; and yet the Apoſtle's argument ſuppoſes an acceſſion of honour to be made to him upon his exaltation, as the reward of his humility and obedience. God has more highly exalted him; (for ſo the original word ſignifies,) and given him a name above every name. This glory, therefore, according to the ſtrain of the Apoſtle's reaſoning, ought to be a more excellent glory than the firſt glory; for if God gave him nothing but what he had a right to from the dignity of his own nature, how did he reward his humility? To exalt is to raiſe to a higher ſtation; therefore the glory to which Chriſt was exalted ought to be a greater glory than that which he had before his humility. To ſet this matter in a true light we muſt conſider, that the glories of nature, and the glories of office, are very diſtinct glories; the Apoſtle ſays nothing of nature or eſſence, he ſpeaks of the perſon of Jeſus Chriſt, and conſiders him as the ſame perſon in all his different ſtates of glory, humility, and exaltation. The ſame nature which he had, being in the form of God, the ſame he had in his ſtate of humiliation, and now has in his ſtate of exaltation. The Apoſtle's argument does not infer that the natural powers and dignities of Chriſt Jeſus were increaſed, but only that, in conſequence of the redemption, God put all things immediately under him; making him head over all, and conſequently intitled him to that worſhip, and thoſe honours, which were not before paid him. In Matth. xxviii. 18, 19, 20. our Saviour himſelf declares that all power and authority were given him at his reſurrection. There is no doubt but this power is part of the exaltation which St. Paul ſpeaks of, to which God raiſed Chriſt for his ſufferings. Thoſe who pleaſe may ſee more to this purpoſe in Epheſ. i. From Revelations, ch. v. it is plain that the worſhip paid to Chriſt is founded in this; "That he was ſlain, and did by his blood redeem us." The Apoſtle proceeds, God hath given Chriſt a name above every name,—that every tongue ſhould confeſs, &c. Confeſſion here implies much more than a bare acknowledgement that Chriſt is the Lord. It comprehends thoſe honours, and that worſhip, which thoſe who heartily confeſs him to be the Lord, will naturally and readily pay him. How this confeſſion muſt be made, and from what ground it muſt proceed, the Apoſtle informs us in Rom. x. 8, 9. whence you may collect, that all men are to honour the Lord Jeſus upon this account, becauſe God hath raiſed him from the dead. Every man muſt honour the Son, even as he honoureth the Father: This honour paid to the Son muſt proceed from this principle of faith, that you believe God raiſed him from the dead, and made him Lord of all. But all the powers exerciſed by Chriſt, all the honours paid to him are ultimately referred to God, the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. For the honour paid to Chriſt being founded in the power and glory to which he is exalted, the honour paid muſt naturally follow the power and glory to which it relates, and at the laſt terminate in the fountain and origin of the power and glory,—even God the Father. By theſe means the peculiar honour of God the Father is ſecured, whilſt we worſhip and adore the Son. If we adore the Son, it is becauſe of the relation to the Father: If we honour our Redeemer, that honour muſt redound to his glory, who was in Chriſt reconciling the world to himſelf: If we apply it to Chriſt as our high-prieſt, at the ſame time we acknowledge his glory who anointed him to his office: If we worſhip him who is head of the church, we cannot but adore him who gave Chriſt to be the head of the church: If we fall down before him who has all power and might, at the ſame time do we confeſs the excellency of the Father, who hath given him all power, and put all things in ſubjection under him: So that we cannot honour the Son as we ought to do, but we muſt at the ſame time honour the Father with the honour due to him. Inſtead of things in heaven, &c. ver. 10. ſome read, of celeſtial beings, of thoſe upon, and under the earth: "Angels, and men, the living and the dead, yea devils themſelves ſhall do homage to Jeſus; who ſhall be ever adored, as the Saviour of his redeemed people, as the head of all holy and happy ſpirits; the ſovereign and uncontroulable Lord of all thoſe, whoſe rebellion againſt him and his heavenly Father, hath made them the worthy objects of perpetual diſpleaſure and puniſhment." See Epheſ. i. 10. Rom. xiv. 9. Rev. i. 18. Sherlock as before, Whitby, Peirce, and Doddridge.

Ver. 12, 13. Wherefore, my beloved] If St. Paul's diſcourſe here is read with attention, it will be found, that having diſpatched his argument from the example of Chriſt, he comes now to apply it to the purpoſe for which he brought it; namely, to preſs upon them that kind and friendly temper and behaviour towards one another, mentioned ver. 3—5. This is ſtill more plain, if we obſerve that in ver. 14. he continues his diſcourſe upon this ſubject in the general. See Peirce; who gives a very peculiar interpretation of the preſent paſſage, which we will juſt ſubjoin, referring to his note for the juſtification of it: "Wherefore, my beloved, as you have always obeyed me with the greateſt humility and concern, not only when I have been preſent with you, but more eſpecially ſince I left you, I am the more encouraged to urge upon you by this example of Chriſt, the duty I have recommended to you, of looking to the concerns of others, as well as your own; and of promoting each other's welfare. And you have good reaſon for this, becauſe in ſo doing you comply with the motion of God himſelf, who works in you to be inclined and to act, out of good will; and therefore, take care that you do all ſuch good offices chearfully, without murmurings, &c."—But the following, as it is the more general, ſo does it ſeem by far the more juſt interpretation of this text: "Wherefore, my beloved, as God hath, in the perſon of his Son, thus glorioully rewarded that bright aſſemblage of virtues, for which he was ſo incomparably illuſtrious; and particularly that condeſcenſion, humility, and benevolence, which I have been ſo earneſtly recommending to you; let it be conſidered by you as an engagement to tread in his ſteps, with diligence and reſolution, ſo far as the feeble powers of human nature may admit. And, as juſtice requires me to acknowledge that you have always been obedient to my inſtructions and exhortations, while I have had the pleaſure of being with you, be ſolicitous that not only in my preſence, but now much more in my abſence, (which, though it deprives you of ſome advantages, yet as it is owing to my bonds in your cauſe, ought to increaſe the tenderneſs of your concern for my comfort) you may work out your own ſalvation with great earneſtneſs and aſſiduity; yea, conſidering its infinite importance, with holy fear and trembling. I ſay your own ſalvation; for that will be moſt effectually ſecured and promoted by the temper I have now been recommending. Seize that happy opportunity of doing it, which divine grace affords; for God is He who worketh in you, both to will and to perform, of his own good pleaſure. You ought therefore to conſider every good affection and purpoſe which ariſes in your heart, as ſuggeſted by his grace, which waits upon you to enable you to bring it into perfection." The original of ver. 13. is very emphatical; for it aſſerts on the one hand, that God is actually or continually operating; and the other, that thus to work in the heart for ſuch noble purpoſes, is the prerogative of God, and an effect worthy of his divine attributes and perfections. Bp. Sherlocke has given us a fine interpretation of this paſſage of Scripture; which he obſerves conſiſts of two parts;—an exhortation, and an argument, by which that exhortation is enforced. The exhortation you have in theſe words, Work out your ſalvation, &c. The argument to enforce it follows in the next words: For it is God which worketh, &c. an argument which may at firſt ſight ſeem rather to lead to confidence than to fear. For if God be for us, who can be againſt us? or what is there to fear, when we are thus ſupported? The diſciples of the Goſpel had many enemies to encounter with. Now with reſpect to theſe, the argument may furniſh us with great confidence. There is likewiſe a fear which reſpects our friends, and that is, a fear of loſing their favour and aſſiſtance; and the more a man is dependant upon his friends, the greater ought his fear to be of loſing their protection. This fear naturally inſpires us with diligence to obſerve and fulfil the commands of our patrons; and of this fear the Apoſtle ſpeaks in the text; "Work out, &c. for it is a work you are no ways ſufficient for of yourſelves, therefore have a care of offending him on whom you entirely depend." That the Apoſtle means this kind of fear may be ſeen by his own way of reaſoning. In the beginning of this chapter, he preſſes humility upon the Philippians from the example of Chriſt, and the great reward he obtained on that account; and, as if humility and fear were the ſame thing, he thus concludes, "Wherefore, my beloved, work out, &c." If we believe God works in us, it will make us humble, becauſe we can do nothing without him; it will likewiſe make us fear and tremble to diſobey him, from whom our ſalvation cometh. That this fear is the fear of offending God, and loſing his favour, is further evident from ver. 14. Do all things without, &c. Now, what fear is it that makes men obey chearfully? Not the fear of puniſhment; for who grumble more than ſlaves? But where the fear that poſſeſſes the heart, is the fear of diſobliging a kind friend or beloved maſter upon whom we depend, there fear gives wings to obedience. Ver. 15. ſupplies us with the like argument: the words are theſe; That ye may be blameleſs, harmleſs, or, as the margin reads it, ſincere, the ſons of God, &c. Now then, the fear which the Apoſtle ſpeaks of is the fear of a ſon; the fear of offending the father he loves; it is a fear which renders obedience blameleſs and ſincere, without rebuke; which no fear can do, but a fear of offending him we love, and him we depend on. The reaſon why we ought to fear, is becauſe God worketh in us, &c. To will and to do good, are the terms and conditions of our ſalvation, and therefore from whence we have the power to will and to do, from thence we have the means of ſalvation. Now ſalvation comprehends in it all the good we are capable of enjoying, without which our life is death, and our hope miſery: So that if we depend upon God to work in us both to will and to do, we depend upon him for all that is, or can be valuable to man.—And farther, God worketh in us of his own good pleaſure: We have no right or claim to his aſſiſtance; freely he gave, and freely he may take away. All our danger is in loſing the favour of God, and therefore for that muſt be all our fear. But farther, this fear ariſes from a ſenſe of our own inſufficiency; and ſince God does help our weakneſs, it is great reaſon we ſhould love and adore him: So that the fear that ariſes from hence is not in the leaſt degree inconſiſtent with the perfect love of God. That it is of his good pleaſure that he aſſiſts us, is a great evidence of his love to us, and a great argument of our love to him. So that to work

27 For indeed he was ſick nigh unto death: but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me alſo, leſt I ſhould have ſorrow upon ſorrow.

28 I ſent him therefore the more carefully, that when ye ſee him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the leſs ſorrowful.

Ver. 17. Yea, and if I be offered up, &c.] The proper import of the word rendered offered up, is, "to be poured forth as a libation." Almoſt every reader muſt know that as oil and wine made a part of the proviſions of the table which God had ordained in the Jewiſh ritual, that a proportionable quantity of each ſhould attend every bullock, goat, ram, lamb, or kid, which was preſented at his altar; ſo the heathens likewiſe uſed ſuch libations; and ſometimes they uſed blood, mingled with wine, in honour of their idol deities. See Pſ. xvi. 4. The Apoſtle conſiders the faith of the Philippians as an acceptable ſacrifice preſented to God; and if he incurred martyrdom for his zeal to promote it, he might ſpeak of his blood, as a libation poured out, with great beauty and propriety. One cannot but obſerve the heroic manner in which the Apoſtle here ſpeaks of his ſuffering; which he conſiders as matter of congratulation, rather than of condolance. It brings to mind the behaviour of the brave Athenian mentioned by Plutarch, who returned to Athens from the victorious battle of Marathon, bleeding to death with the wounds he had received in the action; and coming directly to the houſe where the magiſtrates were aſſembled, uttered only theſe two words, χαίρετε, χαίρομεν: "Take your ſhare of our joy;" and immediately dropped down dead at their feet. See Doddridge, Calmet, and Plutarch's Glor. Athen. Works, p. 347.

Ver. 19.] St. Paul having declared his readineſs to lay down his life to ſerve the Philippians, (among the other Gentile churches which were in the like circumſtances) ſeems to have apprehended how tenderly they would take his mentioning ſuch a thing to them; and therefore, to prevent their being over much concerned, he here tells them, that however willing he was to die for them, yet he did not expect to do ſo preſently; that he rather thought he ſhould eſcape now, and in a little time be freed from his preſent bonds. And that he might teſtify his earneſt and affectionate care for them, he acquaints them, that he had hopes ſhortly to ſee how his affair was likely to turn out; and that then he ſhould be able to ſpare Timothy, whom he would ſend to them, and from whom he expected a pleaſing account of their good eſtate. He further tells them, that he hoped ſhortly to have an opportunity of viſiting them himſelf; but in the mean time, while he was not at liberty to come himſelf, nor could well ſpare Timothy, he thought it neceſſary to ſend back Epaphroditus to them, of whom he gives an excellent character, recommending him to their kind and courteous reception. ver. 10—30. Peirce. Inſtead of, that I may be of good comfort, the MS reads, that I may be refreſhed.

Ver. 20. No man like-minded] "No man of a like diſpoſition; who will ſo naturally, with ſuch a generous tenderneſs and concern, take care of your affairs." Some underſtood the words in the ſenſe of our margin; I have no man ſo dear unto me: "No man whom I value as myſelf, as my own ſoul,—ισόψυχον,—but him." Inſtead of naturally, the Syriac and Vulgate read ſincerely. See Doddridge, Peirce, and Heylin.

Ver. 21. For all ſeek their own] It can hardly be ſuppoſed that St. Paul intended here abſolutely to tax every one of thoſe who were about him, and aſſiſted him in preaching the Goſpel, with an utter neglect of this intereſt of Chriſt, and an entire ſelf-ſeeking. The ȣ̓, which we render not, might perhaps better be rendered rather than, as it is Matth. ix. 13. He may be underſtood to ſpeak comparatively, and to mean no more than this, That their other preachers were defective in reſolution and courage, being too prone to conſult their own eaſe, and decline ſuch work as was fatiguing and hazardous. The caſe was this; The intereſt of Chriſt required at that time, that ſomebody ſhould go to Philippi. St. Paul could not then ſpare Timothy, as is plain from his ſaying, that he hoped to be able to ſend him: But nobody elſe cared to undertake the fatigue of the journey, and to riſque ſuch treatment as they knew the Apoſtle had before met with there. This reluctancy he taxes in the preceding verſe, as a not ſincerely caring for the concerns of the Philippians; and in this verſe, as a preferring their own concerns to thoſe of Chriſt. Such a temper was very contrary to St. Paul's; who ſought not his own profit, but the profit of many, that they might be ſaved. See 1 Cor. x. 33. and Peirce.

Ver. 22. Ye know the proof] The experience. MS.

Ver. 25. But your meſſenger, &c.] But your Apoſtle, and who is now to act for me with you; or, the ready miniſter to the relief of my neceſſities, by whoſe faithful hand I received that liberal ſupply, which your pious friendſhip ſo chearfully advanced. See Rom. xi. 13. Doddridge, Peirce, and Caſtalio.

Ver. 27. Sorrow upon ſorrow] Some think the meaning is, "Sorrow for Epaphroditus's death, upon ſorrow for his ſickneſs." This may well be allowed, without excluding the other circumſtances of St. Paul's ſituation; for the loſs of ſuch an excellent perſon,—and eſpecially when his attending and ſerving the Apoſtle was the occaſion of it,—muſt have been a great addition both to the ſorrow of his confinement, and to the ſorrow he had from the oppoſition made againſt him by the Judaizers; of the latter of which we find he could not write to the Philippians without weeping. See ch. iii. 18.

Ver. 28. I ſent him] I have ſent him. Wat. The Vulgate renders the word Σπȣδαιοτέρως, which we tranſlate the more carefully, by feſtinantius,—the more ſpeedily; which ſeems beſt to agree with the Apoſ-

CHAP. III.

He warneth them to beware of the falſe teachers of the circumciſion, ſhewing that himſelf hath greater cauſe than they to truſt in the righteouſneſs of the law: which notwithſtanding he counteth as dung and loſs, to gain Chriſt and his righteouſneſs, therein acknowledging his own imperfection: he exhorteth them to be thus minded, to imitate him, and to decline the ways of carnal chriſtians.

FInally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. To write the ſame things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is ſafe.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 12, 13.

The reader has ſeen in the notes a full, and, as we hope, ſatisfactory explanation of theſe verſes. To what has been ſaid there, it may be proper to ſubjoin upon the ſubject in general, that there is in the language made uſe of to explain the doctrine of grace, ſomething liable to the abuſe of ignorant or crafty men. We ſay, that of ourſelves we can do nothing; whence they conclude, that we have nothing to do. We ſay, that it is the grace of God which enables us to do every thing; from whence they conclude, that every thing muſt be left to the grace of God; and that we need only work ourſelves into a ſtrong perſuaſion that God is at work with us, and may ſit ſtill ourſelves. And this perſuaſion, which is generally mere enthuſiaſm, they dignify with the name of Chriſtian faith.

But, let us try this language in a common caſe, and ſee whether it be ſo hard to be underſtood. Suppoſe a man wanted to move a weight, which required double his ſtrength to move it, would it not be a very proper expreſſion to ſay, Of himſelf he could do nothing? Or would it follow, that if he was offered help, he ſhould ſit ſtill, and not put his own ſtrength to the work? If a friend came to his aſſiſtance, would it not be properly ſaid, that his friend enabled him to do what he did? But would it follow, that his friend did all, and he nothing? This then may ſerve to guard men againſt being miſled by mere ſounds. Let us now proceed to conſider ſome conſequence which may ariſe from the Apoſtle's doctrine and exhortation.

And 1. it is evident, that "The Chriſtian ſtate is not a ſtate of ſecurity;" for, ſecurity is inconſiſtent with any kind of fear and trembling,—and is indeed a condition which does not call even for care or diligence. In a ſtate of ſecurity, a man cannot even fear for himſelf; for, to be ſure of ſalvation, he muſt be ſure of every thing that is neceſſary to it: and therefore, he muſt either be ſure that he is to have no part himſelf in working out his ſalvation; or, if he is to have any, he muſt be ſure and certain that he ſhall perform it; either of which excludes all manner of fear and trembling. Much leſs can he, who is ſecure of being ſaved, fear being puniſhed: ſo that there is no kind of fear left for him; and the Apoſtle's exhortation will have no meaning in it to ſuch a man:—Work out your ſalvation with fear and trembling;—With fear of what? ſince nothing is left to be afraid of. And yet, to be ſure of our ſalvation has been made by ſome a neceſſary ſign of regeneration and adoption: and hence has proceeded the doctrine "that grace once received can never be loſt;" and if ſo, thoſe who have received grace, can have no reaſon to fear and tremble. And yet it cannot be denied that the Philippians had received grace; ſince from his own teſtimony ch. 1, 7. we learn, that they had obeyed always; that both in his bonds, and in the doctrine and confirmation of the Goſpel, they had been partakers of his grace. Grace then they had received; what then had they to fear,—If grace once received cannot be loſt, that is, if grace gives ſecurity of ſalvation?

To make the Apoſtle therefore conſiſtent with himſelf, we muſt affirm, "That it is his doctrine, that grace may be loſt; and that even thoſe who have made great progreſs in Goſpel obedience, are not ſecure of their ſtate; but muſt labour on, and work on with fear and trembling, leſt they come ſhort of the promiſes which they have received." And from hence we may comfort and ſupport good Chriſtians, under the many fears and miſgivings of mind which attend them in their ſpiritual warfare. That we fear, is no argument of our miſtruſting God: we have reaſon to fear for ourſelves; nor will this fear be taken from us, till we are removed out of this world. Were there any reaſon to think that ſecurity as to our future condition was among the gifts of God's ſpirit to the true Children of Chriſt, then indeed our fears would be matter of diſturbance to us: but ſince the beſt muſt fear and tremble, why ſhould we diſquiet ourſelves, becauſe we fear for ourſelves? Since not only our preſent condition requires it, but it is even part of our ſecurity to fear, and to labour with care and diligence, which is the bleſſed ſpirit of fear. To fear that God will not perform his promiſes to us, is a wicked fear; but to fear that we may fall ſhort of thoſe promiſes, is a reaſonable fear, our preſent weakneſs conſidered; and it is a ſpur to virtue. And thoſe who would deſire this thorn in the fleſh to be removed, may be anſwered in the Lords name, as he anſwered St. Paul, My grace is ſufficient for you. You are weak, but the Lord is ſtrong, and his ſtrength is perfected in weakneſs: ſo that, if your fear be active and buſy, and ſets you to work for the thing you are afraid of loſing, there is no doubt, but that through Chriſt, you ſhall be enabled to do all things.

2. From hence we may alſo learn what to think of the works of Chriſtians. It is the Apoſtle's command, work out your ſalvation. Now then, works are neceſſary to ſalvation; and it matters little in what degree they are neceſſary, or how they are to be named. If they are neceſſary, you muſt do them; and that is enough to ſecure the practice of virtue and holineſs in the world. And for this reaſon God works in us, that we may not only will but do; that is, bring our good inclinations to perfection: For why does God work in us to will and to do, if willing and doing are not neceſſary to our redemption? And perhaps the good works of Chriſtians may not deſerve all the hard words which have ſo liberally been beſtowed on them, if we conſider, that they are not the works of men, but of God; for He worketh in us to will and to do: And therefore our good works are the fruits of his ſpirit; and are holy, becauſe they proceed from an holy root,—the power of God dwelling in us.

Laſtly, we may from hence obſerve in what manner God works with the faithful. St. Paul makes it an argument for fear and diligence: From whence it is evident that God does not ſo work in us, as to exclude our own care and induſtry, that is, he does not work irreſiſtibly: For, ſuppoſing God to work irreſiſtibly, the wit of man cannot make an argument out of it for private care and diligence. If God does every thing in us, whether we will or no, what is left for us to do? What have we to fear and tremble for, when God alone has undertaken the whole care and buſineſs of our redemption?

The work of the ſpirit of God upon the hearts of the faithful is to actuate and to inſpire them: But to perform what is good, is the buſineſs of him who is actuated and inſpired. Now it muſt be allowed, that it is one thing to give a man power to act, another to force him to act. A man's will is not influenced by his own power. He that has ten times the power to do a thing that I have, is nevertheleſs as free to let it alone as I am—And tho' the grace of God gives us great power and ability to work out our ſalvation, yet the power to will and to work, is no conſtraint either to will or to work. And in this ſenſe the grace of God is a great argument for diligence and care. For if he furniſhes us with power, it behoves us to ſee that we make a right uſe of it.

In a word then, we have the aſſiſtance of God to enable us to work; which is the great reaſon to love and truſt him, ſince he takes this care of us. Our danger now is only from ourſelves; It is in our own power, but in the power of no other creature under Heaven to defeat our hopes. We, only, can rob ourſelves of the aſſiſtance of God, by doing deſpight to his holy ſpirit—by not obeying, where it is in our power to obey. Let us then be extremely careful, and watchful over ourſelves, and whilſt we have opportunity ſo graciouſly afforded, work out our own ſalvation.

Chap. III. Ver. 1. The chief argument of the Epiſtle is contained is this chapter, and chapter iv. to ver. 21. and here it coincides with the main deſign of the Epiſtles to the Epheſians and Coloſſians, which was, to arm the Gentile converts againſt the attempts of ſome, who from the Jews had embraced and made a profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion. Theſe were very zealous to perſuade the Gentiles to ſubmit to the ceremonial law, and mix Judaiſm with Chriſtianity. In order to this end, they ſeem to have made a great boaſting of their being circumciſed, and the law of Moſes. St. Paul had well conſidered the temper of theſe men, and well knew how much advantage ſuch commonly promiſe themſelves from, and too often make of their aſſurance and confidence; and therefore in oppoſing them, he has in ſome meaſure raiſed his ſtile. He very prudently reminds the Philippians that theſe men could not pretend that he ſpoke againſt the things they ſo much magnified out of envy, ſince he could make as great pretenſions to them as any of the Jews could do, and poſſibly greater than thoſe who were endeavouring to ſeduce them; but that he was convinced they were miſtaken in their opinion of theſe things; and that it was in quite another way,—even by Chriſt, and not the ceremonial law, they were to ſeek for juſtification. And as theſe Judaizers ſeem to have endeavoured to recommend their opinion by their example, he reminds the Philippians of what they could not but know his courſe of life had been; and inſinuates, that upon comparing his own example and theirs together, they might eaſily judge which was moſt worthy their obſervation; and he particularly and expreſly obſerves, that his thoughts and care were taken up about more noble things than theirs; that they were minding earthly things, but he heavenly; and ſo upon the whole he exhorts them to follow the example he had ſet them, and to continue ſtedfaſt in their adherence to Chriſt. Peirce.

Finally,—Rejoice] Some have apprehended a contraſt with ch. ii. 25, 28. where he tells them he had ſent Epaphroditus, that they might rejoice at his coming: As if he had ſaid, "And now I add, that while you are rejoicing in him, I would have you rejoice in the Lord, diſcerning the interpoſition of Chriſt, in his being preſerved and reſtored to you." In this connection, it might have made the concluſion of the ſecond chapter: It however ſeems more naturally to introduce what follows, thus: "As for what remains, my brethren, let me exhort you, whatever may become of me, or of yourſelves, ſo far as any worldly intereſt and proſpect is concerned, that ye rejoice in the protection and care of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and in the promiſes and hopes given us by him. I have already inſiſted upon them with pleaſure; (ch. i. 5, 6, 10, 11, 20, &c. ch. ii. 5, 11.) and to write the ſame things to you, on ſuch a topic, is not grievous to me, while it is both ſafe and neceſſary for you." Some think that the words, writing the ſame things, intimate that St. Paul had written a former Epiſtle to them, which is now loſt; others ſuppoſe that they refer to what he had ſaid to them formerly; and that he only gives ſome hints at theſe larger converſations in the following verſes. See Doddridge, Peirce, Diodati, and Fleming on the Firſt Reſurrection, p. 4.

Ver. 2. Beware of dogs] This may very poſſibly be an alluſion to Iſai. lvi. 10—12. Comp. ver. 19. Tit. i. 11, 12. Rom. xvi. 18. Gal. vi. 12, 13. The Jews uſed to call the Gentiles dogs, and perhaps St. Paul may uſe this language, when ſpeaking of their proud bigots, by way of retaliation. Comp. Rev. xxii. 15. L'Enfant tells us of a cuſtom at Rome, to chain their dogs at the door of their houſes, and to put an inſcription over them, "Beware of this dog;" to which he ſeems to think theſe words may refer: But it is more natural to interpret St. Paul's expreſſion from the compariſons uſed in the Old Teſtament, rather than from any proverbial ſpeeches among the heathens. Evil-workers does not ſo much mean thoſe who lived wickedly, as thoſe who worked fraudulently and deceitfully. By the conciſion is meant, "thoſe who rend and divide the church;" See Rom. xvi. 17, 18. They gloried in being the περιτομὴν, the circumciſion; which name and character St. Paul will not allow them; but claims it for Chriſtians, in the next word, and calls them the κατατομὴν, or conciſion; expreſſing his contempt of their pretences, and cenſure of their practices. See 2 Cor. xi. 13. Doddridge, Peirce, L'Enfant, and Budæi Comm. Ling. Græc.

Ver. 3. We are the circumciſion] That is, "We have that which was ſignified by circumciſion;" for that is not circumciſion which is outward in the fleſh, but circumciſion is that of the heart; in the ſpirit, and not in the letter. Rom. ii. 28, 29. To which may be added, that he conſidered baptiſm as the Chriſtian circumciſion, which availed to all the valuable religious purpoſes, that the ancient circumciſion did. See Col. ii. 11. Inſtead of we rejoice in Chriſt Jeſus, the Greek ſhould be rendered we glory, or boaſt in Chriſt Jeſus, whom St. Paul conſidered as the ſpirit of the law, in contradiſtinction to the letter of it. So that the ſum of what he ſays is this: "We are the true circumciſion, who worſhip God by Jeſus Chriſt, and have our whole dependance upon him; and to this it was the deſign of the law to lead men." See Gal. iii. 24. Rom. x. 4. and Peirce.

Ver. 4. If any man thinketh, &c.] It can ſcarcely be ſuppoſed, that there were abſolutely none who could pretend to the ſame grounds of confidence in the fleſh, which St. Paul here mentions: His expreſſion, therefore, is to be limited to ſuch as he had in view. If there was but one perſon in Philippi, who was endeavouring to ſeduce them, no doubt he here ſpeaks of him; but if there were more, he may be thought to aim at the principal man amongſt them, for he ſeems here to ſpeak only of a ſingle perſon. His meaning therefore is, "If the perſon who attempts to draw you into Judaiſm thinks he has grounds for confidence in the fleſh, I am able to go beyond him in all his pretences." It is uſual with the Apoſtle to ſpeak in ſuch a covert way of this kind of men. See 1 Cor. iii. 10. 2 Cor. x. 7, 11. xi. 4. xii. 16—21.

Ver. 5. Circumciſed the eighth day] Under circumciſion when eight days old. Piſcator, Homberg, and Wat. It evidently appears that the Jews did not only lay a great deal of ſtreſs on the rite of circumciſion, but on the time of performing it; that is, exactly on the eighth day. The LXX have an addition to Gen. xvii. 14. which is alſo found in the Samaritan Pentateuch:—The male-child which is not circumciſed on the eighth day, ſhall be cut off from among his people. This and the following particulars muſt be underſtood as plain evidences, that St. Paul had more reaſon to truſt in the fleſh, than the perſon upon whom he reflects; and therefore it ſeems highly probable, that this perſon was only a proſelyte, and not a Jew by birth. We may collect the ſame from the phraſe an Hebrew of the Hebrews; by which he ſeems to mean, that he was not an Helleniſt Jew, as probably the perſon who endeavoured to ſeduce them was. Comp. Acts vi. 1. where the Helleniſts are contra-diſtinguiſhed from the Hebrews: See alſo Rom. xi. 1. 2 Cor. xi. 22. Acts xxiii. 6. Doddridge, Peirce, and Whitby.

Ver. 6. Concerning zeal, perſecuting the church] St. Paul was far from counting this a virtue, or any ſolid ground of confidence towards God: He freely condemns it elſewhere, as a grievous ſin: 1 Cor. xv. 9. 1 Tim. i. 13. All therefore which he can mean here is, that if a zeal for the law were, as the Jews thought it, a ground of confidence, he could lay claim to it with abundant propriety; ſince his zeal had been ſo great for it, as to lead him to perſecute Chriſtians, becauſe he thought they diſhonoured it. The righteouſneſs which is in the law, both here and in ver. 9. refer to the conformity which he lived in to the ritual, or ceremonial part of the Moſaic law. See Peirce, and Calmet.

Ver. 7. Thoſe I counted loſs for Chriſt] That is, "I threw them away, as mariners do their goods, on which they before ſet a value, leſt they ſhould endanger their lives:" In which ſenſe ζημία is uſed, Acts xxvii. 21. We may obſerve that St. Paul in this and the following verſes carries on an agreeable allegory; in which all the metaphors are taken from traders or merchants. The firſt metaphors he uſes are profit and loſs: The next lies in the word caſt away; and the laſt in the word arrive or attain. See Doddridge, Peirce, and Grotius.

Ver. 8. I count all things but loſs] I have thrown away all things;—"Have willingly parted with all my advantages and expectations from the law; that I might gain, or ſecure Chriſt." It is not by any means improbable, that a ſentence of excommunication might have been pronounced againſt St. Paul, or at leaſt that his goods might have been confiſcated; as we know other believing Hebrews, though probably no one of them ſo obnoxious to their brethren as himſelf, were actually treated. (See Heb. x. 33, 34.) And if this were the caſe, it gives great force to the words, For whom I have ſuffered, &c. See Gataker's Adverſ. Miſcell. c. 43.

Ver. 9. And be found in him] St. Paul is ſpeaking of what ſhould commend him to God. The Jews thought that the ceremonial righteouſneſs would effectually do this; but the Apoſtle was convinced of the contrary; and therefore deſired, that when Chriſt ſhould look upon him, he might not appear to him as a perſon depending upon ſuch

10 That I may know him, and the power of his reſurrection, and the fellowſhip of his ſufferings, being made conformable unto his death;

11 If by any means I might attain unto the reſurrection of the dead:

12 Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which alſo I am apprehended of Chriſt Jeſus.

13 Brethren, I count not myſelf to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting thoſe things which are behind, and reaching forth unto thoſe things which are before,

14 I preſs toward the mark, for the prize of the high-calling of God in Chriſt Jeſus.

15 Let us, therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in any thing ye be otherwiſe minded, God ſhall reveal even this unto you.

16 Nevertheleſs, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the ſame rule, let us mind the ſame thing.

17 Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk ſo, as ye have us for an enſample.

18 (For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the croſs of Chriſt:

a righteouſneſs; but as one who had put on Chriſt, and had an intereſt in the benefits obtained by him: i. e. he deſired God ſhould accept him as a Chriſtian, and not as a Jew. See on Rom. xiii. 14. and Gal. iii. 27.

Ver. 10. And the power of his reſurrection] The reſurrection of Chriſt is one of the ſtrongeſt confirmations of our holy religion; and therefore yields the greateſt encouragement to the hopes and expectations of Chriſtians. Hence God is ſaid to have begotten them again to a lively hope, by the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt from the dead. 1 Pet. i. 3. Some may perhaps imagine, that St. Paul had not here a due regard to order in placing his words, becauſe he ſpeaks of his reſurrection firſt, and then of his ſufferings; but his reaſon for this probably was, becauſe a lively hope, effected by the conſideration of Chriſt's reſurrection, was abſolutely neceſſary to make men willing to be conformed to him in his ſufferings. See Peirce, Grotius, and Sherlock's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 278, &c.

Ver. 11. If by any means I might attain, &c.] "That any way, as it ſhall pleaſe him, I may arrive ſafe at my deſired haven, the reſurrection of the juſt." Dr. Heylin renders it, In order to attain to the reſurrection of the dead; that is, ſays he, the reſurrection of the juſt; for the reſurrection of ſinners is the ſecond death.

Ver. 12. Not as though I had already, &c.] The Apoſtle here begins a new allegory; nor is it unuſual with the moſt correct writers to paſs from one allegory to another: but our verſion confounds theſe two allegories by tranſlating both καταντήσω, ver. 11. and ἔλαβον, in the preſent verſe, by the ſame word, attained. St. Paul here compares himſelf to a racer, and borrows many terms from the Olympic games, as in ſeveral other places of his Epiſtles. The words rendered apprehend and apprehended are uſed in the ſame agoniſtical ſenſe, 1 Cor. ix. 24. His deſign is to ſhew, that he conſidered not himſelf as having already gained the victory, or obtained the prize which is the reward of it,—which the Jewiſh converts ſeem to have fancied of themſelves; but that he was running, and ſtriving, and uſing all proper methods to qualify himſelf for it. Candidates in the Grecian games, eſpecially when they firſt preſented themſelves, were often introduced by ſome perſon of eſtabliſhed reputation, who, at the ſame time that he ſpoke as honourably as might be of his friend, urged him to acquit himſelf with the utmoſt vigour and reſolution;—and it is probable that the latter clauſe of this verſe may allude to that circumſtance: In which view, it expreſſes the ſenſe the Apoſtle had of his obligations to the condeſcenſion and grace of Chriſt, in purſuing and laying hold of him, while he fled from him, and ſo engaging him to aſpire to the crown of life. See 1 Tim. i. 15, 16. and the note on ver. 15. Dr. Heylin renders the verſe, For I have not yet attained, nor am I yet arrived at perfection; but I ſtill advance and hold on my courſe, that I may at laſt attain that prize, to the purſuit of which Chriſt has engaged me.

Ver. 13, 14. Brethren, I count not myſelf, &c.] No, my brethren, I do not imagine that I am yet arrived at the goal; but this one thing I do: Regardleſs of what is behind, and intent only to reach what is before, I preſs forwards to the mark, for the prize to which God has called me from above by Chriſt Jeſus. Heylin. Mr. Peirce thinks the moſt exact grammatical conſtruction of the words is this, "I preſs after that one thing for which I have been apprehended by Jeſus Chriſt, that I may apprehend or attain it; neglecting the things behind, and ſtretching forward to thoſe before. After this one thing (I ſay) I preſs, according to the aim I have fixed to myſelf, that I may obtain the prize of the high calling, &c." But the conſtruction may be clear enough, by ſupplying (as in our tranſlation) the words I do, or I can ſay, without the tranſpoſition he would attempt here. The Apoſtle continues his alluſion to the Olympic games, and eſpecially the foot races, which made the moſt celebrated part of them; where the prize was placed in a very conſpicuous ſituation, ſo that the competitors might be animated by having it ſtill in their view. Some conſider the word βραβεῖον, ver. 14. as expreſſing the principal prize; whereas ſome might come to the goal, and receive lower rewards: As if he had ſaid, "I labour to come in, ſo as to ſecure the greateſt; that is, I aim at being an advanced and exemplary Chriſtian." L'Enfant thinks the Apoſtle compares our Lord in this verſe to thoſe who ſtood on an elevated place at the end of the courſe, calling the racers by their names, and encouraging them, by holding out the crown, to exert themſelves with vigour. But, not to inſiſt on the uncertainty of this, it would ſeem at all events more rational to interpret the high calling, as alluding to the proclamation by which men were called before the opening of the courſe, to contend for ſuch and ſuch a prize; which anſwers to the general declaration made in the Goſpel of the heavenly prize. See L'Enfant, Dunlope's Serm. vol. ii. p. 331. and Weſt's Diſſert. on the Olympic Games, p. 63.

Ver. 15. As many as be perfect] In ver. 12. the Apoſtle ſpeaks of himſelf as not already perfect; which is ſaid in oppoſition to the Jews, and the converts from among them, who flattered themſelves, that barely by being under the law they were made perfect. Hence he ſpeaks in ſuch a manner to the Galatians, ch. iii. 3. when they were ſeduced by the Judaizers; Are ye ſo fooliſh? having begun in the ſpirit, are ye now made perfect by the fleſh? Where, by the fleſh he means the ceremonial law. The author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews diſputes in ſeveral places againſt this vain conceit; ſhewing that perfection was not by the Levitical prieſthood, under which the people received the law. ch. vii. 16. That the law made nothing perfect; ver. 19. That thoſe ceremonies could not make him who did the ſervice perfect, as pertaining to the conſcience; ch. ix. 9. and x. 1. This notion of the Jews naturally led them into ſecurity, and ſuch carleſſneſs of life, as the Apoſtle judged to be moſt dangerous: In oppoſition to them, he ſets forth his own great ſolicitude and diligence in the uſe of all proper means, conſidering himſelf, as not having yet obtained the prize, or as not yet being perfect. This clears the ſeeming inconſiſtence between the 12th and the preſent verſe. The perfection ſpoken of in the 12th verſe relates to the reward;—with reſpect to which our Saviour himſelf ſays, the third day I ſhall be perfected; Luke xiii. 32. And thus the ſpirits of juſt men are not made perfect till the other world: Heb. xii. 23.—But the perfection which St. Paul attributes to himſelf and other good men, in the verſe before us, is a very different thing, and imports the "being arrived to a maturity of underſtanding in Chriſtianity,—perfectly initiated into all its holy myſteries." We may juſtly obſerve, that when an expreſſion of this kind is uſed to intimate that the greateſt adepts in Chriſtianity ſhould be labouring after higher improvements, it muſt ſtrongly imply the obligations on thoſe in a lower claſs, to preſs forward. See Heb. v. 13, 14. 1 Cor. ii. 6, xiv. 20. Mr. Peirce connects this and the following verſe thus: "Let us therefore, as many of us as are thoroughly inſtructed in Chriſtianity, mind this,—to walk by the ſame rule, and to be unanimous. And if you differ in your ſentiments about any thing, God ſhall reveal it unto you; except it be ſuch a matter as he has already fully revealed, and of which we have attained the knowledge; wherein you cannot expect any further revelation, if you depart from it."

Ver. 17. Be followers together of me] Here the reaſon very plainly appears, why he ſaid ſo much of himſelf in the forgoing verſes; and we may obſerve, that as he was apprehenſive of their danger from theſe Judaizers, he labours effectually to diſcredit them; and ſhews from the difference there was between his converſation and theirs, how much reaſon they had to follow and be directed by him, rather than them. Comp. 1 Cor. iv. 16, 17. However, to take off the ſeeming oſtentation of his diſcourſe, he joins others with himſelf, as examples to them. Peirce.

Ver. 18. They are the enemies of the croſs] That is, "enemies to the doctrine of ſalvation by a dependance upon Chriſt crucified:" for while they directed men to ſeek ſalvation by obſerving the ceremonial law, they took them off from depending ſolely on Chriſt crucified, and ſo made the death of Chriſt inſignificant and uſeleſs. See Gal. ii. 21. v. 3, 4. Some however rather underſtand this as referring to their

20 For our converſation is in heaven; from whence alſo we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt:

21 Who ſhall change our vile body, that it may be faſhioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to ſubdue all things unto himſelf.

CHAP. IV.

From particular admonitions, he proceedeth to general exhortations; ſhewing how he rejoiced at their liberality towards him lying in priſon, not ſo much for the ſupply of his own wants, as for the grace of God in them: and ſo concludeth with prayer and ſalutations.

THerefore, my brethren, dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, ſo ſtand faſt in the Lord, my dearly beloved.

2 I beſeech Euodias, and I beſeech Syntyche, that they be of the ſame mind in the Lord.

3 And I intreat thee alſo, true yoke-fellow, help thoſe women which laboured with me in the goſpel, with Clement alſo, and with other my fellow-labourers, whoſe names are in the book of life.

their immoral temper, afterwards deſcribed; the end and deſign of the croſs being to attract our hearts from earth to heaven, they were enemies to it, as being unwilling to comply with that end and deſign. It is to be feared, that many converts from the Gentiles, as well as from the Jews, anſwered this character; and if they did, it was intirely to the Apoſtle's purpoſe to reprove them. See Peirce, Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 19. Whoſe end is deſtruction] See 2 Cor. xi. 15. It has been thought that the Apoſtle has an eye here to what he had obſerved of theſe men before, ch. i. 28. and ſo he may be underſtood as if he had ſaid, "Theſe men reckon upon your deſtruction, but they will certainly meet with their own." The next clauſe implies, that however they pretended to act for the ſervice and honour of God, they were ſeeking ſolely their own profit, and proſtituting all things for the promoting a temporal intereſt. Thus they made a god of themſelves, or of their own belly. See Rom. xvi. 18. 1 Tim. vi. 5 Tit. i. 11. 2 Cor. xi. 20. St. Paul's aim and behaviour was directly oppoſite; who did all things for the edification of the churches, without ſeeking his own temporal advantage, as he often declares in his Epiſtles, and that with a tacit reflection upon theſe men for their behaviour. By ſhame and earthly things many commentators underſtand their zealous attachment to the beggarly elements of the law, in excluſion of the Goſpel. See Col. iii. 1—3. Perhaps the Apoſtle may refer more generally to their glorying in the indulgence of thoſe earthly and ſenſual paſſions and purſuits, which are a ſhame to the rational mind.

Ver. 20. For our converſation is in heaven] They who have occaſion to make uſe of this text, commonly attempt to mend our tranſlation, aſſerting that the word πολίτευμα ſhould not be rendered converſation, but citizenſhip. Thus Beza, the common French tranſlation, and that printed at Mons, have rendered it. Diodati agrees with ours, but puts citizenſhip in the margin. The Vulg. Syr. Low Dutch, and Caſtalio render it as we do; and after all that the critics have ſaid upon this matter, our own rendering ſeems preferable to the other. It muſt be confeſſed that the word, being derived from πόλις, a city, is often uſed to ſignify ſuch actions as relate to the adminiſtration and government of it; but nothing is more common, than for words in time to be uſed in a laxer and more general ſenſe than their etymology will account for. This is clearly the caſe in the verb πολιτεύεσθαι, which in like manner related at firſt to a civil adminiſtration, but was afterwards uſed to ſignify any manner of living and converſing: So it is uſed by St. Paul, ch. i. 27. and ſo Acts xxiii. 1. and in this ſenſe it is alſo applied by the claſſics. Now the rendering in our tranſlation appears beſt for theſe reaſons: 1. As it ſtands here in oppoſition to the foregoing character, and eſpecially the laſt part of it,—who mind earthly things. It is moſt agreeable therefore to underſtand him to deſcribe his own character, as one who minded heavenly things, or whoſe converſation was about them. 2. This is confirmed by the parallel place, Col. iii. 1, 2. For, our converſation is in heaven, will be the ſame as, we ſeek or mind the things above. 3. This ſuits beſt with his deſign, as he is recommending himſelf to them as an example of walking, or of converſation, ver. 17. Be followers together of me, and mark, or obſerve with attention, thoſe who walk ſo, as you have us for an example; and in this 20th verſe he gives a reaſon why they ſhould follow his example,—becauſe it was a very good one; for our converſation, that is, our walking, is in heaven; and that this 20th verſe is clearly connected with the 17th, appears by the γὰρ, or for, at the beginning of it; the 18th and 19th verſes being to be read in a parentheſis. 4. This converſation in heaven comprehends briefly all he had ſaid of himſelf, ver. 10—14. and as in thoſe verſes he makes not the leaſt alluſion to a citizenſhip, but his whole diſcourſe is concerning the manner of his life and converſation; it is but reaſonable to underſtand him as ſpeaking of that alone in this verſe. See Peirce, Wetſtein, &c.

Ver. 21. Who ſhall change our vile body, &c.] As σχῆμα always ſignifies the habit or outward form of a thing, and not the ſubſtance or outward eſſence of it, it ſeems we are to underſtand the verb μετασχηματίσει here to denote a change only of the form, and not of the ſubſtance of the bodies of the ſaints. Inſtead of our vile body, the Greek would be better tranſlated, our mean, humble, lowly body: τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν: literally the body of our humiliation. Fleſh and blood, in their preſent ſtate, not being fit to inherit the kingdom of God, there is a neceſſity that the bodies of thoſe who ſhall inherit it ſhould undergo a great change; ſuch a change will be made in the bodies of the dead ſaints at the reſurrection, when they ſhall be raiſed incorruptible; but as to the ſaints who ſhall be alive at that time, (in whoſe name St. Paul ſeems to ſpeak here, as in 1 Theſſ. iv. 15—17.) ſince they undergo not ſuch a change by the reſurrection, there muſt be ſomewhat equivalent to it; that is, by the mighty power of our Saviour they ſhall undergo ſuch a change, as ſhall in an inſtant qualify them to inherit the kingdom of God. See 1 Cor. xv. 50—54. The bodies of believers, at preſent, and till that change ſhall be made, bear the image of the firſt Adam, and are in a low and mean condition; but they ſhall then bear the image of Chriſt, the laſt or ſecond Adam, who is the Lord from heaven; 1 Cor. xv. 45—49. This is expreſſed here by our bodies being conformed to his glorious body: The reaſon of his ſpeaking in this caſe of Chriſt's ſubduing all things to himſelf, is to be drawn from 1 Cor. xv. 24—26, 54—57. according to which, death is to be conſidered as an enemy, and the laſt enemy to be conquered; and ſo when this is ſubdued, all is ſubdued, and Chriſt will beſtow upon his ſaints a complete victory over it, freeing them for ever from being ſubject and liable to it. See Peirce, Wolfius, Wetſtein, and on the firſt verſe of the next chapter. Inſtead of working, the MS reads energy.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1. Therefore, my brethren] There is no more reaſon for making this the beginning of a new chapter, than there would be for disjoining the laſt verſe of 1 Cor. xv, (in a ſenſe exactly parallel to this) from the preceding diſcourſe on the reſurrection, with which it is ſo beautifully and properly connected. The variety of words here uſed by the Apoſtle is remarkable,—My brethren,—dearly beloved, and longed for;—my joy and crown; repeating again one of the terms in the end of the verſe, as though he thought he could never apply words enough to expreſs the greatneſs of his love and tenderneſs to them. The word ſo refers to his immediately foregoing diſcourſe; "So ſtand faſt as I have exhorted you: follow this my example, which I have earneſtly recommended to you; and be accordingly ſolicitous, in ſpite of all the inſinuations of ſuch as would ſeduce you, to perſevere in your dependence on Chriſt, and to preſs after that ſtate of future happineſs, which he will ſhortly beſtow upon his ſaints." But ſince the word may be ſuppoſed to denote a continued and perſevering poſture, it ſeems not unreaſonable to allow, that he may herein have a reſpect to their paſt behaviour, and the ſtedfaſtneſs for which he had before commended them. See Peirce, Doddridge, and Bengelius.

Ver. 3. True yoke-fellow] My genuine aſſociate. Doddridge, and MS. Heylin reads the clauſe, I beſeech thee alſo, my faithful partner, to aſſiſt them both, for they aſſiſted me, &c. Some have ſuppoſed that by σύζυγε, St. Paul means his wife; but as the word in the original is maſculine, waving all other arguments, it cannot be taken in that ſenſe. It is probable this was an officer of conſiderable dignity and authority in the church at Philippi, perhaps huſband to one of the pious women here mentioned. As women's preaching was ſo expreſly forbidden by St. Paul, we muſt conclude, that it was in ſome other way that theſe good women were helpful to him in the Goſpel; not ſo much by miniſtering to his perſon, though that no doubt they were ready to do as they had opportunity; but by ſuch ſervices as ſuited their ſex and ſtation, and by the intelligence they might give him of the ſtate of religion among their female acquaintance, their children, and other branches of their family. The names of good men are often repreſented as regiſtered in heaven; See Malachi iii. 16. Luke x. 20. Heb. xii. 23. Rev. xiii. 18. Where any thing of ſuch a character appeared, it was reaſonable, in the judgement of charity, to hope this with reſpect to the perſons in whom it was found: but we have no reaſon to conclude from the expreſſion before us, that St. Paul had any particular revelation with regard to the friends he here mentions, as certainly ordained to ſalvation. See Peirce, Doddridge, Calmet, and Wetſtein.

4 Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I ſay, Rejoice.

5 Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand.

6 Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and ſupplication, with thankſgiving, let your requeſts be made known unto God.

7 And the peace of God, which paſſeth all underſtanding, ſhall keep your hearts and minds through Chriſt Jeſus.

8 Finally, brethren, whatſoever things are true, whatſoever things are honeſt, whatſoever things are juſt, whatſoever things are pure, whatſoever things are lovely, whatſoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praiſe, think on theſe things.

9 Thoſe things which ye have both learned and received, and heard and ſeen in me, do: and the God of peace ſhall be with you.

10 But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now at the laſt your care of me hath flouriſhed again; wherein ye were alſo careful, but ye lacked opportunity.

11 Not that I ſpeak in reſpect of want: for I have learned in whatſoever ſtate I am, therewith to be content.

12 I know both how to be abaſed, and I know how to abound: every where, and in all things I am inſtructed, both to be full, and to be hungry, both to abound, and to ſuffer need.

13 I can do all things through Chriſt which ſtrengtheneth me.

14 Notwithſtanding, ye have well done that ye did communicate with my affliction.

15 Now ye Philippians know alſo, that in the beginning of the goſpel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me, as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only.

16 For even in Theſſalonica, ye ſent once and again unto my neceſſity.

John xv. 5. 2 Cor. xii. 9.—V. 14. Ch. i. 7.—V. 15. 2 Cor. xi. 8, 9.

Ver. 4. Rejoice in the Lord always] The Apoſtle in this advice ſeems to have a reſpect to the ſuffering condition, in which it appears by other paſſages in the Epiſtle that he conſidered them. This is confirmed by the ſtrain of his advice in the next verſes. See ch. ii. 18. iii. 1. 1 Theſſ. v. 16.

Ver. 5. Let your moderation be known] Let your meekneſs, &c.—(v. Wiſd. ii. 9.)—The Lord is nigh you. Wat. Both the parts of this verſe ſhew, that St. Paul conſiders the Philippians in a ſtate of perſecution. Gentleneſs or meekneſs, (which is the import of τὸ ἐπιεικὲς) was peculiarly ſuited hereto, and the Lord's being at hand, was a proper motive to excite them to bear their ſufferings with ſuch temper. And as the adverſaries, againſt whom, at leaſt principally, he encourages them, were the Jews, or Judaizing converts, the Lord's being at hand may well enough be interpreted of the overthrow which the Lord would ſuddenly bring upon the Jews; which, by the deſtruction of the temple, and the aboliſhing the greateſt part of the Jewiſh ſervice, would in a manner put an end to their conteſt, as well as be a ſignal vengeance taken on the moſt virulent enemies of the Chriſtian cauſe. See Peirce, Grotius, and Calmet.

Ver. 6. With thankſgiving] When St. Paul directs them to join thankſgiving with prayer and ſupplication in their ſuffering condition, he appears to have the ſame deſign before noticed; namely, to divert them from the frightful view of perſecution, and to put them in mind, as he does ch. i. 29, 30. that their being called hereunto was a gracious vouchſafement, for which they ought to be thankful. Inſtead of, be careful for nothing, it would be more proper to read, with Dr. Heylin, be ſolicitous for nothing; "Whatever your danger or wants may be, do not diſtract yourſelves with an anxious care about them."

Ver. 7. And the peace of God, &c.] This expreſſion is only found here and Col. iii. 15. In both ſome underſtand it of that peaceable temper which God hath commanded; but it ſeems much more eaſy and natural to underſtand it of that peace we have with God. St. Paul is here arming the Philippians againſt perſecution, nor could any thing be a greater ſupport to them under it, than the peace of God thus underſtood; for the ſenſe of it will make the heavieſt afflictions and preſſures ſit eaſy upon us. Having peace with God through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, we may well rejoice in hope of the glory of God, and glory in tribulations; nor will our hope make us aſhamed. It will be ſo far from it, that it will fill us with boldneſs and reſolution, when the love of God, that is, the ſenſe of his love, which is equivalent to the peace of God,—is ſhed abroad in our hearts: Rom. v. 1, 2, 3, 5. Indeed, a peaceable and quiet temper will be a ſupport and comfort to a man under his troubles, when he conſiders that he has done nothing to provoke men, and that their fury and wrath againſt him is without cauſe: But this is inconſiderable in compariſon of the ſupport we ſhall have from a ſenſe of God's favour, and his being at peace with us: And the commendation here given of the peace of God, that it paſſeth all underſtanding, ſeems to ſuit better with this ſenſe than the other. The ſame is, perhaps, confirmed by that clauſe, through Jeſus Chriſt; and that, whether it be joined with the peace of God, or with the keeping their hearts and minds. Finally, the connection here may be thought to lead us to this ſenſe. They were under their troubles to caſt their care upon God by prayer and ſupplication with thankſgiving; and when they did ſo, the peace of God that paſſeth all underſtanding would keep their minds; that is, by guarding againſt diffidence and diſtruſt, and committing themſelves to, and relying upon the favour of God, they would be ſecure of his favour; the ſenſe of which would make them eaſy and happy. See John xiv. 27. 1 Pet. i. 5. Peirce, and Dumont's Sermons, page 307, &c.

Ver. 8. Finally, my brethren, whatſoever things, &c.] The reader will find in the Reflections a compleat expoſition of this beautiful and comprehenſive paſſage.

Ver. 9. The God of peace] So called, on account of his affording us peace with himſelf; as he is called the God of all grace, 1 Pet. v. 10. on account of all the favours he beſtows upon us. See Heb. xiii. 20. 1 Theſſ. v. 23.

Ver. 10. But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly] The Apoſtle uſes a very ſkilful way here of commending the generoſity of his benefactors; whereby he ſignifies not only that they had done their duty, but that the Lord had favoured them, by ſtirring them up to it; and that they had given him occaſion of much thankfulneſs to the Lord: which ſhews his pious diſpoſition, who in ſuch things took ſpecial notice of the Lord's hand, and kindneſs to him. The original, which we render, Wherein ye were alſo careful, is doubtful; and may ſignify, For whom ye were alſo careful: Or it may be taken, in the ſenſe of our tranſlators,—In which matter ye were careful. St. Chryſoſtom's explanation of the laſt clauſe is,—"But you wanted an ability to ſupply me."

Ver. 11. Not that I ſpeak in reſpect of want] Nor do I ſpeak upon the account of my want. He had told them in the verſe before, that he rejoiced greatly in the revival of their care for him; and here he prevents their miſtaking the true cauſe of his joy. Caſtalio.

Ver. 12. I am inſtructed] "I find myſelf initiated as it were into this great myſtery." This is well known to be the peculiar ſenſe of μεμύημαι; and it ſeems as if the Apoſtle, by the choice of this peculiar word, meant to intimate to his Greek readers, how much he eſteemed the good diſpoſitions of mind here ſpoken of, beyond all their boaſted inſtructions, whatever myſteries they might be ſuppoſed to contain. See Doddridge, Grotius, and Stockius.

Ver. 15. In the beginning of the Goſpel] That is, when he firſt preached the Goſpel amongſt the Philippians. See ch. i. 5. The next verſe ſhews, that the clauſe when I departed, &c. ſhould be rendered when I was departing, &e. Theſſalonica was itſelf in Macedonia, and therefore he had not departed from Macedonia, when they ſent to him in Theſſalonica; but he was then about to leave that country to preach the Goſpel elſewhere, and ſo needed aſſiſtance in order to it. See Peirce, and Doddridge.

Ver. 16. Ye ſent once and again, &c.] It appears by 1 Theſſ. ii. 9. 2 Theſſ. iii. 7—9. that it was not to the liberality of the inhabitants of that city, but chiefly to the labour of his own hands, that St. Paul owed his ſubſiſtence during his abode among them. St. Chryſoſtom remarks judiciouſly upon this place, "That it is a great commendation of the Philippians, that when St. Paul reſided in the metropolis, [Theſſalonica,] he ſhould receive no aſſiſtance from the inhabitants of that city, while generous contributions were made to him from the little city of Philippi."

17 Not becauſe I deſire a gift: but I deſire fruit that may abound to your account.

18 But I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were ſent from you, an odour of a ſweet ſmell, a ſacrifice acceptable, wellpleaſing to God.

19 But my God ſhall ſupply all your need, according to his riches in glory, by Chriſt Jeſus.

20 Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

21 Salute every ſaint in Chriſt Jeſus. The brethren which are with me greet you.

22 All the ſaints ſalute you, chiefly they that are of Cæſar's houſhold.

Ver. 19. But my God ſhall ſupply] And my God, Wat. This is to be underſtood in the nature of a wiſh, or as expreſſive of what was the matter of his prayer for them. Many copies and verſions read it in the optative mood; and may my God ſupply. Obſerve further, he ſays not our God, but my God; becauſe he is ſpeaking of God's recompenſing to them the kindneſs they had ſhewn to him, as his ſervant; it was therefore moſt proper to mention the relation God ſtood in to him, as that would ſecure his regard to thoſe who had done him good. Ver. 21. Salute every ſaint] The Syriac reads, "every one who has acquired holineſs by Jeſus Chriſt." As the brethren here ſtand contradiſtinguiſhed to the ſaints, ver. 22. we muſt underſtand the brethren in office, or the miniſters. Peirce.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 8.

It would be needleſs to lay down particular rules of morality, directly referred to every poſſible caſe that may happen in human life, ſince the caſes themſelves are almoſt infinite, and continually varying in ſome circumſtance or other: all therefore that can be expected in the moſt improved and complete moral ſyſtem is, that to ſupply the place of this vaſt multiplicity of diſtinct and minute directions, there be certain general characters, deſcribing the proper behaviour and duty of men; and that theſe characters have a clear and determinate meaning, and are eaſy to be applied to particular caſes by a common capacity.

Now taken thus, St. Paul's words in the verſe above will be found eminently uſeful: They not only ſuppoſe the unalterable difference of good and evil, and give us a noble and perfect ſummary of the whole of virtue and moral goodneſs; but the marks therein propoſed, to enable us to judge rightly in all circumſtances, are obvious and infallible.

Every one of theſe branches,—whatſoever things are true, honeſt, juſt, pure, lovely, and of good report, deſerve our conſtant and ſtrict regard, conſidered as general rules, and are always proper to influence and determine our conduct. By the things which are true, in this large ſenſe, are meant thoſe habits, and that courſe of life and manners, which are agreeable to the ſtate and original diſpoſition of things in nature; which are ſuitable to our own frame, and the rank and character we ſuſtain in the univerſe, and to the relations we bear, and the various obligations we are under to other beings. Now to aſſert that this is one invariable ſtandard, to which we are obliged to conform, is only aſſerting in other words, that we are all bound to live and act like ourſelves, and not like different beings from what we really are; and that we are bound to have exactly the ſame conſideration of our fellow-creatures, and to treat them in the ſame manner. And the contrary ſcheme ſuppoſes, that we are at full liberty, upon every ſtart of humour, every impulſe of headſtrong appetite, to violate the ſettled order of the world; and that monſtrous and unnatural characters are equally to be approved, with thoſe which are formed on the ſtricteſt rules of truth and propriety:—all which is directly repugnant to the firſt and plaineſt principles of reaſon.

Secondly, By whatſoever things are honeſt, or, as the original word ſignifies, grave, decent, venerable;—are meant things not affected and formal, nor moroſe and ſplenetic, nor recluſe and unſociable; (for theſe are the natural properties of ignorance and craft, of peeviſhneſs and diſcontent, of pride and enthuſiaſm;) but ſuch a conduct as ſprings from ſerious reflection, as argues ſolidity of judgement, and a calm and ſteady temper;—and is therefore decent, becauſe becoming the importance and dignity of human nature; and venerable, as it both tends to create, and deſerves reſpect.

From what has been ſaid, it neceſſarily follows, that it muſt be our indiſpenſable duty to adhere conſtantly to whatſoever things are juſt;—i. e. in the unreſtrained and general acceptation of the term, right and fit in themſelves;—and to whatſoever things are pure, or which have a direct and certain tendency to perfect our ſuperior intelligent frame; for if things are right in themſelves, becauſe they correſpond with the eſtabliſhed ſcheme of the univerſe, with truth, and all our ideas of natural order and harmony; and if the ſame things are likewiſe pure, becauſe they preſerve the comelineſs and honour of human nature uncorrupted and unſullied;—every obligation that lies upon us to conform our actions to the truth of things, muſt of courſe infer an equal degree of obligation to right action; and all the ties by which we are bound to preſerve the complection of our minds and our moral faculties fair and unſpotted, in order to behave with a decent gravity, and render human nature venerable, muſt alſo be conſidered as ſo many indiſſoluble bonds of duty to cultivate univerſal purity of diſpoſitions, affections, and manners.

If, again, there are any things in themſelves lovely, it can admit of no poſſible diſpute, whether they are the natural and juſt objects of our eſteem and choice. To ſay of characters, that they are lovely, and that they deſerve our love, is only expreſſing the ſelf-ſame idea by different terms; and to ſay that they deſerve our love, and therefore ought to be delighted in; and that becauſe they ought to be delighted in, they ſhould be diligently and conſtantly improved and cultivated;—This again is only laying down a plain principle, and aſſerting the neceſſary conſequences which reſult from it. And was there any being formed with ſuch an original moral depravity, as to have no ſenſe of amiable actions, but a ſtrong and conſtant propenſity to the contrary, it would inſtantly be condemned as the moſt monſtrous production of nature; and even the atheiſt himſelf would be apt to lay hold of ſuch an inexplicable prodigy, as an unanſwerable objection againſt the exiſtence of a God, and a wiſe ſuperintending Providence.

Finally, it is alſo a right general rule of conduct, Whatever things are of good report,—think on theſe things. By which we are not to underſtand thoſe actions which ſuit the taſte and genius of the country where we live, and are admired from the force of education and habit, or becauſe they agree with opinions and prejudices received from our anceſtors;—but ſuch actions only as have univerſally a good report in all nations, however diſagreeing in their ſentiments, and cuſtoms, and forms of religion. Whatever is of this kind, it may fairly be preſumed has a ſolid foundation in the common frame of human nature, and that the approbation of it ſprings from reaſon, not from the ſtrength of prepoſſeſſion, or prejudice, which in every other caſe are infinitely various. Nor indeed can we pretend to account for this agreement of ſentiment and harmony of applauſe with any appearance of reaſon, otherwiſe than by ſuppoſing the intrinſic and immutable excellency of the things themſelves; and that there is one original ſuperior faculty, which, with reſpect to general rules, of eternal uſe and importance to all, dictates to all alike; and is therefore the light, the voice, the law of God, in his creature and ſubject man. So that hence we may collect the true ſum of the Apoſtle's advice in the words we are now conſidering; and that is, That we ſteadily attend to, and conſtantly practiſe all thoſe things, which, becauſe they are in their own nature praiſe-worthy, are allowed every where to be neceſſary branches of a right, decent, and honourable behaviour.

Having thus conſidered the Apoſtle's argument in a general view, it may be proper briefly to point out the particular virtues more directly included in each of the above characters.

And, 1. It is natural to underſtand him as intending by the things that are true, to recommend the virtues of truth and fidelity; that is, ſincerity in all our profeſſions of reverence and duty to God, and of reſpect and ſervice to our fellow-creatures;—the being true to our promiſes, contracts, friendſhips, and diſcharging with diligence and care every truſt repoſed in us;—the contrary vices to which, are diſſimulation, deceitful compliment, lying, fraud, treachery,—which are infallible indications of a ſelfiſh and baſe diſpoſition, and the ſource of endleſs confuſion in ſocieties.

2. In the things that are grave, decent, and venerable, are particularly included a calm compoſed temper, free from the perturbation of exceſſive paſſions;—an uniform and unſhaken reſolution to adhere to the principles of truth and right; and that ſedateneſs and dignity of behaviour, which is the natural reſult of inward regularity, and a juſt ſelf-eſteem. To theſe inſtances of manly and venerable conduct, are oppoſed a ſlaviſh ſubjection to appetite, which renders human nature deſpicable;—a fickle, fluctuating temper, levity, vanity, and ridiculous affectation;—thoſe unguarded familiarities which leſſen our weight and influence; and in ſhort, all ſuch deportment as is unſuitable to our peculiar rank and ſtation, and tends to diſgrace it.

3. In the next head are comprehended all the different branches of juſtice: The diſtinct offices of juſtice are indeed various, as mens conditions and characters differ; but the general obligation and the general rules are one and the ſame; which may eaſily be reduced to that admirable maxim of our bleſſed Saviour,—the compendium and ſubſtance of all equity; "Whatſoever ye would that men ſhould do to you, were they in your circumſtances, and you in theirs, do ye even ſo to them." We may add, that the virtue of juſtice is not only the main pillar and ſtrength of ſocieties, but, as it were, the eſſential and vital ſpirit by which they ſubſiſt; and that the contrary vices,—viz. Cenſoriousneſs, detraction, ſlander, undermining arts, rigorous oppreſſion, and injuries of every kind, are directly calculated to diſſolve the frame of all governments, to render a regular ſocial life abſolutely impoſſible, and human exiſtence itſelf inſupportable.

23 The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you all. Amen.

It was written to the Philippians from Rome, by Epaphroditus.

Ver. 23. Rom. xvi. 24.

4. By the following article, whatever things are pure, is chiefly meant the virtues of continence and chaſtity; oppoſed to which ſtand the infamous ſin of adultery, univerſally deteſted and branded; fornication, ſenſuality,—actions or diſcourſes offenſive to modeſty, which are all known, and fitly deſcribed by the name of impurities,—as ſpreading defilement and a deadly taint over the ſoul, and thus creating a ſtrong averſion to intellectual and ſpiritual enjoyments, and the divine pleaſures of moral rectitude.

Finally, By the things which are of good report, if any particular virtues are deſigned, thoſe muſt be underſtood which are univerſally celebrated as the marks of a noble diſpoſition;—and by the things which are amiable and lovely, thoſe virtues which have a peculiarly attractive beauty and gracefulneſs;—Such as, a diſintereſted and unconfined benevolence, generoſity, returning good for evil, moderation in affluence and power, humility and condeſcenſion in high ſtations;—in oppoſition to all ſelfiſhneſs, narrowneſs of heart, implacable revenge,—diſhonouring and corrupting the innocent, to ſatiate a brutal paſſion; haughtineſs and inſolence, ingratitude and cruelty. So that from the view above taken, the courſe lies open and plain before us, in which we may adorn human nature, and advance it to the higheſt pitch of moral beauty; as well as the oppoſite path, which neceſſarily leads to deformity and ſhame.

Thus then we have ſeen, that in a ſingle paſſage of the New Teſtament we have a complete ſyſtem of morals, as it were in miniature; the natural and unchangeable foundation of virtue is clearly aſſerted, wiſely laid, and exhibited in a proper variety of lights: the characters are ſo contrived, that they may be conſidered as general rules, at the ſame time that they direct our view to almoſt all the particular branches of morals: and to render the account as comprehenſive as poſſible, a clauſe is added, in which, by a fair and eaſy interpretation, the peculiar duties of every rank and condition, and the nobleſt refinements and heights of virtue may be ſuppoſed to be inculcated: In ſhort, from the abridgement of its precepts here given by St. Paul, we may reaſonably infer "the extent, the ſublimity, the perfection of that moral goodneſs which the Goſpel of Chriſt requires."

What then remains, but that if there be any virtue, and if there be any praiſe, we ſhould think on theſe things? If virtue be a reality, and not an empty fiction; and if there be in nature any juſt ground of praiſe, it muſt of neceſſity be in ſuch things as theſe. If there be any good quality of a tranſcendent worth and excellence, and which juſtly intitles thoſe who are poſſeſſed of it to extraordinary honour and applauſe, we ſhould even think it our duty ardently to aſpire after that, and count it an highly commendable and virtuous ambition to endeavour to excel in it: For if we give all diligence that theſe things be in us, and abound, they make us that we ſhall neither be barren, nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. See Foſter's Sermons, vol. 2.

COLOSSIANS.

CHAP. I.

After ſalutation, he thanketh God for their faith, confirmeth the doctrine of Epaphras, prayeth further for their increaſe in grace, deſcribeth the true Chriſt, encourageth them to receive Jeſus Chriſt, and commendeth his own miniſtry.

PAUL, an apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother,

2 To the ſaints and faithful brethren in Chriſt, which are at Coloſſe: Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

3 We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, praying always for you;

4 Since we heard of your faith in Chriſt Jeſus, and of the love which ye have to all the ſaints;

5 For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the goſpel;

6 Which is come unto you, as it is in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth alſo in you, ſince the day ye heard of it, and knew the grace of God in truth:

7 As ye alſo learned of Epaphras, our dear fellow-ſervant, who is for you a faithful miniſter of Chriſt;

COLOSSIANS] Coloſſe was a conſiderable city of Phrygia, in Aſia Minor, ſituated at a ſmall diſtance from Laodicea, both which cities were deſtroyed by an earthquake not long after the writing of this Epiſtle. St. Paul himſelf had not been at Coloſſe when he wrote it, though he had ſome years before travelled through Phrygia; however Epaphras had founded a Chriſtian church at Coloſſe, and probably in the neighbouring cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis. It is probable that ſome Coloſſians, who had heard St. Paul preach at Epheſus, might be converted by him; and among them Philemon, to whom St. Paul addreſſed his Epiſtle ſo entitled. The churches of Coloſſe, Laodicea, and Hierapolis were expoſed to more imminent danger of being ſeduced by falſe teachers, as they had not received the Goſpel immediately from an Apoſtle, but from Epaphras, and as they might queſtion whether Epaphras did not err in ſome reſpects. This occaſioned St. Paul's anxiety for them, and induced him to confirm the doctrine of Epaphras by this Epiſtle, which was written from Rome about the ſame time with the preceding, A. D. 62, or 63. Lardner thinks, that this and the Epiſtle to Philemon were ſent away together by Tychicus and Oneſimus; although that to Philemon was probably delivered firſt. The more immediate occaſion of writing to the Coloſſians was, an Epiſtle St. Paul had received from the Laodiceans, (ſee ch. iv. 16.) which Michaelis thinks contained ſome written queries relating to the doctrines of the Eſſenes, and that this Epiſtle was intended to anſwer them. The Epiſtle to the Coloſſians is ſo like that to the Epheſians, both in language and contents, that the one will greatly illuſtrate the other. See the Introduction of the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, of the 1ſt to Timothy, Lardner, Michaelis, Locke, Peirce, &c.

Ver. 1. Timotheus our brother] Timothy the brother. Wat.

Ver. 2. To the ſaints and faithful brethren] To the holy and faithful brethren. They might receive this appellation of holy, not only on account of their ſtrong attachment to the purity of the Chriſtian faith, but likewiſe as a ſociety by profeſſion ſeparated from the reſt of the world. See on Epheſ. i. 2. Peirce, and Doddridge.

Ver. 3. To God and the Father] To the God and Father. Pierce, Doddridge, &c. P. Franck has a good obſervation here, which illuſtrates the beauty of many Scriptures, "The order which would ſeem moſt artificial is tranſpoſed, to make the ſenſe plainer. It is not having heard of your faith I bleſs God, but vice verſa." The ſame obſervation may be applied to ver. 11. From hence to ver. 13. St. Paul acquaints them with the ſatisfactory account he had received of their faith and love; aſſuring them at the ſame time of the great intereſt they had in both his petitions and thankſgivings. In giving an account hereof, he evidently endeavours to raiſe their ſenſe of the greatneſs of thoſe advantages which they partook of by the Goſpel, which were ſuch as the law could not ſecure to them, and which were in a more large and plentiful manner now diſperſed, being offered to the whole world, and not confined ſo narrowly as under the former œconomy, to the comparatively ſmall nation of the Jews. Hereby he likewiſe ſtirs up their gratitude to God, who had dealt ſo kindly with them, and excites their endeavours to anſwer the obligations he had laid them under. Peirce.

Ver. 4. Since we heard of your faith] See on Epheſ. i. 15. and Philip. i. 3—5.

Ver. 5. For the hope which is laid up, &c.] There is an ambiguity in the connection of this clauſe. It may either ſignify that the Apoſtle gives thanks for this their hope, (ſuppoſing the 4th verſe to come in as a parentheſis;) or it may more directly refer to the immediately preceding words, and intimate that a partnerſhip in this bleſſed hope cemented the hearts of theſe good men. In either ſenſe the connection is inſtructive; but the former appears moſt natural. See Peirce and Doddridge.

Ver. 6. In all the world] "In all the provinces of the Roman empire," as the phraſe often ſignifies. See Rom. x. 18. Dr. Waterland, after ſome MSS, reads the next clauſe, and bringeth forth fruit, and increaſes, as, &c. The words in truth, at the end of the verſe, may be referred to their knowledge; and then it ſhould be rendered, ſince you truly know the grace of God. But St. Paul ſeems rather here to mean the true grace of God, as the Goſpel is called 1 Pet. v. 12. By the true grace, or unmixed Goſpel of God, he probably intends what was chiefly upon his mind,—God's great favour to the Gentiles, in receiving them to be his people, without their ſubmitting to circumciſion, and the Jewiſh law. This he ſeems eſpecially to call the truth of the Goſpel, and the truth. See Gal. ii. 5, 14. iii. 1. v. 7. Tit. i. 14. Peirce, Clarke, and Grotius.

8 Who alſo declared unto us your love in the Spirit.

9 For this cauſe we alſo, ſince the day we heard it, do not ceaſe to pray for you, and to deſire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will, in all wiſdom and ſpiritual underſtanding;

10 That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleaſing, being fruitful in every good work, and increaſing in the knowledge of God;

11 Strengthened with all might according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-ſuffering with joyfulneſs;

12 Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the ſaints in light:

13 Who hath delivered us from the power of darkneſs, and hath tranſlated us into the kingdom of his dear Son:

14 In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveneſs of ſins.

15 Who is the image of the inviſible God, the firſt-born of every creature:

Ver. 8. Rom. xv. 30.—V. 9. Epheſ. i. 15. 1 Cor. i. 5. Rom. xii. 2. Epheſ. v. 17.—V. 10. Epheſ. iv. 1. Phil. i. 27. 1 Theſſ. ii. 12. 1 Theſſ. iv. 1.—V. 11. Epheſ. iv. 2.—V. 12. Acts xxvi. 18.—V. 13. Epheſ. vi. 12. Hebr. ii. 14. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Gr. the Son of his love.—V. 14. Epheſ. i. 7.—V. 15. 2 Cor. iv. 4. Hebr. i. 3. Rev. iii. 14.

Ver. 8. Your love in the Spirit] The Apoſtle's meaning ſeems to be, that their love to him was purely upon a ſpiritual account,—for the ſake of the doctrine he taught; they not having reaſon to love him upon any inferior conſideration, ſince they had never ſeen him. See ch. ii. 1, 5. and Peirce.

Ver. 9. Since the day we heard it] Our tranſlators, by inſerting it, ſhew that they thought this verſe ſtood connected with ver. 7, 8. whereas thoſe two verſes are rather a parentheſis; and the preſent verſe is to be joined with ver. 6. This ſeems clear from what he ſays,—That ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will. The αὐτοῦ, his, here relates to God, mentioned in the end of the 6th verſe, and conſequently the ſenſe is better ſupplied by theſe things;—that is, all the good things he had before mentioned concerning them. By comparing the latter part of this verſe with Epheſ. i. 8, 9. it appears, that in both places is meant a comprehenſive view of the will of God; or, as he there calls it, the myſtery of his will; namely, his great purpoſe of calling the Gentiles. The ſpiritual underſtanding is an underſtanding of ſpiritual things, or ſuch things as were revealed by the Spirit, of which the aforeſaid myſtery was one. He ſeems to mean the ſame thing, Epheſ. i. 17. where he calls it a revelation. St. Paul ſhews himſelf very deſirous that the Coloſſians ſhould thoroughly underſtand, and acknowledge this myſtery. See ch. ii. 1, 2. Locke, Peirce, and Grotius.

Ver. 10. That ye might walk worthy, &c.] The Apoſtle ſeems here moſt pathetically to propoſe the great ſubject and deſign of this Epiſtle; which was chiefly intended to excite them to a temper and behaviour worthy their Chriſtian character, and which indeed is the leading view in all his writings. Some would render the latter part of this verſe, Being fruitful and increaſing in every good work, for the knowledge of God; that is, for the acquiring that knowledge for which St. Paul had thanked God before, ver. 6.—that the Goſpel brought forth fruit among the Coloſſians; and it ſeems natural to ſuppoſe, that when he prays here, that they might bring forth fruit in every good work, he does not pray barely for what they already did, but for a further increaſe of it. Comp. 1 Theſſ. iv. 1, 10. The words thus underſtood inform us, that a holy converſation is very ſerviceable to diſpoſe men to acquire the knowledge of God. See Grotius, Mill, Wetſtein, and Peirce.

Ver. 12. Made us meet to be partakers] The words rendered, partakers of the inheritance, literally ſignify, the proportion of an inheritance, which falls by lot to each of thoſe among whom it is divided; alluding, as is ſuppoſed, to the manner in which the land of Canaan was divided amongſt the tribes. It may be rendered, Who hath made us fit for a part in the inheritance of the ſaints in light;—an expreſſion, which ſome underſtand as referring to the luſtre of the glorified body of the ſaints; who will be clothed after the reſurrection with a viſible lucid glory, reſembling that of the Shechinah. See Wolfius, Whitby, and Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. iii. p. 198.

Ver. 13. Who hath delivered us] Some think that the us and we in theſe verſes refer to the Gentile converts only; but though there is no doubt that the Apoſtle refers to their dark and ſinful ſtate, yet there is no reaſon to believe that he means to exclude himſelf: For when divine grace made him ſenſible of what he had been in his Phariſaical ſtate, while a blaſphemer, a perſecutor and injurious, he muſt certainly have ſeen himſelf to have been under the power of darkneſs; as Chriſt repreſents thoſe of the Jews to have been, who, influenced by the ſpirits of darkneſs, were combined againſt him. See Luke xxii. 53. Peirce, and Doddridge.

Ver. 14.] St. Paul having in the 13th verſe mentioned God's dear Son, he here, according to his uſual manner, runs out immediately into a digreſſion concerning him; but it is ſuch a digreſſion as is very much to his main purpoſe; viz. to eſtabliſh them in their adherence to Chriſt, and to make them ſenſible how unreaſonable their attempt was, who endeavoured to ſeduce them from him. Nothing could be ſaid more proper for this end, than what he here ſays to ſhew the pre-eminence and headſhip of Chriſt, in all reſpects, even above the angels, whom ſome would have perſuaded them to worſhip; and to ſet forth his tranſcendent excellency, and the greatneſs of the advantages which the Gentiles received by him. Peirce.

Ver. 15. Who is the image] Adam is ſaid to have been made in the image of God, and dominion given him over the creatures of the earth; by which he became Lord of this lower world. St. Paul in Philip. ii. 6. tells us, that Chriſt was in the form of God, which gave him dominion over the works of nature, which had their being, and owe their preſervation to his power. Moſes gives us an account how Adam fell from the dignity in which he was created, and entailed miſery upon his deſcendents through his diſobedience and vain ambition. St. Paul ſays, that Chriſt, through obedience and ſubmiſſion to the will of his Father, has ſet us an example, by which, if the ſame mind be in us, we may recover what is loſt. Moſes tells us, that Adam was tempted to eat the forbidden fruit, upon the hopes the tempter gave him, that it would make him like to God. He thought it ſuch an advantageous propoſal, that he catched at the opportunity, and eagerly embraced the offer. St. Paul's account is, that Chriſt, who had a right by nature to appear in the majeſty and glory of God, yet voluntarily laid it aſide, and lived and died upon earth, in faſhion as a man. What Adam got by his bold attempt, we all know; but Chriſt, for a recompence of his obedience, was highly exalted. Adam was at beſt a faint image of God; but Chriſt was a true, faithful, and ſtrong image of the wiſdom, power, and goodneſs of his Father. Adam was ſuch an image of God, as the reflection of the ſun is, when ſeen in the water; but Chriſt was ſuch an image of the ſun, as another ſun would be, adorned with equal luſtre and radiance. The Apoſtle deſcribes our Redeemer in this and the following verſes in ſuch lofty terms, as evidently beſpeak him to be a divine perſon; truly and really a God; and conſequently the fitteſt perſon to undertake ſo great and glorious a work as the redemption of a periſhing world. The Father alone is repreſented in the New Teſtament as the inviſible God: Chriſt is never repreſented as inviſible; and indeed it might ſeem ſtrange if he ſhould, ſince he actually took upon him fleſh, and was ſeen in the world; His being called the Image of God in this place, and 2 Cor. iv. 4. implies his being viſible, and that the perfections of God do moſt eminently ſhine in him. It is remarkable how expreſly Philo the Jew, in more places than one, calls the Logos, or Word, of which he ſpeaks, The image of God.

Dr. Hammond obſerves, that the word πρωτότοκος, beſides the ordinary notion of firſt-born, (which cannot ſo well here refer to Chriſt's eternal generation, becauſe of that which is added to it,—the firſt-born of every creature; which only gives him a precedency before other creatures, and doth not attribute eternity to him) is uſed ſometimes in Scripture for a lord, or perſon in power; who hath the privilege of the firſt-born, dominion over all his brethren; and according to this notion, it is uſed commonly in Scripture for a prince, or principal perſon; (ſee Pſ. lxviii. 27.) and amongſt the civilians the Heir and the Lord are ſynonimous terms. That this is the true ſenſe of the word in this place appears probable for the following reaſons: 1. Becauſe the Apoſtle immediately adds, for by him were all things created; ſo that the creation of all things by him, is given as a reaſon for his being πρωτότοκος. Now it is not a good argument, that becauſe he created all things, he was therefore himſelf produced before them; it is ſufficient for that purpoſe, that he had almighty power, and was before them: but it is a very good argument, that becauſe he created all things, he ſhould therefore be Lord, or Heir of all things. 2dly, Becauſe the ſame Apoſtle, Heb. i. 12. hath ſtiled the ſame perſon Heir of all things; and probably alluded to the ſame reaſon, when he added, by whom alſo he made the world. Thirdly, Becauſe the prophecy in Pſ. lxxxix. confirms this interpretation, and ſhews the true meaning of the word. He ſhall cry unto me, Thou art my Father, my God, and the rock of my ſalvation; alſo I will make thee my firſt-born,—(in the LXX πρωτότοκος) higher than the kings of the earth; But, according to the Arian notion, this ſhould have been, He is or was my firſt-born. See Heb. i. 6. Rev. iii. 14. It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that the word πρωτότοκος hath yet another ſignification, and is applied by Homer, Il. P. to an animal that hath brought forth its firſt young, in which ſenſe it might be applied without any great impropriety to the Creator of all things;—He, who as it were at the firſt birth, by the exertion of his creating power, brought forth all things. The words πασης κτισεως, ſo naturally ſignifying the whole creation, (a verſion which gives a much nobler and more determinate ſenſe than every creature) at leaſt render this interpretation very remarkable. Dr. Waterland reads the firſt-born before, or born before all the creation. See Blackwall. S. C. vol. ii. p. 173. Sherlock, vol. iv. diſ. 1. Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. iii. p. 559. 16 For by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, viſible and inviſible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him:

17 And he is before all things, and by him all things conſiſt.

18 And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the firſt-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence.

19 For it pleaſed the Father that in him ſhould all fulneſs dwell;

20 And (having made peace through the blood of his croſs) by him to reconcile all things unto himſelf; by him, I ſay, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven.

21 And you, that were ſometime alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled,

22 In the body of his fleſh, through death, to preſent you holy and unblameable, and unreproveable in his ſight:

23 If ye continue in the faith grounded and ſettled, and be not moved away from the hope of the goſpel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a miniſter;

24 Who now rejoice in my ſufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Chriſt in my fleſh, for his body's ſake, which is the church:

25 Whereof I am made a miniſter according to the diſpenſation of God, which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God;

26 Even the myſtery which hath been hid from ages, and from generations, but now is made manifeſt to his ſaints:

27 To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this myſtery among the Gentiles; which is Chriſt in you, the hope of glory:

28 Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wiſdom; that we may preſent every man perfect in Chriſt Jeſus:

Ver. 16. Whether they be thrones, &c.] See on Epheſ. iii. 10. For him, at the end of the verſe, means to be in ſubjection to him. This is juſtified by what is ſaid ver. 18. that in all things he might have the pre-eminence; by which it appears, that when God made all things by Chriſt, he did it with a deſign to rule and diſpoſe of them by him. See Heb. i. 8.

Ver. 17. And by him all things conſiſt] This is a new argument, which St. Paul uſes to prove the ſuper-eminent dignity and authority of Chriſt; namely, that as God made all things by him, ſo he upholds and preſerves all things by him too. The ſame is aſſerted Heb. i. 3. where he is ſaid to uphold all things by the word of his Father's power; for the author of that Epiſtle ſeems to diſtinguiſh in the ſame verſe αὐτȣ͂, and ἑαυτȣ͂. Peirce.

Ver. 18. And he is the head of the body] St. Paul had proved Chriſt's ſuperiority to all the creatures, by his making and ſuſtaining them; and now, by a third argument, he confirms his full authority over the church; and that is, by God's conſtitution and appointment at his reſurrection. The inſiſting expreſly upon this, was agreeable to his grand deſign, to confirm the Coloſſians in their regard to Chriſt, being apprehenſive that they were in ſome danger of being drawn off from him. The beginning here mentioned, (who is the beginning) is very different from that ſpoken of before; and yet this beginning, which is his reſurrection, is plainly laid down as a foundation of the principality and headſhip which he holds over the church. He was the beginning, with reſpect to the creation of all things, being the firſt-born of every creature; He is the beginning and head of the church, being the firſt-born from the dead;—the firſt who ever roſe to an endleſs life. 1 Cor. xv. 20, 23. Acts xxvi. 23. Rev. i. 5. Inſtead of Ἀρχὴ, the beginning, ſome MSS and copies read Ἀπαρχὴ, the firſt-fruits: In all things, means in all reſpects; not only as the Maker of all things, but as the Mediator raiſed from the dead. See Peirce, Mill, Grotius, and Sherlock.

Ver. 19. For it pleaſed, &c.] For in him all fulneſs pleaſed to dwell. Wat. Dr. Heylin renders it, For it pleaſed the Father that all perfection ſhould dwell in him. The 9th verſe of the next chapter ſeems clearly to explain this;—"It pleaſed the Father, that the fulneſs of gifts and graces, even all the plenitude of the Godhead, ſhould reſide in him bodily." The word rendered dwell, ſignifies a permanent and inſeparable preſence; not a temporary one, like that which the prophets experienced; and it is ſtiled by the fathers an hypoſtatical union. See John i. 16. Epheſ. i. 23. Grotius, Beza, and Pierce.

Ver. 20. And (having made peace, &c.] And by him to reconcile all things unto the ſame (having made peace by the blood of his croſs) by him, I ſay, &c. Wat. Dr. Whitby would render it, by him to make all things friendly in him, making peace between them by the blood of his croſs. By things in earth and things in heaven, ſome underſtand the whole world; the heavens and the earth, being an Hebrew phraſe for the world; In this ſenſe the Apoſtle ſays, 2 Cor. v. 9. God was in Chriſt reconciling the world unto himſelf. But if we take the words in their literal ſenſe, they mean that by him God hath reconciled all things to each other, whether things on earth, i. e. Jews and Gentiles, or things in heaven, i. e. celeſtial ſpirits who are now reconciled to fallen man, and incorporated with them into one holy and happy ſociety: For when a breach commenced between God and man, the angels, as faithful ſubjects, muſt join with God againſt rebellious man, and be ready to act as enemies to him, as long as he continued an enemy to God. See Epheſ. i. 10. Whitby, Grotius, and Hammond.

Ver. 22. In the body of his fleſh, &c.] That body, or mortal fleſh, which he was pleaſed to aſſume, that he might be capable of ſuffering. See Epheſ. ii. 16. v. 27. and ver. 10. of the preſent chapter.

Ver. 23. If ye continue in the faith, &c.] Since ye continue, &c. and are not moved, &c. St. Paul was perſuaded that the Coloſſians would be preſented holy and unblameable, ſince he ſaw how firm they continued in the faith: He uſes a parallel kind of reaſoning, Philip. i. 6, 7. This rendering ſeems neceſſary, becauſe of the now in the next verſe, and becauſe of what he ſays of them, ch. ii. 5. Inſtead of which was preached, &c. Dr. Waterland reads, which has been preached to all the creation under heaven. See Rom. xvi. 25. Epheſ. iii. 7—9. Peirce, and Locke.

Ver. 24. And fill up, &c.] Nothing could be further from the Apoſtle's intention (as is manifeſt from the whole tenor of his writings,) than to intimate that the ſufferings of Chriſt were imperfect, as to that fulneſs of atonement which was neceſſary in order to the juſtification of believers. But he deeply retained in his mind the impreſſion of that firſt leſſon which he had from his Saviour's mouth; namely, that he was perſecuted in his members: Acts ix. 4. He therefore conſiders it as the plan of Providence, that a certain meaſure of ſufferings ſhould be endured by this body, of which Chriſt was the head; and he rejoices to think, that what he endured in his own perſon was congruous to that wiſe and gracious king. See Doddridge and Grotius. Inſtead of the afflictions of Chriſt in my fleſh, Dr. Waterland reads, the afflictions for Chriſt, &c. Comp. Epheſ. iii. 13. Philip. ii. 17, 18.

Ver. 26. Even the myſtery, &c.] See Rom. xvi. 25. Epheſ. iii. 9, &c.

Ver. 27. Which is Chriſt in you, the hope of Glory] "This rich diſplay of divine grace is all ſummed up in this one word, That Chriſt is in you the hope of eternal glory. Being formed by divine grace in your hearts, he brings to you, who were once without hope, and without God in the world, (Epheſ. ii. 12.) the bright beamings of this bleſſed proſpect,—even a glorious and holy immortality." See Doddridge and Peirce.

Ver. 28. Whom we preach] All this diſcourſe centers in the great view of engaging the Coloſſians to adhere to Chriſtianity; and it is 29 Whereunto I alſo labour, ſtriving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily.

CHAP. II.

He ſtill exhorteth them to be conſtant in Chriſt, to beware of philoſophy, and vain traditions, worſhiping of angels, and legal ceremonies, which are ended in Chriſt.

FOR I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not ſeen my face in the fleſh;

2 That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full aſſurance of underſtanding, to the acknowledgement of the myſtery of God, and of the Father, and of Chriſt;

3 In whom are hid all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge.

4 And this I ſay, leſt any man ſhould beguile you with enticing words.

5 For though I be abſent in the fleſh, yet am I with you in the ſpirit, joying and beholding your order, and the ſtedfaſtneſs of your faith in Chriſt.

6 As ye have therefore received Chriſt Jeſus the Lord, ſo walk ye in him:

7 Rooted and built up in him, and ſtabliſhed in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thankſgiving.

8 Beware leſt any man ſpoil you through philoſophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Chriſt.

9 For in him dwelleth all the fulneſs of the Godhead bodily.

pleaſing to obſerve how every verſe, and almoſt every clauſe ſuggeſts more directly or obliquely ſome ſtrong argument to that purpoſe. The word every man occurring no leſs than three times in the compaſs of this one verſe, ſhews that St. Paul laid great ſtreſs upon it; and it ſeems plain that he means to expreſs that he made no diſtinction between Jews and Gentiles, but applied himſelf indifferently to both. The meaning of the laſt clauſe is, "I labour that my miniſtry may have that effect upon all my hearers, whether Jews or Gentiles, as that every one of them may appear perfect in the ſight of God." Nor need it ſeem ſtrange that the Apoſtle ſhould ſpeak of this preſenting, as his own act, ſince he uſes a ſomewhat ſimilar expreſſion elſewhere, 2 Cor. xi. 2. I have eſpouſed you to one huſband, that I might preſent you as a chaſte virgin to Chriſt. The expreſſion here ſeems uſed in alluſion to the offerings preſented to God under the law, and agrees with his manner of ſpeech, Rom. v. 16. When he ſays perfect in Chriſt Jeſus, he hints, that they had not, and could not have this perfection by the Moſaical law. Chriſt elſewhere ſignifies the doctrine or laws of Chriſt. See Epheſ. iv. 20. Heb. xiii. 8. and Peirce.

Ver. 29. Striving according to his working, &c.] This may import the many ſigns and wonders which God enabled him to perform for the confirmation of the doctrine he preached; (comp. Gal. ii. 8. 2 Cor. xiii. 3.) or elſe the divine influence upon himſelf, whereby he was excited and enabled with ſuch vaſt diligence, induſtry, and ſucceſs to preach the Goſpel. Comp. Rom. xv. 19. 1 Cor. xv. 10. The next verſe, which, with the two following, ſhould not have been ſeparated from this chapter, leads us rather to prefer the latter of theſe. See Peirce, Doddridge, and the Reflections on Philip. ii. 12, 13.

Chap. II. Ver. 1. What great conflict] The words and metaphors in this and the preceding verſe are taken from the athletic exerciſes in the Grecian games, and expreſs the great ſolicitude, the kind of agony St. Paul had upon his mind for them. See 2 Cor. xi. 2. The pains he took to preach the Goſpel, and to aſſert their liberty againſt ſuch as oppoſed; the troubles and difficulties he now underwent upon this account, being actually in bonds for that cauſe; (ch. i. 24. iv. 3.) and the earneſtneſs with which he prayed for them, are all comprehended in this expreſſion. See Doddridge, Peirce, and the Introductory Note. Have not ſeen my face, might be rendered, have not ſeen me in perſon.

Ver. 2. Might be comforted] The original word παρακληθῶσιν ſignifies not only "to have conſolation adminiſtered under affliction," but "to be exhorted and quickened, excited and animated; and ſo recovered from indolence and irreſolution, as well as dejection." The expreſſion rendered all riches of the full aſſurance of underſtanding, or the richeſt and moſt aſſured underſtanding, is extremely emphatical; more agreeable to the Hebrew than the Greek idiom; and it is one of the many inſtances of that ſtrong manner of ſpeaking with which the writings of our Apoſtle abound. "The myſtery here ſpoken of, ſays Dr. Hevlin, is the ſame as before, at ver. 27. of the laſt chapter. I conceive that it relates to the divine paternity and filiation in us. But as it appears from this verſe that the comprehenſion of that myſtery depends upon a certain diſpoſition of heart, and enlargement of the underſtanding, no expreſſion can convey the knowledge of it, until the requiſite diſpoſitions are produced." Inſtead of God, and of the Father, the MS reads God, even the Father.

Ver. 3. Are hid] The original ſignifies any thing that is depoſited or treaſured up for future ſervice; and is uſually applied to money. See Epheſ. i. 8. Prov. viii. 9, 10. and Grotius.

Ver. 4. And this I ſay] Namely, "That all the treaſures of wiſdom are in Chriſt,—that you may not be impoſed upon by the plauſible argumentations of human philoſophy." See ver. 8. St. Paul comes here directly to treat of that matter which he chiefly deſigned in writing this Epiſtle. Though he was well pleaſed with the Coloſſians continuing hitherto ſo ſteadfaſt in the doctrine he had taught, and in maintaining the liberty they had by Chriſt, and had therefore beſtowed great commendations upon them; yet he was apprehenſive of their being in danger from ſome of the Jewiſh converts, who were endeavouring to ſeduce and corrupt them. The points in which he judged them moſt liable to be deceived, were the pretended obligation of the Gentiles to ſubmit to the Moſaic law, and the Jewiſh traditions, and to yield a worſhip to angels; againſt which he cautions them with much earneſtneſs, ſhewing them that they had in Chriſt all they could pretend to ſeek for elſewhere; and that by having recourſe to the law, they forſook the ſubſtance, and embraced ſhadows only. That Chriſt had aboliſhed the obligation to obſerve the law; that they were obliged by their baptiſm to refuſe the ſubmiſſion urged upon them; and that by paying the reſpect to angels, which was recommended to them, they in effect renounced Chriſt as their head, upon whom alone their hopes ought to depend, as all their ſupplies were derived only from him. His diſcourſe, though ſhort, is admirably adapted to his ſubject, and ſets forth with much magnificence the glorious advantages they had by Chriſt, above what could be expected from the law. See Peirce and Heylin.

Ver. 5. Yet am I with you in the ſpirit] As this ſtands oppoſed to in the fleſh, it ſeems moſt reaſonable to underſtand it of St. Paul's own ſpirit, and not, as ſome have thought, of the Holy Ghoſt. See 1 Cor. v. 3. 2 Kings v. 26. The word τάξιν, rendered order, is a military term, and ſignifies that beautiful order and diſpoſition, in which an army appears when arrayed for battle.

Ver. 8. Beware, leſt any man ſpoil you, &c.] Make a ſpoil of you. Wat. "The tradition of men, and the rudiments, or rather ſhadows of the world, being entirely Jewiſh, ſays Mr. Peirce, the philoſophy and vain deceit there mentioned, muſt belong entirely to the Jews alſo. For, that philoſophy and vain deceit, by which St. Paul feared leſt any one ſhould make a prey of them, was after, or according to that tradition, and thoſe elements or ſhadows; and conſequently was uſed by ſuch as were fond of thoſe things." That many of the Jewiſh converts might be acquainted with the heathen philoſophy is eaſy to be believed, ſince this was then common amongſt the Jews, who blended it with their religion; as may be ſeen by many paſſages in Joſephus, and many more in Philo. Theſe converts from Judaiſm St. Paul thought moſt dangerous to thoſe, who from among the Gentiles believed, as we may perceive by many paſſages in his Epiſtles. See Titus i. 10, 14. iii. 9. 1 Tim. i. 4—7. vi. 20. Nay, the chief deſign of the Epiſtles to the Romans, Galatians, Epheſians, Philippians, and of this to the Coloſſians likewiſe, is to arm them againſt ſuch ſeducers. See Epheſ. iv. 14—16. Others, however, think that the Apoſtle refers to the vain deceit of Gentile, as well as Jewiſh philoſophy. The word rendered rudiments, ϛοιχεῖα, may doubtleſs ſignify ſhadows, as oppoſed to ſubſtance; ſuch as the Jewiſh ceremonies undoubtedly were. But there may be a peculiar ſpirit in ſpeaking of the boaſted dictates of Pagan philoſophy but as elements, or leſſons for children, when compared with the ſublime inſtruction to be received in the ſchool of Chriſt. See Peirce, Doddridge, Pyle, and Grotius.

Ver. 9. For in him dwelleth all the fulneſs, &c.] For in him all the plenitude of the divinity ſubſtantially reſides. Theſe words contain an evident alluſion to the Shechinah in which God dwelt; and ſo ultimately refer to the adorable myſtery of the union of the divine and human natures, in the perſon of the glorious Emmanuel; which makes

10 And ye are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power:

11 In whom alſo ye are circumciſed with the circumciſion made without hands, in putting off the body of the ſins of the fleſh, by the circumciſion of Chriſt:

13 And you, being dead in your ſins, and the uncircumciſion of your fleſh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all treſpaſſes,

14 Blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances that was againſt us; which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his croſs:

makes him ſuch an object of our hope and confidence, as the moſt exalted creature, with the moſt glorious endowments, could never be of himſelf. See Heylin, Doddridge, and Waterland.

Ver. 11. In whom alſo ye are circumciſed] St. Paul uſes this argument in oppoſition to thoſe who pleaded for the neceſſity of external circumciſion. He aſſures the Coloſſians, that they had no need of this circumciſion, as they were circumciſed with that kind of circumciſion which the external rite was intended to expreſs; namely, the putting off the body of the ſins of the fleſh, by the circumciſion of Chriſt, and initiated by that means into his church, as the members of it formerly were by external circumciſion. See the next verſe, and Rom. ii. 28, 29. Dr. Waterland renders the laſt words of this verſe, —Body of the fleſh, by the Chriſtian circumciſion.

Ver. 12. Buried with him in baptiſm] By baptiſm. MS. This verſe is in purſuance of what is ſaid in the former; namely, to ſhew that the Coloſſians had obtained the true circumciſion by baptiſm, inaſmuch as thereby they made a profeſſion of being dead with Chriſt, and of being raiſed together with him to a new life. Comp. Rom. vi. 4. As this church at Coloſſe was planted earlier than that at Rome, and this Epiſtle was written later than that to the Romans, it more abundantly confirms the perpetuity of baptiſm; as it ſuppoſes all to whom it was addreſſed to have been partakers of that ordinance, whether they were or were not deſcended from Chriſtian parents. See Doddridge, Peirce, and Gale's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 202. The reader will obſerve, that the agent ſpoken of in this and the three next verſes, is God the Father.

Ver. 14. Blotting out the hand writing, &c.] Having blotted out, with reſpect to us, the hand writing of Jewiſh ordinances and inſtitutions, which was contrary to us, (Acts xv. 10.) and had an evident efficacy, either to load us with an heavy burden, or to alienate the hearts of our Jewiſh brethren from us; and therefore he hath taken it away from between us, as I may expreſs it, nailing it to the croſs; and thereby has cancelled it,—as bonds are uſually cancelled amongſt us,—by being ſtruck through with a nail; while he has accompliſhed the purpoſes of the ceremonial law, by that ſacrifice of himſelf; and thereby cauſed the obligation of it to ceaſe." The word χειρόγραφον, rendered hand writing, ſignifies a note of hand, which acknowledges a debt or duty, and obliges a man to pay it:—The Jews bound themſelves to God by their profeſſion of Judaiſm, not to worſhip any other deity, nor to neglect any divine inſtitution; in conſequence of which they rejected all communion with the Gentiles; and thus it was againſt them: It was a bill or obligation, which always was to be diſcharged, and which ſubjected them to penalties in caſe of non-payment. Among the Jews there were two ways of cancelling a bond, or writing; one by blotting, or croſſing it out with a pen; another by ſtriking it through with a nail, as abovementioned. The firſt is done by Chriſt's doctrine, the latter by his crucifixion; expreſſed here by nailing it to his croſs. See Hammond, Grotius, Doddridge, and Peirce.

Ver. 15. And having ſpoiled, &c.] By principalities and powers are generally underſtood the fallen angels, our ſpiritual enemies. The Apoſtle alludes to the cuſtom of conquerors, who in their triumphs made a ſhew of their captives. See 2 Cor. ii. 14. Epheſ. iv. 8. Inſtead of in or by it, i. e. the croſs, whereby theſe ſpiritual enemies hoped to have triumphed over Chriſt, ſome would read in or by him; i. e. Chriſt. Dr. Whitby obſerves, that Cerinthus and Simon Magus, whoſe doctrines he imagines the Apoſtle is here oppoſing, pretended to deliver men from the power of evil ſpirits, by whom they ſaid the world was made and governed. See Whitby, Peirce, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 16. Let no man therefore judge you, &c.] "Since therefore the ceremonial law is thus aboliſhed, and ſince God without it has quickened you Gentiles, who were dead in ſins, and uncircumciſed; let no man take upon him to paſs ſentence upon you, that you belong not to the church of God, becauſe you do not obſerve the ſame ordinances with themſelves about meats, &c." See Rom. xiv. 3.

Ver. 17. Which are a ſhadow, &c.] "Which things were only a ſhadow, or type of things that were to come, and which are now actually come; Chriſt being the real and ſubſtantial bleſſing obſcurely ſhadowed forth by them;—and while you retain the ſubſtance, you will have no need of the ſhadow." Peirce.

Ver. 18. Let no man beguile you] This verſe is differently underſtood. Dr. Doddridge tranſlates and paraphraſes it as follows: "Let no one, therefore, who may ever ſo eagerly deſire it, or ever ſo artfully attempt it, deprive you of your great prize,—for which as Chriſtians you contend,—by an [affected] humility, and the worſhip of angels, which ſome Jewiſh zealots, as well as heathen philoſophers, ſo eagerly inculcate; intruding officiouſly and preſumptuouſly into that which he hath not ſeen; while pretending to tell us wonderful ſecrets, relating to the various ranks, ſubordinations, and offices of theſe angels. This may render a man the admiration of the ignorant and inconſiderate, but it is indeed the reſult of his being vainly puffed up by his corrupt and fleſhly mind, with the conceit of things which it is impoſſible he ſhould underſtand, and a deſire of introducing novelties into religion." Mr. Peirce's paraphraſe is this: "And ſince Chriſt has thus diveſted principalities and powers, let no man take upon him to condemn you, while he pleaſes himſelf with an humility and worſhipping of angels of his own deviſing; bolding prying into, and dictating about matters whereof he knows nothing: and this he is led to by his Jewiſh temper, which puffs him up with vain conceit, that he knows and is fit to judge of every thing." It evidently appears from ſeveral paſſages in Philo, to have been his opinion that angels were meſſengers, who preſented our prayers to God, as well as brought down his favours to us. He repreſents this view of the matter as moſt humble and reverential, and there is no doubt but it prevailed amongſt other Jews; ſee Tob. xi. 14. xii. 12, 15. It ſeems much more probable that the Apoſtle refers to this opinion, than to that of Tertullian, who explains it of "worſhip taught by angels," or perſons pretending to receive revelations from them. It is uncertain whether the heathens began ſo early as this to call thoſe celeſtial ſpirits angels, whom they before had called good demons; but it is evident, that very ſoon after the Apoſtle's days they ſpeak of angels, and archangels, and recommend the worſhip of them, under thoſe names. Bp. Burnet juſtly obſerves, "That if it had been the Apoſtle's intention to give the leaſt encouragement to any religious addreſſes to ſaints and angels, this would have been a very natural occaſion of introducing the ſubject, and adjuſting its proper boundaries. See Burnet on the Articles, p. 225. Jamblic. de Myſter. ſect. ii. c. 2. and Wetſtein.

Ver. 20. Wherefore, if ye be dead with Chriſt] Mr. Peirce and ſome others have conſidered this as the beginning of a new paragraph, addreſſed particularly to the Jewiſh zealots at Coloſſe; and they plead, in ſupport of this opinion, that the ſubjection to ordinances which the Apoſtle here reproves, is inconſiſtent with the applauſes he had before beſtowed on the Coloſſians. But it ſeems moſt natural to ſuppoſe though living in the world, are ye ſubject to ordinances,

21 (Touch not; taſte not; handle not;

22 Which all are to periſh with the uſing;) after the commandments and doctrines of men?

23 Which things have indeed a ſhew of wiſdom, in will-worſhip and humility, and neglecting of the body, not in any honour to the ſatisfying of the fleſh.

CHAP. III.

He ſheweth where we ſhould ſeek Chriſt; he exhorteth to mortification, to put off the old man, and to put on Chriſt; recommending to charity, humility, and ſeveral other duties.

IF ye then be riſen with Chriſt, ſeek thoſe things which are above, where Chriſt ſitteth on the right hand of God.

2 Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth.

3 For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Chriſt in God.

4 When Chriſt who is our life ſhall appear, then ſhall ye alſo appear with him in glory.

5 Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanneſs, inordinate affection, evil concupiſcence, and covetouſneſs, which is idolatry:

6 For which things ſake the wrath of God cometh on the children of diſobedience.

7 In the which ye alſo walked ſome time, when ye lived in them.

8 But now ye alſo put off all theſe; anger, wrath, malice, blaſphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth.

9 Lie not one to another, ſeeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds;

10 And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of him that created him;

11 Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumciſion nor uncircumciſion, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Chriſt is all, and in all.

poſe that he addreſſes the ſociety in general, and leaves it to their own conſciences to determine which of them deſerved the cenſure. Inſtead of, Why are ye ſubject to ordinances? Peirce reads, Why do ye ſtill dogmatize? Τὶ δογματίζεσθε; that is, "require ſuch a compliance as you do, with the injunctions and ritual precepts of the law?"

Ver. 21. (Touch not, &c.] "Touch not any thing ceremonially unclean: Taſte not any food which the law prohibits: Handle not any thing by which legal pollutions may be contracted." The quick ſucceſſion of theſe precepts, without any copulative between them, happily expreſſes the eagerneſs with which the ſeducing teachers inculcated theſe things. See Grotius, Whitby, and Hammond.

Ver. 22. Which all are to periſh with the uſing] Dr. Doddridge renders and paraphraſes this: "All which things tend to the corruption of that excellent religion, in which you have the happineſs to be initiated, by the abuſe of them." Mr. Peirce, underſtanding the three precepts foregoing as referring entirely to meats and drinks, explains this clauſe, "Which yet were all made by God to be conſumed by our uſe of them." See Beza, Grotius, and Bengelius.

Ver. 23. A ſhew of wiſdom, in will-worſhip] "In performing ſome acts of voluntary and uncommanded perfection; in ſhewing a greater humility than others pretend to, both in an affectation of virtue, and the worſhipping of angels;—in auſterities and abſtinencies from ſuch things as others enjoy." The two laſt clauſes may be tranſpoſed, as if it had been ſaid, "It is to ſuch a ſatisfying of the fleſh, as does it no real honour;"—A Meioſis, to expreſs what is diſhonourable; whereas the higheſt honour of our bodies, is to be the inſtruments of our ſouls in the ſervice of God. It has been obſerved that the word τιμῆ ſignifies proviſion, as well as honour; and then the ſenſe will be, that though there was no appearance of providing for the fleſh, yet there was a carnal kind of ſatisfaction in theſe affected ſeverities, when proceeding from the principles of vain-glory and ill-nature; which were as contrary to the genius of true religion, as any the groſſeſt ſenſualities that could be imagined. Mr. Peirce gives the verſe a different turn. According to him the Apoſtle's meaning is, "Which things, having indeed a ſhew of wiſdom, in will-worſhip, (ver. 18.) and humility, and neglecting of the body, ſerve to the diſhonourably gratifying perſons of a fleſhly or Jewiſh diſpoſition." See his note.

Chap. III. Ver. 1. If ye then be riſen, &c.] Since ye then are riſen. MS. The Apoſtle here proceeds, upon the principles he had laid down, to graft a moſt important practical exhortation on what he had ſaid, different from any he had advanced before; than which nothing could more effectually tend to take them off from thoſe bigotted attachments he was ſo ſolicitous to root out;—A remarkable inſtance of that happy addreſs, which we have ſo often had an opportunity of obſerving. See Doddridge, and the Reflections at the end of the chapter.

Ver. 2. Set your Affection on things above] The original is Mind, Regard: "Prefer and purſue the things that are above:"—Τὰ ἄνω φρονεῖτε.

Ver. 3. For ye are dead, &c.] "Dead to the world, its affections and luſts, by the engagement of your baptiſmal covenant." The life of the Chriſtian is repreſented by the next clauſe as an invaluable jewel, and under a double ſecurity reſerved in heaven, and laid up with Chriſt in God; therefore as ſecure as the abode of Chriſt with the Father, or as the fidelity and immutability of the Father himſelf could make it. See Doddridge, and Davenant.

Ver. 5.] St. Paul having diſpatched the principal deſign of his writing, comes now, according to his uſual manner, to give the Coloſſians ſome rules and directions for their Chriſtian behaviour and converſation. Theſe rules are of four kinds: Firſt, Such as concerned themſelves perſonally, and their own purity, in abſtaining from ſenſual luſts; ver. 5—7. Secondly, Such as concerned them as Chriſtians in ſociety, and were to be obſerved by them with regard to, and in converſing with each other; ver. 8—17. Thirdly, The duties reſulting from the ſeveral relations men ſtand in to each other; ver. 18—ch. iv. 1. Fourthly, Such as had reſpect to their enemies, among whom they lived; ch. iv. 2—6. Inſtead of covetouſneſs, expoſitors in general, after Mr. Locke, render the word πλεονεξια, inſatiable deſire, or licentious intemperance. See the note on Epheſ. iv. 19.

Ver. 7. In the which ye alſo walked] Amongſt whom ye alſo once walked, [partaking in all their enormities] when ye lived among them. Doddridge. Mr. Peirce paraphraſes the verſe as follows: "Among which children of diſobedience you alſo ſometime had your converſation, when, being unconverted, you lived in the commiſſion of thoſe ſins."

Ver. 8. Blaſphemy] Evil-ſpeaking. Wat. The original word properly ſignifies blaſphemy; but it includes not only impious ſpeeches with regard to God, which is the higheſt degree of malignant language, but all railing and reproachful ſpeeches againſt our brethren. See Matth. xv. 19. Epheſ. iv. 31. By filthy communication, obſcure and leud diſcourſe is generally underſtood. Dr. Whitby explains the original word of reproachful language; but the former ſenſe is rather to be preferred, as reproachful language ſeems abundantly forbidden in the former article; and as in the parallel Epiſtle to the Epheſians the Apoſtle expreſly forbids ſuch filthy communication. See Epheſ. iv. 29. Whitby, Peirce, and Hammond.

Ver. 11. Where there is neither Greek, &c.] Neither Gentile, &c. Wat. St. Paul's main deſign in this Epiſtle was to eſtabliſh the Coloſſians in their adherence to the Goſpel myſtery of the calling of the Gentiles, and maintaining their freedom againſt the Jewiſh dogmatizers; and though he had already concluded that matter, yet having it very much at his heart, he takes an occaſion here, in the midſt of quite other things, to drop a word with relation to it. The ſenſe of the verſe is, that in the point of obtaining acceptance with God, our regard muſt be paid ſolely to Chriſt; upon him alone we muſt depend, and not upon the Moſaic law;—That faith in and obedience to Chriſt, are all the terms upon which God inſiſts; and that this is the caſe in all, or among all men, let them be Jews, or let them be Gentiles; of whatever nation, or whatever condition it matters not. Upon theſe terms alone they ſhould be received, without ſubmitting to the ordinances

12 Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindneſs, humbleneſs of mind, meekneſs, long-ſuffering;

13 Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel againſt any: even as Chriſt forgave you, ſo alſo do ye.

14 And above all theſe things, put on charity, which is the bond of perfectneſs.

15 And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which alſo ye are called in one body; and be ye thankful.

16 Let the word of Chriſt dwell in you richly in all wiſdom; teaching and admoniſhing one another in pſalms, and hymns, and ſpiritual ſongs, ſinging with grace in your hearts to the Lord.

17 And whatſoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jeſus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him.

18 Wives, ſubmit yourſelves unto your own huſbands, as it is fit in the Lord.

19 Huſbands, love your wives, and be not bitter againſt them.

20 Children, obey your parents in all things: for this is well-pleaſing unto the Lord.

21 Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, leſt they be diſcouraged.

22 Servants, obey in all things your maſters according to the fleſh; not with eye-ſervice, as men-pleaſers, but in ſingleneſs of heart, fearing God:

23 And whatſoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men;

24 Knowing, that of the Lord ye ſhall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye ſerve the Lord Chriſt.

25 But he that doth wrong, ſhall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no reſpect of perſons.

ordinances which the Judaizers would gladly obtrude upon them. The Apoſtle ſeems to make uſe of a kind of climax in mentioning the Scythians, as they were reckoned more barbarous than any barbarous nation. See Grotius and Peirce.

Ver. 12. Put on therefore, as the elect, &c.] As the choſen people, &c. The exhortation in this verſe is not inconſiſtent with what was ſaid in ver. 10. of their having already put on the new man, as the Apoſtle intended here to exhort them to advance more and more in thoſe benevolent diſpoſitions, which did in ſome conſiderable degree already prevail in their hearts.

Ver. 14. Put on charity] "Put on love, which is the bond of that perfect union that ought to reign in the body of Chriſt, and by which the whole church becomes perfect. See John iv. 12, 18.

Ver. 15. And let the peace of God rule, &c.] See Philip. iv. 7. The word βραβευέτω, rendered rule, is a term borrowed from the Grecian games, and alludes to the office of the maſter who preſided at thoſe games, deciding all controverſies between the competitors, and determining who ſhould have the preference; in which view the Apoſtle's meaning is, "Let the peace of God always preſide, as the great umpire in your hearts." See Doddridge, Hammond, Beza, and Stockius.

Ver. 16. Let the word of God dwell in you richly, &c.] That is, "The Goſpel which you have received;" which the Apoſtle exhorts them to lay up in their hearts, to meditate upon it continually, and to endeavour to improve it wiſely to the beſt purpoſe. But Peirce and others give a different interpretation, as follows: "It would be of good ſervice to prevent the ſins from which I have diſſuaded you, and to promote the love I have recommended, if in your converſing together you would take care that your diſcourſe and talk ſhould be much of Chriſt, in all wiſdom; and that you entertain each other in converſing together in a Chriſtian manner; teaching and admoniſhing, &c." See Epheſ. v. 18—20. Dr. Waterland, after Beza, Schmidius, Bengelius, and Gataker, points the verſe thus: Let, &c. richly: in all wiſdom teaching and admoniſhing one another; in pſalms, &c.

Ver. 20. Children, obey—in all things] That is, "Which are lawful, or to which the parental authority extends." This muſt be underſtood with ſome ſuch limitation; and there can be no hurt in ſupplying the ſenſe from ver. 18. with ἐν κυρίῳ, in the Lord; and ſo it is expreſſed Epheſ. vi. 1. That is, "as the Lord requires you, and as far as is conſiſtent with your duty to him." See Peirce, Doddridge, &c.

Ver. 23. Do it heartily] Ἐκ ψυχῆς, from the ſpirit, or "from a ſpiritual principle, and not worldly motives." Heylin.

REFLECTIONS.

How much the metaphorical language of Scripture has been miſtaken, and what errors and abſurdities men have fallen into, under pretence of adhering to the literal ſenſe, is well known. The words of the firſt verſe of this chapter are however hardly capable of being ſo abuſed, being a plain inference from what had before been advanced, as is evident from the manner in which they are introduced, "If ye then be riſen with Chriſt." It is plain therefore that they muſt refer to ſomething which had been ſaid of our reſurrection with or in Chriſt, ſince this concluſion ſuppoſes that doctrine already laid down and eſtabliſhed. To find this connection, we muſt look back to the middle of the foregoing chapter, (ver. 10. &c.) where the doctrine here referred to is plainly declared. And ye are complete in him, (that is, in Chriſt Jeſus) &c. and you—hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all treſpaſſes; from whence the inference above drawn naturally follows, If ye then be riſen with Chriſt, &c.

The better to explain this inference, it may be neceſſary to conſider the repreſentation which the Scripture makes of the natural ſtate of man, and of his Goſpel ſtate, on becoming a Chriſtian.

1. The ſtate of nature is fully repreſented Epheſ. iv. 17, 18. ii. 2, 3, 12. Rom. vi. 19, 20. to which paſſages the reader may refer. And becauſe the end of theſe things is death, therefore this ſtate of ſinful nature is called likewiſe a ſtate of death; Epheſ. ii. 1, 5. Whilſt men were thus dead to God and to themſelves, they lived only to ſin and unrighteouſneſs; and ſin therefore is ſaid to reign in them,—to have dominion over them. In this ſtate of corruption, the natural paſſions and affections were but the inſtruments of ſin, in all things ſubſervient; on which account they are ſaid to conſtitute the body of ſin; that body, over which ſin, as the ſoul, or active principle, had intire rule and dominion; (See Rom. vi. 6. Col. ii. 11.) and whoſe members are deſcribed in the chapter before us, ver. 4. and this body is elſewhere called by our Apoſtle the body of death, for the ſame reaſon that the ſtate of ſin is called the ſtate of death. Rom. vii. 24.

Now the body, together with the ſoul, which is the active principle of life,—the influencer and director of the body, and all its motions, conſtitutes the man; From hence therefore, by an eaſy and natural metaphor, thoſe depraved appetites and affections, which are the inſtruments or members of ſin, and which compoſe the body of ſin,—together with the evil principle ruling in us, and directing the affections in the purſuit of all uncleanneſs and iniquity, and which is called ſin,—are ſaid in Scripture to be the old man; the only man which lived before the regeneration by Chriſt Jeſus. Comp. Rom. vi. 6. Epheſ. iv. 22.

2. This then is the ſtate of nature, according to the repreſentation and language of Holy Writ; and it is eaſy to ſee what muſt become of this old man, this man of ſin, upon the appearance of Chriſt Jeſus, who came to deſtroy the works of the devil;—to give life and light to thoſe who ſat in the ſhadow of darkneſs and death: He and his works muſt be deſtroyed, to make way for the Spirit of righteouſneſs, and his holy works; and to introduce man to the ſecond, or Goſpel ſtate.

But thus to deſtroy the old man,—to root out all the corrupt affections of nature, and to implant a new principle of life and holineſs,—to reſtore the decayed image of God,—to give new deſires to the ſoul, new affections to the heart;—what is it, but to new-make the man, and by a ſecond creation to reſtore him to thoſe rights and privileges of the firſt, which were long ſince forfeited by ſin and diſobedience? For this reaſon the Chriſtian is ſaid to be a new creature, 2 Cor. v. 17. Gal. vi. 15. Epheſ. ii. 10. iv. 23, 24. Nay, and we are ſaid even to put on Chriſt, from the ſimilitude of will and affections between Chriſt and his true members. Gal. iii. 27.

From this account it is eaſy to underſtand the propriety of the phraſes uſed to expreſs theſe two conditions. Sometimes we read, that we were dead before the knowledge of Chriſt: ſometimes that we died and were buried with Chriſt: again, that we roſe with Chriſt, and are alive in him. Now to be dead before the coming of Chriſt, and yet to die with Chriſt after his coming, and yet ſtill to be alive in him, may ſeem to be aſſertions inconſiſtent, with reſpect to the ſame perſon; but if we take the ſame view of man that the Scripture does, the inconſiſtency will ſoon vaniſh and diſappear.

Man was at firſt created after the image and likeneſs of God, with a rectitude of mind and will; with inclinations adapted to his true happineſs, and ſubject to the influence and direction of reaſon: but upon his diſobedience, man became a quite different perſon; his underſtanding was darkened, his will corrupted, his inclinations diſtorted to the purſuit of evil continually. This change was a real death of the man created after the image of God; he could no longer exerciſe any of the functions proper to his life, but lay buried under the ruins of ſin.—And this was the death of the world, before the knowledge of Chriſt.

What then was the life of the world at the coming of Chriſt?—It was the life of ſin; of the earthly man, made not in the image of God, but after the likeneſs of the ſon of diſobedience. To deſtroy this man of ſin Chriſt came into the world; and they that are Chriſt's have crucified the fleſh, with the affections and luſts: Gal. v. 24. And thus, with reſpect to the life we had at the coming of Chriſt, which was the life of ſin,—we are ſaid to die with Chriſt, and to be buried with him, becauſe we renounce that life, and the affections proper to it. Thus dying to ſin, we begin to live again unto God, and to true holineſs: and this is a reſurrection of the man made after the image of God, which before was dead in treſpaſſes, and therefore we are ſaid to be made alive to Chriſt, and to riſe together with him.

But further: this change was what we had not power ſo much as to wiſh for, or deſire for ourſelves: It was undertaken and effected by Chriſt alone: He took our nature and our iniquities upon himſelf, and underwent death in behalf of all. He dying therefore upon the croſs for all, all are ſaid to be crucified with him. See Heb. ii. 9. 2 Cor. v. 14. And the way to attain to the benefits of the death of Chriſt, is, as we learn from St. Paul in his Epiſtle to the Philippians, to be conformable unto his death. This conformity conſiſts, as we have ſeen, in dying to ſin, and the affections of it; in putting off the old man, and in putting on the new man, who is created after righteouſneſs: and this the Apoſtle ſtiles being planted in the likeneſs of his death, and being planted in the likeneſs of his reſurrection: Rom. vi. To which likewiſe he plainly refers, ch. viii. 29. and there are many other precepts in Scripture, founded upon this notion of our conformity with Chriſt.

Indeed the very eſſence of Chriſtianity conſiſts in this conformity; and therefore baptiſm, which is our admiſſion to the Goſpel, is nothing elſe but a ſolemn taking this conformity upon ourſelves; ſee Rom. vi. 3, 4. To walk in newneſs of life is our conformity to the reſurrection of Chriſt, which was to new life and glory; and as the reſurrection of Chriſt was to perpetual life, never more to be expoſed to death; ſo muſt our firſt reſurrection, according to this pattern, be to perpetual holineſs, and a conſtant freedom from ſin. See Rom. vi. 9, 11, 12.

If we bear in mind the above account of the Scripture language, and the reaſons upon which it is founded, it will be a key to open to us the meaning of many, otherwiſe intricate paſſages of Scripture. For inſtance, we ſhall not be to ſeek when we find mention made of two deaths, which we muſt undergo,—and of two reſurrections, in which we muſt partake: we ſhall eaſily diſtinguiſh between the natural death of the body, and the death unto ſin;—between the reſurrection to life eternal hereafter, and the reſurrection to holineſs and righteouſneſs in this preſent world. I am crucified to the world, ſays St. Paul, and the world to me.—Whoſoever is born of God, ſays St. John, i. e. whoever is begotten to this new life in Chriſt by the power of God,—overcometh the world. Again, St. Paul tells us, that the Spirit of God will quicken our mortal bodies, as well as our dead bodies; which is not to be underſtood, without having recourſe to the firſt reſurrection, which is to a new life of holineſs, and which muſt be the forerunner and introducer of the ſecond reſurrection to glory. The Apoſtle to the Philippians tells us, that he willingly ſuffered the loſs of all things, that he might know Chriſt, and the power of his reſurrection; and this he deſired to know, that he might attain to the reſurrection of the dead. Phil. iii. 10, 11. where, if we remember what has been ſaid of our being made conformable to the death and reſurrection of Chriſt, by riſing to holineſs and righteouſneſs, we ſhall not be at a loſs to underſtand what it is to know or feel the power of Chriſt's reſurrection; or to underſtand how the knowing the power of Chriſt's reſurrection ſhould be a means of attaining the reſurrection of the dead.

Such is the power of Chriſt's reſurrection, that thoſe who feel it have (as the Apoſtle informs us, Philip. iii. 20.) their converſation in heaven; whence alſo we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. This, which St. Paul calls knowing the power of Chriſt's reſurrection, and having our converſation in heaven, the author to the Hebrews calls taſting the powers of the world to come. ch. vi. 5. The reſurrection is indeed one of the powers of the world to come, which all partake in, and taſte of, whoſe mortal bodies are quickened by the Spirit of God. In the verſe after this it is ſaid, that thoſe who fall from their faith, crucify to themſelves the Son of God afreſh, and put him to open ſhame. How does he who falls away crucify Chriſt, or put him to open ſhame?—This cannot be underſtood but by having recourſe to the Scripture repreſentation already explained: but if we remember, that all who are baptized crucify the old man, with his deeds; that they put on the new man, created after holineſs; that the Apoſtle to the Galatians expreſly ſays, that as many as are baptized put on Chriſt; it will readily appear why it is that thoſe who fall away, crucify Chriſt afreſh. For, by receiving the faith they put on Chriſt, and crucified the old man and his deeds; but if they deſert the faith, and return to their former deeds, and again put on the old man, they do then crucify Chriſt again with his deeds, and put him once more to open ſhame.

This notion of the different ſtates and conditions of man,—of the death of the old man,—of a new creature in Chriſt,—runs through the precepts, exhortations, and doctrines of the Goſpel, which cannot be underſtood but with analogy to this notion. We have conſidered already our death, and burial, and reſurrection with Chriſt; but the Apoſtle, in the paſſage now before us, carries the metaphor ſtill one degree higher: If ye then be riſen, &c. as if he had ſaid, "It is not enough that ye are riſen from the dead with Chriſt; you muſt alſo aſcend after him into heaven, for there is our life hid in Chriſt; there are your true riches, and thither muſt you go to take care of them. You are dead to the world, and can no longer live to it; your life is ſpiritual and heavenly: as is your life, ſuch muſt be the actions which flow from it,—the inclinations which attend it. Since therefore you are dead to the world, and alive to Chriſt through the Spirit of holineſs, you muſt act like members of Chriſt, and ſet your affections on things above, where Chriſt, your life, is aſcended."

Hence it is that St. Paul ſo often exclaims againſt the abſurdity of a Chriſtian's living in ſin. You may juſt as well ſay, that all the actions of life may be performed in the grave, when a man is dead and buried, as ſay that a Chriſtian may continue in ſin: for a Chriſtian has crucified and buried the body of ſin. How then, as the Apoſtle cries out, How ſhall we, who are dead to ſin, continue any longer therein? Sin is the only poiſon by which the life of Chriſt, which is in us, may be deſtroyed. It is a life which no man can take from us but ourſelves. Thoſe who kill the body cannot reach it: Not all the powers of darkneſs, ſin only excepted, can ſeparate believers and their Lord; but every unmortified luſt, every unſubdued vice, is a canker that eats into our very vitals, and, if we do not cut them off, will in the end deſtroy us quite. Holineſs is as neceſſary to our ſpiritual life, as eating and drinking are to our natural; and therefore the Apoſtle's concluſion in the text is juſt, If we be riſen with Chriſt,—if we live with him, we muſt ſeek the things which are above, where Chriſt ſitteth on the right-hand of God. See Bp. Sherlock's Sermons.

Chap. IV. Ver. 3. Praying alſo for us] Dr. Whitby juſtly obſerves, it is very remarkable that St. Paul, who ſo often and ſo earneſtly intreats the interceſſion of his Chriſtian friends, ſhould never ſpeak of the interceſſion of the virgin Mary, or of departed ſaints or angels, if he believed it a duty to ſeek it.

Ver. 6. Let your ſpeech be always with grace] "Always conducted in the moſt mild and courteous, the moſt proper and graceful manner; ſo that it may appear influenced by a governing principle of divine grace, and unfeigned piety in your hearts. Let it in this reſpect be ſo ſeaſoned with the ſalt of heavenly wiſdom, as may render it ſavoury and edifying. In this view, reflect upon things and circumſtances before you ſpeak, that you may not utter any thing which would be raſh and fooliſh, but may know how you ought to anſwer

7 All my ſtate ſhall Tychicus declare unto you, who is a beloved brother, and a faithful miniſter, and fellow-ſervant in the Lord:

8 Whom I have ſent unto you for the ſame purpoſe, that he might know your eſtate, and comfort your hearts;

9 With Oneſimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you. They ſhall make known unto you all things which are done here.

10 Ariſtarchus, my fellow-priſoner, ſaluteth you, and Marcus, ſiſter's ſon to Barnabas, (touching whom ye received commandments. If he come unto you, receive him;)

11 And Jeſus, which is called Juſtus, who are of the circumciſion. Theſe only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, which have been a comfort unto me.

12 Epaphras, who is one of you, a ſervant of Chriſt, ſaluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may ſtand perfect, and complete in all the will of God.

13 For I bear him record, that he hath a great zeal for you, and them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis.

14 Luke, the beloved phyſician, and Demas greet you.

15 Salute the brethren which are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, and the church which is in his houſe.

16 And when this epiſtle is read amongſt you, cauſe that it be read alſo in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye likewiſe read the epiſtle from Laodicea.

17 And ſay to Archippus, Take heed to the miniſtry which thou haſt received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it.

18 The ſalutation by the hand of me, Paul. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you. Amen.

Ver. 7. All my ſtate ſhall Tychicus declare] From comparing this verſe with Epheſ. vi. 21, 22. where Tychicus is mentioned as ſent by Paul from Rome to Epheſus, which was not very far from Coloſſe, it may be very probably inferred, as we have obſerved, that theſe two Epiſtles to the Epheſians and Coloſſians, which contain many ſimilar paſſages, were witten about the ſame time, and might be ſent together. See the Introductory Notes to theſe Epiſtles. Dr. Waterland, after ſeveral good MSS, reads the latter part of ver. 8. that ye may know my ſtate, and he may comfort your hearts. Comp. Epheſ. vi. 22.

Ver. 9. With Oneſimus] This verſe makes it poſſible that this Epiſtle, if it was not written, was at leaſt delivered after that to Philemon; and that the admirable letter to him produced its deſired effect. See the introductory note to Philemon.

Ver. 10. Ariſtarchus] See Acts xv. 38. xix. 29. xx. 4. Ariſtarchus and Epaphras are mentioned as ſaluters in this Epiſtle, and in that to Philemon, written at the ſame time. But he is here ſaid to be a priſoner, and Epaphras not: In that to Philemon, Epaphras is called a priſoner, and Ariſtarchus not. One of them is wrong, though it is uncertain which;—unleſs both were priſoners. See Wall's Critic Notes. The Ethiopic verſion omits Ariſtarchus here; to which Mill accedes, p. 1216. Inſtead of, Ye received commandments, &c. Doddridge reads, Ye have received inſtructions; and Heylin, Letters of recommendation; adding, If he come, do you give him a kind reception. See Acts xvii. 15. The original word, rendered commandments, has doubtleſs that meaning; but as civility teaches us to eſteem the reaſonable deſires of friends, as carrying in them the force of commands, though they pretend not to uſe any authority; hence the ſame mode of ſpeech is familiar, not only in ancient, but in modern languages; by which commands is uſed for recommendation. See Peirce.

Ver. 11. Theſe only are my fellow-workers] That is, the only ones of the circumciſion; for Luke and Demas were with him. See the next note.

Ver. 14. Luke, the beloved phyſician] From comparing this with ver. 11. where St. Paul ſays he had no fellow-labourer of the circumciſion, but thoſe whom he had named, Lord Barrington concludes, that Luke was a proſelyte of the gate, before he was converted to Chriſtianity; and it may certainly be fairly concluded that he was not a Jew. See the introductory note to St. Luke's Goſpel.

Ver. 16. The epiſtle from Laodicea] The epiſtle from Laodicea could not be written by St. Paul from thence, ſince he had never been there; ch. ii. 1. It ſeems probable that it was ſome Epiſtle written to him by ſome of the Laodiceans, giving an account of their own caſe, and that of their neighbours at Coloſſe: And he, judging it to contain ſomething worthy to be conſidered by the Coloſſians, was deſirous that it ſhould be read among them: Or elſe, as others conjecture, he may here mean ſome letter which he had written to thoſe of Laodicea; of which, when the Coloſſians ſent a copy of their letter, the ſame meſſengers were to bring a copy from Laodicea. Whatever the letter was, it is loſt; that which has appeared in the world being too contemptible a forgery ever to be taken for the writing of St. Paul, by perſons of the leaſt degree of ſenſe and judgement. See Peirce, Grotius, Knatchbul, and Wake's preface to the Apoſtolical Fathers, p. 94.

Ver. 17. Say to Archippus, &c.] This ſeems an intimation that Archippus was not ſo diligent and active in the proſecution of his miniſtry as could have been wiſhed. Dr. Heylin ſays, he then performed the paſtoral office amongſt the Coloſſians, inſtead of Epaphras the biſhop, who was detained at Rome.

Ver. 18. Remember my bonds] Remember my tears. Chryſoſtom; reading δακρυῶν, inſtead of δεσμῶν.

THE
TO THE THESSALONIANS.

CHAP. I.

The Theſſalonians are given to underſtand both how mindful of them Saint Paul was at all times in thankſgiving, and prayer; and alſo how well he was perſuaded of the truth and ſincerity of their faith, and converſion to God.

PAUL, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Theſſalonians, which is in God the Father, and in the Lord Jeſus Chriſt: Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

2 We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers;

3 Remembering without ceaſing your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, in the ſight of God, and our Father;

4 Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God.

5 For our goſpel came not unto you in word only, but alſo in power, and in the Holy Ghoſt, and in much aſſurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among you, for your ſake.

6 And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghoſt:

7 So that ye were enſamples to all that believe, in Macedonia and Achaia.

Acts v. 41. Hebr. x. 34.

THESSALONIANS.] Theſſalonica was in St. Paul's time the capital of Macedonia; St. Paul had preached the Goſpel there in the year 51. Acts xvii. Some few among the Jews received the Goſpel; but a great multitude of the devout Gentiles became converts to Chriſt: Hence the majority of the church conſiſted of native Heathens, who had formerly been idolaters. The Jews, ever jealous of the admiſſion of the Gentiles to the ſame privileges with themſelves, raiſed ſuch a diſturbance, that St. Paul and Sylvanus were obliged ſuddenly to withdraw. They even purſued him to Berea: He left Sylvanus and Timothy there, and withdrew to Athens, ordering them to follow him. Timothy did not long continue at Athens with St. Paul, but was ſent back to Theſſalonica; and when he returned, found St. Paul at Corinth, where he reſided a year and half, and in the former part of that time this Epiſtle was probably written; that is, about A. D. 52. With regard to the ſtate of the church at Theſſalonica, (the knowledge of which is requiſite for the underſtanding theſe two Epiſtles:) Firſt, It conſiſted chiefly of Gentiles, and of ſome Jewiſh members. It is probable that the teachers mentioned ch. v. 12. were converts from Judaiſm; at leaſt ſuch Greeks as had before been proſelytes to the Jewiſh religion. Secondly, This church being ſtill in its infancy, and oppreſſed by the powerful Jews, required to be eſtabliſhed in the faith: Hence, in the three firſt chapters, St. Paul endeavours to convince the Theſſalonians of the truth and divinity of his Goſpel; both by the imparting miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, and by his own conduct when amongſt them. Thirdly, An error prevailed with reſpect to the doctrine of the laſt judgement. The Theſſalonians, like moſt of the primitive Chriſtians, thought the day of judgement would happen in their time. They imagined that thoſe who lived to ſee it take place, would have great advantage over the deceaſed faithful; which was probably to conſiſt in their entering immediately on the Millennium: This error he combats in the 4th chapter. Fourthly, Some of this church, who refuſed to ſubject themſeves to the teachers, had at the ſame time given themſelves up to diſorder; and they ſeem to have carried on this unrulineſs, under a pretence of teaching or edifying others. Hence the Apoſtle's admonitions in the 5th chapter. See Lardner, Michaelis, Grotius, Doddridge, &c.

Chap. I. Ver. 2.] From hence to ch. iii. 13. we have the chief buſineſs of this Epiſtle; which was to comfort, ſtrengthen, and eſtabliſh the Chriſtians at Theſſalonica, and to perſuade them to perſevere under all the diſcouragements which he their Apoſtle, or they themſelves, might meet with. In his entrance upon this deſign, he gives vent to what lay moſt upon his heart; thanking God for their converſion from idolatry to Chriſtianity, amidſt ſo many diſcouraging circumſtances, and begging of God that they might perſevere; in which he takes all occaſions of ſpeaking well of the Theſſalonians, as indeed he does through all this Epiſtle. See Benſon.

Ver. 3. Your work of faith, &c.] Your faithful work, and loving labour, and patient hope. Wat. Dr. Mill ſays, that the laſt ſentence of this verſe is wanting in the Syriac and Ethiopic verſions; but if it be retained, we may underſtand it both here and in ch. iii. 9. as the Apoſtle's ſolemn appeal to God for the truth of what he ſays. See 2 Cor. xi. 31. xii. 19. Gal. i. 20. 1 Tim. v. 21. 2 Tim. iv. 1. Mill, Benſon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 4, 5. Knowing, brethren beloved, &c.] This Epiſtle being, as we have obſerved, directed principally to converted idolatrous Gentiles, The deſign of theſe verſes is very evident, if we reflect upon the great controverſy of that time, concerning the admiſſion of the Gentiles into the Chriſtian church, without ſubmitting to any part of the law of Moſes: In which view, the verſes may be thus paraphraſed: "As I have had a full and undoubted revelation immediately from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, of God's purpoſe to receive you, idolatrous Gentiles, into his church, and as his people, under the Chriſtian diſpenſation; I own you as dearly beloved brethren, and have with pleaſure ſeen this purpoſe of God take effect; in that our Goſpel, when it firſt appeared among you, was not an empty ſound, but was attended with the plainneſs and energy of truth; and had alſo the atteſtation of miracles, as well as plenty of ſpiritual gifts." See Locke, and Benſon. Dr. Waterland, inſtead of, For our Goſpel, reads, For that our Goſpel, &c. Inſtead of, In power, and in the Holy Ghoſt, Dr. Heylin reads, With miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghoſt.

Ver. 7. So that ye were enſamples] Τύπους, types; that is, plans, models, or patterns; and by a metaphor, it is uſed for an example, or moral pattern. Philippi and Berea were in Macedonia; Athens and

Corinth

8 For from you ſounded out the word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but alſo in every place your faith to God-ward is ſpread abroad; ſo that we need not to ſpeak any thing.

9 For they themſelves ſhew of us, what manner of entering-in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from idols, to ſerve the living and true God,

10 And to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raiſed from the dead; even Jeſus, which delivered us from the wrath to come.

Corinth were in Achaia. The Apoſtle mentions theſe parts, as he had juſt been travelling through them, before he came to Corinth. See Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 8. For from you ſounded out the word] It was accounted a great honour for any church or city to have the Goſpel go out from thence. Grotius obſerves, that many of the Theſſalonians were merchants, who travelled through all Greece; and therefore ſo ſtrange a piece of news might eaſily ſpread through Macedonia and Achaia, as one was ſo nigh them, and the other had ſuch commerce with them.

Ver. 9. For they themſelves ſhew of us] "For even our enemies, as well as the Chriſtians, can tell, and do ſpeak of it, not without wonder and aſtoniſhment, what uncommon gifts we ourſelves had, and communicated unto you, and what an hearty reception we met with on our firſt arrival." See Benſon, and the Reflections.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 9, 10.

If we conſider the Goſpel in its precepts and morality, is there any doctrine advanced, any duty required, but what reaſon muſt admit and approve, or which it can reject, without doing violence to itſelf? Is there, in this reſpect, any objection againſt the Chriſtian religion, but what is and muſt be equally an objection againſt all natural religion? If we conſider the Goſpel with reſpect to its new doctrines, its articles of belief, we ſhall find them all deſigned to ſupport and encourage true religion, and to preſerve the world from falling again into that confuſion of idolatry and ſuperſtition, which for many ages held it in darkneſs. This might be ſhewn in the ſeveral particulars of the Goſpel diſpenſation; but it may be ſufficient to our preſent purpoſe to conſider thoſe ſpecified in the paſſage before us.

To wait for the Son of God from heaven, ſignifies to continue with patience and well-doing in expectation of the coming of our Saviour and Judge. This ſenſe is compleatly expreſſed Philip. iii. 17, 20, 21. to which we refer. The expectation of Chriſt's coming to judge the world, is peculiar to Chriſtians; and it is ſupported by the belief of the reſurrection of Chriſt, that great and main point of faith, which the Apoſtles were commiſſioned to teach and eſtabliſh in the church of God. See particularly Acts i. 21, 22. ii. 22, 23, 32. iii. 14, 15. iv. 33. v. 29—32. From which paſſages taken together, it plainly appears how much the Chriſtian religion, conſidered as a diſtinct ſyſtem from natural religion, depends upon the belief of Chriſt's reſurrection. See alſo Acts xvii. 18, 30, 31.

Let us then conſider, whether we are beholden to the Goſpel, and how much, for this new evidence of a life to come; and what there is in this great article of Chriſtian faith, and the doctrines grounded upon it, that any ſober Deiſt, or profeſſor of natural religion can juſtly blame.

Even natural religion pretends to ſupport itſelf upon the expectation of future rewards and puniſhments: It conſiders God as governor and judge of the world. The Chriſtian religion ſtands upon the ſame foundation, and admits for genuine all theſe hopes and fears of nature. Thus far there is no difference; the queſtion is, which brings the beſt proof, and moſt fitted to perſuade the world of this great truth. Natural religion appeals to conſcience, and that ſenſe which all men have of their being accountable for their actions. The Chriſtian religion embraces all this evidence, and whatever elſe can be ſuggeſted by reaſon to render the hopes of futurity probable or certain: and to theſe evidences it adds the expreſs teſtimony and aſſurance of God, given to mankind in the reſurrection of his beloved Son Chriſt Jeſus.

"But what need (it may be ſaid) of this new evidence?—Were not the arguments which natural religion affords ſufficient to ſupport the belief and expectation of a future judgement?—If ſo, to what purpoſe is it to call men from a dependence on their reaſon, and to rely on the evidence of men for the truth of a fact ſo uncommon, and in the nature of it ſo ſurpriſing, as not eaſily to gain admittance to our belief?—A fact, which had we ſeen ourſelves, we might perhaps have ſuſpected the report of our own ſenſes, and cannot therefore eaſily refer ourſelves to the ſenſes of others, in a matter of ſo great moment and conſequence?"

Whoever, in anſwer to this difficulty, endeavours to weaken and enervate the natural arguments for a future ſtate, ſhould ſeem to be very ill employed; to me they appear ſo convincing, that I cannot, and ſo amiable, that I would not leſſen the ſincere Chriſtian's opinion of them: but then it is certain that they require more thought and ſpeculation to place them before the mind in their true and ſtrongeſt light, than the generality of mankind are capable of exerciſing; and whether this be ſo or not, is a matter fitter to be determined by the evidence of hiſtory, than by reaſoning upon the caſe. We are very ill judges, under the light we now enjoy, how far the generality of men could go by the mere ſtrength of reaſon, without the aſſiſtances we have. A right notion of God is the foundation of all true religion, and who is there that thinks himſelf obliged to any thing but his own reaſon for this notion?—And yet, if this be the caſe, the world is mightily improved in reaſon theſe laſt ages: for we certainly know many ages paſt, when the true notion of God was hardly to be found in any nation,—commonly to be found in none. Since the publication of the Goſpel the darkneſs has been diſpelled, and reaſon ſees and approves the truths which were before in great meaſure hid from her eyes.

The caſe is the ſame with reſpect to the natural arguments for a future ſtate: the arguments, duly propoſed and conſidered, are of great weight; but yet it is evident they had little weight in the world for many ages together. The natural notion was ſo buried under ſuperſtitious fables and abſurd repreſentations, that it yielded no comfort or ſatisfaction; and was ſo liable to be expoſed and ridiculed for the extravagant repreſentations which attended it, that it afforded no certainty, or even probability, to ſupport the hopes of virtue. The vulgar had no ability to reaſon much on the caſe; and the learned who did, were full of doubts and uncertainties, and found no ſure ground to ſtand on. To remedy this evil, God has propoſed a new evidence to the world: He called his Son from the grave, and ſhewed him before choſen witneſſes for many days; witneſſes, who were ſent into the world to publiſh his reſurrection, as an evidence of a future general reſurrection of all men, and to ſeal the truth of their doctrine with their own blood.

Now as to this evidence, it is in the nature of it the propereſt for the generality of men: It requires no abſtracted reaſonings, no refinements, to ſhew its force. Nay, were the wiſeſt man to chooſe an evidence himſelf of the certainty of a reſurrection, I know not what he could deſire more, than to ſee one riſe from the dead.

As to thoſe who pretend to be real and true Deiſts, I cannot ſee what there is in this evidence to offend them. The main point we prove by it, they acknowledge to be true; "that God will judge the world." Since then the Chriſtian religion has no private deſign to ſerve by this evidence, but produces it in confirmation of that general ſenſe of nature, which all true religion does admit,—why ſhould it be ſuſpected of deceit?

Beſides, the belief of a future ſtate, ſupported by the evidence of the reſurrection of Chriſt, is applied to no other purpoſes in the Chriſtian religion than every wiſe and good man would deſire it ſhould be applied to, were it a matter to be ſubmitted to his choice. Let us ſee: the Goſpel labours to aſſure us of the certainty of our reſurrection to eternal life; and, not content with the common evidence of reaſon for a future ſtate, has given us a new proof from the very hand and immediate power of God. There is ſuch a concern ſhewn in the Goſpel for fixing and eſtabliſhing this proof, that we may be ſure this proof was provided for the ſake of carrying on the great end and deſign of the Goſpel, whatever it is: ſo that if there be any thing amiſs, any deluſion or deceit in the Goſpel, we may certainly find it leaning upon this article of the reſurrection for its ſupport.

But now what does the Goſpel require of us, in virtue of our belief of this article? Why, nothing but what reaſon and natural religion require of us,—to live ſoberly and righteouſly, in obedience to God, and in love with our brethren. Where is there any ground now for ſuſpicion in the caſe?—Men do not uſe to play tricks, or endeavour to impoſe upon the world for nothing. Shew us then any one uſe made of this article in the Goſpel, but what all ſober-minded men will allow to be a juſt and proper uſe, and we will part with our evidence. But if no ſuch thing can be ſhewn, neither may we ſuſpect any guile or deceit in the evidence calculated to ſerve ſuch noble and worthy purpoſes.

One thing there is in the Scripture account of a future ſtate, which is new,—the deſignation of the man Chriſt Jeſus for judge of the quick and the dead; But this is ſuch a new thing, as is liable to no objections on the part of natural religion: for it is no part of natural religion to maintain, that God muſt do every thing immediately by himſelf, and in his own perſon, without uſing the miniſtry of other beings. This deſignation of Chriſt to be judge of the world is no impeachment of the authority of God: the Son acts by the Father's commiſſion, who hath given all judgement unto him. It makes no change in the nature of the judgement: we ſhall anſwer for nothing to Chriſt, but what our reaſon tells us we are accountable for. So that take in all the circumſtances belonging to this article of Chriſtian faith, and yet there is nothing for you to do, nothing for you to expect, but what you are already perſuaded you ought to do and expect, if you are in truth ſo honeſt and ſincere a profeſſor of natural religion as to believe in God, and that he will judge the world in truth and juſtice. This difference there is between you and a Chriſtian believer; You have ſuch hopes of futurity as reaſon and reflection can furniſh out; the Chriſtian has the ſame hopes, and in the ſame degree, but has moreover the expreſs promiſe and teſtimony of God, confirmed by the reſurrection of his only Son, to ſtrengthen his expectations of immortality.—Suppoſe the Chriſtian miſtaken; even then he ſtands upon the ſame ground that you do: ſuppoſe his faith to be well eſta-

CHAP. II.

He ſets forth, in what manner the goſpel was brought and preached to the Theſſalonians, and how they received it. A reaſon is given, both why St. Paul was ſo long abſent from them, and why he was ſo deſirous to ſee them.

FOR yourſelves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain;

2 But even after that we had ſuffered before, and were ſhamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi, we were bold in our God to ſpeak unto you the goſpel of God with much contention.

3 For our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanneſs, nor in guile:

4 But, as we were allowed of God to be put in truſt with the goſpel, even ſo we ſpeak; not as pleaſing men, but God, which trieth our hearts.

5 For neither at any time uſed we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetouſneſs; God is witneſs:

6 Nor of men ſought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdenſome, as the apoſtles of Chriſt.

7 But we were gentle among you, even as a nurſe cheriſheth her children:

8 So, being affectionately deſirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the goſpel of God only, but alſo our own ſouls; becauſe ye were dear unto us.

9 For ye remember, brethren, our labour and travail: for, labouring night and day, becauſe we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the goſpel of God.

10 Ye are witneſſes, and God alſo, how holily, and juſtly, and unblameably we behaved ourſelves among you that believe:

11 As ye know, how we exhorted and comforted, and charged every one of you, (as a father doth his children;)

12 That ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.

13 For this cauſe alſo thank we God without ceaſing, becauſe when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it, not as the word of men, but bliſhed, he ſtands upon a better, and is able to render to himſelf a better account of the hope that is in him. This is the advantage we draw from this article of faith; an article introduced to ſerve true religion; founded upon an evidence of ſuch force, that it can make its way to every underſtanding, and wants no help from philoſophy to ſupport it.

Thus we ſee how the Goſpel has ſupplied the defect of natural religion in this momentous point: How wiſely this proviſion of the Goſpel was made, let experience bear witneſs: wherever the Goſpel prevails, the hopes of immortality are clear and diſtinct. The preaching the reſurrection of Chriſt conveys to the loweſt member of the church of Chriſt a clear conception of his own future condition.

The reſurrection itſelf was indeed a great and ſtupendous work; but the hand that performed it was greater. No one, who believes that God made all men at firſt, can poſſibly doubt of his power to raiſe them again from the grave.—"Allow, you will ſay, to the power of God all that can be deſired; yet ſtill the reſurrection remains to be proved, as to the fact;"—And proved it is, by the concurrent teſtimony of eye-witneſſes, who have given not only their words, but their very lives, in confirmation of this truth. And ſurely they were in very good earneſt, when they embraced and taught the doctrine upon ſuch hard terms. And methinks no ſerious man ſhould be very hard of belief in this caſe:—Did the article of the reſurrection make any alteration in our notions of God, or of religion; did it bring any new burden upon us of any ſort, it would be no wonder to ſee men very careful how they admitted it. But now, that it requires nothing at our hands but what reaſon and nature requires,—is attended with no burden or expence to us,—pretends only to eſtabliſh and confirm the hopes of nature;—what pretence for being ſo very ſcrupulous?—Admit the article, your hopes are much improved, your duty nothing increaſed: Reject the article, your duty is the ſame, and your hopes much leſs.

How kind a proviſion then has the Goſpel made for our weakneſs! how powerfully has it ſupported the intereſts of true religion, by furniſhing them with ſo plain, yet ſo ſtrong a proof of a future ſtate, and a judgement to be executed in righteouſneſs by the man Chriſt Jeſus, whom God hath raiſed from the dead, and hath ordained to be the judge of all the world!—Let us hold faſt this hope; let this hope be our conſtant encouragement in doing the work of the Lord; and let us do his work chearfully and heartily, knowing for certain that our labour ſhall not be in vain in the Lord.

Chap. II. Ver. 1.] After the Apoſtle had appealed to the world, he more particularly appeals to the Theſſalonians themſelves, for the abundance of ſpiritual gifts, and miraculous powers he had exerciſed among them, and communicated unto them; how holily he and his companions had behaved themſelves; how far he was from giving any grounds to the moſt critical and jealous obſerver to ſuſpect him of any worldly deſigns from any part of his conduct among them; how tenderly he was concerned for them, and to what purity and holineſs he had urged them, which (as he obſerved with pleaſure) had not been altogether in vain. He here, as elſewhere, frequently expreſſes his juſt reſentment at the behaviour of the unbelieving Jews, and his affectionate concern for the Theſſalonians; taking all the fair occaſions that offered, to ſpeak well of them, and of their conduct. ver. 1—13. Benſon. Inſtead of, was not in vain, Dr. Waterland reads, was not vain; and Dr. Heylin, was not without ſucceſs.

Ver. 2. With much contention] Becauſe of the oppoſition exerted againſt us by the perverſe and unbelieving Jews. Acts xvii. 1—9. Dr. Heylin reads, even under great difficulties.

Ver. 3. For our exhortation was not of deceit] For our doctrine was not erroneous, nor impure, nor ſuch as could ſeduce you. Heylin.

Ver. 4. But as we were allowed, &c.] But as we have been approved of God to be intruſted, &c. Wat.

Ver. 6. When we might have been burdenſome] The Apoſtle evidently refers to the right he had of being maintained at their charge. See ver. 9. 2 Cor. xi. 9. 1 Tim. v. 18. and 1 Cor. 9. Dr. Waterland, however, after Vitringa, would render it, when we could have taken much [authority] upon us.

Ver. 7. But we were gentle, &c.] "We not only gave up our own juſt rights, but conſidered you as our children, and cheriſhed you in your infant ſtate as an hen cheriſheth her brood under her wings, or as a tender and affectionate mother nurſeth her own helpleſs infant." Dr. Heylin renders the verſe, We treated you with the tenderneſs and condeſcenſion of the nurſing mother cheriſhing her children.

Ver. 9. For, labouring night and day, &c.] What an inſtance of goodneſs and benevolence to mankind! to labour for bread with his own hands, while he ſpent his time in teaching all who would learn truths of the greateſt importance,—how to live virtuouſly, die chearfully, and be happy for ever! Benſon.

Ver. 12. That ye would walk worthy of God] How much does the Apoſtle inſiſt upon holineſs of heart and life in all profeſſed Chriſtians! He urged the converted heathens to virtue and purity, from the example of the true God, in whom they now believed, Col. i. 10. and by the great favour which was ſhewn them in their being received into the Chriſtian church; Epheſ. iv. 1. by that purity which the Goſpel in general requires, Rom. viii. 1, &c. and more particularly, by the life and example of our Lord and Saviour; by his death and reſurrection, by his aſcenſion and authority, and by the proſpect of his coming to judgement at the laſt day, as well as of enjoying an endleſs life of holineſs and happineſs in his glorious kingdom. See 1 Cor. xi. 1. Heb. xii. 2, 3. and Benſon.

Ver. 13. But, as it is in truth, the word of God] That the doctrine was from God, and the Apoſtles only as heralds, meſſengers, and am-

15 Who both killed the Lord Jeſus, and their own prophets, and have perſecuted us; and they pleaſe not God, and are contrary to all men:

16 Forbidding us to ſpeak to the Gentiles, that they might be ſaved, to fill up their ſins alway: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermoſt.

17 But we, brethren, being taken from you for a ſhort time, in preſence, not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to ſee your face with great deſire.

18 Wherefore we would have come unto you (even I Paul) once and again; but Satan hindered us.

19 For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? are not even ye, in the preſence of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt at his coming?

20 For ye are our glory and joy.

and ambaſſadors from God, to publiſh it among men, appears from comparing ch. i. 6. and iv. 8. Matth. x. 40. Gal. iv. 14. 2 Pet. iii. 2. Wherever it is thus eſteemed, the Goſpel muſt neceſſarily have a great influence; where there is a thorough and full conviction that the Apoſtles of our Lord and Saviour were employed by heaven, and that the doctrine itſelf is nothing leſs than a meſſage from the God of ſtrict truth, unſpotted holineſs, unerring wiſdom, and overflowing goodneſs; No wonder that it ſhould influence ſuch as conſidered it in this view readily to renounce their falſe religions, to lay aſide their prejudices and prepoſſeſſions, to embrace it, and live upon its principles, and to forego all temporal things whatever, on the faith of ſo well atteſted a religion, and ſo glorious a proſpect. Benſon.

Ver. 14.] Having before commended them for their ready and chearful reception of the Goſpel, and hinted at their reſolution in ſuffering for the cauſe; he goes on to commend them for their patience and fortitude; ver. 14—16. and then again expreſſes his great affection for the Theſſalonians, and his earneſt deſire to make them another viſit; which he aſſures them he had more than once attempted; but Satan had always hindered him: By which vehement expreſſion, he again obliquely reflects on the unbelieving Jews: ver. 17—20. St. Paul probably calls the Chriſtian churches in Judea, churches in Chriſt Jeſus, as well as in God, to diſtinguiſh them from the Jewiſh churches, or the ſynagogues in Judea. As to the patience and fortitude of the Chriſtian churches there, ſee Acts xii. and Heb. x. 32—34. How theſe Theſſalonians imitated them, ſee ch. i. 6. Acts xvii. 5, 13. The Jews of Jeruſalem had deſired Pilate, a Gentile, to crucify our Lord; the Jews of Theſſalonica had exaſperated the Gentiles, and even the governors of that city, to perſecute his Apoſtle and diſciples. From the repreſentation both of the hiſtory of the Acts, and the apoſtolic Epiſtles, as well as from other ancient writings, it appears, that moſt of the primitive perſecutions proceeded from the malice and oppoſition of the unbelieving Jews. See Benſon, and Lardner's Credibil. vol. i. p. 226.

Ver. 15. Who both killed, &c.] Who have both killed the Lord Jeſus, and the, or his, prophets. Wat. Mill, and Wetſtein. Not only heathen authors have given the Jews the character of being an obſtinate prejudiced people, contrary to all men; but even their own prophet Ezekiel, (ch. iii. 4—9. v. 6.) and Joſephus their own hiſtorian. Tacitus, ſpeaking of them, obſerves, that the end of their peculiar rites was to ſeparate them from all other people: From their ſeparation he inferred their averſion, or hatred to all mankind. In this ſenſe we are to underſtand him and other pagan writers, when they exclaim againſt the Jews, for their peculiar rites. Each nation had its own rites, ſo that peculiarity was a circumſtance common to them all. What differenced the Jewiſh rites from all others was, their end; which was, to keep the people from all inter-community with the ſeveral religions of paganiſm, each of which, how different ſoever in their rites, had communion one with another; therefore the pagans thought nothing, but ſuch an unnatural averſion as is mentioned above, could induce men to perſevere in rejecting ſo univerſal a principle as inter-community of worſhip. The ſame hiſtorian ſtiles this hoſtile odium. St. Paul tells us in what this hoſtile odium conſiſted, when, ſpeaking of their obſtinate adherence to the law againſt all the conviction of the Goſpel, he ſays, They pleaſe not God, and are contrary to all men. They were not contrary to all men in having different rites,—for each nation had rites differing one from another; but in their condemning and reprobating all rites but their own, which, till the coming of Chriſtianity, were peculiar to themſelves. See Benſon, Warburton's Div. Leg. pref. to vol. 2. and Elſner's Obſervat. vol. ii. p. 274.

Ver. 16. Forbidding us to ſpeak] Hindering us from ſpeaking. Wat. Their filling up the meaſure of their ſins was by murdering our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and perſecuting his diſciples. This moſt grievous ſin was, in a manner, uniting all the guilt of mankind in one act of diſobedience; and therefore it was to be puniſhed with a moſt grievous and exemplary puniſhment; as if all the temporary puniſhment of ſinners had been deferred till then, and was to have been collected, in order to fall upon their heads with the greater vengeance. The next clauſe might be rendered more properly, For perfect wrath, or complete and durable vengeance, is coming upon them. It is true, a judicial blindneſs had ſeized them; but the remarkable deſtruction was approaching, propheſied of Dan. ix. 27. Matth. xxiv. They returned from their former captivities; but extreme vengeance, a laſting divine judgement, has befallen them, ſince their crucifixion of the Lord of life. Above 1700 years have they been diſperſed among the nations, and Jeruſalem is ſtill trodden under foot of the Gentiles; and ſhall be ſo, until the times which God hath appointed for the Gentiles be fulfilled. The deſtruction here referred to was drawing nigh when the Apoſtle wrote this Epiſtle, and actually happened within twenty years after; and it may be obſerved, that in conſequence of this deſtruction, the Jews ſuffered the divine vengeance in various other parts of the earth; particularly under Trajan 460,000 of them were deſtroyed in Egypt and Cyprus, and under Adrian 580,000. See Benſon, Grotius, and Lowman on Rev. vi. 4.

Ver. 17. Being taken from you] The original word is very emphatical;—ἀπορφανισθέντες. It is an alluſion to that grief, anxiety, and reluctance of heart, with which dying parents take farewel of their children, when they are juſt going to leave them, helpleſs orphans, expoſed to the injuries of the world; or, that ſorrow of heart with which poor deſtitute orphans cloſe the eyes of their dying parents. The Apoſtle by this metaphor, in a very lively and tender manner, expreſſes the concern and reluctance wherewith he had parted from his young converts at Theſſalonica; being violently driven away from them by the unbelieving Jews; compelled to leave theſe his ſpiritual children amidſt the moſt reſtleſs and malicious enemies, without the guidance, defence, and ſupport of their father in the Goſpel. Acts xvii. 5, 10. The original, rendered for a ſhort time, ſignifies literally, for an hour's time;—which is a figurative expreſſion. It was ſeveral years before the Apoſtle returned to them; but his mind was full of the ideas of eternity, which annihilated, as it were, any period of mortal life. See Benſon, Doddridge, Wall, and Whitby. Inſtead of preſence, Dr. Waterland and the MS read perſon.

Ver. 18. But Satan hindered us] When the Hebrews would expreſs any thing remarkably great, they add the name of God to it; ſo they call great mountains, the mountains of God,—and the like: And thus, when they deſcribe the moſt wicked men, they call them the miniſters, ſervants, and children of Satan, and ſometimes Satan himſelf; becauſe they imitate and comply with the temptations of that wicked ſpirit, who is at the head of all apoſtaſy from God, and the moſt remarkable enemy in the univerſe to truth and goodneſs. The unbelieving Jews of Theſſalonica were the perſons intended; and indeed the ſenſe of their extreme malice ſeems to have dwelt ſtrongly on the Apoſtle's mind during the writing of this whole Epiſtle. Benſon.

Ver. 19. For what is—are not even ye, &c.] For what will be—are not alſo ye, &c. MS.

Ver. 20. For ye are our glory and joy] Ye doubtleſs are, &c. MS. The Apoſtle expected to know the Theſſalonians again at the day of judgement, and in the other world; and rejoiced in the proſpect of meeting them amongſt the holy and glorified in that day, eſpecially as he had been ſo inſtrumental towards their converſion and ſalvation. From hence we may hope to know our friends in another world; but then, all temporal conſanguinity and relation ſhall ceaſe, and we ſhall rejoice in each other there, only in proportion to the degrees of virtue and holineſs, and as we have here mutually contributed to promote each other's knowledge and charity, piety and virtue. When this animal nature, and thoſe affections and qualities ſuited to this animal ſtate and terreſtrial life ſhall be put off, and we ſhall have qualities and affections fit only for an intellectual ſtate, we ſhall then ſee things in a different light, and our reliſh will be altered; for where rational enjoyments are in their higheſt perfection, rational beings, who have the true taſte, will value each other in an exact proportion to their purity and perfection, knowledge, charity, and holineſs. What a glorious motive ought this to be to us, as it was here to St. Paul, to cultivate in ourſelves, and to promote in all

CHAP. III.

St. Paul teſtifieth his great love to the Theſſalonians; partly by ſending Timothy unto them to ſtrengthen and comfort them; partly by rejoicing in their well-doing; and partly by praying for them, and deſiring a ſafe coming unto them.

WHerefore, when we could no longer forbear, we thought it good to be left at Athens alone;

2 And ſent Timotheus, our brother, and miniſter of God, and our fellow-labourer in the goſpel of Chriſt, to eſtabliſh you, and to comfort you concerning your faith;

3 That no man ſhould be moved by theſe afflictions: for yourſelves know that we are appointed thereunto.

4 For verily when we were with you, we told you before, that we ſhould ſuffer tribulation; even as it came to paſs, and ye know.

5 For this cauſe when I could no longer forbear, I ſent to know your faith, leſt by ſome means the tempter have tempted you, and our labour be in vain.

6 But now when Timotheus came from you unto us, and brought us good tidings of your faith and charity, and that ye have good remembrance of us always, deſiring greatly to ſee us, as we alſo to ſee you;

7 Therefore, brethren, we were comforted over you, in all our affliction and diſtreſs, by your faith:

8 For now we live, if ye ſtand faſt in the Lord.

9 For what thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your ſakes before our God!

10 Night and day praying exceedingly that we might ſee your face, and might perfect that which is lacking in your faith.

11 Now God himſelf and our Father, and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, direct our way unto you!

12 And the Lord make you to increaſe and abound in love one towards another, and towards all men, even as we do towards you:

13 To the end he may ſtabliſh your hearts unblameable in holineſs before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt with all his ſaints!

CHAP. IV.

He exhorteth them to go forward in all manner of godlineſs, to live holily and juſtly, to love one another, and quietly to follow their own buſineſs; and laſt of all, to moderate their ſorrow for the dead. And to this laſt exhortation is annexed a brief deſcription of the reſurrection, and ſecond coming of Chriſt to judgement.

FUrthermore then, we beſeech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jeſus, that as ye have received of us how ye ought to walk, and to pleaſe God, ſo ye would abound more and more.

our friends and acquaintance, knowledge and virtue, goodneſs and charity! This will leave laſting and happy effects, when all earthly relations will be over; and be a pleaſurable reflection to us and them many thouſand ages hence, when it will perhaps be almoſt forgot in what temporary relation we ſtood here one to another, or that there was ever ſuch a thing as this preſent planetary ſyſtem. See Benſon, Price's third Diſſertation, and my Sermon on "Mutual knowledge in a future ſtate."

Chap. III. Ver. 1.] The concern which the Apoſtle was under for the ſtedfaſtneſs and perſeverance of the Theſſalonians, had cauſed him to ſend Timothy to them; and the good news which Timothy had brought back was matter of great joy to him. He here tells them, that it is his daily prayer, that God in his providence would remove all obſtacles, and permit him to make them another viſit, that he might further inſtruct and eſtabliſh them in the Chriſtian faith, and in their love to God and man; that they might all meet their Judge with acceptance at the laſt day. See Benſon, Acts xvi. 10. xviii. 5.

Ver. 2. Our fellow-labourer] It appears from Acts xvii. 14. that Timothy had been in thoſe parts before, as St. Paul's fellow-labourer; and as, doubtleſs, being known to the Theſſalonians, his coming on this occaſion would be the more agreeable to them. See Doddridge.

Ver. 3. For yourſelves know] Here ſeems to be a particular alluſion to Acts ix. 15, 16. xx. 23. What Apoſtles, Prophets, and even common Chriſtians, were to expect in the world, ſee Matth. x. 34—39. xvi. 24. Acts xvii. 5. Rom. viii. 17, 29. Epheſ. iii. 13, &c. &c.

Ver. 6. But now when Timotheus came, &c.] This ſhould rather be read, But now that Timothy is come,—and hath brought,—therefore (ver. 7.) we are comforted. The Apoſtle did not think their election of God (ch. i. 4.) ſufficient, without further admonitions from him; or without watching, prayer, and perſeverance in faith and holineſs in them. He intimates that without theſe, all which he and they had yet done would prove in vain. See Waterland, Wall, Heylin, and Benſon.

Ver. 8. For now we live, if, &c.] "For now I live indeed, I reliſh and enjoy life, ſeeing you continue ſtedfaſt in the profeſſion, faith, and practice of the Chriſtian religion, in which, through the favour of God, I was employed in initiating you." Here is a pattern for all the paſtors of the Chriſtian church. It would have deprived this great Apoſtle of much of the ſatisfaction and comfort of his life, to have heard that his converts at Theſſalonica or elſewhere did not perſevere; but it was happineſs, it was comfort, it was life worth enjoying, to hear of their ſteadineſs and perſeverance. See Pſ. xxii. 27. Benſon, and Grotius.

Ver. 11. Direct our way unto you] This prayer of St. Paul was heard, and his requeſt granted; for he had an opportunity to go over Macedonia again once or twice, and to give them much exhortation; Acts xx. 1—3. He then moſt probably perfected what was ſtill wanting in their faith, and rectified or confirmed them as to their practice.

Ver. 13. The coming of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt] How often and how ſkilfully doth St. Paul mention the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and his coming to judgement, to ſupport and animate them both to do and to ſuffer, according to the good and holy and acceptable will of God! Grotius mentions a MS which reads αγγελῶν, angels, inſtead of αγιῶν, ſaints. See Dan. vii. 10. Matth. xvi. 27. xxv. 31. Mark viii. 38. When our Lord Jeſus Chriſt comes thus attended, he will preſent all his ſincere and faithful followers to his Father, unblameable in holineſs: 1 Cor. i. 8. Philip. i. 10. Theſe are high expreſſions, when uſed of imperfect man; but by the goodneſs of God, and through the mediation of Jeſus Chriſt, the ſincere will be treated as honourably as if they had been blameleſs; that is, their human frailties will be pitied, and their ſins, which they have repented of and forſaken, will be blotted out by his Father and their Father, his God and their God. Who would not deſire to be thus preſented to God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, attended by all his ſaints, and all the holy angels! See Benſon, and Matth. xxiv. 42. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Epheſ. v. 27. 2 Pet. iii. 14.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1.] Having finiſhed the main deſign of this Epiſtle, St. Paul proceeds, according to his uſual cuſtom, to lay down ſeveral practical

2 For ye know what commandments we gave you by the Lord Jeſus.

3 For this is the will of God, even your ſanctification, that ye ſhould abſtain from fornication:

4 That every one of you ſhould know how to poſſeſs his veſſel in ſanctification and honour;

5 Not in the luſt of concupiſcence, even as the Gentiles which know not God:

6 That no man go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter: becauſe that the Lord is the avenger of all ſuch, as we alſo have forewarned you, and teſtified.

7 For God hath not called us unto uncleanneſs, but unto holineſs.

8 He therefore that deſpiſeth, deſpiſeth not man, but God, who hath alſo given unto us his holy Spirit.

9 But as touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write unto you: for ye yourſelves are taught of God to love one another.

10 And indeed ye do it towards all the brethren, which are in all Macedonia; but we beſeech you, brethren, that ye increaſe more and more;

11 And that ye ſtudy to be quiet, and to do your own buſineſs, and to work with your own hands, (as we commanded you;)

12 That ye may walk honeſtly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing.

13 But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are aſleep, that ye ſorrow not even as others, which have no hope.

practical directions, ſuited to the ſtate of the church to which he writes: And firſt, he exhorts them to an holy life; cautioning them particularly againſt uncleanneſs, to which the idolatrous Gentiles were very much addicted, and that in almoſt all the kinds and degrees of it: and he ſtrengthens his advice by the authority of God, and of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and by his own authority, as he was an inſpired Apoſtle; or by their privileges, as they were favoured with ſeveral gifts of the Spirit. Furthermore then, is as if he had ſaid, As to what remains. Dr. Heylin renders the verſe, What we have further to add is, to beſeech and exhort you, brethren, by the Lord Jeſus, that as ye have been taught by us how to walk in the ways of piety, you would more and more advance in them.

Ver. 3. For this is the will of God] For the will of God is, that you ſhould become holy, and abſtain from all impurity. The word πορνεια, in the original, is commonly rendered fornication; but the ſenſe of it is more general, and extends to all acts of uncleanneſs. See Heylin, and the next note. Inſtead of veſſel, ver. 4. Dr. Waterland reads body.

Ver. 5. As the Gentiles, who know not God] The idolatrous Gentiles in general, and thoſe of Theſſalonica in particular, were remarkable for their impurity; and how brutiſh and preternatural the vices of many in the heathen world were, and thoſe not condemned, but practiſed in the worſt inſtances, by their philoſophers, may be ſeen in numbers of ancient Greek and Latin authors. And were thoſe philoſophers the fit men to educate youth? to ſhew them the beauty of virtue, and the odiouſneſs of vice?—The repreſentations of the boundleſs and unnatural luſts which their own poets gave the heathens, even of their chief gods, were enough to encourage their votaries in the like enormities: nay, ſuch monſtrous obſcenities became part of their religious worſhip, as Chriſtian and chaſte ears could not even bear to have mentioned. See Epheſians v. 12. What their ſatiriſts, Horace, Juvenal, and Perſius have intimated, and what Suetonius has ſuggeſted as to the emperors themſelves, would make a modeſt perſon bluſh even to read or hear; and when the people, philoſophers, emperors, and gods were ſuch notorious offenders, how exact a picture has the Apoſtle drawn of the heathen world in Rom. i. 21—32. and how much was the Chriſtian revelation wanting, to work a reformation!—Certainly, many profeſſed Chriſtians are but too wicked; but then their religion condemns them; and if we will be juſt to ourſelves, we muſt own, that Chriſtianity hath made us much more knowing and virtuous than the heathens, or than we ourſelves ſhould have been without it. See Benſon, Whitby, and Calmet.

Ver. 6. That no man go beyond, and defraud, &c.] And finally, that no one over-reach and injure his brother in that reſpect; namely, of adultery or impurity, which the context clearly proves to be meant in this place. See Heylin and Benſon. Inſtead of, and defraud, &c. Dr. Waterland reads, and be inordinate with his brother in the matter.

Ver. 8. Deſpiſeth not man, but God] The Apoſtles alone had the whole ſcheme of the Goſpel revelation immediately from God, and were the great fountains of Chriſtian knowledge, as it related either to faith or practice. They therefore were to be attended to, as truly divine oracles; and he that deſpiſed them, deſpiſed that Spirit from whom they had their inſpiration: And if we underſtand it according to the common reading,—that God had given his Holy Spirit to the Apoſtles, and that what they taught was by divine inſpiration, and therefore not to be deſpiſed, we ſhall ſee confirmations of this great truth in Luke x. 16. Acts v. 4. 1 Cor. ii. 10, 12. vii. 40. xi. 23. xv. 1, 3. Gal. i. 11, 12. But a great number of ancient MSS and verſions, inſtead of unto us, read unto you; intimating, that God had given to the Theſſalonians themſelves his Holy Spirit; that is, his ſupernatural gifts and miraculous powers; and therefore they were obliged to uſe their bodies as temples of the Holy Ghoſt, i. e. in a pure, chaſte, and holy manner. See 1 Cor. vi. 15, 20. 1 Theſſ. v. 19, 23. 1 John iii. 24. Benſon, Mill, Wetſtein, and Doddridge's "Eſſay on the Inſpiration of the Sacred Scriptures."

Ver. 9.] St. Paul here commends them for their love to each other; but generally when he commends them, it is to introduce ſome further advice,—as he does here; for immediately after the commendation, he preſſes them to abound therein more and more. ver. 9, 10. There ſeem to have been ſome idle perſons and buſy bodies among the Chriſtians at Theſſalonica, who went about tattling from houſe to houſe, and would not work for a ſubſiſtence, but were burdenſome to their neighbours, and a ſcandal to Chriſtianity. They ſeem to have given the Apoſtle a great deal of trouble and uneaſineſs, as appears not only from ver. 11, 12. but alſo from 2 Theſſ. iii. 6—12. 1 Tim. v. 13. However, to take off the harſhneſs of the reproof in the paſſage before us, he introduces it with the commendation of their love to each other; that they might not be diſcouraged, as if their Apoſtle had intirely condemned their conduct. Comp. 1 Cor. xi. ver. 2, with ver. 17. The phraſe of being taught of God, is uſed Iſai. liv. 13. John vi. 44, 45. and alluded to in various other parts of Scripture. The contentions of the heathen gods could never have taught them this brotherly love; but the example and command of the God of love, and of Jeſus the Prince of peace, plainly pointed out this harmony and mutual benevolence, for which the primitive Chriſtians were remarkable. See Benſon, and Heb. xiii. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 17. and Philem. ver. 1.

Ver. 11. That ye ſtudy to be quiet, &c.] Idleneſs is utterly unbecoming a reaſonable creature, and is not only a great vice itſelf, but the ſeed of many and greater vices. Nothing can be a higher ſcandal to any party or profeſſion, than lazy, pragmatical, officious people, who mind every body's buſineſs but their own. They are a common nuiſance, and ought to be diſcouraged, if the churches would have peace, and recommend religion. But indeed idleneſs, in every ſort and degree, ſtands condemned by the Chriſtian inſtitutes. See Acts xx. 34 Rom. Rom. xiii. 13. Epheſ. iv. 28, 29. Col. iv. 5. 2 Theſſ. iii. 7—13. 1 Pet. iv. 15 and Benſon

Ver. 12. Honeſtly] Decently reputably. Wat. The word rendered of nothing, μηδενος, may be tranſlated of no man. The Apoſtle bids them mind their own buſineſs, and work with their own hands, that they may be in repute and credit among their heathen neighbours. For a man who cannot maintain himſelf, and is reduced to beggary by idleneſs, is an object of univerſal and juſt contempt. See Wall, Doddridge, and Heylin.

Ver. 13.] The Apoſtle had intimated, ch. iii. 10. that he wanted to make them another viſit at Theſſalonica, in order to perfect that which was lacking in their faith. Perhaps what he ſays here was part of what he wanted to teach them, as not having ſeen it proper before to enter into ſuch curious and minute diſcoveries as theſe; namely, whether the laſt generation ſhould die at all or no; and whether the dead ſaints ſhould be raiſed before the living were transformed. But, having heard that they ſtill lamented over their dead, like their heathen neighbours, and perhaps that they ſtill hired mourners,—were apt to repine at the Divine Providence,—to lament, and be exceſſively dejected; he here delivers three things, to dry up their tears. 1. He briefly

14 For if we believe that Jeſus died, and roſe again, even ſo them alſo which ſleep in Jeſus will God bring with him.

15 For this we ſay unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, ſhall not prevent them which are aſleep.

16 For the Lord himſelf ſhall deſcend from heaven with a ſhout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Chriſt ſhall riſe firſt:

17 Then we which are alive and remain, ſhall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and ſo ſhall we ever be with the Lord.

18 Wherefore, comfort one another with theſe words.

CHAP. V.

He proceedeth in the former deſcription of Chriſt's coming to judgement, and giveth divers precepts; and ſo concludeth the epiſtle.

BUT of the times and the ſeaſons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you.

2 For yourſelves know perfectly that the day of the Lord ſo cometh as a thief in the night.

Ver. 14. 1 Cor. xv. 13. 1 Cor. xv. 18, 23. Ch. iii. 13.—V. 15. 1 Kings xiii. 17, 18. xx. 35. 1 Cor. xv. 51.—V. 16. Matth. xxiv. 31. 2 Theſſ. i. 7. 1 Cor. xv. 52. 1 Cor. xv. 23.—V. 17. 1 Cor. xv. 51. briefly repeats what he had taught already, ſtrongly aſſerting the reſurrection of the pious dead to an eternal life of virtue and happineſs, in conſequence of the reſurrection of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and according to his expreſs and repeated promiſes. 2. He makes this new diſcovery,—that the laſt generation ſhould not die at all, but be on a ſudden changed into immortals. And, 3. He adds another new diſcovery, viz. that though the living ſhould not die, but be transformed; yet the dead ſhall firſt be raiſed, and be made glorious, immortal and happy; and ſo in ſome meaſure have the preference and advantage of ſuch as ſhall then be found alive. From all which he concludes, that the Chriſtians ought to leave off their exceſſive lamentations for their deceaſed friends, and no longer imitate their heathen neighbours, who, though they might have ſome obſcure notions and expectations of the immortality of the ſoul, had no ſuch hopes as the Chriſtians of a reſurrection from the dead, and of an eternal life of ſuch holy and glorious enjoyments, in the preſence of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and of the holy angels, and of all the wiſeſt, worthieſt, and beſt of men, who will be perfect and happy as well as they: ver. 13—18. Cicero ſays, (Tuſcul. Diſp. i. 13.) "Who would lament the death of a friend, unleſs he ſuppoſed him deprived of all the enjoyments of life, and ſenſible of the loſs of them?"—How forcible a remark in the preſent connection! See Benſon, Doddridge, and Saurin's Serm. tom. vi. ſerm. 1.

Ver. 14. Which ſleep in Jeſus] The words διὰ τȣ̃ Ἰησȣ̃, which we connect with κοιμηθέντας, and render ſleep in Jeſus, may be conſidered as making a ſeparate clauſe; and may imply, that it is by the power and agency of Chriſt that God will bring with him thoſe of his people who are departed out of this life. See ver. 16. 1 Cor. xv. 18. Accordingly Dr. Heylin renders it, We muſt alſo believe, that God will raiſe up by Jeſus thoſe who are departed, &c. Archbp. Tillotſon explains the expreſſion here uſed, as appropriate to the martyrs, and renders διὰ τȣ̃ Ἰησȣ̃, for the ſake of Jeſus: But it cannot be proved that the grief to which the Apoſtle refers related only to ſuch, and the force of the argument plainly reaches further. The ſtate of the pious dead in their graves is not only here, but in many other paſſages of Scripture, deſcribed as a ſhort ſleep, compared with that eternal life into which they ſhall awake in the morning of the reſurrection. This 14th verſe ought to be read in a parentheſis, it being a repetition of what the Apoſtle had more fully inſtructed them in before. The reſurrection of Chriſt was the foundation or fact upon which the whole Chriſtian religion was built, and with it the reſurrection of mankind in general, but more eſpecially of the juſt, was joined in the cloſeſt connection. This is what the Apoſtle elſewhere ſhews at large; here he only reminds the Theſſalonians of it in a ſhort parentheſis, and paſſes on to the two diſcoveries mentioned in the preceding note. See Matth. ix. 24. John xi. 4—14. Doddridge, Benſon, Tillotſon's Works, vol. ii p. 184. and Lardner's Anſwer to Woolſton, p. 52, 105.

Ver. 15. By the word of the Lord] No words can more plainly aſſert, that in what follows St. Paul ſpeaks by an expreſs revelation from Chriſt; and conſequently, there can be no room for any interpretation, which can ſuppoſe him at all miſtaken in any circumſtance of the enſuing account. Now, becauſe here and elſewhere St. Paul ſpeaks in the firſt perſon plural, and thereby ſeems to join himſelf with them that would be alive at Chriſt's ſecond coming, when the dead are to be raiſed, and the living transformed,—ſome have too haſtily concluded, that he thought the day of the Lord to be juſt then at hand; and that he, and ſeveral of the Chriſtians of that age, ſhould be of the number of thoſe who ſhould (not die and be raiſed again, but) be transformed: But they are great ſtrangers to St. Paul's ſtile and manner, who have not obſerved in what a latitude he uſes the word we; ſometimes thereby meaning himſelf, and at other times himſelf and his companions; ſometimes the Apoſtles, and at other times the Chriſtians in general;—in ſome places the Jewiſh, and in other places the Gentile Chriſtians. Nay, I, the firſt perſon ſingular, is uſed Rom. vii. 9. for ſuch as lived between the covenants made with Abraham, and the law's being given by Moſes; and if the word I be uſed in ſuch a latitude, much more may the word we. Beſides, how often are all Chriſtians conſidered as one church, one family, one kingdom, one city, one building, or the members of one and the ſame body, whether they be in heaven or earth, in what age or nation ſoever they live! Further, to confirm this interpretation, it is evident that St. Paul expected not to eſcape death, but that he ſhould die, and riſe again; 2 Cor. v. 6, 8. Philip. i. 23. iii. 10, 11, &c. And finally, when the Theſſalonians, either by the means of ſome weak or deſigning perſons, were led into this miſtake, St. Paul himſelf wrote them a ſecond Epiſtle; in which he aſſures them, that he did not deſign to ſay any ſuch thing as that the day of the Lord was at hand; for a grand apoſtaſy was firſt to happen in the Chriſtian church. See the notes on 2 Theſſ. ii. 1—12. Benſon, Limborch. Collat. p. 75. and La Mothe "of Inſpiration," p. 133, &c. Dr. Heylin renders the latter part of this verſe thus: "That we who remain alive until the coming of the Lord ſhall not enter [into bliſs] before thoſe who are departed.

Ver. 16. With the trump of God] It was a cuſtom among the ancients to ſummon aſſemblies by the ſound of a trumpet; to which cuſtom probably the Apoſtle here alludes. It has generally been inferred from the next clauſe, that good men ſhall riſe before the wicked; and 1 Cor. xv. 23. ſeems to favour it. But this text only aſſerts their riſing before the ſaints who are found alive ſhall be changed. Dr. Heylin renders the verſe, For as ſoon as the order ſhall be given by the voice of the archangel, and by the trumpet of God, the Lord himſelf ſhall deſcend from heaven; and the dead, &c.

Ver. 17. Shall be caught up together with them, &c.] A cloud conducted by angels was our Lord's triumphal chariot when he aſcended, and ſuch a bright cloud will be his triumphal chariot, or throne of glory, when he comes down as judge on the great day. Acts i. 9, 11. Rev. i. 7. Pſal. lxviii. 17, 18. Dan. vii. 13. And it is here intimated, as if his redeemed alſo were thus to aſcend into glory. See Benſon, Doddridge, and Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. 3. Dr. Heylin reads this verſe, After that, ſuch of us as are then alive ſhall, together with them, be taken up into the air, upon the clouds, to meet the Lord; and ſo we ſhall eternally live with him.

Ver. 18. With theſe words] Some MSS add, of the Spirit. See Mill, and Wetſtein.

Chap. V. Ver. 1.] As the ſubject of the foregoing chapter had led St. Paul to diſcourſe of the reſurrection of the dead, of the transformation of the laſt generation, and of Chriſt's coming to judgement; it would have been very natural for the Theſſalonians to ſay, with our Lord's Apoſtles, Tell us, when ſhall theſe things be; and what ſign or notice ſhall we have of Chriſt's coming, and of the end of the world. To obviate ſuch a queſtion, he tells them, that there was no occaſion for them to know the time, for they already knew as much as was ſufficient; namely, that ſuch a day will come; and whenever it does come, will come ſuddenly and ſurpriſingly; and that therefore men ought always to be upon their guard. Death puts an end to our ſtate of trial, and the wicked will fall in the judgement, and the righteous be accepted, whether they be alive at the laſt day, or die and be raiſed again. ver. 1—11. See Benſon, Matth. xxiv. 36. Mark xiii. 32. Acts i. 7.

Ver. 2. The day of the Lord] This phraſe may be underſtood either figuratively, of Chriſt's coming in judgement upon the Jews, or literally, of his coming in glory to judge the world. Sometimes, indeed, it is uſed in the former ſenſe; but it is more generally employed in the latter, by the writers of the New Teſtament; and the context plainly evinces that this latter is the ſenſe in the preſent paſſage. There is a remarkable emphaſis in the next expreſſion: A thief comes upon people when they are bound in ſleep; and they awake in amazement and confuſion, being found unarmed, and in an helpleſs poſture. Again, Pangs come upon a woman, ver. 3. when ſhe is eating or drinking, and thinking of nothing leſs than that hour: and here it is ſaid, not that the day of the Lord will come thus, but that it is actually coming; which increaſes the awefulneſs of the repreſentation. See Bp. Newton on the Prophecies, vol. ii. p. 361. and Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, vol. i. p. 209.

3 For when they ſhall ſay, Peace and ſafety; then ſudden deſtruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they ſhall not eſcape.

4 But ye, brethren, are not in darkneſs, that that day ſhould overtake you as a thief.

5 Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkneſs.

6 Therefore, let us not ſleep, as do others; but let us watch, and be ſober.

7 For they that ſleep, ſleep in the night; and they that be drunken, are drunken in the night:

8 But let us who are of the day, be ſober, putting on the breaſt-plate of faith and love; and for an helmet, the hope of ſalvation.

9 For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain ſalvation by our Lord Jeſus Chriſt,

10 Who died for us; that whether we wake or ſleep, we ſhould live together with him.

11 Wherefore, comfort yourſelves together, and edify one another, even as alſo ye do.

12 And we beſeech you, brethren, to know them which labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admoniſh you;

13 And to eſteem them very highly in love, for their work's ſake. And be at peace among yourſelves.

14 Now we exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, ſupport the weak, be patient toward all men.

15 See that none render evil for evil unto any man; but ever follow that which is good, both among yourſelves, and to all men.

16 Rejoice evermore.

17 Pray without ceaſing.

18 In every thing give thanks: for this is the will of God in Chriſt Jeſus concerning you.

19 Quench not the Spirit.

Ver. 5. Ye are all the children of light] Having compared our Lord's ſudden and unexpected appearance to the coming of a thief in the night, ver. 2. he takes up the compariſon again, ver. 4. and purſues it to ver. 10. calling virtuous and good men the children of the day, and of the light, and ignorant, idolatrous, and wicked perſons, children of the night, and of darkneſs. This compariſon is frequently touched upon in the Holy Scriptures, as well as in the heathen poets, with the greateſt juſtneſs and beauty. Wicked men are repreſented as ſkulking about in the night, like beaſts of prey, or like bats and moles, whoſe eyes cannot bear the light. Job xxiv. 13—18. Jer. xlix. 7—10. Matth. viii. 12. On the other hand, good men fear not the light, as their deeds will bear examination. This was the ſtate into which the converts from among the idolatrous Gentiles, had happily and more remarkably emerged. See Rom. xiii. 12—14. Epheſ. v. 7, 8. Col. i. 12, 13. Benſon, Calmet, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 8. Putting on the breaſt-plate of faith and love] The alluſion is here changed again, though it naturally grows out of what had been ſaid above; for, having called the time of Chriſt's coming to judgement by the name of that day, (ver. 4.) the image ſeems to have dwelt upon St. Paul's mind; and though he calls the Goſpel-diſpenſation light, in compariſon of the darkneſs of idolatry, yet the brighteſt light in this world is but darkneſs compared with the light of the everlaſting world: Rom. xiii. 12. 2 Pet. i. 19. And having conſidered the Chriſtians at Theſſalonica as in the darkneſs of the night, and as ſurrounded with enemies, he recommends it to them to be upon their guard, clad in proper armour; [illegible] deſcribing which he alludes to the ancient cuſtom of ſoldiers ſtanding centinel during the ſeveral watches of the night, in armour, eſpecially with the helmet and breaſt-plate. St. Paul had indeed the ſkilful and happy addreſs of uſing figures and ſimilitudes, which would be well underſtood, nay, and be emphatical, in the country and among the perſons to whom he was writing. Thus in his Epiſtle to the Romans, he compares virtue and vice to two maſters, who had each of them their ſlaves; and dwells for ſome time upon that cuſtom, which was ſo common among the Romans, in order to their apprehending his meaning more clearly. In writing to the Epheſians, he uſes the architect ſtile, ch. ii. 20—22. as all Aſia had ſuch ſublime thoughts of the celebrated temple of Diana at Epheſus: In writing to the Hebrew Chriſtians, he compares Chriſtianity to almoſt the whole Moſaic œconomy, and ſhews how much the Goſpel-diſpenſation excels; So here, in writing to the Theſſalonians of Macedonia, he ſpeaks the very language of that warlike people; and as the Leſſer Aſia was ſo well acquainted with the like cuſtoms, he makes uſe of the ſame alluſion, Epheſ. vi. 10—18. See the notes there, and Benſon.

Ver. 9. For God hath not appointed us to wrath] The primary deſign of God in ſending his Son into this world, was not to condemn the world, but to ſave it. He did not reveal the Goſpel, that men might ſin with the greater aggravation, and ſo be puniſhed the more; but the motive was love, and the deſign was mercy: And he hath appointed none to wrath, but ſuch as wilfully and obſtinately refuſe to believe, and obey the Goſpel. See Wiſd. i. 12—16. Matth. x. 37—39. Rom. ix. 22. Epheſ. ii. 3. 1 Theſſ. ii. 16. 2 Theſſ. ii. 14. 2 Tim. ii. 20, 21. Hebr. x. 38, 39. and Benſon.

Ver. 10. Who died for us] The Apoſtles lay a great ſtreſs upon this,—that Chriſt not only was incarnate, but died alſo to ſave the penitent, believing, and obedient; and therefore he has a juſt claim to our love and obedience. See Rom. v. 6—12. xiv. 8, 9. 1 Cor. vi. 20. Whether we wake or ſleep, means, Whether we live or die; "Whether we be of the number of thoſe who depart this life before the coming of Chriſt, or of thoſe who ſurvive till that time." The Apoſtle refers to what he had ſaid, ch. iv. 13. See Benſon, and Heylin.

Ver. 11. Wherefore, comfort yourſelves together] He had uſed this expreſſion, ch. iv. 18. All that he has ſaid ſince, concerning the time of Chriſt's coming, and the neceſſity of preparing for it, is to be looked upon as a parentheſis or digreſſion, though an exceeding proper and uſeful one: And here, by his uſing this expreſſion again, he ſhews that he is returning to where he left off, and cloſing this part of his Epiſtle.

Ver. 12.] In a church which had been ſo lately planted, and that in the midſt of ſo much confuſion and oppoſition, it is no wonder that there ſhould be ſeveral diſorders. Among other things, they did not carry it with a proper deference and reſpect to ſuch as preſided over them as a church, inſtructing, directing, and admoniſhing them; and particularly they ſeem to have refuſed a compliance with ſuch of their directions, as concerned the regulating of their public worſhip. The Apoſtle therefore exhorts them to a due regard to theſe in ver. 12, 13. after which, he concludes his Epiſtle with practical directions; ſome of them ſuited only to a church where many of them had extraordinary ſpiritual gifts, though other of the directions are ſuited to all Chriſtians. Dr. Heylin reads this verſe, Who labour in the miniſtry, who preſide over you in the Lord, and inſtruct you. See Benſon, Vitring. de Vet. Synag. p. 727. Barrington's Miſcell. Sacr. vol. i. p. 81. Mill, Wetſtein, and Heb. xiii. 17.

Ver. 14. Them that are unruly] Dr. Heylin, with the margin, renders the original ἀτάκτους, by diſorderly. It is a military term, expreſſing the character of ſoldiers, who keep not their ranks, and will not know their colours.

Ver. 16. Rejoice evermore] The original may expreſs the form of a ſalutation; as if he had ſaid, "May you always be proſperous and happy!" But as they are put among ſo many other ſhort exhortations, our verſion ſeems preferable. Some MSS add,—in the Lord. See Mill, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 17. Pray without ceaſing] That is, "at all proper ſeaſons." So the burnt offering preſented every morning and evening is called perpetual; Lev. vi. 20. Comp. Luke xxiv. 53. Acts ii. 46, 47. and John xviii. 20.

Ver. 19. Quench not the Spirit] This has generally been expounded as referring to the gifts of the Spirit; the exerciſe of which, in themſelves or others, ſhould not be hindered. See 1 Tim. iv. 14. 1 Cor. xiv. 39. The phraſe here uſed, σβέννυτε, quench, or extinguiſh, according to ſome, has a reference to the deſcent of the Spirit, as in flames of fire; as may alſo the word ἀναζωπυρεῖν, 2 Tim. i. 6. The extenſive meaning of the words may be thus expreſſed: "Extinguiſh not ſpiritual gifts in others, by preventing them from the exerciſe of them in the ſolemn aſſembly; nor extinguiſh them in yourſelves, by pride, idleneſs, abſenting from the ſolemn aſſembly, or the diſorderly exerciſe of them there; much leſs by wickedneſs, or apoſtaſy from the Chriſtian religion. No, rather ſtir up the gifts which were given you by the laying on of my hands: Allow others in their turns to exerciſe their gifts, and by reading, meditation, prayer, and praiſe, by frequenting the ſolemn aſſembly, and by ſuch an uſe of your ſpiritual gifts there, as may turn moſt to the edification of others, together with a ſteady perſeverance in faith and charity, and an holy Chriſtian converſation;—by theſe means ſtir up and improve your ſpiritual gifts, until that holy religion which they atteſt, purify your own hearts and lives, and blaze ſo bright, as to give light to all around you." See Doddridge, Benſon, Barrington, and Calmet.

Ver. 20. Deſpiſe not propheſyings] By propheſying, here we are not to underſtand barely a foretelling future events, but a preaching by immediate inſpiration; that is, ſpeaking what tended to inſtruct or eſtabliſh, convert or confirm, reprove or comfort mankind, in matters relating either to faith or practice. See 1 Cor. xiv. 3, 4. If we had only this one of all St. Paul's Epiſtles, we ſhould not perhaps have been able to underſtand the reaſon and deſign of this ſhort direction; though the Theſſalonians might eaſily underſtand it, from their thorough knowledge of the ſtate of their own church: But in writing to other churches, which probably were more guilty of the ſame fault, he has opened his mind more fully. He is thought to have referred to their contentions about the exerciſe of ſpiritual gifts in the church at Philippi. Philip. ii. 2—14. See on Rom. xii. 6. But he does evidently refer to ſuch contentions, Rom. xii. 3—6. and yet more evidently 1 Cor. xii. xiii xiv. where he treats of this ſubject at large; ſhewing them that propheſying was the moſt valuable of all the ſpiritual gifts that were among them, as conducing moſt to edification. See the notes there, Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 21. Prove all things, &c.] Though they were not to deſpiſe propheſyings, yet they were not to receive every thing which might be ſo called; but to prove and examine all things that went under that name. Nor were they to ſtop here; But, when they had ſeparated them, or could diſtinguiſh between them, they were to reject the evil, and hold faſt the good. Theſe three verſes (20, 21, 22.) ought to have been joined together, and then the connection would have been more evident. This direction was given not only to ſuch as preſided among them, but unto all the Chriſtians at Theſſalonica in general. Comp. 1 John iv. 1. Though in the preſent times we have no propheſying, or ſpeaking by immediate inſpiration; yet as we find ſeveral, which are pretended to be revelations from God, it is the buſineſs of every particular perſon to examine, as far as he hath ability and opportunity; and upon a careful ſearch and examination, joined with the practice of virtue, and frequent fervent prayer, he may diſtinguiſh the good from the evil, and ought to adhere to the former only. That God is able to diſcover his mind and will to us, as well as we are able to do ſo one to another, ſeems highly reaſonable; and that he ſhould do ſo, when men are in ſuch circumſtances, as that ſo univerſal a reformation could not be expected any other way, is very agreeable to our notions of the divine wiſdom and goodneſs. Upon ſuch accounts we enquire after a revelation. And whatever carries the plaineſt traces of reaſon and virtue in it, whatever appears upon ſearch to be moſt worthy of God, and moſt exactly ſuited to the ſtate of man; that, of all that are offered to us as divine revelations, ought to be embraced: Upon ſuch accounts we reject the Alcoran, and receive the Bible: And though miracles may be performed to rouſe the attention of mankind, and make them enquire into any doctrine; yet they cannot prove falſhood to be true, even ſuppoſing that God ſhould permit them to be performed upon ſuch an occaſion, which it is natural to think he will hardly do: But miracles may make truth ſtrike deeper, and be more regarded. As we have both reaſon and revelation, whereby to try doctrines, we have no need of infallible living guides and judges: For, though teaching be highly proper, and will ever be ſo for the bulk of mankind, reaſon and Scripture are ſufficient for every man to try doctrines by, if he will but make uſe of that liberty of private judgement, which the Scriptures of the New Teſtament do ſo abundantly aſſert for him. See Philip. i. 9, 10. What a glorious freedom of thought does the Apoſtle recommend in the verſe before us! And how contemptible in his account was a blind implicit faith! May all Chriſtians allow ſuch freedom to each other, and to all mankind, as well as ſtand faſt themſelves in that liberty, wherewith Chriſt has made them free! Acts xvii. 11.

Ver. 23. And the very God of peace] The Apoſtle here calls him the God of peace, becauſe, ver. 12—15. he had been exhorting to peace. Upon the ſame account he calls him the God of love and peace, 2 Cor. xiii. 11. and there, as well as here, purſues the ſame thought, by recommending the holy kiſs of charity. See Rom. xv. 4, 5, 12, 13. and 1 Theſſ. iii. 13. It is likely enough that the Theſſalonians were uſed to divide the man into ſpirit, ſoul, and body, (as this was the doctrine of the Pythagoreans, Platoniſts, and Stoics) taking the ψυχὴ for the ſenſual ſoul, or the lower faculties; and the πνεῦμα for the rational ſoul, or the ſuperior faculties: and theſe two they uſed to ſpeak of as two diſtinct ſouls, or rather as a ſoul and a ſpirit. Some would render Ὁλόκληρον ὑμῶν, your whole conſtitution, ſpirit, ſoul, &c. Dr. Heylin has it, May every part of you, your ſpirit, &c. See Vitring. Obſervat. lib. iii. c. 4. Hallet on Scripture, vol. i. p. 39. and Bp. Browne's Procedure of the Underſtanding, b. ii. ch. 10.

Ver. 27. I charge you by the Lord] This was in the nature of a ſolemn oath, which the Apoſtle upon occaſion uſed himſelf, and by which he here obliges the Theſſalonians. See Joſhua vi. 26. 1 Sam. xiv. 24. Matth. xxvi. 63, 64. St. Paul was not for having the Scriptures locked up from the common people, nor did he recommend it to them firſt to read a ſyſtem of divinity, drawn up by uninſpired and fallible men. See Col. iv. 16. How eaſy was it for the primitive Chriſtians to diſtinguiſh St. Paul's genuine Epiſtles from any counterfeit ones, when he ſent them to the ſeveral churches by approved perſons, and commonly by ſome of his own companions and attendants, when he ordered them to be read publickly upon the receipt of them, and took care to affix his name, wrote in ſome peculiar diſtinguiſhing manner, or with ſome very particular mark annexed to it! and if the fact was once aſcertained, how eaſy was it to admit it to poſterity! See on Philem. ver. 19. and Benſon.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. V.

Since we continually ſee ſo many around us ſuddenly ſurprized into the eternal world, and fixed in that ſtate in which judgement will find them, it ſhould render us very careful that the day of the Lord may not overtake us as a thief, but that we maintain a continual watch. How many are at this hour ſpeaking peace and ſafety to themſelves, over whoſe heads inſtantaneous deſtruction is hovering; ſuch a deſtruction that they ſhall never be able to eſcape, never able to recover from it! ver. 2—4.

Let us endeavour to awaken ourſelves and each other. Are we not indeed all children of the day? Let us then rouſe ourſelves, and uſe the light, that by it we may diſpatch our labours, and favoured by it, be guarded againſt the moſt ſudden attacks of our ſpiritual enemies. Let us be ſober and vigilant, leſt our adverſary, the devil, break in upon us by ſurprize; which the unexpected weapons wherewith he attacks us may render yet more dangerous. ver. 5, 6.

Our own armour is deſcribed, and provided, if we ſeek it from the magazine of God. Let faith and love ever defend our breaſt; let the hope of ſalvation cover our head. Let us adore the divine clemency and mercy, that we are not appointed unto wrath, but enjoy the views of ſuch a ſalvation, to be obtained by Jeſus Chriſt. As he hath done his part to procure it for us, having died for this important purpoſe, be it our care to exert ourſelves in our proper ſphere for ſecuring it, that we may lay hold on eternal life. ver. 8—10. Then may we be happily indifferent to life or to death:—While we continue in the body,—when that is ſleeping in the grave, and our ſouls remain in the inviſible world,—and when our ſleeping duſt ſhall be rouſed, and both ſoul and body live in unremitting vigour and energy, beyond the need of that repoſe which is now ſo neceſſary;—ſtill, in each of theſe different ſtates, we ſhall live with him; and he will make the progreſſion of the ſoul from one ſtate of being to another, its progreſſion to ſtages of increaſing holineſs and joy. In the perſuaſion of this, let us comfort, exhort, and edify each other; and we ſhall feel the energy of the exhortations we give, and the ſweetneſs of the conſolations we adminiſter. ver. 11.

What a variety of excellent inſtructions does the ſhort cloſe of this chapter contain! yea, how much is expreſſed in ſome of its ſhorteſt ſentences;—but how hard is it for our degenerate hearts to learn theſe leſſons, which ſo few words are ſufficient to expreſs! (ver. 16, &c.)—This habitual joy in God,—this conſtant diſpoſition to prayer,—this grateful temper, which upon every call may overflow in thankſgiving,—this abſtinence from all appearance of evil! "Bleſſed Lord, we need a better ſpirit than our own, to teach us theſe things! May thy grace be with us, and may none of us quench thy Spirit, nor deſpiſe thoſe ordinances, which, by his heavenly communications, he ſo often vouchſafes to own! O may we endeavour, by the daily importunity of prayer, to engage more of his efficacious and purifying influences, to ſanctify the whole frame of our nature, our ſpirits, and ſouls, and bodies; ſo ſhall we underſtand and chooſe, ſo ſhall we love and delight in things divine, and maintain that conſtant command over our appetites of fleſh and blood, as to be continually fit for the appearance of thy dear Son, and more like what we hope we ſhall be, when preſented before the preſence of his glory."

To promote this, let us watch over each other in the Lord: May Chriſtian ſocieties preſerve a regular diſcipline, with a due mixture of zeal and tenderneſs; May the friendſhip of private perſons be rendered mutually ſubſervient to religious improvement, and a due regard be ever paid to thoſe who labour among them, and preſide over them in the Lord. ver. 12. They will not require a blind ſubmiſſion to their dictates, if they rightly underſtand the Goſpel they are to teach: They will allow, they will encourage, they will urge their hearers to prove all things, which even the Apoſtles themſelves, with all their plenitude of inſpiration, did not think it beneath them to do. But they who thus candidly inquire, and are determined to hold faſt what is truly good, knowing how excellent an office the miniſtry is; knowing how much the edification of the church depends upon it, will eſteem thoſe who bear it very highly in love, for their work's ſake; and, in whatever inſtances they may be conſtrained by what they judge to be the evidence of truth, to differ from their brethren, or even from their teachers,—will be ſolicitous to maintain harmony and love in the ſociety to which they belong, as it becomes them to do, who are the diſciples of that wiſdom from above, which hath taught them inſeparably to connect their regards to purity and peace. ver. 13, 23.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

CHAP. I.

Saint Paul certifieth them of the good opinion which he had of their faith, love, and patience; and therewithal uſeth divers reaſons for the comforting them in perſecution; whereof the chiefeſt is taken from the righteous judgement of God.

PAUL, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, Unto the church of the Theſſalonians, in God our Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt:

2 Grace unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

3 We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, becauſe that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all towards each other aboundeth:

4 So that we ourſelves glory in you in the churches of God, for your patience and faith in all your perſecutions and tribulations that ye endure:

5 Which is a manifeſt token of the righteous judgement of God, that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye alſo ſuffer:

6 Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompence tribulation to them that trouble you;

7 And to you who are troubled, reſt with us, when the Lord Jeſus ſhall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels,

8 In flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the goſpel of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt:

9 Who ſhall be puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction from the preſence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power,

II. THESSALONIANS.] It is probable that this Epiſtle was written from the ſame place with, and not long after the firſt. This ſeems the more likely, as Timothy, and Sylvanus, or Silas, are mentioned as being ſtill with them. The general deſign of this Epiſtle, like the former, was to eſtabliſh the Theſſalonians in the faith of the Goſpel; to comfort them under the ſufferings to which they were expoſed; to rectify ſome miſtakes into which they had fallen, concerning the general reſurrection and final judgement,—from ch. iv. 13, &c. of the former Epiſtle; and to direct them in the exerciſe of ſalutary diſcipline to ſome, who had been guilty of great irregularities in the church. Though this is the ſhorteſt of all St. Paul's Epiſtles to the churches, it is not inferior to any of them in ſublimity of ſentiment, or warmth of expreſſion. The remarkable prophecy of the man of ſin, as explained in the courſe of our notes, will be found a ſtrong and undeniable argument of the reality of the Apoſtle's inſpiration. See Benſon, Hammond, Elſner, Lardner, &c.

Chap. I. ver. 3. We are bound to thank God, &c.] From hence to the end of this chapter the Apoſtle repeats the ſubſtance and main deſign of the firſt Epiſtle; which was, to confirm them in Chriſtianity, and in their patient ſuffering for it: And the great argument he here makes uſe of is, that the Lord Jeſus Chriſt would come as an univerſal judge, and that then he would puniſh their enemies and perſecutors, and make them happy. The Chriſtians at Theſſalonica ſeem to have been remarkable for their patience and ſteadfaſtneſs, as well as for their mutual love and affection. See ver. 4, 5. 1 Theſſ. i. 3, 6—10. ii. 14. iv. 9, 10. and Benſon.

Ver. 4. So that we ourſelves glory] Compare ver. 11. with this verſe, and you will find, that here is an inſtance of his commending them, in order to encourage and more effectually perſuade them ſtill to be advancing. Such inſtances may be found 1 Theſſ. i. 3—10. and ii. 19, 20. 2 Cor. vii. 14, &c. From this text it is worth while to obſerve the Apoſtle's ſkilful and happy addreſs: He raiſed the emulation of other churches, by commending the Theſſalonians; and he again quickens the Theſſalonians, by acquainting them how much he had praiſed them in other churches. See Benſon and Calmet.

Ver. 5. Which is a manifeſt token] Many ancient verſions and writers read εἰς ἔνδειγμα, for a diſplay, which will better connect this with the preceding verſe. So Rom. iii. 25.—εἰς ἔνδειξιν, the judgement of God; or, which is the ſame, the exerciſe of his juſtice, has a double object;—in good men for their purification, and in bad men for their puniſhment. Perſecution inflicted and ſuffered, furniſhes both theſe objects reſpectively. Perhaps the word rendered manifeſt token or diſplay, may further imply, that the ſufferings of good men, and the triumphant propriety of their perſecuting enemies, ſhould not only terminate in ſuch a diſplay of divine vengeance; but that theſe ſeeming irregularities do even now declare, that there ſhall be ſuch a day of retribution. See Heylin, Doddridge, Mill, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 6, 7. Seeing it is a righteous thing with God, &c.] Becauſe, &c. MS. His juſtice is equally concerned to afflict thoſe in their turns who have afflicted you; ver. 7. and to grant to you who have been afflicted Repoſe with us, &c. Heylin. With his mighty angels, ſhould be joined to the next clauſe;—his mighty angels in flaming fire; or, "who will make a flaming fire;" as Pſ. civ. 3, 4. See Benſon.

Ver. 9. From the preſence of the Lord] This phraſe expreſſes not only that they ſhall be expelled from that joy and glory which reigns in the preſence of Chriſt, but that his preſence ſhall appear active in the infliction of their puniſhment; ſo that they ſhall as it were be blaſted by the lightning of his eye. The original is very emphatical: "Who ſhall ſuffer puniſhment,—everlaſting deſtruction from the face of the Lord." From the glory of his power means, from his glorious power. See Benſon, and Bp. Hopkins's Works, p. 370.

10 When he ſhall come to be glorified in his ſaints, and to be admired in all them that believe (becauſe our teſtimony among you was believed) in that day.

11 Wherefore alſo we pray always for you, that our God would count you worthy of this calling, and fulfil all the good pleaſure of his goodneſs, and the work of faith with power:

12 That the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt may be glorified in you, and ye in him, according to the grace of our God, and of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

CHAP. II.

He willeth them to continue ſtedfaſt in the truth received; ſheweth that there ſhall be a departure from the faith, and a diſcovery of antichriſt, before the day of the Lord come: and thereupon repeateth his former exhortation, and prayeth for them.

NOW we beſeech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and by our gathering together unto him,

2 That ye be not ſoon ſhaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by ſpirit, nor by word, nor by letter, as from us, as that the day of Chriſt is at hand.

3 Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day ſhall not come except there come a falling-away firſt, and that man of ſin be revealed, the ſon of perdition:

4 Who oppoſeth and exalteth himſelf above all that is called God, or that is worſhipped; ſo that he as God ſitteth in the temple of God, ſhewing himſelf that he is God.

5 Remember ye not, that when I was yet with you, I told you theſe things?

6 And now ye know what with-holdeth, that he might be revealed in his time.

Or, holdeth.

Ver. 10. To be admired, &c.] This ſtrongly implies, not only that the ſaints themſelves ſhall admire at what he does for them, ſo far above all their conceptions and expectations; but that it ſhall reflect an admirable glory upon our Redeemer, in the judgement of all who ſhall be ſpectators of it. Dr. Waterland, after Elſner and Grotius, reads the next clauſe, Becauſe our teſtimony concerning you will be approved—πιςευθησεται, in that day; or ſhall have been verified, or ratified upon you. Dr. Heylin reads it, For what we have teſtified and declared to you ſhall be verified in that day.

Ver. 11. That our God would count you worthy] Would make, or render you worthy, &c. MS. Heylin, Doddridge. Inſtead of the good pleaſure of his goodneſs, Blackwall would render the original εὐδοκίαν ἀγαθωσύνης, the benevolence of his goodneſs; and obſerves, that it is the ſhorteſt and moſt charming repreſentation any where to be found, of that infinite goodneſs which paſſes all expreſſion, but was never ſo happily and properly expreſſed as here. The word εὐδοκία ſeems at once to imply, that it is ſovereign pleaſure, and alſo that God feels as it were a ſecret complacency in the diſplay of it. See Blackwall's Sacred Claſſics, vol. i. p. 242.

Chap. II. Ver. 1, 2. Now we beſeech you, brethren, by the coming, &c.] As concerning the coming, &c. Wat. and MS. Dr. Heylin has it, Now, with reſpect to the coming, &c. and our being aſſembled with him,—I deſire, brethren, ver. 2. that you would not inconſiderately change your ſentiments, and be alarmed by any revelation, or diſcourſe, or letter, as from us, as if the day of Chriſt were to come immediately. Michaelis thinks, that the ſecond verſe relates to ſome Epiſtles forged in St. Paul's name, to propagate the notion above referred to; and to certain calculations and falſe prophecies applied to the ſame purpoſe. The Bp. of Briſtol obſerves, in agreement with the above tranſlations, that the prepoſition which is tranſlated by, ought rather to be tranſlated concerning, as it ſignifies in Rom. ix. 27. 2 Cor. i. 7. viii. 23, 24. beſides other places of Scripture, and as it does in other authors. "Now we beſeech you, brethren, concerning the coming, &c." For he doth not beſeech them by the coming of Chriſt, but the coming of Chriſt is the ſubject of which he is treating; and it is in relation to this ſubject that he deſires them not to be diſturbed or affrighted, neither by revelation, nor by meſſage, nor by letter, as from him, as if the day of Chriſt's coming was at hand. The phraſe of the coming of Chriſt muſt be taken literally for his coming in glory to judge the world, as the context will evince beyond contradiction. It is uſed in this ſenſe in the former Epiſtle. From 1 Theſſ. iv. 13, &c. v. 1, 2. ſome had inferred, that the end of the world was now approaching, and the day of Chriſt was at hand: the Apoſtle ſets himſelf in this place to rectify that miſtake; and it is with reference to this coming of Chriſt that he beſeeches the Theſſalonians not to be ſhaken from their ſtedfaſtneſs, nor to be troubled and terrified, as if it was now at hand. Nothing then can be more evident and undeniable, than that the coming of Chriſt here intended, is his ſecond coming in glory to judge the world; and of this ſecond coming the Apoſtle had ſpoken before, ch. i. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. It was a point of great importance for the Theſſalonians not to be miſtaken in this particular, becauſe if they were taught to believe that the coming of Chriſt was at hand, and he ſhould not come according to their expectation, they might be ſtaggered in their faith; and finding part of their creed to be falſe, might be haſty enough to conclude that the whole was ſo. The Apoſtle therefore cautions them in the ſtrongeſt manner againſt this deluſion, and aſſures them, that other memorable events will take place before the coming of the Lord. Newton's Diſſert. on the Proph. vol. ii. p. 360—365.

Ver. 3, 4. For that day ſhall not come, except, &c.] "The day of Chriſt ſhall not come, except there come the apoſtaſy firſt." The apoſtaſy here deſcribed is plainly not of a civil, but of a religious nature; not a revolt from the government, but a defection from the true religion and worſhip. In the original it is the apoſtaſy, with an article to give it an emphaſis. The article being added, ſignifies "that famous and before-predicted apoſtaſy." So likewiſe is the man of ſin, with the like article, and the like emphaſis. If then the notion of the man of ſin be derived from any ancient prophet, it muſt be derived from Dan. vii. 25. and ix. 36. Any man may be ſatisfied that St. Paul alluded to Daniel's deſcription, becauſe he hath not only borrowed the ſame ideas, but hath even adopted ſome of the phraſes and expreſſions. The man of ſin may ſignify either a ſingle man, or a ſucceſſion of men: A ſucceſſion of men being meant in Daniel, it it is probable that the ſame was intended here alſo. It is the more probable, becauſe a ſingle man appears hardly ſufficient for the work here aſſigned; and it is agreeable to the phraſeology of Scripture, and eſpecially to that of the prophets, to ſpeak of a body, or number of men under the character of one. Thus a king, Dan. vii. 8. Rev. xvii. is uſed for a ſucceſſion of kings. The man of ſin ſeems to be expreſſed from Dan. vii. 24. according to the Greek tranſlation, he ſhall exceed in evil all that went before him; and he may fulfil the character, either by promoting wickedneſs in general, or by advancing idolatry in particular, as the word ſin frequently ſignifies in Scripture. The ſon of perdition is alſo the denomination of the traitor Judas, John xvii. 12. which implies, that the man of ſin ſhould be, like Judas, a falſe apoſtle; like him betray Chriſt, and like him be devoted to deſtruction. Who oppoſeth, &c. is manifeſtly copied from Daniel, He ſhall exalt himſelf, &c. The features exactly reſemble each other:—He oppoſeth and exalteth himſelf above all; or, according to the Greek, "above every one that is called god, or, that is worſhipped." The Greek word for worſhipped, is σεϐασμα, alluding to the Greek title of the Roman emperors, σεϐαςος, which ſignifies auguſt, or venerable." He ſhall oppoſe,—for the prophets ſpeak of things future, as preſent;—he ſhall oppoſe and exalt himſelf not only above inferior magiſtrates (who are ſometimes called gods in holy writ,) but even above the greateſt emperors, and ſhall arrogate to himſelf divine honours:—So that he as god ſitteth in the temple, &c." By the temple of God, the Apoſtle could not well mean the temple of Jeruſalem, becauſe that, he knew, would be totally deſtroyed within a few years. After the death of Chriſt, the temple of Jeruſalem is never called by the Apoſtles the temple of God; and if at any time they make mention of the houſe or temple of God, they mean the church in general, or every particular believer. Whoever will conſult 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17. 2 Cor. vi. 16. 1 Tim. iii. 15. Rev. iii. 12. will want no examples to prove, that under the Goſpel diſpenſation the temple of God is the church of Chriſt: and the man of ſin's ſitting, implies his ruling and preſiding there; and ſitting there as God, implies his claiming divine authority, in things ſpiritual as well as temporal; and ſhewing himſelf that he is God, implies his doing it with oſtentation. See Newton as above, p. 365—370.

Ver. 5, 6, 7. Remember ye not, &c.] The Apoſtle thought it a part of his duty, as he made it a part of his preaching and doctrine, to forewarn his new converts of the grand apoſtaſy that would infeſt the church, even while he was at Theſſalonica. From theſe verſes it appears, that the man of ſin was not then revealed: His time was not

7 For the myſtery of iniquity doth already work: only he who now letteth, will let, until he be taken out of the way.

8 And then ſhall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord ſhall conſume with the ſpirit of his mouth, and ſhall deſtroy with the brightneſs of his coming:

9 Even him whoſe coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and ſigns, and lying wonders,

10 And with all deceivableneſs of unrighteouſneſs in them that periſh; becauſe they received not the love of the truth, that they might be ſaved.

11 And for this cauſe God ſhall ſend them ſtrong deluſion, that they ſhould believe a lie:

12 That they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleaſure in unrighteouſneſs.

not yet come, or the ſeaſon of his manifeſtation. The myſtery of iniquity was indeed already working;—the ſeeds of corruption were ſown; but they were not grown up to maturity. The man of ſin was yet hardly conceived in the womb; it muſt be ſome time before he could be brought forth. There was ſome obſtacle that hindered his appearing: What this was we cannot determine with abſolute certainty at ſo great a diſtance of time; but, if we may rely upon the concurrent teſtimony of the fathers, it was the Roman empire. Moſt probably it was ſomewhat relating to the higher powers, becauſe the Apoſtle obſerves ſuch caution: He mentioned it in diſcourſe, but would not commit it to writing. See ver. 15. and Newton as before, p. 370—372.

Ver. 8. Then ſhall that Wicked be revealed, &c.] When the obſtacle mentioned in the preceding verſe ſhould be removed, then ſhall that Wicked, &c. Nothing can be plainer than that the Lawleſs, (ὁ ανομος) as the Greek ſignifies,—The wicked one here mentioned, and the man of ſin, muſt be one and the ſame perſon. The Apoſtle was ſpeaking before of what hindered that he ſhould be revealed, and would continue to hinder, till it was taken away; "and then the wicked one, &c." Not that he ſhould be conſumed immediately after he was revealed; but the Apoſtle, to comfort the Theſſalonians, no ſooner mentions his revelation, than he foretels alſo his deſtruction, even before he deſcribes his other qualifications. His other qualifications ſhould have been deſcribed firſt in order of time; but the Apoſtle haſtens to what was firſt and warmeſt in his thoughts and wiſhes, "Whom the Lord ſhall conſume, &c." If theſe two clauſes refer to two diſtinct and different events, the meaning manifeſtly is, That the Lord Jeſus ſhall gradually conſume him with the free preaching and publication of his word; and ſhall utterly deſtroy him at his ſecond coming in the glory of his Father, with all his holy angels. If theſe two clauſes relate to one and the ſame event, it is a pleonaſm very uſual in the ſacred, as well as other oriental writings; and the purport plainly is, That the Lord Jeſus ſhall deſtroy him with the greateſt facility, when he ſhall be revealed from heaven; as the Apoſtle has expreſſed it in the preceding chapter, ver. 7, 8. See as before, p. 372. The MS reads the laſt clauſe of ver. 7. Only there is that with-holdeth as yet, until he be, &c.

Ver. 9—12. Whoſe coming is after, &c.] The Apoſtle was eager to foretel the deſtruction of the man of ſin; and for this purpoſe having broken in upon his ſubject, he now returns to it again, and deſcribes the other qualifications by which this wicked one ſhould advance and eſtabliſh himſelf in the world. He ſhould riſe to credit and authority by the moſt diabolical methods; ſhould pretend to ſupernatural powers, and boaſt of revelations, viſions, and miracles, falſe in themſelves, and applied to promote falſe doctrines; ver. 9. He ſhould likewiſe practiſe all other wicked arts of deceit; ſhould be guilty of the moſt impious frauds and impoſitions upon mankind; but ſhould prevail only among thoſe who are deſtitute of a ſincere affection for the truth, whereby they might attain eternal ſalvation: ver. 10. And indeed, it is a juſt and righteous judgement of God, to give them over to vanities and lies in this world, and to condemnation in the next, who have no regard for truth and virtue, but delight in falſhood and wickedneſs: ver. 11, 12.

Upon this ſurvey there appears little room to doubt of the genuine ſenſe and meaning of the paſſage. The Theſſalonians (as we have ſeen from ſome expreſſions in the former Epiſtle,) were alarmed, as if the end of the world was at hand. The Apoſtle, to correct their miſtakes, and diſſipate their fears, aſſures them, that a great apoſtaſy or defection of the Chriſtians from the true faith and worſhip muſt happen, before the coming of Chriſt. This apoſtaſy all the concurrent marks and characters will juſtify us in charging upon the church of Rome. The true Chriſtian worſhip is, the worſhip of the one only God, through the one only Mediator, the man Chriſt Jeſus; and from this worſhip the church of Rome hath notoriouſly departed, by ſubſtituting other mediators, and invocating and adoring ſaints and angels. Nothing is apoſtaſy, if idolatry be not: And are not the members of the church of Rome guilty of idolatry in the worſhip of images, in the adoration of the hoſt, in the invocation of angels and ſaints, and in the oblation of prayers and praiſes to the Virgin Mary, as much or more than to God bleſſed for ever? This is the grand corruption of the Chriſtian church; this is The apoſtaſy, as it is emphatically called, and deſerves to be called; which was not only predicted by St. Paul, but by the prophet Daniel likewiſe. If the apoſtaſy be rightly charged upon the church of Rome, it follows of conſequence, that the man of ſin is the Pope; not meaning any Pope in particular, but the Pope in general, as the chief head and ſupporter of this apoſtaſy. He is properly the man of ſin, not only on account of the ſcandalous lives of many Popes, but by reaſon of their moſt ſcandalous doctrines and principles; diſpenſing with the moſt neceſſary duties, and granting, or rather ſelling, pardons and indulgences to the moſt abominable crimes. Or if by ſin be meant idolatry particularly, as in the Old Teſtament, it is evident how he hath perverted the worſhip of God to ſuperſtition and idolatry of the groſſeſt kind. He alſo, like the falſe Apoſtle Judas, is the ſon of perdition; whether actively, as being the cauſe of deſtruction to others, or paſſively, as being devoted to deſtruction himſelf. He oppoſeth;—he is the great adverſary to God and man; perſecuting and deſtroying by croiſadoes, inquiſitions, and maſſacres, thoſe Chriſtians who prefer the word of God to the authority of men. The heathen emperor of Rome may have ſlain his thouſands of innocent Chriſtians; but the Chriſtian biſhop of Rome has ſlain his ten thouſands. He exalteth himſelf above all that is called God, or is worſhipped; not only above inferior magiſtrates, but likewiſe above biſhops and primates; not only above biſhops and primates, but likewiſe above kings and emperors; depoſing ſome, obliging them to kiſs his toe, to hold his ſtirrup, treading even upon the neck of a King, and kicking off the imperial crown with his foot; nay, not only above kings and emperors, but likewiſe above Chriſt and God himſelf;—making even the word of God of none effect by his traditions; forbidding what God hath commanded; as marriage, the uſe of the Scriptures, &c.—and alſo commanding or allowing what God hath forbidden; as idolatry, perſecution, &c. So that he, as God, ſitteth in the temple of God, &c. He is therefore in profeſſion a Chriſtian, and a Chriſtian biſhop: His ſitting in the temple of God, plainly implies his having a ſeat, or cathedra, in the Chriſtian church: And he ſitteth there as God, eſpecially at his inauguration, when he ſitteth upon the high altar in St. Peter's church, and maketh the table of the Lord his footſtool, and in that poſition receiveth adoration. At all times he exerciſeth divine authority in the church,—ſhewing himſelf that he is God; affecting divine titles, and aſſerting that his decrees are of the ſame or greater authority than the word of God. So that the pope is evidently, according to the titles given him in the public decretals, "The God upon earth;" at leaſt, there is no one like him, who exalteth himſelf above every God; no one like him, who ſitteth as God in the temple of God, ſhewing himſelf that he is God. The foundations of popery were laid in the Apoſtle's days, but the ſuperſtructure was raiſed by degrees, and ſeveral ages paſſed before the building was completed, and the man of ſin revealed in full perfection. The tradition that generally prevailed was, that what hindered was the Roman empire: This tradition might have been derived even from the Apoſtle himſelf; and therefore the primitive Chriſtians, in the public offices of the church, prayed for its peace and welfare, as knowing that when the Roman empire ſhould be diſſolved and broken into pieces, the empire of the man of ſin would be raiſed upon its ruins. In the ſame proportion as the power of the empire decreaſed, the authority of the church increaſed, and the latter at the expence and ruin of the former; till at length, the Pope grew up above all, and the wicked, or lawleſs one, was fully manifeſted and revealed. His coming is after the energy of Satan, &c. and doth it require any particular proof, that the pretenſions of the Pope, and the corruptions of the church of Rome, are all ſupported and authorized by feigned viſions and miracles, by pious frauds, and impoſitions of every kind?—But how much ſoever the man of ſin may be exalted, and how long ſoever he may reign, yet at laſt, the Lord ſhall conſume him, &c. This is partly taken from Iſai. xi. 4. [And with the breath of his lips ſhall he ſlay the wicked one;] where the Jews put an emphaſis upon the words the wicked one, as appears from the Chaldee, which renders it, "He ſhall deſtroy the wicked Roman." If the two clauſes (as ſaid in the note on ver. 8.) relate to two different events, the meaning is, "That the Lord Jeſus ſhall gradually conſume him with the free preaching of the Goſpel, and ſhall utterly deſtroy him at his ſecond coming in the glory of the Father." The former began to take effect at the reformation, and the latter will be accompliſhed in God's appointed time. The man of ſin is now upon the decline, and he will be totally aboliſhed when Chriſt ſhall come in judgement. Juſtin Martyr, Tertullian, Origen, Lactantius, Cyril of Jeruſalem, Ambroſe, Hilary, Jerome, Auguſtine, and Chryſoſtom, give much the ſame interpretation that hath here been given of the whole paſſage; And it muſt be owned, that this is the genuine meaning of the Apoſtle; that this only is conſiſtent with the context; that every other interpretation is forced and unnatural; that this is liable to no material objection; that it coincides perfectly with 13 But we are bound to give thanks alway to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, becauſe God hath from the beginning choſen you to ſalvation, through ſanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth:

14 Whereunto he called you by our goſpel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

15 Therefore, brethren, ſtand faſt, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epiſtle.

16 Now our Lord Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, and God even our Father, which hath loved us, and hath given us everlaſting conſolation, and good hope through grace, 17 Comfort your hearts, and ſtabliſh you in every good word and work.

CHAP. III.

He craveth their prayers for himſelf, teſtifieth what confidence he hath in them, maketh requeſt to God in their behalf, giveth them divers precepts, eſpecially to ſhun idleneſs and ill company; and laſt of all, concludeth with prayer and ſalutation.

Finally, brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free courſe, and be glorified even as it is with you:

2 And that we may be delivered from unreaſonable and wicked men: for all men have not faith.

3 But the Lord is faithful, who ſhall ſtabliſh you, and keep you from evil.

4. And we have confidence in the Lord touching you, that ye both do and will do the things which we command you.

5 And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Chriſt.

6 Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that ye withdraw yourſelves from every brother that walketh diſorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us.

7 For yourſelves know how ye ought to follow us: for we behaved not ourſelves diſorderly among you,

8 Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travel night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you:

9 Not becauſe we have not power, but to make ourſelves an enſample unto you to follow us.

Daniel; that it is agreeable to the tradition of the primitive church, and that it hath exactly been fulfilled in all particulars;—which cannot be ſaid of any other interpretation whatever. Such a prophecy as this is an illuſtrious proof of divine revelation, and an excellent antidote to the poiſon of popery. See Newton, 373—424. and the notes on 1 Tim. iv. Inſtead of, in them that periſh, ver. 10. the MS reads, to them, &c.

Ver. 13. We are bound to give thanks, &c.] All that the Apoſtle had ſaid from ch. i. 4. to this place was gently introduced, as if it had been only a digreſſion; and having, as it were by the bye, inſinuated what he chiefly intended to ſay, he winds up his diſcourſe with the greateſt propriety; and as returning to ch. i. 4. thanks God again for the faith and ſtedfaſtneſs of the Theſſalonians, which would end in their ſalvation, though ſo many would be led away and periſh in the general apoſtaſy. Hereby he ſoftened the many terrible things which he had ſaid of the man of ſin, &c. and intimated in the moſt admirable and opportune manner, that all would not prove apoſtates; and peculiarly his Theſſalonian converts would eſcape ſuch deluſions, and the condemnation that would follow. From the beginning, is generally interpreted of the beginning of the Chriſtian diſpenſation. See Benſon and Heylin.

Ver. 15. The traditions] This probably refers to the prophecy concerning the man of ſin in the preceding verſes, and to the explication which the Apoſtle had given of ſome particulars reſpecting it by word of mouth. See Benſon's Diſſert. 2. concerning the man of ſin.

Chap. III. Ver. 1.] The Apoſtle now proceeds to the cloſe of his Epiſtle; and as he had ſo often and ſo ardently prayed for them, he here begs their prayers for him and his fellow-labourers in the Goſpel; and as having upon his mind a continual ſenſe of their diſtreſſes, he again intimates, that under all their diſcouragements they ought to remember, that though ſo many of mankind would prove faithleſs, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt would prove faithful: and they ought to imitate, obey, and depend upon him, as well as patiently to wait for his ſecond coming. ver. 1—5. Inſtead of finally, Dr. Waterland reads furthermore; and inſtead of may have free courſe, ſome render the word τρέχῃ, may run: and they think that this and the next words allude to the applauſe given to thoſe who made a ſpeedy progreſs in the races, which conſtituted ſo important a part of the Grecian games.

Ver. 2. Unreaſonable] 'Ατόποι, abſurd, contumacious perſons, who are not to be fixed by any principles, and whom no topics can work upon. Some ſuppoſe that the unbelieving Jews are here meant. By faith, in this verſe, ſome underſtand a principle of honeſty, which may encourage a confidence to be repoſed; but it ſeems rather to mean that upright and candid diſpoſition, which would engage men to receive the teſtimony of the Apoſtles. See Wilkins's Natural Religion, p. 34. and Howe "of the Spirit." vol. ii. p. 192.

Ver. 5. From evil] 'Απὸ τȣ̃ πονηρȣ̃; from the evil one. MS. The Hebrews commonly ſpeak of the devil, as the ſource and author of all evil; and of God, as the author of all good: and when they would deſcribe any great evil in a moſt emphatical manner, they mention the apoſtate himſelf. See on 1 Theſſ. ii. 18. Matth. vi. 13. John xvii. 15. 1 John v. 18, 19. and Benſon.

Ver. 4. And we have confidence, &c.] "We have that opinion of you, as Chriſtians, that you will perſevere in duty, and that the things which we have recommended, you both practiſe already, and will continue to practiſe." See ch. ii. 15. 2 Cor. vii. 16. and Benſon.

Ver. 5. Into the patient waiting for Chriſt] 'Υπομονὴν τȣ̃ Χριςȣ̃, may either ſignify Chriſtian patience, or that patience with which Chriſt himſelf ſuffered the many injuries and afflictions through which he paſſed. Doddridge.

Ver. 6.] St. Paul, 1 Theſſ. iv. 11, 12. had ordered the idle perſons among them to work and maintain themſelves in a creditable manner. As his directions had not been complied with, but inſtead of reforming, they were rather grown worſe, he here repeats what he had there ſaid; rebuking with more ſeverity ſuch idle and officious perſons as were a ſcandal to Chriſtianity, and troubleſome in civil ſociety. Benſon.

Ver. 7. For we behaved not ourſelves diſorderly, &c.] Οὐκ ἠτακτήσαμεν, we did not go out of our rank; an alluſion to ſoldiers ſtanding or marching in their proper ranks, out of which it is a great irregularity to depart, in the leaſt degree. The expreſſion night and day, in the next verſe, may poſſibly mean only continually: however, it ſeems to intimate that the Apoſtle was ſometimes obliged to ſit up part of the night at his buſineſs as a tent-maker, that he might have the day at leiſure, to preach to thoſe who came to him for religious inſtruction. Benſon and Doddridge.

Ver. 9. Not becauſe we have not power] St. Paul would not here leave room for any perſon to inſinuate, as we find his enemies did at Corinth, 1 Cor. ix. 1, &c. that he knew himſelf not to be an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, and therefore he abſtained from taking or demanding any thing from their church, merely for want of ſuch an apoſtolic power; but, ſo heartily concerned was he to ſpread Chriſtianity, and ſo cautious and prudent in order to do it in the moſt effectual manner, that he refuſed a maintenance, in the rich city of Corinth, 10 For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither ſhould he eat.

11 For we hear that there are ſome which walk among you diſorderly, working not at all, but are buſy-bodies.

12 Now them that are ſuch we command, and exhort by our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that with quietneſs they work, and eat their own bread.

13 But ye, brethren, be not weary in well-doing.

14 And if any man obey not our word by this epiſtle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be aſhamed:

15 Yet count him not as an enemy, but admoniſh him as a brother.

16 Now the Lord of peace himſelf give you peace always, by all means. The Lord be with you all.

rinth, and thereby prevented the falſe apoſtle's demanding any thing under the pretence of his example; and by maintaining himſelf at Theſſalonica, he prevented the idle Chriſtian brethren there from pleading the example of their great Apoſtle, in defence of their idleneſs. Benſon.

Ver. 10. That if any would not work, &c.] This ſentence occurs in many of the Jewiſh writings, and ſeems to have been proverbial: and both our Lord and his Apoſtles frequently adopted thoſe proverbs or ſayings which were in general uſe. See Grotius and Wetſtein.

Ver. 11. Working not at all, but are buſy bodies] The original is, Not working, but going about as buſy bodies: not only idle, but officious; vices, which frequently accompany each other.

Ver. 12. And eat their own bread] That which they have earned themſelves. Therefore Dr. Heylin renders it, and earn their bread by labour.

Ver. 13. Be not weary in well-doing] Faint not, nor be diſcouraged while you are engaged in a courſe of well-doing: Though ſome may abuſe your liberality, be not deterred thereby from works of charity. See Gal. vi. 9. and Diodati.

Ver. 14. And if any man obey not, &c.] Whether the Apoſtles had any particular orders from the Lord in ſuch a caſe as this, or knew from the light of nature and the general ſcheme of Chriſtianity, that idleneſs, like every other vice, deſerved reproof, is not very material: but however that be, they were only perſons who gave commandments or orders immediately from the Lord. Others, even Evangeliſts and prophets, received commandments from the Apoſtles, and delivered them to the world. 2 Tim. ii. 2. iii. 14. Some would render this verſe, If any man obey not our word, ſignify or take notice of him by your Epiſtle to me,—that he may be reclaimed by ſhame. See Eraſmus, Caſtalio, Grotius, Bengelius, &c.

Ver. 16. By all means] Some MSS read ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ, in every place. As it follows διὰ παντὸς, it ſeems to be the true reading, and to anſwer to the common phraſe ſemper & ubique; "always, and every where." Dr. Heylin renders the clauſe, Grant you continual peace in all reſpects.

Ver. 17. Which is the token in every Epiſtle] It has been concluded from this and ſome other paſſages, that St. Paul not being very familiarly uſed to Greek characters, and perhaps to ſave time, (every moment of which he knew how to eſtimate,) uſed to dictate to ſome ready ſcribe,—poſſibly ſometimes while his hands were employed in the labours of his occupation; and this may account for ſome ſmall inaccuracies of ſtile, at which little minds have been offended, and which ſome, who ſeem to carry their ſcrupuloſity to an exceſs, have been over ſolicitous to vindicate; but which they who read with any thing like the temper of the writer, will eaſily know how to excuſe. What was hinted before in this Epiſtle, ch. ii. 2. may be an intimation,—as we obſerved,—that ſome fictitious letters were early written in his name, by which St. Paul might be induced to add this token, with his own hand. See Doddridge, and the Reflections on the Epiſtle to Philemon.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. II. AND III.

With humble reverence let us behold the depths of the divine counſels and judgements: God hath been pleaſed to ſuffer the craft of Satan to diſplay itſelf, in reducing from his allegiance a great part of the Chriſtian world; Yet has he taken the wiſe in his own craftineſs, ſo far, as to make that very apoſtaſy from Chriſtianity, an additional proof of its divine original. ch. ii. 3. Who, that had only examined the genius of that holy religion, could have imagined that ſuch a myſtery of iniquity ſhould have ariſen in it, and that man of ſin have been revealed? ver. 7. Surely, when the particulars of the deſcription come to be compared with the accompliſhment, it may ſeem owing to ſome judicial infatuation, that men of deep policy and great penetration, with this very paſſage of Scripture in their hands, ſhould have ſuffered the marks of antichriſt to be ſo very apparent, even, in many inſtances, beyond what might have ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary for eſtabliſhing that ſecular kingdom which they ſought; Particularly that the pope, on high days, ſhould ſet himſelf on a high throne, in the temple of God, to be there ſolemnly adored, and ſhould have permitted his paraſites ſo expreſſly to boaſt that he is God, and to give him, in ſome of their licenſed and authorized works, divine titles! ver. 4.

The ſcandalous and extravagant pretences which the followers of the papacy have made to miracles,—exceeding in number, and ſome of them in marvellous circumſtances, thoſe of Chriſt and his Apoſtles,—plainly diſplay the energy of Satan, that father of frauds, whether pious or impious. ver. 9. And the moſt incredible lies, which they have by ſolemn and irrevocable acts made eſſential to their faith, ſhew the ſtrength of deluſion, beyond what could have been imagined, had not fact led us into the theory. ver. 11. How dreadful is it to think of ſome of thoſe expreſſions which the Spirit itſelf uſes, when ſpeaking of theſe artificers of deceit!—That they ſhould be abandoned by God to believe a lie; that they may all be damned, who have pleaſure in unrighteouſneſs;—that they might bring upon themſelves eternal aggravated damnation! ver. 12.

Who would not tremble, who would not grieve, for ſo many of our fellow-creatures, yea of thoſe, who, degenerate as their form of Chriſtianity is, we muſt yet call our fellow-chriſtians, who are thus diſhonoured, enſlaved, endangered?—The Lord grant that they may not be utterly undone!—Let them deſpiſe us; let them, by moſt ſolemn execrations, annually repeated, devote us to deſtruction, and prepare againſt us all the inſtruments of it in their power; yet ſtill we will pray for them. God grant that they may recover themſelves out of the ſnare of the devil, who are led captive by him at his pleaſure! 2 Tim. ii. 26. Let us recommend to divine compaſſion the ſouls drawn after artful and wicked leaders, in the ſimplicity of their hearts; and take comfort in this thought,—That the time is coming, when the Lord ſhall deſtroy this ſon of perdition with the breath of his mouth, and the brightneſs of his coming. ver. 8. May the remnant of God's people among them take the alarm, and come out from them in time, and be ſeparate, that they may not be partakers with them in their plagues, Rev. xviii. 4.

How wiſely and happily does the Apoſtle unite the views of the grace of God, and the duties of men, while he repreſents our choice of ſalvation in a light ſo worthy of God,—ſince this ſalvation is ſtill to be obtained through ſanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth. ver. 13. Our ſpirits muſt be ſanctified by the operation of the divine Spirit: The truth muſt be not only ſpeculatively, but powerfully, and practically believed, or all our hopes will be vain.—But ſurely, were it poſſible that ſalvation could any other way be obtained, it would be leſs deſirable, or rather that which did not imply a ſanctified ſpirit, and an heart open to receive and obey the truth, would not deſerve the name of ſalvation.

Bleſſed be God, who in this view hath called us to obtain ſalvation and glory by Jeſus Chriſt, even God our Father, who hath loved us. From him do theſe everlaſting conſolations flow: It is by his bleſſed and gracious operation, we are ſtrengthened and eſtabliſhed in every good word and work. ver. 14—ch. iii. 3. His fidelity ſtands engaged to do it, if we humbly commit ourſelves to him, and wait upon him. The prayers of the Apoſtles, dictated no doubt from above, concur with the promiſes to encourage our hopes, that he will direct our hearts into the love of God, and the patience of Chriſt. ver. 5. On the exerciſe of that love, and that patience, doth the happineſs of life chiefly depend. Too ready are our weak hearts to wander from it, and to faint under the difficulties which lie in our way. Let us then call on him to preſerve and maintain the graces he hath implanted, that they may be exerted with growing vigour and conſtancy even unto the end.

Unreaſonable and wicked men will naturally oppoſe the progreſs of the Goſpel, which has ſo powerful a tendency to promote holineſs and comfort; and as there are thoſe who have not faith, they will be ready to labour its deſtruction: But when the prayers of Chriſtians are frequently engaged, that the word of God may run and be glorified, there is great reaſon to hope, that much of their perverſe oppoſition may be over-ruled to the moſt contrary purpoſes; ſo that the wrath of man ſhall praiſe him, and the remainder of that wrath be reſtrained. Pſ. lxxvi. 10.

May the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, given in a richer abundance to his churches, animate and engage them to maintain that diſcipline, which is ſo neceſſary to his honour, and to their own comfort and edification. ver. 18. We can hardly ſay which is moſt to be lamented, 18 The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you all. Amen.

mented,—the neglect of the thing, or the abuſe of the name. It never could be the deſign of the wiſe legiſlator of the church, that ſecular terrors ſhould be preſſed into his ſervice; that fines, impriſonments, and civil incapacities ſhould be the reſult of cenſures paſſed in his peaceful and benevolent name. Irregularities in thoſe who call themſelves his followers, are indeed to be obſerved and diſcountenanced: offenders are to be admoniſhed, and if lighter admonitions ſucceed not, they are to be avoided; (ver. 6.) but ſtill in a view of recovering them by an ingenuous ſhame, (if any remainder of it be left in their hearts) from thoſe practices, which, if connived at, would ſoon become the ſhame of the ſociety. ver. 14. Thus far therefore let us reſolutely carry our cenſures, and declining that familiar converſe with thoſe who are ſo ſeparated, which might lead them to think we privately diſregarded theſe cenſures, which had in public ſo awful a form; yet at the ſame time, let us not treat them as enemies, or as thoſe of whoſe recovery we have no hope; but remember the tenderneſs of brotherly love, amidſt all the ſevereſt breaches of brotherly reproof; and the common tie of humanity to thoſe, whom we are commanded to regard only as heathens, or as publicans. ver. 15.

May every profeſſed diſciple of Jeſus be cautious to avoid and diſcourage that ſloth and petulance, which would make men buſy in other people's matters, while they are quite negligent of their own. Let us remember the example of the Apoſtle, and be ſolicitous to eat our own bread. (ver. 8—12.) So ſhall we be moſt likely to enjoy inward peace and ſatisfaction of mind, and find that reliſh in the poſſeſſion of a little, which the largeſt ſupplies would not give to them, who are conſcious to themſelves of ſloth or diſhoneſty.

Some worthleſs people there have always been, in every ſtation of life, and under all religious profeſſion;—ſome idle drones, ready to abuſe the bounty of others, better than themſelves; yet let not us from hence ſeek a mean excuſe, for refuſing to ſuch as really ſtand in need, acts of liberality and charity: Let us not be weary in well-doing; (ver. 13.) The time of reſt and reward will come; while we are waiting for it, the preſence of the Lord of peace may be expected, if we take care to adorn his religion by the uſefulneſs as well as the meekneſs of our behaviour, in this world of miſery and provocation, through which he hath appointed us to paſs, and through which he hath himſelf condeſcended to paſs before us, to make our way ſafe, and our exit happy!

TO

CHAP. I.

Timothy is put in mind of the charge which was given unto him by Paul, at his going to Macedonia. Of the right uſe and end of the law. Of Saint Paul's calling to be an apoſtle: and of Hymeneus and Alexander.

PAUL, an apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, by the commandment of God our Saviour, and Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which is our hope:

2 Unto Timothy, my own ſon in the faith: Grace, mercy, and peace from God our Father, and Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

3 As I beſought thee to abide ſtill at Epheſus, when I went into Macedonia, that thou mighteſt charge ſome that they teach no other doctrine,

4 Neither give heed to fables, and endleſs genealogies, which miniſter queſtions, rather than godly edifying which is in faith: ſo do.

5 Now the end of the commandment is charity, out of a pure heart, and of a good conſcience, and of faith unfeigned:

I. TIMOTHY.] We have an account of Timothy in the Acts xvi. 1, 3. and in other parts of the New Teſtament; from which he appears to have been a youth of the moſt excellent qualities, and the almoſt conſtant companion of St. Paul. This firſt Epiſtle to him is by ſome dated A. D. 65. but by others, on better grounds, about A. D. 56, or 58. at the time of St. Paul's journey to Macedonia, Acts xx. 1. The place where it was written is not certainly agreed on, though it is likely St. Paul was either in Macedonia, or near it. Being obliged to retire from Epheſus earlier than he intended, on account of the inſurrection raiſed by Demetrius, he left Timothy behind him, to reſtore perfect order in the church, to fill the eccleſiaſtical offices, and to withſtand falſe teachers. As ſome of the Epheſians would not obey him, and others attempted to force themſelves upon him as biſhops and miniſters, St. Paul wrote this Epiſtle, which he might lay before them as his commiſſion; ſo that it is as much to the Epheſians as to Timothy. See ver. 3, 18. ch. iv. 6, 12, 13. v. 23. Michaelis thinks, that this Epiſtle, and thoſe to the Epheſians and Coloſſians were levelled againſt certain errors prevalent among them, which the Eſſenes, a Jewiſh ſect, had borrowed from eaſtern philoſophers. They held, 1. That God was ſurrounded by demons or angels, who were mediators with God, and therefore to be worſhipped. 2. That the ſoul is defiled by the body; that all bodily enjoyments hurt the ſoul, which they believed to be immortal; though they ſeem to have denied the reſurrection of the body, as it would only render the ſoul ſinful, by being reunited to it. 3. That there was a great myſtery in numbers, particularly in the number ſeven; they therefore attributed a natural holineſs to the ſeventh or ſabbath-day, which they obſerved more ſtrictly than other Jews. They ſpent their time chiefly in contemplation; abſtained from marriage, and every gratification of the ſenſes; uſed waſhings, and thought it ſinful to touch certain things; regarded wine as poiſon, &c. In oppoſition to theſe, St. Paul in the three Epiſtles above-mentioned, ſhews the ſuperiority of Chriſt to the angels, and warns Chriſtians againſt worſhipping them; cenſures the obſervation of legal ſabbaths; rebukes thoſe who forbad marriage, and who delivered commandments of men concerning meats, and prohibited them. He permits Timothy to drink wine, blames thoſe who neglect the proper nouriſhment of their bodies, and enjoins bodily exerciſe. He cautions againſt a philoſophy which teaches all theſe things, and againſt perſons who aſſume an extraordinary appearance of wiſdom and virtue; and he delivers Hymeneus over to Satan, becauſe he pretended that there was no reſurrection of the dead. Michaelis further thinks, that the errors of the Eſſenes had found their way into theſe churches through Apollos, who was of Alexandria, in the neighbourhood of which the Eſſenes prevailed; as alſo through the twelve Chriſtians mentioned Acts xix. who appear but imperfectly acquainted with the Chriſtian doctrine. He conjectures, that the vagabond Jews, exorciſts, were of this ſect. See Michaelis, Benſon, Lardner, and Whitby.

Ver. 1. Commandment of—Chriſt, which is our hope] Appointment of—Chriſt, our hope. Wat.

Ver. 2. My own ſon, &c.] It is not certain from the hiſtory that Timothy was converted by St. Paul: See Acts xvi. 1, 2. It ſeems therefore that he calls him his ſon, to expreſs the parental affection he had for him, and the complacency he found in that aſſiſtance which he had received from him in the work of the miniſtry, and in the filial reverence and affection which this excellent young miniſter expreſſed to him. Nor can we doubt but Timothy had received much confirmation in Chriſtianity from the Apoſtle. See Doddridge and Benſon. Inſtead of God our Father, Dr. Waterland reads God the Father.

Ver. 3. As I beſought thee to abide] As I beſought thee, abide, &c. See Caſtalio and Knatchbul.

Ver. 4. Neither give heed to fables, &c.] Nothing can be conceived more monſtrous and abſurd than the fables with which the Jewiſh Rabbis are filled. It is probable this wild romantic humour might in ſome meaſure prevail as early as the Apoſtle's days, and may be referred to here. The Jewiſh Chriſtians valued themſelves very much upon their deſcent from Abraham and the prophets, though poſſibly ſome of them could hardly make out the whole genealogy; but if they could have done it ever ſo exactly, Chriſtians were to regard no man according to the fleſh, nor to reject or deſpiſe the Gentile Chriſtians, for want of ſuch a genealogy or extraction. Holineſs and charity were chiefly to be looked after in a Chriſtian: he who had theſe, had all that was truly valuable; and he who wanted them, was of no account in the ſight of God. Inſtead of edifying which is in faith, Dr. Waterland reads, the diſpenſation of God, which is in faith: and puts the whole from ver. 5, to 18. in a parentheſis.

Ver. 5. Now the end of the commandment, &c.] "The ſum and great end of the Chriſtian doctrine, or of the Goſpel, is love, &c." See 1 Theſſ. v. 10. Philem. 20.

Ver. 7. Deſiring to be teachers of the law] The Goſpel alone was too ſimple a thing for the judaizing Chriſtians; and their partiality for derſtanding neither what they ſay, nor whereof they affirm.

8 But we know that the law is good, if a man uſe it lawfully;

9 Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawleſs and diſobedient, for the ungodly and for ſinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manſlayers,

10 For whoremongers, for them that defile themſelves with mankind, for menſtealers, for liars, for perjured perſons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to ſound doctrine;

11 According to the glorious goſpel of the bleſſed God, which was committed to my truſt.

12 And I thank Chriſt Jeſus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the miniſtry;

13 Who was before a blaſphemer, and a perſecutor, and injurious. But I obtained mercy, becauſe I did it ignorantly in unbelief:

14 And the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant, with faith and love which is in Chriſt Jeſus.

15 This is a faithful ſaying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Chriſt Jeſus came into the world to ſave ſinners; of whom I am chief.

16 Howbeit, for this cauſe I obtained mercy, that in me firſt Jeſus Chriſt might ſhew forth all long-ſuffering, for a pattern to them which ſhould hereafter believe on him to life everlaſting.

17 Now unto the King eternal, immortal, inviſible, the only wiſe God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

18 This charge I commit unto thee, ſon Timothy, according to the prophecies which went before on thee, that thou by them mighteſt war a good warfare;

19 Holding faith, and a good conſcience; which ſome having put away, concerning faith have made ſhipwreck:

20 Of whom is Hymeneus and Alexander; whom I have delivered unto Satan, that they may learn not to blaſpheme.

the law of Moſes was ſo very great, that they did not only continue to obſerve it all, even the ceremonial part themſelves, (though they had embraced the profeſſion of Chriſtianity,) but they would have taught it to the Gentile converts, and impoſed it upon them; though they underſtood not the grand deſign of the law, with reſpect to the Jews, much leſs the freedom of the Gentile converts from any ſubjection to it. The law was given becauſe of tranſgreſſions, or to reſtrain the Jews from idolatry and other vices, and to prepare them for the reception of the Meſſiah and his Goſpel; when therefore the Goſpel was come, there was no longer any occaſion for that ſevere tutor. Νομοδιδάσκαλος means a doctor of the law, a rabbi, or father. See Luke v. 17. Acts v. 34. Benſon and Stockius.

Ver. 8. If a man uſe it lawfully] This plainly intimates, that there were ſome who abuſed the law, borrowing a pretence from it to condemn ſome of the beſt of men, and to ſubvert the Goſpel: and whereas ſome had repreſented St. Paul as an enemy to the law, he here denies and diſproves the charge. The deſign of the Moſaic law was to direct the conduct of thoſe to whom it was given, and to humble them under a ſenſe of their ſin; but it could not be intended to ſave them by a perfect conformity to it, which was το ἀδύνατον, what the law could not do. Rom. viii. 3. Doddridge, and Benſon.

Ver. 9. Knowing this, &c.] The Apoſtle's thought ſeems to be this, "That a law, in the general,—(for there is no article, as in ver. 8. to determine or confine it to the Jewiſh law)—is chiefly intended to reſtrain men from actions injurious to the public: What it ſays, therefore, chiefly relates to crimes, and their puniſhments; but the genius of Chriſtianity is ſo ſublime, and the character of Chriſtians in the general [at that time] ſo good, that there is no need of inſiſting on legal ſentences denounced againſt ſuch enormities, in order to keep them in the courſe of their duty." The Apoſtle ſeems here to have had the ſame thought that is expreſſed in the common maxim, Ex malis moribus naſcuntur bonæ leges. See Doddridge, Grotius, and Benſon.

Ver. 10. And if there be any other thing, &c.] That was ſound doctrine, in St. Paul's account, which condemned wicked practices, and promoted holineſs; that, therefore, muſt be unſound doctrine which encourages wicked practices: Here then is a proper teſt or ſtandard, given by an Apoſtle, by which to judge of the ſoundneſs or unſoundneſs of any doctrine. Benſon. Dr. Waterland reads, To the ſound doctrine, (ver. 11.) which is according, &c.

Ver. 12. Who hath enabled me] "Who hath qualified me with ſo many, and ſuch extraordinary ſpiritual gifts and miraculous powers, to enable me for ſo great and uſeful an undertaking." See Benſon, and Acts i. 8. Doddridge renders it, "Who hath ſtrengthened me for the arduous duties of ſuch a calling."

Ver. 13. Who was before a blaſphemer] St. Paul had the greater reaſon to acknowledge this gift, as he had not only ſpoken evil of Chriſt himſelf, but encouraged, and even compelled others to do ſo: If St. Paul had an opportunity of knowing more than ſome others, (ſee Luke xxiii. 34.) yet perhaps he might not have been preſent on the ſpot when any of Chriſt's miracles were performed, as Chriſt ſpent but little time at Jeruſalem, and St Paul was then a ſcholar at Gamaliel's feet. The popular cry was ſo ſtrongly againſt Chriſt, and the Phariſees and rulers treated him with ſo much contempt, were ſo full of malignity againſt him, and ſo ready to advance the moſt ſlanderous reports in prejudice of his character, that it is the leſs to be wondered at that this raſh, zealous youth, was borne down by the torrent. Yet we ſee how far he was from thinking all this, and whatever could be added to it, a ſufficient excuſe: Inſtead of inſinuating with ſome, that the miracle wrought for his converſion to Chriſtianity was a reward for his extraordinary ſincerity and virtue, while a Jewiſh zealot, he ſpeaks of himſelf as one of the greateſt ſinners upon earth; and thereby ſhews (by the way) how much guilt a man may contract, without acting directly contrary to the convictions of his mind, if he has neglected an impartial care in forming his principles of action. However, let us in juſtice obſerve, that a man of ſincerity, though at preſent in ſome very great error, is far more likely to be reclaimed, and to find mercy, than ſuch as are inſincere and malicious oppoſers of truth and goodneſs. See Doddridge, Benſon, and Lord Lyttelton's "Obſervations on St. Paul's converſion."

Ver. 14. With faith and love] When he was a bigotted Jew, he had no love to the Chriſtians, or to the Gentiles; but love ſoon followed faith in Chriſt Jeſus: The benevolent ſpirit of Chriſtianity ſweetened his temper, and altered his conduct.

Ver. 15. Of whom I am chief] Firſt. Wat. As diſtance diminiſhes objects to the ſight, and nearneſs magnifies them, ſo to holy men their own faults appear greater than thoſe of others; and truth is not injured by expreſſions which humility ſuggeſts, becauſe they ſpeak their real ſentiments. See Heylin, and Bp. Stillingfleet's Sermons, p. 452.

Ver. 17. Unto the King eternal, &c.] King of the world, or, of angels. Wat. It has been thought that in giving ſuch titles to the true God here, St. Paul might poſſibly glance at the abſurdity of idolatrous Epheſus, in worſhipping ſuch a viſible corruptible image, as that of Diana. What ſeems to confirm this, is, that σοφῷ, wiſe, is wanting in ſome of the beſt MSS and verſions. So that then the Apoſtle plainly intimated, that God is God alone, and there is none beſides him. See Benſon, Mill, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 18. According to the prophecies, &c.] "That, according to the predictions made concerning you, you may, as they foretold, exert yourſelf with ſucceſs in this conflict." Heylin. See ch. iv. 14.

Ver. 19. Holding faith and a good conſcience] "Retaining the great principles of the Chriſtian faith, and with it the exerciſe of a good conſcience." See the Reflections.

Ver. 20. Of whom is Hymeneus and Alexander] Probably this Alexander

CHAP. II.

That it is meet to pray and give thanks for all men, and the reaſon why. How women ſhould be attired: they are not permitted to teach:

ander is the perſon mentioned Acts xix. 33. who might become worſe and worſe after St. Paul's departure from Epheſus, emboldened thereto by his abſence: So that the Apoſtle might now be determined to deliver him up to Satan; that is,—according to the extraordinary apoſtolic power with which God had inveſted him for ſuch purpoſes,—to inflict upon him certain pains and evils which might poſſibly reclaim him. See 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. iv. 14. It has been very well obſerved, that when the Apoſtles mention the names of apoſtates, and cenſure them with ſuch freedom and ſeverity, it affords a plain argument, that they knew themſelves to be intirely out of their power; for if they had been conſcious of any thing to be feared from their diſcovery, they would doubtleſs have endeavoured to manage them more artfully, that they might not provoke them to the uttermoſt. See Reynolds's "Letter to a Deiſt," p. 256. Doddridge, Wall, and Benſon.

REFLECTIONS, ON FAITH, AND A GOOD CONSCIENCE. Ver. 19.

I. The firſt point towards eſtabliſhing Chriſtianity in the heart, is ſeriouſly to conſider the ſtrong evidences of the Chriſtian FAITH; evidences ſo ſtrong, that he would be deemed a madman who was not determined by much leſs in his ſecular affairs. If any one ſhould go about to diſprove the conqueſts of Alexander, he would be thought, doubtleſs, not in his own mind; and yet there are much ſtronger proofs for the reality of the miracles recorded in Scripture, and particularly in the New Teſtament, than there are for the victories of Alexander, or even for the being of ſuch a man.

For one who has been made a proſelyte to Deiſm by reading, thinking, and ſtudy, there are multitudes who become ſo, by converſation with thoſe, who have no way of keeping themſelves in countenance, but by diſcountenancing religion.

And what wonder is it, that perſons ſhould be laughed out of religion, who never reaſoned themſelves into it?—A man in his younger years muſt be well diſpoſed, and of a ſerious thinking turn, to converſe at large, and yet continue a Chriſtian: but if he be of a ſerious turn, and impartially weigh the numerous proofs for it, he cannot but continue a Chriſtian. For "Chriſtianity has too many and ſtrong appearances of truth, for any who deliberately and unbiaſſedly attend to them, to believe it an impoſture: It has been ſifted as wheat: and the conſequence is, that ſome few trifling conſiderations, which had been formerly alledged in favour of it, have been ſet aſide, like the chaff, which the wind ſcattereth away from the face of the earth: But its ſolid and ſubſtantial arguments, like the good ſeed, fall not to the ground, but remain firm, without any debaſing mixture."

To reject Chriſtianity, becauſe of the difficulties with which its doctrines are attended, is to reject it as falſe, for that which ſeems to be an argument of its truth. Chriſtianity,—ſuppoſing its truth,—is a revelation from God: a revelation from God muſt contain ſomething of the nature, will, and counſels of God, as far as they relate to us: Now the will, counſels, and nature of an infinite Being muſt be in a great meaſure unſearchable and incomprehenſible by beings of ſuch a ſcanty pittance of underſtanding as we have;—that is, they muſt be incumbered with inſuperable difficulties. To object difficulties therefore againſt Chriſtianity, is to make that an argument againſt its truth, which Chriſtianity, ſuppoſing it true, muſt in the nature of things be attended with. The united force of unbelievers has never been able to invalidate the ſeveral arguments that have been brought to prove the truth of revelation: and while theſe prove it to be true, difficulties cannot alter the nature of things. They cannot make that to be falſe, for the truth of which we have forcible proofs.

Abſolute certainty indeed is in heaven, and we are upon earth; but there is ſuch a degree of moral certainty, as is ſufficient to overbalance all doubts. We know every objection againſt Chriſtianity as well as the objectors themſelves, and there is not the leaſt ſhadow of a demonſtration againſt it; but the reaſons for it are ſo ſtrong, that though they do not amount to a ſtrict demonſtration, they make near approaches to it.

It is certain, the firmneſs of our aſſent does not depend ſo much on outward evidences, be they never ſo forcible, as on the inward frame and bent of the mind. In matters of belief, where there is a moral certainty, any wrong affection may ſo far blind even a thinking man, that he ſhall not have a through and determined conviction of the truth; But he cannot ſhut out or ſuppreſs the evidences for it ſo intirely, as not to have a general diſtruſt, an implicit ſuſpicion, that he is in the wrong: which general diſtruſt is the cauſe that he is ſo unwilling to look into a book, which is written with great ſtrength of reaſon on the other ſide, leſt he ſhould let in the enemy-truth to diſturb his repoſe.

Again, ſome perſons, who have travelled early into countries where Popery is eſtabliſhed, have had ſenſe enough, in their younger years, to ſee through the groſs impoſitions which are there practiſed upon the vulgar; but not being able to ſeparate religion itſelf from the undue mixtures blended with it, they have unhappily contracted an averſion for all religion in general: They have aſſociated with the idea of religion all thoſe numerous tricks and fopperies which have paſſed there under its ſacred cover. And thus the offenſive impreſſions which have been given us of religion (as of learning, or any thing elſe) in our tender years, before our minds come to a ſteadineſs and conſiſtency,—like thoſe marks made on the body of an animal in its mother's womb,—are ſeldom or never eraſed; but we carry them with us to the grave.

To confirm ſuch impreſſions, a man may have bad books induſtriouſly thrown in his way, and he may have an imagination apt to ſtartle at difficulties new to him; but if he has a turn for ſolid thinking and reaſoning, let ſuch a man bring his mind cloſe to the difficulty, and take a near view of it on every ſide,—and he will find that what ſtartled it at a diſtance, was only ſome idle trifle, which fancy had dreſſed up in a formidable ſhape. Infidelity, in theſe latter days, can only go round and round in an eternal circle, without advancing one ſtep further;—of which numerous inſtances might be given, both in the paſt and preſent times. It produces no new forces; it only brings thoſe again into the field, which have been ſo often baffled, maimed and diſabled, that in pity they ought to be diſmiſſed and diſcharged from further ſervice.

But, ſuppoſing a man's abilities ſo very ſlender, that he cannot perceive the truth of an hiſtorical fact well atteſted; yet one thing he may be ſure of,—that it is much better for the good of the whole, that mankind ſhould abide by ſuch a written Rule of faith and practice as the Chriſtian, than that every one, in low as well as high life, ſhould be left to collect a religion for themſelves, juſt as their ignorance, paſſions, and prejudices may miſlead them: this ſcheme, (which is that of infidelity,) would evidently be deſtructive of the general happineſs of mankind,—conſequently, diſagreeable to his will who wiſhes the happineſs of the world; and therefore, contrary to truth.

II. Let us now, from a right Faith, proceed to what is, or ought to be, the conſequence of it; a good LIFE;—which the Apoſtle includes under the large idea of a good conſcience.

A good life is not one ſolitary virtue, however glaring; it is the combination of all the moral and ſpiritual graces: Juſt as light and whiteneſs is not one ſingle colour and ray; it is the compoſition of all the colours and rays blended together.

1. Our firſt leading duty is piety to God;—which takes in all religious duties, whether moral or poſitive;—knowing this, (enough for us to know) that an all-wiſe Being can enjoin no duty, but for wiſe ends; and an all-good Being can command no performance, but for our good.

Yet, let not our piety break out in ſudden, ſhort, interrupted flaſhes; let it rather ſhine on, in one continued ſteady day. Have not juſt religion enough to make you uneaſy; but enough to give you ſolid ſatisfaction, and a well-grounded aſſurance:—The genuine fruits of ſincere Chriſtianity are love, joy, peace. Give God all you can;—give him your heart;—for that is all: and then, inſtead of contenting yourſelf with thinking how holy and how charitable you would be, if you had ſuch a fortune, or were in ſuch a ſtation; you will never be eaſy, till you are as holy and charitable as it is poſſible for you to be, in whatever ſtation you are, or whatever fortune you poſſeſs. Thus let your piety to God be joined with what ought to be inſeparable from it,

2. Charity to man. By charity I do not mean only almsgiving;—that is only one branch of it,—one outward expreſſion of this duty; but I mean, "the moſt liberal ſentiments, and the moſt enlarged affections towards all mankind." A charitable man will endeavour to ſee every thing through the mirror of good nature, which mends and beautifies all objects, without altering any:—Far from ſurmiſing evil where there is none, he will rather think no evil, where there really is; (1 Cor. xiii. 5.) judging it better to err through a good-natured credulity, than through an undiſtinguiſhing ſuſpicion; Becauſe, a good-natured credulity will only expoſe him to ſome temporal inconveniencies; but an undiſtinguiſhing ſuſpicion will beget in him a ſettled uneaſineſs, jealouſy, hatred, and the whole train of black paſſions; which will render his ſoul as dark as that hell, into which they will at laſt irrevocably ſink him. In ſhort, true Charity is to deteſt nothing but vice, and to deſpiſe nothing but contracted illiberal notions, which would confine God's favour, and moſt certainly limit our affections within a narrow circle.

From charitable and benevolent thoughts, the tranſition is unavoidable to charitable actions: For, wherever there is a ſolid fund of goodneſs in the heart, it will, under every diſadvantage of circumſtances, exert itſelf in acts of ſubſtantial kindneſs. The man who has a hearty, determinate will to be charitable, will ſeldom put men off with the mere will for the deed: For a ſincere deſire to do good, implies ſome uneaſineſs till the thing be done; and uneaſineſs ſets the mind at work, and puts it upon the ſtretch to find out a thouſand ways and means of obliging, which will ever eſcape the unconcerned, the indifferent, and the unfeeling.

The moſt proper objects of bounty are the neceſſitous; and amongſt the variety of neceſſitous objects none have a better title to our compaſſion than thoſe, who, after having taſted the ſweets of plenty, are, by ſome undeſerved calamity, obliged, without charitable relief, to drag out the remainder of life in miſery and woe: who little thought they ſhould aſk their bread of any, but of their God; and who, after a life led in affluence, cannot dig, and are aſhamed to beg. And theſe are to be relieved in ſuch an endearing manner,—with ſuch a beauty of holineſs, that at the ſame time that their wants are ſupplied, their confuſion of face may be prevented.

3. The laſt duty we ſhall inſiſt on, (and which indeed will engage men to the performance of every other) is frequent ſelf-examination, or ſelf-reflection.

He never knew himſelf rightly, who never ſuſpected himſelf. We ſeldom have that charity which covers a multitude of faults in our neighbours; and we much ſeldomer want that ſelf-love, which covers a multitude of faults in ourſelves. The truth is, the bulk of mankind do not reflect upon what they do: Did they but take a ſurvey of every

They ſhall be ſaved, notwithſtanding the teſtimonies of God's wrath, in child-birth, if they continue in faith.

I Exhort therefore, that firſt of all, ſupplications, prayers, interceſſions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men;

2 For kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godlineſs and honeſty.

3 For this is good and acceptable in the ſight of God our Saviour;

4 Who will have all men to be ſaved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.

5 For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Chriſt Jeſus;

6 Who gave himſelf a ranſom for all, to be teſtified in due time.

7 Whereunto I am ordained a preacher, and an apoſtle (I ſpeak the truth in Chriſt, and lie not;) a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity.

8 I will therefore that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting.

every thing that paſſed, there could not be ſo many unkind things ſaid or done, and ſo many kind ones omitted by thoſe, who yet are not void of a ſenſe of religion; nor, could men ſo conſtantly allow themſelves in the practice of what they conſtantly condemn. Without ſelf-reflection, a man may have every vice under the ſun, without knowing he has any; provided he has it not in a high degree.

Are we, then, as apprehenſive of a miſtake in duty,—as cautious not to take wrong meaſures,—as vigilant and circumſpect in our grand concernment,—our eternal welfare,—as we ſhould be in caſes on which our life and fortune here depended?—If we are, we ſhall ſeldom act amiſs: If we are not, we ſhew that a worldly temper prevails more with us, than the hopes of God's favour, and the deſire of ſalvation.—Many excellent books are written, many divine admonitions are continually ſounding in our ears, with all the ſtrength of reaſoning, and beauty of eloquence, to perſuade us to,—What?—One would think it ſhould be ſomething ſeemingly hurtful and diſadvantageous to us:—No, quite the contrary.—It is only to perſuade us,—what one would think is no difficult matter, and yet is the moſt difficult of all; "That we would not make ourſelves eternally miſerable;—that we would endeavour after eternal happineſs!" Alas! for one that periſhes for want of knowing his duty, what numbers are there loſt for ever, for want of ſeriouſly conſidering it, and laying it to heart!—"If there be not another world, there is ſcarce any thing worth living for here: But if there be,—our main concern, ſurely, in this, is to fit ourſelves for that."

Chap. II. Ver. 1.] The Jews, and Judaizing Chriſtians, were very apt to confine their charity to their own nation, and had little or none for the uncircumciſed Gentiles: They were likewiſe very apt to be mutinous and ſeditious, and to deſpiſe all kings and civil governors, but ſuch as were of their own race and nation. In direct oppoſition to ſuch a factious and uncharitable ſpirit, the Apoſtle orders Chriſtians, that, according to the benevolent ſpirit of the Goſpel, they ſhould pray for all men: For kings eſpecially, and ſuch as are in power and authority, in any city or country; that under them the Chriſtians might live in peace and tranquillity, and ſpend their time in a virtuous, prudent, and pious manner. This God hath by the Goſpel plainly manifeſted to be acceptable to him; for he hath thereby declared himſelf to be the God not only of the Jews, but alſo of the Gentiles; and would have all men to be ſaved, and to that end to embrace the Goſpel. Another argument is, that there is alſo one and the ſame Mediator between God, and men of all nations,—the man Chriſt Jeſus; who laid down his life as a ranſom for all, and appointed St. Paul to declare all this, even to the Gentiles. ver. 1—7. Benſon.

Ver. 4. Who will have all men to be ſaved] It is here aſſerted by an inſpired Apoſtle, that God deſireth the ſalvation of all men; and in order to their being capable of higher degrees of glory and happineſs, would have them embrace the Goſpel, and become members of his preparatory kingdom. This is a pleaſing thought, and cannot but be highly grateful to all benevolent perſons: And if it ſhould be enquired, "Why then are not all men ſaved?—Is not God infinite in power? Cannot he effect what he deſires?"—The proper anſwer would be, that God is undoubtedly infinite in power, and therefore able to do whatſoever he pleaſes; but, that his manner of dealing with reaſonable creatures, and with the inanimate part of the creation, is very different; becauſe the ſtate of the creatures themſelves is very different. In the natural, or inanimate world, God by his mighty power effecteth whatever he deſireth; and therein he acts according to the nature of inanimate things, which are entirely paſſive: But, ſhould he act after the ſame manner with rational creatures, whom he hath endowed with underſtanding, free choice, and active powers, He would deſtroy their make; and treat them like, what they are not, mere inanimate and paſſive creatures;—a thing which infinite wiſdom can never do. Should he attempt to force ſinners to become penitent and virtuous; the very force would deſtroy the nature and value of their virtue, and render it as improper to reward them, as it would be to reward a clock for going right, when all the wheels, and ſprings, and weights, were in their due order and ſituation. This does not hinder but that God may in ſome manner or meaſure aſſiſt men: And if he ſincerely deſire the ſalvation of all, it is neceſſary that a wiſe and good God ſhould either in creation, or by interpoſition, grant unto all men what is ſufficient and abſolutely neceſſary to ſalvation; without which, indeed, it is not eaſy to ſee how the wicked, who finally periſh, can be left without excuſe. But when he deals with reaſonable creatures agreeably to their natures, and leaves men in this ſtate of trial to the uſe or abuſe of their human agency, and reaſonable powers and faculties; it is not difficult to account for the periſhing of ſuch multitudes, even though God would have all men to be ſaved. He has granted reaſon to mankind in general, and unto many a revelation alſo: whereby he lays before them the rules of life, and the motives to repentance and holineſs; and they deſtroy themſelves, by abuſing the goodneſs of God, and going on in thoſe very courſes by which he declares they will at laſt come to ruin and deſtruction. The declaration of the divine benevolence to all mankind, is here ſubjoined as a reaſon why the Chriſtians were to pray for all men: If God was ready to ſave them, ſurely they ought to be ready to pray for them. But it was alſo peculiarly deſigned as an oblique reproof of the Judaizing Chriſtians, for their bigotry to their own nation, and their contempt of the Gentile Chriſtians, or Gentiles in general. St. Paul here lets them know, that God judgeth otherwiſe, and therefore they ought to do ſo. He makes no diſtinction under the Goſpel between Jew and Gentile; and they ought to imitate the divine benevolence. See Benſon, and Doddridge. Inſtead of knowledge of the truth, the MS reads acknowledgement.

Ver. 5. The man Chriſt Jeſus] Though the union of the divine nature with the human qualified Chriſt for the office of Mediator, yet it ſeems plain from the words before us, that it is in his human nature we are to conſider him as diſcharging it. The idol mediators in the church of Rome are hereby evidently condemned. God hath appointed only one Mediator between himſelf and mankind; and men have no right to appoint more.

Ver. 6. Who gave himſelf] That is, chearfully and willingly. See John x. 18. For all, is added for the ſame reaſon as all men in ver. 4. To be teſtified in due time, is, according to the Greek, a teſtimony to his own times. So it ſtands oppoſed to a ranſom for all. Jeſus Chriſt is called a faithful witneſs, Rev. i. 5. and is ſaid to have witneſſed before Pilate a good confeſſion; 1 Tim. vi. 13. Some would connect this with the next verſe, thus;—A ranſom for all: A doctrine to be borne witneſs to in due time; of which I am appointed a preacher, &c. See Caſtalio, Bengelius, Benſon, and 2 Tim. i. 11.

Ver. 7. I ſpeak the truth in Chriſt, and lie not] St. Paul uſes ſuch ſolemnity in aſſerting this doctrine, as the Jews were ſo much averſe to it, and were ready to charge his preaching the Goſpel among the Gentiles either upon the want of a due regard to his own nation, or ſome view of avarice or ambition; looking upon the Gentiles as the moſt deteſtable creatures, and probably growing more inveterate againſt them in proportion to the degree in which they were compelled to permit them to dwell in their own holy land, and often to aſſociate with them. In faith and verity, is read very properly by Dr. Heylin, in true faith.

Ver. 8.] The Apoſtle here, firſt, returns to ſpeak concerning the duty of prayer, and orders that the men offer up the public prayers. Secondly, He lets them know, that they might pray acceptably in one place as well as another, and need not confine their public worſhip either to the temple at Jeruſalem, or to the ſynagogue, as the Jews and judaizing Chriſtians probably would have inſinuated. Thirdly, He obſerves, that Chriſtian women ſhould rather count good works their ornaments, than finery and gay dreſſes; and he introduces this advice, as if he meant to caution them againſt ſuch dreſs, more eſpecially when they appeared at public worſhip. Fourthly, That not only the public prayers were to be offered up by the men, but that they alſo were to teach the Chriſtian doctrine, and that the women ought not to teach, but to learn in ſilence; for that the man was firſt created, and the woman for the man; and the woman firſt tranſgreſſed in eating

9 In like manner alſo, that women adorn themſelves in modeſt apparel, with ſhamefacedneſs and ſobriety; not with broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or coſtly array,

10 But (which becometh women profeſſing godlineſs) with good works.

11 Let the woman learn in ſilence, with all ſubjection.

12 But I ſuffer not a woman to teach, nor to uſurp authority over the man, but to be in ſilence.

13 For Adam was firſt formed, then Eve.

14 And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the tranſgreſſion.

15 Notwithſtanding, ſhe ſhall be ſaved in child-bearing, if they continue in faith and charity, and holineſs, with ſobriety.

CHAP. III.

How biſhops, and deacons, and their wives, ſhould be qualified; and to what end Saint Paul wrote to Timothy of theſe things. Of the church, and the bleſſed truth therein taught and profeſſed.

THIS is a true ſaying, If a man deſire the office of a biſhop, he deſireth a good work.

2 A biſhop then muſt be blameleſs, the huſband of one wife, vigilant, ſober, of good behaviour, given to hoſpitality, apt to teach;

3 Not given to wine, no ſtriker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous;

4 One that ruleth well his own houſe, having his children in ſubjection with all gravity;

the forbidden fruit, and then prevailed with the man to eat of it too; though the Apoſtle ſoftens this by adding, that the curſe denounced upon the woman for that tranſgreſſion ſhall be greatly mitigated, if ſhe behave piouſly and prudently. ver. 8—15. Pray, here means, "perform the public offices of devotion." I require therefore, that in all our aſſemblies the men pray. The lifting up of the hands in prayer was a very ancient cuſtom. See Exod. xvii. 11. Pſ. cxxxiv. 2. cxli. 2. Iſai. i. 15. Lam. iii. 41. The expreſſion of holy hands may allude to the cuſtom of waſhing their hands before ſolemn prayer, which has prevailed not only among the Jews, but among heathens and Mahometans; that they might hereby expreſs their deſire of inward purity: and the caution againſt wrath might be more ſuitable, as the many injuries which the Chriſtians received from their perſecutors might tempt them to ſome imprecations againſt them, not agreeable to the gentle and benign genius of their religion. The Apoſtle might likewiſe have a view to thoſe imprecatory prayers which the Jews made uſe of againſt the Chriſtians,—of which ſome forms are ſtill extant in their ritual. In this ſenſe the Apoſtle may be underſtood as endeavouring to reſtrain all Chriſtians from copying ſo unſocial a temper. Some would render χωρὶς διαλογισμȣ, without debate, diſputing, or contention; but the common interpretation ſeems preferable, as it ſuggeſts another very important thought, different from that inferred by the word wrath; namely, the abſolute neceſſity of faith in prayer. See Doddridge, Heylin, and Benſon.

Ver. 9, 10. In like manner alſo] It is commonly ſuppoſed, that this relates to what was to be attended to in their aſſemblies. Some, however, refer it to the charge which the Apoſtle had given to Timothy with ſuch ſolemnity, ch. i. 18. Dr. Heylin reads the verſes thus: And alſo that the women [in your aſſemblies] be dreſſed decently, adorning themſelves with baſhfulneſs and ſobriety; not with broidered hair, &c. ver. 10. but with good works, as it becometh women profeſſing Piety; i. e. the Chriſtian religion. The Apoſtle often uſes piety or godlineſs, as ſynonimous with Chriſtianity. See ver. 2. Eſtius obſerves, that this diſcourſe concludes with yet ſtronger force againſt all foppery in men. Dr. Waterland reads,—in decent apparel, with modeſty and ſobriety, &c.

Ver. 12. I ſuffer not a woman to teach] The Apoſtle muſt be underſtood as limiting this reſtraint to public aſſemblies; and as excepting thoſe caſes, when they were under divine inſpiration. See 1 Cor. xi. 5. xiv. 35. and Grotius.

Ver. 13. Adam was firſt formed] It is plain the Apoſtle does not mean to put the whole of his argument upon the priority of the man's creation in point of time; for on that principle the birds and beaſts would have the pre-eminence even of Adam; but he refers only to the human ſpecies, and to the regard which God expreſſed for the eaſe and comfort of man, by making the woman to be his helpmate and companion. So that it is the ſame thought, in fewer words, which is expreſſed more largely, 1 Cor. xi. 8, 9. The man was not created for the woman, but the woman for the man. See Doddridge and Calmet.

Ver. 14. And Adam was not deceived] Not firſt deceived. The Apoſtle hereby ſeems to intimate, that the tempter choſe to make his firſt attack on the woman, as being, even in her original and moſt glorious ſtate, the inferior, and conſequently leſs fit in future life to take the lead in important affairs. The verſe may be paraphraſed thus: "It is further to be recollected, that at the fatal entrance of ſin into the world, Adam was not immediately deceived by the fraud of the ſerpent; but that artful ſeducer choſe to begin his attack on the woman; who, being deceived by him, was firſt in the tranſgreſſion, and prevailed upon Adam by her ſolicitations to offend. Now it ſhould be an humbling conſideration to all her daughters, that their ſex was ſo greatly concerned in the introduction of guilt and miſery, and make them leſs forward in attempting to be guides to others, after ſuch a miſcarriage." See Doddridge, Diodati, and Whitby.

Ver. 15. Notwithſtanding, ſhe ſhall be ſaved in child-bearing] Many and various are the interpretations of this obſcure paſſage. Mr. Locke underſtands it of being carried ſafely through child-bearing; which ſenſe Dr. Whitby endeavours to illuſtrate at large. See on Rom. vii. 5. 1 Cor. iii. 15. Dr. Benſon obſerves, "Having intimated that the man was ſuperior by creation, and the ſubjection of the woman increaſed by the fall, the Apoſtle here declares, that if the Chriſtian women continued in holineſs and charity, the curſe pronounced upon the fall, Gen. iii. 16. would be removed or mitigated." Inſtead of in child-bearing, ſome render the Greek, by child-birth; namely, by the birth of the Meſſiah; an interpretation, which Dr. Doddridge adopts, "as, on attentive deliberation, the moſt probable." His paraphraſe is as follows: "Yet, let them not be deſpiſed or upbraided on this account; conſidering, on the other ſide, that ſhe was alſo happily inſtrumental in producing the great promiſed ſeed, (Gen. iii. 15.) who was derived from a woman without any human father; and ſo they ſhall be ſaved, as I may ſay, by child-birth, if there be a ſuitable readineſs not only to profeſs, but to obey the Goſpel:—if they continue, &c." See Harris on the Meſſiah, p. 54. Dr. Waterland cloſes this verſe with the words beginning the next chapter; This is a faithful ſaying.

Chap. III. Ver. 1. In the foregoing chapter the Apoſtle had ordered, that the men ſhould offer up the public prayers, and that the women were not to ſpeak in the church. He now declares how honourable and important the office of a biſhop is, and what ought to be the qualifications of the men who were admitted to that office; which are virtue and prudence, an unſpotted character, and an aptneſs to teach: ver. 1—7. Inſtead of a good work, Heylin reads an excellent office.

Ver. 2. A biſhop, then, muſt be blameleſs] With reſpect to his moral character, the prieſts under the law were to be without bodily infirmities; Lev. xxi. 16, &c. The biſhops in the Chriſtian church are to be of unblemiſhed hearts and lives: Tit. i. 6, 7.—the huſband of one wife; that is, "one who hath not cauſeleſly divorced his wife, and married another;" much leſs ought he to have more than one wife at a time. See ver. 12. Some underſtand the Apoſtle here as prohibiting ſecond marriages in the clergy; but the interpretation above given appears the moſt juſt and reaſonable. Which way ſoever the ſentence be interpreted, it plainly condemns the practice of the church of Rome, which allows not biſhops or clergy to marry at all: Surely that can never be conſiſtent with a biſhop's being the huſband of one wife.—We have, in the courſe of this commentary, frequently obſerved, that in the eaſtern country there were few houſes of publick entertainment; and therefore, though hoſpitality is at all times highly commendable, there was the more neceſſity that the houſes of biſhops ſhould be famed for it, and always open to ſuch as travelled about in order to ſpread the Goſpel. Inſtead of vigilant, ſober, Dr. Waterland reads, ſober, prudent.

Ver. 3. No ſtriker, &c.] Dr. Waterland, following ſome ancient MSS, reads this, No ſtriker, but meek; not quarrelſome, but patient, &c. Inſtead of no ſtriker, Dr. Heylin reads, not violent;—not a lover of contention, or one who has ſo little government of himſelf, as paſſionately to fly out againſt others.

Ver. 4, 5. One that ruleth well his own houſe] One that was a good προϊςάμενος, preſident, over his own family, was to be ὁ ἐπίσκοπος, an inſpector or biſhop over the church of God. Confucius, directing princes to take care of their families, has a ſaying parallel to this before

5 (For if a man know not how to rule his own houſe, how ſhall he take care of the church of God?)

6 Not a novice, leſt being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil.

7 Moreover, he muſt have a good report of them which are without; leſt he fall into reproach, and the ſnare of the devil.

8 Likewiſe muſt the deacons be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre,

9 Holding the myſtery of the faith in a pure conſcience.

10 And let theſe alſo firſt be proved; then let them uſe the office of a deacon, being found blameleſs.

11 Even ſo muſt their wives be grave, not ſlanderers, ſober, faithful in all things.

12 Let the deacons be the huſbands of one wife, ruling their children, and their own houſes well.

13 For they that have uſed the office of a deacon well, purchaſe to themſelves a good degree, and great boldneſs in the faith, which is in Chriſt Jeſus.

14 Theſe things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee ſhortly:

15 But if I tarry long, that thou mayeſt know how thou oughteſt to behave thyſelf in the houſe of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth.

16 And without controverſy, great is the myſtery of godlineſs: God was manifeſt in the fleſh, juſtified in the Spirit, ſeen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.

fore us: "It is impoſſible that he who knows not how to govern and reform his own family, ſhould rightly govern and reform a people." See his Morals, p. 38.

Ver. 6. Not a novice] Μὴ νεόφυτον; "Not one lately engrafted into the Chriſtian church." He had ſaid before, ver. 2. that a biſhop ought to be one who is apt to teach, and conſequently he muſt have taught for ſome time as an elder, or one of the firſt converts in that church, whereby his aptneſs to teach might appear. Here he declareth againſt one lately baptized;—conſequently he muſt remain ſome time a private Chriſtian, before he could be admitted to be a biſhop. See 1 Theſſ. v. 12. What St. Paul here orders as to a biſhop, had been obſerved in a remarkable manner as to himſelf: for he was eight or nine years a Chriſtian, and an inferior prophet, before he was admitted to be an Apoſtle; and the other Apoſtles attended upon our Lord ſome time, before they received their apoſtolical qualifications and commiſſion. Inſtead of the devil, ſome would render the Greek, both here and in ver. 7. the accuſer; not underſtanding it of the devil, but of any man or woman who watched for the faults of Chriſtians, and was ready to accuſe them. The word evidently has this ſignification, ver. 11. and is very properly rendered ſlanderers. See John vi. 70. Others, however, think the ſenſe given in our verſion the moſt natural; and it is eaſy to ſee (they obſerve) that Satan might graft many dangerous temptations not only on the man's pride, but on the evil report which he might have incurred by any ſcandal before he entered on the miniſtry; either attempting to draw him to the commiſſion of former evils, from an apprehenſion that he had very little reputation to loſe by a new fall; or weakening his hands in efforts of uſefulneſs, by a fear, that the remembrance of thoſe paſt irregularities would render his attempts leſs effectual:—thoughts worthy the conſideration of all who deſign themſelves for the miniſtry; and eſpecially to be recollected, when perſons who have been remarkably profligate, are deſirous of undertaking it, or returning to it. See Benſon, Doddridge, Queſnell, and Reynolds's "Queries of the Angelic World," p. 13, &c.

Ver. 7. Leſt he fall into reproach, &c.] Leſt the unbelieving Jews or Gentiles being able to blaſt his reputation, he fall into the reproach and ſnare of the accuſer, for the bad life he led before his converſion. "For the Chriſtian church will flouriſh or decay very much, according to the character or behaviour of its biſhops or paſtors." See 1 Theſſ. iv. 12. Benſon and Heylin.

Ver. 8.] The Apoſtle goes on to deſcribe the qualifications of a deacon. Such particulars as are mentioned, are much the ſame with thoſe required in a biſhop; only he does not mention ſo many things under this head, and particularly he ſays nothing about their being apt to teach. He alſo intimates, that their wives ought to be virtuous and prudent; and declares, that when the diaconate is faithfully diſcharged, it is by no means a contemptible office. ver. 8, 13. In the three laſt verſes, he gives this reaſon why he was ſo minute in his directions; namely, that the Chriſtian revelation was ſo grand and important, ſo remarkable in itſelf, and ſo well atteſted, that Timothy could never be too well inſtructed how to behave himſelf, and promote this doctrine; and as he did not know whether he could return himſelf ſo ſoon as he hoped, it was not improper to write this Epiſtle. Benſon.

Ver. 9. Holding the myſtery of the faith, &c.] The deacons were to be ſuch as held the myſtery of the pure and unmixed Chriſtian faith, and that held it in a good conſcience, and would be ready openly to profeſs it: men of integrity, and of charity towards both Gentile and Jewiſh Chriſtians, and who were not for impoſing upon the one or the other. See Gal. ii. 2. Epheſ. i. 9. and iii. 1—11.

Ver. 10. Let them uſe the office] Let them exerciſe, &c. MS.

Ver. 11. Even ſo muſt their wives be grave] There was as much reaſon that this ſhould extend to the wives of biſhops alſo; and as he begins the next verſe with let the deacons, i. e. as well as the biſhops, be the huſbands of one wife,—perhaps he might ſo deſign it. Theſe wives were not to ſlander any body, and eſpecially not to blaſt the characters of the poor to their huſbands, and ſo cut them off from the charitable relief of the Chriſtian church. Thoſe perſons who are addicted to the vice of ſlander will do well ſeriouſly to reflect upon the title which they bear in God's word; that is, διαβόλους, devils. See on ver. 6. The deacons themſelves are required, ver. 8. not to be ſordidly covetous; and here their wives are ordered to be faithful in all things. Might not theſe orders be given, to prevent their embezzling the public money? See Acts vi. 1, &c. Benſon and Queſnell.

Ver. 13. Purchaſe to themſelves a good degree] Acquire for themſelves an honourable degree, [that of prieſt or biſhop] and great aſſurance in preaching the Chriſtian faith. Heylin. The Apoſtle alludes here to the practice of electing the deacons from the beſt among the laity; the prieſts or elders from the beſt among the deacons; and the rulers or biſhops from the beſt among the prieſts or elders.—Where the unbelieving Jews were ſo virulent, and the Gentiles ſo much exaſperated by Demetrius and his company, there was a neceſſity for great boldneſs and fortitude; eſpecially in the officers of the Chriſtian church, who are generally the firſt expoſed to perſecution. See Grotius, Heylin, and Benſon.

Ver. 15. The houſe of God, which is the church, &c.] The MS renders this, that thou, who art the ground and pillar of the truth, mighteſt know how thou oughteſt to behave thyſelf in the church of God;—which is after Dr. Benſon. Dr. Doddridge obſerves, that though many good critics refer this deſcriptive clauſe to Timothy, agreeably to that figure by which St. Peter is called a pillar. Gal. ii. 9. (compare Rev. iii. 12.) yet he thinks, had this been the conſtruction, the accuſative caſe would have been uſed to agree with σε, underſtood, and therefore he chooſes to read the ſentence as follows: "That ſo the whole ſyſtem of Evangelical truth may be conſidered as reſting on this pillar and baſis, (as ἑδραίωμα may ſignify;) that thou mayeſt know how it becomes thee to converſe in the houſe of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth: ver. 16. And confeſſedly, great is the myſtery of godlineſs, namely, what follows; that God was manifeſted, &c.—Bengelius and others underſtand the paſſage nearly in the ſame manner. See Gataker's Adverſaria, p. 378. Witſius, Whitby, and Dr. Clark's Sermons, ſerm. 10. Why the Apoſtle here uſes the architect ſtile in writing to the Epheſians, will eaſily appear to any one who recollects the grandeur of Diana's temple amongſt them. See on 1 Theſſ. v. 8.

Ver. 16. God was manifeſt in the fleſh, &c.] Concerning this text, ſee Wetſtein, Mill, Bentley's Phileleuth. Lips. p. i. p. 82. Pierce on Philip. ii. 9. and Sir Iſaac Newton's Letter to Le Clerc. Inſtead of angels, ſome would read meſſengers; and others ἀποστόλοις, apoſtles; and they obſerve, that it is difficult to underſtand what is meant by our Lord's being ſeen by the holy angels; but what his being ſeen by the apoſtles meaneth, is very evident from the following texts: John i. 14. Acts x. 39. xli. 1. John i. 1. See Mede's Works, p. 637.

be a departure from the faith. And to the end that Timothy might not fail in doing his duty, he furniſheth him with divers precepts belonging thereto.

NOW the Spirit ſpeaketh expreſly, that in the latter times ſome ſhall depart from the faith, giving heed to ſeducing ſpirits, and doctrines of devils;

Ver. 1. 2 Theſſ. ii. 3. 2 Tim. iii. 1. 2 Pet. iii. 3. 1 John ii. 18. Jude 18. 1 Pet. i. 20. Rev. xvi. 14. Dan. xi. 35, 37, 38. Rev. x. 20.—V. 2. Epheſ. iv. 19.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1.] St. Paul here propheſies of the apoſtaſy which was to happen in the latter times, and mentions their grand error, namely, holding the doctrines of demons; which doctrine was to be propagated by the notorious hypocriſy and impudence of liars, and of ſuch as would forbid marriage, and enjoin Chriſtians to abſtain from ſome ſorts of food. This prophecy is introduced in ſuch a manner, as might ſhew Timothy how much the judaizing Chriſtians made way for that grand apoſtaſy, and that he might warn them that the myſtery of iniquity was then working.—Againſt all tendencies to ſuch an apoſtaſy, Timothy was faithfully to caution the church at Epheſus, and to inculcate on them perpetually, that the virtue and piety of the Chriſtian life were the only things acceptable to God under the Goſpel. For the inſiſting on this ſo ſtrenuouſly, in oppoſition to the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles, and the judaizing Chriſtians, the Apoſtle himſelf had been reproached and perſecuted, ſo often, and to ſo great a degree. ver. 1, 2, 11. and Benſon.

Ver. 1, 2. Now the Spirit, &c.] This paſſage perhaps would be better tranſlated, But the Spirit ſpeaketh expreſly. He had before been ſpeaking of the myſtery of godlineſs, ch. iii. 5. and now he proceeds to ſpeak of the myſtery of iniquity, in oppoſition to it: But the Spirit, &c. I. The firſt thing to be conſidered is, the apoſtaſy here predicted, "Some ſhall depart, or rather apoſtatize from the faith." An apoſtaſy from the faith may be total or partial; either when we renounce the whole, or when we deny ſome principal and eſſential article of it. It is not every error, or every hereſy that is apoſtaſy from the faith: It is a revolt in a principal and eſſential article, when we worſhip God by any image or repreſentation, or when we worſhip other beings beſides God, and pray unto other mediators beſides the one Mediator between God and men, the man Chriſt Jeſus. This is the very eſſence of Chriſtian worſhip, to worſhip the one true God, through the one true Chriſt; and to worſhip any other god, or any other mediator, is apoſtaſy, and rebellion againſt God and againſt Chriſt. Such is the nature of apoſtaſy from the faith;—and it is implied, that this apoſtaſy ſhould be general, and affect great numbers. For though it be ſaid only ſome ſhall apoſtatize; yet, by ſome, in this place, many are underſtood. The original word frequently ſignifies a multitude, and there are abundant inſtances in Scripture where it is uſed in that ſenſe, as the reader will perceive from John vi. 64, 66. Rom. xi. 17. 1 Cor. x. 5, 6. This apoſtaſy may be general and extenſive, and include many, but not all. II. It is more particularly ſhewn wherein the apoſtaſy ſhould conſiſt, in the following words: Giving heed to ſeducing ſpirits, and doctrines of devils; or rather, "Giving heed to erroneous ſpirits, and doctrines concerning demons." Spirits ſeem to be much the ſame in ſenſe as doctrines; the latter word may be conſidered as explanatory of the former; and error ſometimes ſignifying idolatry, erroneous doctrines may comprehend idolatrous as well as falſe doctrines. But it is ſtill further added for explanation, that theſe doctrines ſhould be doctrines of devils, or of demons; where the genitive caſe is not to be taken actively, as if demons were the authors of theſe doctrines; but paſſively, as if demons were the ſubject of theſe doctrines. In Jer. x. 8. Acts xiii. 12. Heb. vi. 2. the genitive caſe is uſed in this manner; and by the ſame conſtruction doctrines of demons, are doctrines about or concerning demons. This is therefore a prophecy, that the idolatrous theology of demons profeſſed by the Gentiles ſhould be revived among Chriſtians. Demons, according to the theology of the Gentiles, were middle powers between the gods and mortal men, and were regarded as mediators and agents between the gods and men. Of theſe demons there were accounted two kinds; one kind were the ſouls of men, deified or canonized after death; the other kind were ſuch as had never been the ſouls of men, nor ever dwelt in mortal bodies. Theſe latter demons may be paralleled with angels, as the former may with canonized ſaints; and as we Chriſtians believe there are good and evil angels, ſo did the Gentiles that there were good and evil demons. It appears then, as if the doctrines of demons which prevailed ſo long in the heathen world, were to be revived and eſtabliſhed in the Chriſtian church: and is not the worſhip of ſaints and angels now in all reſpects the ſame, that the worſhip of demons was in former times? The name is only different, the thing is identically the ſame. The heathens looked upon their demons as mediators and interceſſors between God and men: and are not the ſaints and angels regarded in the ſame light by many profeſſed Chriſtians? The promoters of this worſhip were ſenſible that it was the ſame, and that the one ſucceeded the other; and as the worſhip is the ſame, ſo likewiſe is it performed with the ſame ceremonies. Nay, the very ſame temples, the very ſame altars, the very ſame images, which once were conſecrated to Jupiter and the other demons, are now re-conſecrated to the virgin Mary and other ſaints. The very ſame titles and inſcriptions are aſcribed to both; the very ſame prodigies and miracles are related of theſe as of thoſe. In ſhort, the whole almoſt of paganiſm is converted and applied to popery; the one is manifeſtly formed upon the ſame plan and principles as the other. III. Such an apoſtaſy as this of reviving the doctrines of demons, and worſhipping the dead, was not likely to take place immediately; it ſhould prevail and proſper in the latter days. The phraſe of the latter times or days, or the laſt times or days, ſignifies any time yet to come; but denotes more particularly the times of Chriſtianity. The times of Chriſtianity may properly be called the latter times or days, or the laſt times or days, becauſe it is the laſt of all God's revelations to mankind. See Heb. i. 1, 2. 1 Pet. i. 20. IV. Another remarkable peculiarity of this prophecy is, the ſolemn and emphatic manner in which it is delivered;—The Spirit ſpeaketh expreſly. By the Spirit is meant the Holy Spirit of God, which inſpired the prophets and Apoſtles. The Spirit's ſpeaking expreſly, may ſignify his ſpeaking preciſely and certainly, not obſcurely and involvedly, as he is wont to ſpeak in the prophets; or it may be ſaid, that the Spirit ſpeaketh expreſly what he ſpeaketh in expreſs words in ſome place or other of divine writ: and the Spirit hath ſpoken the ſame thing in expreſs words before, in the prophecy of Daniel. Daniel hath foretold in expreſs words the worſhip of new demons or demi-gods, Dan. xi. 38. The Mahuzzim of Daniel are the ſame as the demons of St. Paul; gods protectors, or ſaints protectors, defenders and guardians of mankind. This therefore is a prophecy, not dictated merely by private ſuggeſtion and inſpiration, but taken out of the written word. It is a prophecy not only of St. Paul's, but of Daniel's too, or rather of Daniel, confirmed and approved by St. Paul. V. The Apoſtle proceeds, ver. 2. to deſcribe by what means and by what perſons this apoſtaſy ſhould be propagated and eſtabliſhed in the world: Speaking lies in hypocriſy, &c. or rather, "Through the hypocriſy of liars, having their conſcience, &c." for the prepoſition rendered in does frequently ſignify by or through. Liars too, or ſpeaking lies, cannot poſſibly be joined with the original word rendered ſome and that rendered giving heed; becauſe they are in the nominative caſe, and this is in the genitive. Neither can it well be joined in conſtruction with the word rendered devils or demons; for how can demons or devils be ſaid to ſpeak lies in hypocriſy, and to have their conſcience ſeared? It is plain then, that the great apoſtaſy of the latter times was to prevail through the hypocriſy of liars, &c. And hath not the great idolatry of Chriſtians, and the worſhip of the dead particularly, been diffuſed and advanced in the world by ſuch inſtruments and agents; by fabulous books forged under the names of the Apoſtles and ſaints; by fabulous legends of their lives, by fabulous miracles aſcribed to their reliques; by fabulous dreams and revelations, and even fabulous ſaints, who never exiſted but in imagination? See Newton on the Prophecies, diſc. xxiii. vol. 2.

Ver. 3. Forbidding to marry, &c.] VI. This is a farther character of the promoters of this apoſtaſy: The ſame hypocritical liars, who ſhould promote the worſhip of demons, ſhould alſo prohibit lawful marriage. The monks were the firſt who brought a ſingle life into repute; they were the firſt alſo who revived and promoted the worſhip of demons. One of the primary and moſt eſſential laws and conſtitutions of all monks, is the profeſſion of a ſingle life; and it is equally clear that the monks had the principal ſhare in promoting the worſhip of the dead. The monks then were the principal promoters of the worſhip of the dead in former times; and who are the great patrons and advocates of the ſame worſhip now? Are not their legitimate ſucceſſors and deſcendants, the monks, and prieſts, and biſhops, of the church of Rome? And do not they alſo profeſs and recommend a ſingle life, as well as the worſhip of ſaints and angels? Thus have the worſhip of demons, and the prohibition of marriage, conſtantly gone hand in hand together; and as they who maintain the one, maintain the other, ſo it is no leſs remarkable, that they who diſclaim the one, diſclaim the other. VII. The laſt mark and character of theſe men is, commanding to abſtain from meats, &c. The ſame lying hypocrites, who ſhould promote the worſhip of demons, ſhould not only prohibit lawful marriage, but likewiſe impoſe unneceſſary abſtinence from meats: And theſe two, as indeed it is fit they ſhould, uſually go together as conſtituent parts of the ſame hypocriſy. It is as much the law of all monks to abſtain from meats, as from marriage. Some never eat any fleſh; others only certain kinds on certain days. Frequent faſts are the rule and boaſt of their orders. So lived the monks of the ancient church; ſo live with leſs ſtrictneſs, perhaps, but with greater oſtentation, the monks and friars of the church of Rome; and theſe have been the principal propagators and defenders of the worſhip of the dead, both in former and in latter times. The worſhip of the dead, is indeed ſo monſtrouſly abſurd, as well as impious, that there was hardly any probability of its ever prevailing in the world, but by hypocriſy and lies; but that theſe particular ſorts of hypocriſy,—celibacy, under pretence of chaſtity,—and abſtinence, under pretence of devotion,—ſhould be employed for this purpoſe, the Spirit of God alone could foreſee and foretel. There is no neceſſary connection between the worſhip of the dead, and forbidding to marry, and commanding to abſtain from meats; and yet it is certain, that the great advocates of this worſhip have, by their pretended purity and mortification, procured the greater reverence to their perſons, and the readier reception to their doctrines; but this idle, popiſh, monkiſh abſtinence, created to be receiving with thankſgiving of them which believe and know the truth.

4 For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refuſed, if it be received with thankſgiving:

5 For it is ſanctified by the word of God, and prayer.

6 If thou put the brethren in remembrance of theſe things, thou ſhalt be a good miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt, nouriſhed up in the words of faith, and of good doctrine, whereunto thou haſt attained.

7 But refuſe profane and old wives fables, and exerciſe thyſelf rather unto godlineſs.

8 For bodily exerciſe profiteth little: but godlineſs is profitable unto all things, having promiſe of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

9 This is a faithful ſaying, and worthy of all acceptation.

10 For therefore we both labour, and ſuffer reproach, becauſe we truſt in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, ſpecially of thoſe that believe.

11 Theſe things command and teach.

12 Let no man deſpiſe thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in converſation, in charity, in ſpirit, in faith, in purity.

13 Till I come, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine.

14 Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the preſbytery.

15 Meditate upon theſe things; give thyſelf wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear to all.

is as unworthy of a Chriſtian, as it is unnatural to a man; it is perverting the purpoſe of nature, and commanding to abſtain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thankſgiving by believers, and them who know the truth. The Apoſtle, therefore, approves and ſanctifies the religious cuſtom of bleſſing God at our meals; as our Saviour, when he was to diſtribute the loaves and the fiſhes, looked up to heaven, and bleſſed, and brake it: And what can be ſaid of thoſe, who have their tables ſpread with the moſt plentiful gifts of God, and yet conſtantly ſit down, and riſe up again, without ſuffering ſo much as one thought of the Giver to intrude upon them? It is but a thought, it is but a glimpſe of devotion; and can they, who refuſe even that, be thought to believe or know the truth? Man is free to partake of all the good creatures of God; but thankſgiving is the neceſſary condition. See ver. 4, 5. The Apoſtle proceeds to ſay, that it is the duty of the miniſters of the Goſpel to preſs and inculcate theſe things. ver. 6. All that is preached up of ſuch abſtinence and mortification, as above ſpecified, with all the legends of the ſaints, were no better than profane and old wives fables,—like Rabbinical dreams and traditions. Godlineſs is the only thing which will truly avail us here and hereafter. ver. 7, 8. See Bp. Newton as above, Mede's Works, p. 666. Archbp. Tillotſon's works, vol. ii. p. 53. Mann's Critical Notes on Scripture, p. 92. Mill, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 8. For bodily exerciſe profiteth little] The Apoſtle, ver. 7. had ſaid, Exerciſe thyſelf, as applied to a Chriſtian life; and therefore he here uſes the word exerciſe, as applied to bodily labour; and by calling it bodily exerciſe, he leads our thoughts either to the labours of the Eſſenes, according to the rules and inſtitutions of their ſect, or to the agoniſtic games, of which Mr. Weſt has given ſo entertaining and uſeful an account in the diſſertation prefixed to his Pindar. Poſſibly the exerciſe preparatory to thoſe games might here be more particularly alluded to. By the practice of godlineſs, Timothy was to prepare himſelf for the life to come; juſt as the combatants, by repeated bodily exerciſe, prepared for obtaining the victory in thoſe games. Godlineſs, under the New Teſtament diſpenſation, has no particular promiſe of health, or reputation, or wealth, or any other individual worldly bleſſing, though in its natural conſequences it bears a moſt friendly aſpect upon all; but it has the promiſe of comfort and happineſs in general,—And that declaration of Chriſt, that the good man ſhall receive an hundred fold, even in the midſt of perſecution, if ſuch ſhould be his lot, Mark x. 30. might alone be ſufficient to vindicate the Apoſtle in his aſſertion. The law, however, certainly contains promiſes of temporal bleſſings to godlineſs; ſo that the aſſertion of the Apoſtle is ſtrictly true, when referred both to the Old and New Teſtament. See Benſon, Whitby, Doddridge, and the Divine Legation, book v. ſect. 6.

Ver. 9. This is a faithful ſaying] St. Paul has uſed this expreſſion four times; 1 Tim. i. 15. 2 Tim. ii. 11. Titus iii. 8. and here. They were all matters of certain truth and great importance; and the Apoſtle uſed the expreſſion to call up men's attention to them, as things of great conſequence. Concerning the moſt important of them he has added, as here, that it is worthy of univerſal acceptation. The intereſting truth to which he here calls upon all men to attend, is, That Godlineſs is profitable, &c. The three grand principles of religion are,—a God,—a Providence,—and a future ſtate. Without theſe religion could not ſubſiſt; and the Apoſtle in the next verſe plainly intimates, that theſe principles were his ſupport under afflictions; animating him to zeal and diligence in active ſervice. Benſon.

Ver. 10. Who is the Saviour of all men, &c.] This ſeems a title parallel to that in Job vii. 20. Preſerver of men: But he is eſpecially the Saviour of believers, as he extends to them the nobleſt and moſt important deliverance; reſerving for them the moſt invaluable bleſſings of a future ſtate, and guiding them ſafely to it, through all the dangers of this life. Thoſe who enjoy the advantages of the Chriſtian revelation, in the purity of it, may certainly with equal diligence excel others in knowledge and virtue; and conſequently, may be qualified and prepared for higher felicity, or a more exalted ſtation: And may we not hence form a notion of the Chriſtian heaven;—namely, as a more exalted ſtate of happineſs, in proportion to the ſuperior knowledge, piety, and virtue of a Chriſtian? See Doddridge, and Benſon.

Ver. 11. Command] Give in charge. Wat. See ch. i. 3, 5, 18.

Ver. 12. Let no man deſpiſe thy youth] St. Paul here gives Timothy directions concerning his own conduct, eſpecially as he was yet a young man, and had ſuch difficulties upon his hands. He adviſes him to take a great deal of care how he behaved both in public and private, and particularly that he gave himſelf entirely to the work of the miniſtry. ver. 12—16. St. Paul wrote in a popular ſtile; and therefore uſes many words to the ſame purpoſe, to expreſs the thing more vehemently. However, if any deſire to diſtinguiſh, they may refer in word to his ſpeech, and in converſation to his behaviour. See 1 Pet. i. 15. In charity, may poſſibly refer more eſpecially to that love which they owed the Gentile Chriſtians. The words rendered in ſpirit, are not found in ſeveral ancient MSS. If they are retained, we muſt underſtand by them the temper, or diſpoſition of mind;—"In a candid, yet zealous ſpirit." See Benſon, Mill, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 13. To reading, to exhortation, &c.] It was the cuſtom in the ſynagogue to read a portion of the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament; and after that to inſtruct the people in the meaning of it, and to give them ſome uſeful exhortations. Timothy was to do ſo in the ſchool of Tyrannus, as well as read the Scriptures privately for his own improvement.

Ver. 14. Neglect not the gift] "Of the Holy Spirit;"—Particularly in his miraculous efficacy. Benſon would render and underſtand this verſe, as parallel to ch. i. 18. "Neglect not the gift of the Holy Spirit which is in you; which was conferred upon you after (or according to) ſome prophecy or prophecies that went before concerning you." It was according to prophecy that Paul and Barnabas were ſet apart at Antioch, to the work unto which God had called them. See Acts xiii. 2. xx. 28. Doddridge underſtands and paraphraſes the verſe thus: "Neglect not, by proper and ſtrenuous exerciſe, to rouſe and cultivate that gift of God's Holy Spirit which is in thee; which was given thee in a large and ſenſible effuſion, on that ever-memorable day, when thou wert ſet apart to thy ſacred office by the miniſtration of thoſe who had the gift of prophecy, by which they were enabled and excited to tell ſomething extraordinary concerning thee; with ſuch a token of eſpecial preſence did God honour the impoſition of the hands of the preſbytery." As this text, to ſay the leaſt, ſtrongly implies that Timothy was adorned with ſome ſupernatural gifts; ſo it likewiſe proves, that the degree in which ſuch favours were continued, did very much depend on the diligence and fidelity with which they were cultivated by the perſon who had received them. See particularly the Reflections on 2 Tim. iv. 13.

Ver. 15. Meditate upon theſe things] The word Μελέτα is uſed to denote all the preparatory exerciſes of mind or body made uſe of by thoſe who were deſirous of excelling in any art or ſcience.

St,

16 Take heed unto thyſelf, and unto thy doctrine; continue in them: for in doing this, thou ſhalt both ſave thyſelf, and them that hear thee.

CHAP. V.

Rules to be obſerved in reproving. Of widows. Of elders. A precept for Timothy's health. Some men's ſins go before unto judgement, and ſome men's follow after.

Rebuke not an elder, but entreat him as a father; and the younger men as brethren;

2 The elder women as mothers; the younger as ſiſters, with all purity.

3 Honour widows, that are widows indeed.

4 But if any widow have children or nephews, let them learn firſt to ſhew piety at home, and to requite their parents: for that is good and acceptable before God.

5 Now ſhe that is a widow indeed, and deſolate, truſteth in God, and continueth in ſupplications and prayers night and day:

6 But ſhe that liveth in pleaſure, is dead while ſhe liveth.

7 And theſe things give in charge, that they may be blameleſs.

8 But if any provide not for his own, and ſpecially for thoſe of his own houſe, he hath denied the faith, and is worſe than an infidel.

9 Let not a widow be taken into the number, under threeſcore years old, having been the wife of one man,

Ver. 16. Ezek. xxxiii. 9. Rom. xi. 14. 1 Cor. ix. 22. Jam. v. 20.——V. 1. Lev. xix. 32.—V. 3. Ver. 5, 16.—V. 4. Or, kindneſs. See Gen. xlv. 10, 11. Matth. xv. 4. Epheſ. vi. 1, 2.—V. 5. 1 Cor. vii. 32. Luke ii. 37. xviii. 1. Acts xxvi. 7.—V. 6. James v. 5. Or, delicately.—V. 8. Gal. vi. 10. Or, kindred. 2 Tim. iii. 5. Tit. i. 16. Matth. xviii. 17.—V. 9. Or, choſen. Luke ii. 36. Ch. iii. 2.

St. Paul therefore recommends it to Timothy, by proper previous exerciſes to qualify himſelf for excelling in the diſcharge of the work of an Evangeliſt: "Make theſe things your daily care and ſtudy." See 1 Theſſ. ii. 5. They who had the gifts of the Spirit in a ſupernatural manner, were to read and ſtudy, as well as to teach others; thus they ſtirred up the gift that was in them, which by negligence they would have quenched. Surely then, as ſpiritual gifts are wholly ceaſed in the church, the paſtors of it now-a-days have much more reaſon to read and to ſtudy. The Hebrew, in which the Old Teſtament, and the Greek, in which the New is written, are now dead languages; and the idioms of ſpeech, the hiſtory and cuſtoms, &c. are very different from ours; which render learning and diligence abſolutely neceſſary to ſuch as would teach others the true, pure, and primitive Chriſtianity. See Benſon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 16. Take heed unto thyſelf] As Timothy's taking heed to himſelf, and to his teaching others, and perſevering therein, were neceſſary to his own ſalvation, ſo it was neceſſary in thoſe who were inſtructed by him, that they ſhould take heed unto themſelves, practice the duties of the Chriſtian life, and perſevere therein; otherwiſe it was not in Timothy's power to ſave them. It ſeems a natural obſervation here, that the ſalvation of others may accidentally have ſome influence upon a man's own ſalvation; as the better thoſe about him are, the more advantage he has for religious improvement; the fewer hindrances from duty, and temptations to ſin: And the argument for imitation is much ſtrengthened, when it comes from a perſon placed in an inferior ſtation; from whom, therefore, leſs might be expected in that view, than from ourſelves. But certainly, the thought chiefly referred to here, is, the neceſſity of acting faithfully in the miniſtry, in order to being intitled to the divine promiſe of ſalvation; in which perſons who betray ſo important a truſt can have no part. See Doddridge, and Benſon.

Chap. V. Ver. 1] Having adviſed Timothy to diligence in teaching others, the Apoſtle proceeds to point out ſome rules of prudence in order to his teaching with ſucceſs; namely, that he ſhould behave with a filial reſpect towards the aged, and with mildneſs and affability towards younger perſons. ver. 1—2. He next gives directions concerning the widows, who were to be maintained by the church's charity, and to diſcharge the office of deaconeſſes. The ſum of what he ſaith upon this head is, that private Chriſtians ought every one of them to maintain their own near relations, if they are able: but if any widow have no near relations able to maintain her, then the church is to take care of her, and to place her among the deaconeſſes; provided ſhe has been a pious woman, and continues to be ſo. But none were to be admitted under ſixty years of age; for the younger women, by being reſtrained from marrying again among the Chriſtians, would be in danger of throwing off Chriſtianity, or of behaving ſo, as to bring ſome ſcandal upon it. The Apoſtle therefore adviſes, that none of them ſhould be admitted into the number of the deaconeſſes, whom the church was to maintain, and of whom it was expected that they ſhould continue in that ſtation. ver. 3—16. The word πρεσβυτέρῳ—rendered an elder—is not an elder in the church, as the ſame word ſignifies, ver. 17, 19. for it is here oppoſed to νεωτέρους, the younger men; as the elder women, in the next verſe, are oppoſed to the younger women. Dr. Heylin reads, an aged man. See the Reflections on Philemon.

Ver. 3. Honour widows] To honour here, ſignifies to maintain, as is evident from the context, from ver. 17. and other paſſages of Scripture: "Reſpect and maintain the widows, who are (what that word importeth) really χήρας, that is, bereaved and deſolate."

Ver. 4. Nephews] Grand-children. Wat.

Ver. 5. Night and day] That is, continually; morning and evening, and on every proper occaſion, whether by night or by day. See 1 Theſſ. v. 17.

Ver. 6. But ſhe that liveth in pleaſure] The Jews had a common ſaying among them, "that wicked men, whilſt they live, are to be reckoned among the dead." The Pythagoreans built empty tombs for thoſe who had revolted from philoſophy; and it was reckoned a beautiful thought in Pythagoras, and other ancient heathens, "that a worthleſs man is a dead man." That the ſame thought is not as much admired in St. Paul (with whom it is very frequent) can proceed from nothing but an unreaſonable partiality for what is of heathen extraction, and an ungenerous contempt of what is Jewiſh or Chriſtian: however, Grotius ſuſpects that Pythagoras received this obſervation from the people of the eaſt, and more particularly from the Jews. The word σπαταλῶσα, which we may render living in pleaſure, [in wantonneſs and ſenſuality] properly ſignifies faring deliciouſly, and expreſly refers to drinking ſtrong and coſtly liquors. See Druſius, Grotius, Benſon, and Div. Leg. b. ii. ſect. 4.

Ver. 7. That they may be blameleſs] Some would refer this to the widows; but the gender of the word ἀνεπίληπτοι rather favours our referring it either to the deacons, or to Timothy's hearers in general; ſince it is certain that widows were not the only perſons who, in ſo luxurious a city as Epheſus, were in danger of falling into ſuch ſenſualities as he had been warning them againſt. See Doddridge and Calmet.

Ver. 8. For his own, &c.] That is, "for his own relations, and his own domeſtics;—thoſe of his own family:" Denying the faith, is here, according to St. Paul, leading a wicked life, or living and acting contrary to the moral law, which is adopted in the Chriſtian law. Suppoſe the man of whom the Apoſtle is here ſpeaking, to have believed every article of the creed; yet, as long as he provided not for his own family, St. Paul declares, that ſuch an one had thereby denied the faith; and was ſo much worſe than one guilty of error in ſpeculation, as to be worſe even than an infidel himſelf: for the heathens were ſenſible of the reaſonableneſs and neceſſity of taking care of their near relations. Others have interpreted the paſſage thus: "Every ſuch Chriſtian is in effect an apoſtate, (as denying the faith ſeems to import,) and that is worſe than being an infidel, becauſe the former ſins againſt greater light and obligations." See Benſon, Whitby, and Fleetwood on Relative Duties, diſc. 5.

Ver. 9. Be taken into the number] Be put upon the liſt, is the preciſe ſignification of καταλεγέσθω. Surely none can imagine that the Apoſtle meant to confine the charity of the church to widows of ſuch an age, and who had all theſe characters. We muſt therefore conclude, that he ſpeaks of thoſe who bore the office of deaconeſſes, who were probably entruſted with the care of entertaining Chriſtian ſtrangers, whether miniſters or others; and perhaps of entertaining ſome poor children, who might be maintained by the alms of the church: and it might be very proper on many accounts, and for very obvious reaſons, that this office ſhould be committed only to perſons of an advanced age, and ſuch as had laid aſide all thoughts of marrying again. It is evident that they who had practiſed hoſpitality themſelves in their more proſperous days, would be particularly fit for one part of this office, and peculiarly worthy of the countenance which this office gave, and of the truſt which it implied. We find that theſe widows were to be ſuch as had been the wife of one man: It is very certain that ſecond marriages in the general are not condemned by Chriſtianity; and it would be a great objection againſt it if they were. The Apoſtle expreſly adviſes the younger widows to marry again, ver, 14. and it would ſeem very hard to exclude them afterwards from this office, (how fit ſoever they might be for it on other accounts,) merely becauſe they had done ſo. The meaning of the expreſſion may be, "one who has chaſtely confined herſelf to one huſband, while in the married relation:" For it is certain that it was never uſual among the Jews, or the Greeks, to admit women to have more than one huſband at once. See the note ch. iii. 2. Benſon, Schmidius, Bengelius, Doddridge, and Bowyer's Conjectures.

10 Well reported of for good works; if ſhe have brought up children, if ſhe have lodged ſtrangers, if ſhe have waſhed the ſaints feet, if ſhe have relieved the afflicted, if ſhe have diligently followed every good work.

11 But the younger widows, refuſe: for when they have begun to wax wanton againſt Chriſt, they will marry;

12 Having damnation, becauſe they have caſt off their firſt faith.

13 And withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from houſe to houſe; and not only idle, but tatlers alſo, and buſy-bodies, ſpeaking things which they ought not.

14 I will therefore that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the houſe, give none occaſion to the adverſary to ſpeak reproachfully.

15 For ſome are already turned aſide after Satan.

16 If any man or woman that believeth, have widows, let them relieve them, and let not the church be charged; that it may relieve them that are widows indeed.

17 Let the elders that rule well, be counted worthy of double honour; eſpecially they who labour in the word and doctrine.

18 For the ſcripture ſaith, Thou ſhalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn: And, The labourer is worthy of his reward.

19 Againſt an elder receive not an accuſation, but before two or three witneſſes.

20 Them that ſin, rebuke before all, that others alſo may fear.

21 I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the elect angels, that thou obſerve theſe things, without preferring one before another, doing nothing by partiality.

22 Lay hands ſuddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men's ſins: keep thyſelf pure.

23 Drink no longer water, but uſe a little wine, for thy ſtomach's ſake, and thine often infirmities.

24 Some men's ſins are open beforehand, going before to judgement; and ſome men they follow after.

25 Likewiſe alſo the good works of ſome are manifeſt before-hand; and they that are otherwiſe cannot be hid.

Of the duty of ſervants. Not to have fellowſhip with new-fangled teachers. Godlineſs is great gain, and love of money the root of all evil. What Timothy is to flee, and what

Ver. 10. If ſhe have waſhed the ſaints feet] It was an uſual piece of civility, as well as a great refreſhment in the eaſtern countries, to waſh a perſon's feet, or to take care that it ſhould be done for him. See Gen. xviii. 4. xix. 2. Luke vii. 38, 44. John xiii. 5, 14, 15.

Ver. 11. When they have begun to wax wanton againſt Chriſt] Καταστρηνιάσωσι is a ſtrong expreſſion, which cannot be exactly rendered into Engliſh. When theſe widows grew negligent of their proper duty, ſenſual affections might prevail upon them; and their credit among Chriſtians being hurt by ſuch an unbecoming conduct, it is very probable they might often be forced to take up with heathen huſbands, and ſo be led to apoſtatize from Chriſtianity. See Stockius, Mintert, and Wolſius.

Ver. 12. Having damnation, &c.] Wherein they are much to be condemned, becauſe they violate their former engagement. Heylin.

Ver. 13. And withal—to be idle, &c.] And moreover, being idle, they get a habit of rambling fom houſe to houſe, and are not only idle, but triflers, φλύαροι:—a word derived from φλύειν, which ſignifies the noiſemade by water, when it is ready to boil over; and ſo well expreſſes the inward fermentation (if we may ſo ſpeak) in the minds of theſe trifling people, which they vented by unprofitable diſcourſes. See Heylin, Raphelius, Heinſius, and Caſtalio.

Ver. 17. Let the elders, &c.] The Apoſtle proceeds to give directions concerning elders, and that under three heads: Firſt, with reſpect to the proviſion which the church was to make for them, eſpecially for the diligent among them. Secondly, with reſpect to Timothy's reproving them, which was not to be done but upon good evidence; and if well atteſted, it was to be done publickly, for a warning to others. This being an ungrateful work, he charges it upon Timothy in the moſt ſolemn manner. And then, thirdly, with reſpect to Timothy's ordaining of elders, he adviſes that it be done upon mature and deliberate conſideration; and particularly upon a full inquiry into their characters. In the midſt of theſe faithful and wiſe admonitions, he drops ſome brief directions concerning Timothy's health, as conſidering his life of great importance to the Chriſtian church. ver. 17—25. By elders here, are meant ſuch who bore office in the Chriſtian church; and perhaps theſe here ſpecified were the firſt fruits or firſt converts in the Chriſtian church at Epheſus. The Apoſtle exhorts that they ſhould be counted worthy of double honour, i. e. ſhou'd be maintained in a liberal and reſpectful manner. Dr. Heylin renders the verſe, Let the prieſts who diſcharge their office well, be conſidered as perſons who deſerve an ample recompence; eſpecially thoſe who are employed in preaching and teaching. See Benſon, Lightfoot, and Limborch.

Ver. 18. The labourer is worthy of his reward] This paſſage occurs no where in the New Teſtament, except here and Luke x. 7. St. Luke was the companion of St. Paul, and wrote his Goſpel, as it were, under the inſpection and guidance of that Apoſtle; inſomuch that ſome of the ancients have applied that Goſpel to St. Paul, and called it his Goſpel. See Benſon, and Seed's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 292.

Ver. 20. Them that ſin, rebuke] This was according to the cuſtom of the ſynagogue. See Vitring. de Vet. Synag. p. 729.

Ver. 21. And the elect angels] That is, "Thoſe angels who having kept their ſtations, when ſo many of their fellows were ſeduced by Satan, are now confirmed in a ſtate of immutable felicity, and ſhall attend our common Lord to the awful judgement of the great day." Mede interprets this of the ſeven archangels choſen by God to the greateſt nearneſs to him, and higheſt honours in the court of heaven;—in reference to the manner of eaſtern courts. See his works, p. 42.

Ver. 22. Lay hands ſuddenly on no man] "Suddenly and raſhly, before his character and qualifications have been fully examined, and thoroughly approved." See Raphelius, and Bp. Hoadly of Epiſcopacy, p. 392.

Ver. 23. Drink no longer water] One cannot forbear reflecting here how very temperate Timothy muſt have been, to need an advice of this kind, which amounts to no more than mingling a little wine with his water: And what is ſaid of his many infirmities, compared with the Apoſtle's exhortation to him to be inſtant in preaching the word, may certainly teach us, that every weakneſs of conſtitution is not to be acquieſced in, as an excuſe for not going on with the miniſtry; though, doubtleſs, great allowances are to be made for bodily infirmities, and life itſelf may often depend upon ſeaſonable interruptions of public labour. Sir Norton Knatchbul, obſerving that the connection is ſo broken between the 22d and 24th verſes by the inſertion of the advice in this verſe, conjectures, that St. Paul might write it in the margin, by way of poſtſcript, and that it was introduced into the text by the miſtake of ſome early tranſcriber. The 24th and 25th verſes contain reaſons for being cautious in ordination, mentioned ver. 22. See Doddridge, Heylin, Wetſtein, and Calmet.

Ver. 24. Some—are open beforehand, &c.] Are notorious, going before to judgement, and ſome men's follow after. Wat.

to follow; and whereof to admoniſh the rich. To keep the purity of true doctrine, and to avoid profane janglings.

LET as many ſervants as are under the yoke, count their own maſters worthy of all honour; that the name of God, and his doctrine, be not blaſphemed.

2 And they that have believing maſters, let them not deſpiſe them, becauſe they are brethren; but rather do them ſervice, becauſe they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit. Theſe things teach and exhort.

3 If any man teach otherwiſe, and conſent not to wholſome words, even the words of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and to the doctrine which is according to godlineſs;

4 He is proud, knowing nothing, but doating about queſtions and ſtrifes of words, whereof cometh envy, ſtriſe, railings, evil ſurmiſings,

5 Perverſe diſputings of men of corrupt minds, and deſtitute of the truth, ſuppoſing that gain is godlineſs: from ſuch withdraw thyſelf.

6 But godlineſs with contentment is great gain:

7 For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out:

8 And having food and raiment let us be therewith content.

9 But they that will be rich, fall into temptation, and a ſnare, and into many fooliſh and hurtful luſts, which drown men in deſtruction and perdition.

10 For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while ſome coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themſelves through with many ſorrows.

11 But thou, O man of God, flee theſe things; and follow after righteouſneſs, godlineſs, faith, love, patience, meekneſs.

12 Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art alſo called, and haſt profeſſed a good profeſſion before many witneſſes.

Chap. VI. Ver. 1. Whether the law, "that the Jews ſhould none of them remain ſlaves for life, without their own conſent," (Exod. xxi. 2—6.) might give occaſion to introduce ſomething like it into the Chriſtian church, or whatever gave riſe to it, it appears, that the Judaizers abſolved men from civil duties, and would have increaſed their party, by drawing ſlaves into the Chriſtian church, under the notion of their being thereby rendered freed men: In oppoſition to which the Apoſtle enjoins ſlaves to continue to reſpect, and faithfully to ſerve their own maſters, whether Chriſtians or not, unleſs they could obtain their freedom in a fair and legal manner. Timothy was to warn the Judaizers not to teach differently from the Apoſtle in this particular, nor in any other to gratify the humours of their hearers, merely to enrich themſelves. ver. 1—16. That this diſcourſe was levelled againſt ſuch falſe teachers, appears not only from the beginning of ver. 3. but alſo from ver. 10, 11. where he dehorts Timothy from following their example. It may be proper to obſerve, that though no Jew was obliged to remain a ſlave for life without his own conſent, yet the Jews might retain heathen ſlaves, and tranſmit them from generation to generation. Lev. xxv. 44—46. Slavery, therefore, in all caſes was not judged unlawful; not even ſlavery for life. Slaves, upon embracing Chriſtianity, became the ſervants and people of God; but they were not thereupon to be ſet free upon the year of jubilee, if their maſters had bought them for life: for the Chriſtian law is not a national law, as the Jewiſh law was: as to civil duties or privileges, it meddles not with them: what belongs to religion concerns the Chriſtian; but civil rights and injuries concern the man, as a member of civil ſociety, not as a member of the Chriſtian church. Chriſtianity might indeed make ſlaves more faithful and conſcientious, or ſweeten the temper of a maſter, and make him more benevolent and ready to treat his ſlave with humanity, or to grant him his freedom; but concerning particular civil rights or duties, Chriſtianity meddleth not. See on Philem. ver. 14. Locke, Benſon, and Calmet.

Ver. 2. Becauſe they are faithful and beloved, &c.] Becauſe they who partake of their good ſervice are faithful and beloved. Wat. Dr. Heylin reads, But ſerve them better, becauſe they are Chriſtians, and to be loved, as partakers of the ſame advantages. See the Syriac verſion, Kuſter, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 3. And conſent not to wholeſome words] Dr. Bentley ſuppoſes, that the original reading was not προσέρχεται, but προσέχεται, or rather προσέχει; adhere, or give heed to. See ch. i. 4. and Phileleutherus Lipſienſis, p. 72.

Ver. 4. But doting about queſtions] But raving on queſtions. MS. The original word ſeems to expreſs the effect of a diſeaſe upon the mind. See Bp. Wilkins's Sermons, p. 73. Dr. Heylin reads, Knows nothing, but has the diſeaſe of diſputation, and controverſy about words.

Ver. 5. Suppoſing that gain is godlineſs] That godlineſs is gain. Peirce. Who conſider piety as a means to enrich themſelves. Heylin. Compare Philip. iii. 19. Dr. Waterland, after many good MSS, leaves out the laſt clauſe.

Ver. 6. But godlineſs with contentment, &c.] Piety, indeed, with contentment, is great riches. Heylin. Diodati thinks αὐτάρκεια here ſignifies a competency; but it gives a much nobler ſenſe, to ſuppoſe the Apoſtle intimates that contentment will attend piety, as its inſeparable companion; and conſequently, that the pious man will be happy, whatever his circumſtances may be, and even much more ſo than any accumulation of worldly wealth can make him.

Ver. 10. Have pierced themſelves through, &c.] "Have felt long and incurable pains, by the numerous wounds they have given to their own conſciences, as it were, on every ſide." The original word περιέπειραν is very emphatical, and properly ſignifies, "They have ſtabbed themſelves, as it were, from head to feet, ſo as to be all covered with wounds." And this indeed happily expreſſes the innumerable outrages done to conſcience by thoſe madmen, who have taken up the fatal reſolution, that they will at all adventures be rich. See Mintert, Leigh, and Doddridge.

Ver. 12. Fight the good fight of faith] Strive generouſly for the faith; ſecure to yourſelf eternal life, &c. St. Paul, Heb. xiii. 22. ſays, that Timothy was ſet at liberty; whence we may conclude, that he had been put in priſon, on account of the faith, and on that occaſion made the profeſſion ſpoken of in this verſe;—and the rather, becauſe the profeſſion of Chriſt before Pilate is mentioned in the following verſe. Heylin. Doddridge reads, Maintain the good combat of faith; and obſerves very juſtly, that theſe and the following words are plainly agoniſtical, and refer to the eagerneſs with which they who contended in the Grecian games ſtruggled for and laid hold of the crown; and the degree to which the preſence of many ſpectators, or, as the Apoſtle elſewhere ſpeaks, the clouds of witneſſes, animated them in their conteſts for it. See Lardner's Sermons, p. 270.

Ver. 13. Who quickeneth all things] This ſeems a very ſuitable, though oblique intimation, that ſhould Timothy, after the example of his great Lord, ſacrifice his life to the honour of his profeſſion, God, who raiſed up Chriſt from the dead, was equally able to raiſe him; and this is moſt fully expreſſed and urged, 2 Tim. ii. 8—11. The next clauſe refers to John xviii. 37. Chriſt's confeſſion before the Jewiſh high-prieſt, when interrogated upon oath, was rather more expreſs; but this before Pilate was more dangerous; as his owning himſelf a King, was the ſole pretenſion likely to expoſe him to the reſentment of the Roman governor, who had the ſupreme power of life and death. It is perhaps called a good confeſſion; not only as in itſelf noble and generous, but as all our hopes of ſalvation and happineſs are built upon the truth of it. See Doddridge, Benſon, and Calmet.

14 That thou keep this commandment without ſpot, unrebukeable, until the appearing of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt:

15 Which in his times he ſhall ſhew, who is the bleſſed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords;

16 Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath ſeen, nor can ſee: to whom be honour and power everlaſting. Amen.

17 Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor truſt in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy;

18 That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to diſtribute, willing to communicate;

19 Laying up in ſtore for themſelves a good foundation againſt the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life.

20 O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy truſt, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppoſitions of ſcience, falſely ſo called:

21 Which ſome profeſſing, have erred concerning the faith. Grace be with thee. Amen.

The firſt to Timothy was written from Laodicea, which is the chiefeſt city of Phrygia Pacatiana.

Ver. 16. Whom no man hath ſeen, nor can ſee] This might be an alluſion either to the eaſtern courts, where the people were not admitted into the royal preſence, or to behold the face of their king; Or, to the inacceſſible light and glory in which God dwelt in the Holy of Holies:—or perhaps, to both. See Exod. xxxiii. 20. 1 John iv. 12, 20.

Ver. 17.] As the Apoſtle had given directions concerning ſome of the judaizing Chriſtians, who attempted to enrich themſelves by preaching the Goſpel in a diſhoneſt manner, he here gives directions concerning ſuch Chriſtians, as were already poſſeſſed of riches; namely, that they ſhould not be proud and ſelfiſh, but pious, and humble towards God; generous, and ready to do good to their fellow-creatures; that when they had done with all the poſſeſſions and concerns of the preſent life, they might have ſatisfaction in the review, and be bleſſed with greater, and more durable poſſeſſions. ver. 17—19. And that he might leave Timothy with the ſtrongeſt impreſſions of the folly and wickedneſs of the judaizing Chriſtians, he concludes, as he had begun, with charging Timothy to adhere to the true and ſimple Chriſtian doctrine, and to reject all Jewiſh mixtures. ver. 20, 21. Some would read the beginning of the preſent verſe, Charge them that are rich, not to be high-minded in this world,—but to truſt in God; thus preſerving the oppoſition between the two parts of the ſentence. See 1 Cor. iii. 18. Benſon, and Bowyer's Conjectures.

Ver. 18. Rich in good works, &c.] If the phraſes in this verſe have a different ſignification, the following expoſition of Archbp. Sharpe's may perhaps be as ſatisfactory as any other. "Let them endeavour, in the general, to do good;—not only now and then, in ſome ſcanty proportion, but frequently, conſtantly, and abundantly; not only with their time, labour, and intereſt, but by diſtributing of their ſubſtance too: And this as freely, as if it were a common ſtock, to which all had a right." See his Sermons, vol. i. p. 136.

Ver. 19. A good foundation] As laying up in ſtore a good foundation is a very diſcordant metaphor, ſome, inſtead of ϑεμέλιον, would read κειμήλιον, a treaſure; or ϑέμα λίαν καλὸν, a very good depoſit. Perhaps the Apoſtle alluded to an expreſſion in the book of Tobit, where he preſſes men to give alms in proportion to what they have, by this motive; For thou treaſureſt up for thyſelf a good treaſure, or depoſit,—ϑέμα—againſt the day of neceſſity. Now ϑέμα might either be the original reading here, or ϑεμέλιον, uſed as a word of the ſame import; the latter of which is preferable, as there is no MS to countenance the former. See on 2 Tim. ii. 19. Le Clerc, Benſon, Petit Var. Lect. cap. xi. Mill, Wetſtein, and the Reflections.

Ver. 21. Concerning the faith] See ch. i. 5, 6. By faith here is probably meant true Chriſtianity, free from Jewiſh mixtures. This may perhaps be one reaſon, why Chriſtianity is called faith, and the Jewiſh religion the law, or works; viz. becauſe the primary duty required of Chriſtians is, to believe in God, and particularly in that moſt perfect revelation of his will, which he hath made in the Goſpel. Whereas, what the judaizing Chriſtians contended for, St. Paul called ſimply the law, and works, without any other addition or diſtinction. He, therefore, that believeth the Chriſtian doctrine, doth not depart from the faith; though he doth not obſerve the works of the law of Moſes. But, if he do not obſerve and do the works which the Chriſtian religion requires, he hath erred from the faith, and cannot be juſtified by his faith; but is declared by the Apoſtle to be worſe than an infidel. See ch. v. 8. and Benſon.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 17—19.

Duty and intereſt are the two great ſprings of human actions. Duty ſtands enforced by reaſon, and intereſt by ſelf-love: And where both theſe concur, it ſhould ſeem that nothing can withſtand them. Both are propoſed in the paſſage before us, which enjoins alms-giving as our duty, and recommends it as our intereſt.

I. As to the firſt there can be no doubt, when we conſider from whom, and to what end we have received our riches. Many, who have ſucceeded to their wealth by inheritance, look no farther, but intent only upon enjoying it, regard not whence, nor why it comes to them; not conſidering, that all an hereditary right implies, is, that God gave their anceſtors the goods which they now poſſeſs, and provided for them, even perhaps before they were born. Others, who have got an eſtate by their labour, or care, or ſkill, think it ſufficiently earned by the pains they have taken: They make no grateful return for the bleſſing of Providence upon their endeavours, but keep, or ſpend their riches, as what they have an abſolute right to uſe at pleaſure, without any reflexion upon the account they are to give of them. To ſuch, the admonition of Moſes is very ſeaſonable; Deut. viii. Beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God,—and ſay in thine heart, My power, and the might of my hand, hath gotten me this wealth. But thou ſhalt remember the Lord thy God; for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth. So David acknowledged, when he made the coſtly oblations recorded in the firſt book of Chronicles, Thine, O Lord, is the greatneſs and the power,—for all that is in the heaven, and in the earth, is thine: Both riches and honour come of thee,—all things come of thee; and of THINE OWN have we given unto thee. Ch. xxix. 11, 12, 14.

As therefore riches are the gift of God, we ſhould conſider wherefore he beſtows them.—Are they given to maintain ſloth, to equip vanity, or to pamper luxury?—Are they given for covetouſneſs to hoard, or for prodigality to ſquander? No; for they are the gifts of God, and, as his gifts, intended for our good; for the exerciſe of virtue; to furniſh liberality, to make us the inſtruments of his mercy, the channels through which his proviſion for the poor ſhould paſs, and to enrich us with good works in its way to the relief of their indigence.

The different ranks of rich and poor are, in the intention of Providence, an occaſion of uniting men together: The ſuperfluity on one part ſuits the wants on the other, and ſhould be a proviſion for it: They fit like indentures, where the redundancy fills up the vacancy:—They meet together, as Solomon expreſſes it, Prov. xxii. 2. The rich and the poor meet together; the Lord is the Maker of them all. He made them thus anſwering to each other, that exceſs might ſupply defect, and reduce things to an equality; ſo as to leave no where an uſeleſs abundance, or an helpleſs indigence. The ſuperfluities, therefore, of the rich, are the proviſion appointed for the poor; they are their juſt due, and we defraud them in refuſing it. Ecclus. iv. 1, 3. Such then is our obligation to this duty: It is a part of juſtice, which requires it as an indiſpenſable debt;—and eternal priſons are prepare for thoſe who refuſe payment. See Matth. xxv. 30, 41, 46.

II. To the motive of duty we may add that of intereſt; for ſelf-love is ſo predominant a principle, that to engage men to what is their intereſt, it may be ſufficient to ſhew that it is their intereſt. Our intereſt may be conſidered with regard to the preſent life, or to the future. I ſhall ſpeak firſt of our intereſt in this life:

And by intereſt I mean, that which contributes moſt to our preſent happineſs. This one would think ſhould be ſufficiently underſtood, and yet nothing is more miſtaken; for the greateſt part of mankind, who are in mean circumſtances, think that a good eſtate would gratify all their deſires; and that if fortune (as they call it) would but make them rich, they would make themſelves happy. But thoſe who are rich know the contrary: They know that the mind of man may continue reſtleſs and wretched, in the moſt ſplendid circumſtances of wealth and power;—that wants may multiply faſter than the means to gratify them; and as poverty has its hardſhips and inconveniences, ſo riches too bring with them their troubles, anxieties, and temptations, tations, which ſorely afflict their poſſeſſors, and often render them more miſerable than thoſe, whom poverty and daily labour have ranked in the loweſt ſtations.

But are not they then ſenſible whence the evil proceeds?—Are they not aware, or will they not confeſs, that it ariſes from the abuſe of riches to their own hurt? Does not their reaſon repreſent to ſuch men, that they are themſelves the authors of their miſery?—But why then do they not follow that reaſon's dictates?—Alas! it is becauſe "men who have not a principle of religion, have not the ſtrength to follow their reaſon." They are ſlaves to their appetites and paſſions;—they "are tied and bound with the chain of their ſins;"—they have forſaken God, and are forſaken by him: they will not be governed by God; and therefore he gives them up to their own miſmanagement, on purpoſe to reclaim them by that miſery which they bring on themſelves.

Thus the rich have their trials in their worldly poſſeſſions, which are not their own, but lent them for a time, that by the liberal diſtribution of them, they may be qualified for thoſe divine favours, which would reſtore them to themſeves, to contentment, and to peace. And hence appear the beauty and force of thoſe words of our Lord, Luke xv. 12. If ye have not been faithful in that which is another's, [not man's, but God's. See the note on the place] who will give you that which is your own? Intimating, "that thoſe who are unfaithful in the adminiſtration of his temporal gifts, (which are but a truſt,) forfeit his ſpiritual graces; whereby he would give us that which is our own, by reſtoring us to the poſſeſſion, and conſequently the enjoyment of ourſelves;—which contains the whole of our intereſt with regard to the preſent life."

2. As to our intereſt in the future life, our Lord has in that reſpect declared the danger of riches, with the difficulties of a rich man's being ſaved, ſo poſitively, and with ſuch emphaſis, as ſhould juſtly alarm thoſe of us who find ourſelves in plentiful circumſtances, and make us heedfully examine where this danger lies, that we may eſcape it. Comp. Luke xviii. 24, 25. Now riches may be conſidered with relation to the acquiſition, poſſeſſion, and uſe; in which three reſpects they are too often dangerous. 1. In the acquiſition they are dangerous, when obtained not only by fraud or oppoſition, but alſo by ſuch vehement care and ſolicitude as withdraws our affections from God. 2. They are dangerous in the poſſeſſion, when hoarded by covetouſneſs. And, 3. dangerous in the uſe, when they are ſpent in vanity and luxury. Every rich man muſt incur one at leaſt of theſe dangers, if he does not expend a due proportion of his wealth to the relief and comfort of his poorer brethren.

As to the firſt of them,—the acquiſition of wealth, it is notorious that the ordinary ways of getting an eſtate are too often indirect, or in plain terms, unjuſt. Now if that injuſtice be not repented of, it is impoſſible for ſuch a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven; and if it be repented of, then reſtitution is a neceſſary conſequence. For to repent of an action, implies to wiſh it not done, and conſequently, to undo it to the utmoſt of our power; i. e. to reſtore the unjuſt gains we are poſſeſſed of:—But oftentimes we cannot find the proper owners; and in that caſe, the only remedy is, to refund what has hitherto been wrongfully detained, in ſome work of charity.

The ſecond abuſe of riches, which renders them ſo dangerous, is in the poſſeſſion by covetouſneſs. Covetouſneſs is a vice which no man owns, and few have the ſenſe or ingenuity to diſcover in themſelves; but there is a ſure mark to know it by, and ſuch as may ſerve to undeceive thoſe who moſt deceive themſelves. The rich man, who is not rich in good works, who is not ready to give, and glad to diſtribute, upon proper occaſions, is certainly covetous; and his conſcience will convince him that he is ſo, if he will but conſult it ſincerely, and in the preſence of God.

The third miſchief of riches is, when they miniſter to pride or luxury. Every uncharitable rich man comes under this head, or the former: He either ſpends or lays up the portion which belongs to the poor, and is equally guilty of defrauding them, whether it be by avarice or prodigality. Many reconcile theſe vices, making the one provide for the other; making covetouſneſs the ſteward for luxury. He was of this character, whoſe fooliſh ſoliloquy is recorded in the Goſpel, where it is ſaid that he thus beſpoke his ſoul: Soul, thou haſt much goods laid up for many years; take thine eaſe, eat, drink, and be merry. But God ſaid unto him, Thou fool! this night ſhall thy ſoul be required of thee,—then whoſe ſhall thoſe things be which thou haſt provided?—So is he that layeth up treaſure for himſelf, and is not rich towards God! So are all uncharitable rich men,—and ſuch ſhall be their puniſhment?

In the 25th chapter of St. Matthew's Goſpel, we have from our Lord himſelf the moſt expreſs and fearful declaration upon this ſubject. He there makes the damnation and miſery of uncharitable rich men an article of faith, and ſpecifies the very words of the ſentence which ſhall then be paſſed upon them: Depart from me, ye curſed! &c. In which ſentence he names not their other vices, but mentions only their uncharitableneſs, as the conſummation of all the reſt; and as what finally excludes thoſe from all pretenſions to the mercy of God, who have ſhewed none to their brethren.

Thus then we have ſeen that alms-giving and benevolence to the poor is our duty and our intereſt. Every man is to judge for himſelf who are the proper objects whereon to exert it; and the ineſtimable bleſſings annexed to this noble exerciſe, are clearly pointed out by the God of love in his ſacred word. Be it then our care, in obedience to our Lord's injunction, To make ourſelves friends with the mammon of unrighteouſneſs, that when we fail, they may receive us into everlaſting habitations.

TO

CHAP. I.

Paul's love to Timothy, and the unfeigned faith which was in Timothy himſelf, his mother, and grandmother: he is exhorted to ſtir up the gift of God which was in him, to be ſtedfaſt and patient in perſecution, and to perſiſt in the form and truth of that doctrine which he had learned of him. Phygellus and Hermogenes, and ſuch like are noted, and Oneſiphorus is highly commended.

PAUL, an apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt by the will of God, according to the promiſe of life, which is in Chriſt Jeſus,

2 To Timothy, my dearly beloved ſon: Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and Chriſt Jeſus our Lord.

3 I thank God, whom I ſerve from my forefathers with pure conſcience, that without ceaſing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day;

4 Greatly deſiring to ſee thee, being mindful of thy tears, that I may be filled with joy:

5 When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt firſt in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and I am perſuaded that in thee alſo.

Ver. 2. 1 Tim. i. 2.—V. 3. Rom. i. 8. Epheſ. i. 16. Acts xxii. 3. xxiii. 1. xxiv. 14. Rom. i. 9. 1 Theſſ. i. 2. iii. 10.—V. 5. 1 Tim. i. 5. iv. 6. Acts xvi. 1.

II. TIMOTHY] It is commonly ſuppoſed that this Epiſtle was written during St. Paul's laſt impriſonment at Rome, not very long before he ſealed the truth with his blood, (ch. iv, 6—18.) about the year of our Lord 66, or 67. That Timothy was at Epheſus, or in Leſſer Aſia, when this Epiſtle was ſent to him, appears from the frequent mention in it of perſons reſiding at Epheſus. The falſe teachers, who had before thrown this church into confuſion, grew worſe and worſe every day; inſomuch that Hymeneus and Philetus, two Epheſian heretics, now denied the reſurrection of the dead. They were led into this error by a diſpute about words: at firſt they only annexed improper ſignifications to the word reſurrection, till at laſt they denied the thing; pretending that the reſurrection of the dead was only a reſurrection from the death of ſin, and ſo was already paſt. This error was probably derived from the eaſtern philoſophy, which placed the origin of ſin in the body. The Apoſtle's chief deſign in this Epiſtle ſeems to have been to prepare Timothy for thoſe ſufferings to which he foreſaw he would be expoſed; to forewarn him of the apoſtaſy and corruption which had already begun, and would continue to advance in the church; and at the ſame time to animate him by his own example, and from the motives which the Goſpel furniſhes, to the moſt vigorous and reſolute diſcharge of every part of the ſacred function, to which he had been called. St. Paul appears throughout this Epiſtle, to have felt a ſtrong conviction of the truth of thoſe principles which he had embraced, and to glory in the ſufferings he had endured in the ſupport of them; triumphing in the full aſſurance of being approved by his great Maſter, and of receiving at his hands a crown of diſtinguiſhed luſtre. A behaviour like this, in one who had ſo conſiderable a ſhare in eſtabliſhing the Chriſtian religion, and expected in a ſhort time to ſeal his teſtimony with his blood, muſt be allowed a ſtrong confirmation of the truth of thoſe facts on which our faith depends; that the Apoſtle himſelf was ſincere in what he profeſſed to believe; and that as he could not poſſibly be deceived himſelf, ſo he could have no deſign to deceive others. See Lardner, Michaelis, Benſon, Doddridge, &c.

Ver. 3.] St. Paul, in what follows, ſeems to intimate, that the Judaizers were not only aſhamed of him in his preſent ſufferings, but gloried over him; ſo far were they themſelves from being willing to ſuffer for righteouſneſs ſake. And as the danger in which the Apoſtle then was might probably make too deep an impreſſion upon the mind of Timothy, and of other Chriſtians, he takes occaſion frequently to intimate, that he himſelf is neither afraid nor aſhamed, notwithſtanding his preſent diſtreſs and danger; and he hoped that Timothy would herein imitate him, and perſevere in oppoſing the Judaizers, even more ſtrenuouſly that when the Apoſtle was at liberty to aſſiſt him. Many had gone off to the Judaizers; but labour and patience under ſufferings was the way to glory and victory: Cowardice, and a regard to preſent eaſe, was the way for men to miſs of the glorious reward of eternal life. By ſuch arguments the Apoſtle preſſed Timothy to live piouſly; to continue in his fidelity, and in charity with all true Chriſtians; to preach the pure Goſpel doctrine, and to ſuffer for it with patience and meekneſs: but not by any means to be aſhamed of it, or betray it. ver. 3.—ch. ii. 26. We may obſerve, that as St. Paul had been calumniated by the Jews as an apoſtate from the religion of his forefathers, he therefore declares the contrary here, as he does frequently elſewhere. See Benſon and Heylin.

Ver. 4. Greatly deſiring to ſee you] The intenſe thinking about a ſon, who had endeared himſelf to his father in the Goſpel by a filial anxiety of heart, and many tears; who had ſuffered in all his afflictions, as well as rejoiced in his joy; muſt raiſe the moſt tender ſentiments in the Apoſtle's mind, and make him, though in a priſon, long to ſee and embrace him, that he might give him his dying charge, and devolve the work of preaching and defending the Goſpel upon him, before he left the world. One may ſee in the very expreſſions, the tenderneſs of his ſentiments under thoſe affecting circumſtances, and that he wrote with tears in his eyes, as well as a parental anxiety in his heart. Benſon.

Ver. 5. In thy grandmother Lois, &c.] This is one internal mark of the genuineneſs of this Epiſtle: for we find, Acts xvi. 1. that Timothy was of Jewiſh deſcent by his mother's ſide, but not by his father's. This, and many other ſuch minute particulars could not all of them have been exactly hit upon, if the writers of the New Teſtament had not been in thoſe very circumſtances, in which we ſuppoſe them to have been, when they wrote the ſeveral books aſcribed to them. Perhaps the Apoſtle, in reckoning up the pious anceſtors of the pious Evangeliſt, might have ſome reference to the ſecond commandment: for God will have mercy upon thouſands of generations of them that love him, and keep his commandments. See Benſon and Calmet.

6 Wherefore I put thee in remembrance, that thou ſtir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands.

7 For God hath not given us the ſpirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a ſound mind.

8 Be not thou therefore aſhamed of the teſtimony of our Lord, nor of me his priſoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the goſpel, according to the power of God;

9 Who hath ſaved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpoſe and grace, which was given us in Chriſt Jeſus, before the world began,

10 But is now made manifeſt by the appearing of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, who hath aboliſhed death, and hath brought life and immortality to light, through the goſpel:

11 Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apoſtle, and a teacher of the Gentiles.

12 For the which cauſe I alſo ſuffer theſe things: nevertheleſs, I am not aſhamed: for I know whom I have believed, and am perſuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him againſt that day.

13 Hold faſt the form of ſound words, which thou haſt heard of me, in faith and love which is in Chriſt Jeſus.

14 That good thing which was committed unto thee, keep, by the Holy Ghoſt which dwelleth in us.

15 This thou knoweſt, that all they which are in Aſia be turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.

16 The Lord give mercy unto the houſe of Oneſiphorus; for he oft refreſhed me; and was not aſhamed of my chain.

Ver. 6. 1 Theſſ. v. 19. 1 Tim. iv. 14.—V. 7. Rom. viii. 15.—V. 8. Rom. i. 16. 1 Tim. ii. 6. Phil. i. 7. Col. i. 24.—V. 9. Tit. iii. 4. Rom. iii. 20. ix. 11. Tit. iii. 5. Rom. viii. 28. Rom. xvi. 25. Epheſ. i. 4. iii. 11. Tit. i. 2. 1 Pet. i. 20.—V. 10. Rom. xvi. 26. Col. i. 26. 1 Cor. xv. 54, 55. Hebr. ii. 14.—V. 11. Acts ix. 15. 1 Tim. ii. 7.—V. 12. Epheſ. iii. 1. 1 Pet. iv. 19. Or, truſted. 1 Tim. vi. 20. Ch. iv. 8.—V. 13. Ch. iii. 14. Rom. ii. 20. vi. 17. Tit. i. 9. 1 Tim. i. 14.—V. 14. 1 Tim. vi. 20. V. 15. Ch. iv. 10, 16.—V. 16. Ch. iv. 19. Acts xxviii. 20. Epheſ. vi. 20.

Ver. 6. Stir up the gift of God, &c.] Ἀναζωπυρεῖν properly ſignifies to blow or ſtir up a fire, when it is almoſt dead, or doth not burn ſufficiently. Poſſibly there might be ſome danger, leſt the fierce and zealous oppoſition of the Judaizers, and the perſecution which the Apoſtle and his faithful adherents were then under, ſhould damp Timothy's zeal, and cauſe him to let the ſacred fire lie under embers. See 1 Theſſ. v. 19. 1 Tim. iv. 14. Benſon, Raphelius, and Mintert.

Ver. 7. God hath not given us the ſpirit of fear] St. Paul hath frequent references in his Epiſtles to the terror which accompanied the giving of the law from mount Sinai, and intimates that the judaizing Chriſtians, who were ſo fond of the legal diſpenſation, were of a legal ſpirit;—a ſlaviſh ſpirit of bondage and fear, as if they had the thunder of mount Sinai ſtill in their ears: men of intimidated and mean ſpirits, who were afraid of ſuffering for their religion. But he takes care to point out the freedom and fortitude, the love and diſcretion of the true Chriſtian Spirit; and indeed diſcretion, love, and fortitude ſhould always go hand in hand. See Benſon, Grotius, Doddridge. Inſtead of fear—power, Dr. Waterland reads, cowardlineſs—courage.

Ver. 8. The teſtimony of our Lord] That is, " The Goſpel itſelf; and more particularly the freedom of the Gentile converts from all ſubjection to the law of Moſes. His priſoner, means, " Priſoner on his account, or for his ſake. Heylin reads, Be not then aſhamed of the Goſpel of our Lord, nor of me who am a priſoner upon his account.

Ver. 9. Purpoſe and grace, which was given us, &c.] This grace may be ſaid to be given us in Chriſt Jeſus, before the world began; as the Father ſtipulated with him, through his hand, as well as for his ſake, to give us that grace which we now actually receive. See Whitby, and Doddridge.

Ver. 10. But is now made manifeſt] The controverſies which have been raiſed upon this text are well known; the learned Biſhop of Glouceſter, in particular, having urged it as an undeniable proof, that the doctrine of life and immortality having been brought to light through the Goſpel, was of conſequence kept hid, and out of ſight, till the preaching of the Goſpel: While the no-leſs learned Bp. Sherlock aſſerts, that to bring life and immortality to light, ſignifies to illuſtrate, and make plain, (φωτίζειν,) this great doctrine of religion; to diſpel the doubts and uncertainties in which it is involved, and to give evident proof and demonſtration to the world of a future life and immortality. The reader will find much on the ſubject in the works of theſe writers, with an elaborate defence of Bp. Warburton's opinion, in the "Critical Enquiry into the opinions of the ancient philoſophers;" and of Bp. Sherlock's opinion, in "Dr. Parry's Defence of the Bp. of London."

I am pleaſed to take the firſt poſſible opportunity, not only to quote, but to recommend to my readers, the new Greek and Engliſh Lexicon to the New Teſtament, by my ingenious friend Mr. Parkhurſt; which appears to be compiled with as much judgement as labour; and to be a work no leſs uſeful, than it was wanting. Under the word φωτίζω he obſerves, that it ſignifies " to bring to light," and occurs 1 Cor. iv. 5. and in the preſent text; where, ſays he, the Apoſtle ſpeaks of the grace or favour, which was given or promiſed (ſee Tit. i. 2.) to us in Chriſt Jeſus before eternal ages: φανερωθεῖσαν δὲ νῦν; but is now made manifeſt, διὰ τῆς ἐπιφανείας, by the appearance, of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, (comp. 1 Tim. iii. 16. 1 Pet. i. 19, 20.) who hath actually overcome death; namely, by his death; (Heb. ii. 14.) and hath brought life and incorruption to light by the Goſpel: That is, not the doctrine, but the thing. Chriſt, by actually riſing from the dead, and cauſing this important fact, as fulfilled in and by him, to be publiſhed by the Goſpel; (ſee 1 Cor. xv. 1, 4.) having manifeſted, or exemplified in his own perſon that life and incorruption, which ſhall be the happy lot of all true believers. See 1 Cor. xv. 42, 50—55. So when St. John, 1 Ep. i. 2. ſays, in terms very ſimilar to thoſe of St. Paul, that ἡ ζωὴ ἐφανερώθη, the life was manifeſted, he does not refer to the doctrine of a future or eternal life; but to that which he had ſeen with his eyes, which he had looked upon, and his hands had handled; even the incarnate word, as is evident from the context. The word φωτίσαντος here uſed, is not (as too many have unhappily imagined) in this paſſage oppoſed to the obſcurity of the doctrine of life and immortality, before the coming of Chriſt; but plainly to God's preceding purpoſe, or promiſe of what was afterwards really fulfilled in our Redeemer, as a pledge of what ſhould likewiſe be accompliſhed in all thoſe that are His. See 1 Cor. xv. 23. The reader will obſerve, that the Apoſtle's term is not Ἀθανασίαν, immortality, but Ἀφθαρσίαν, incorruption; as referring to the reſurrection of the body. Comp. Acts xiii. 34—37. and ſee the Reflections.

Ver. 12. That which I have committed unto him] Philo and Joſephus have many paſſages, in which both the ſoul and the law are, in different views, called Παραθήκη, the depoſitum of God. The ſoul, as it is ſaid, is to be returned into the hands of God, and committed to his care at death; and this, they tell us, may be done more chearfully, in proportion to the degree in which care has been taken, to maintain the honour of his law with due fidelity. Dr. Bentley, underſtanding the Goſpel, by the depoſit, would read the clauſe thus, That you will be able to keep what I have delivered unto you until that day; but it ſeems much more natural and reaſonable to underſtand the Apoſtle as ſpeaking of his own ſoul. In the 14th verſe he ſpeaks of the Goſpel in his uſual manner, applying the phraſe he had employed in this verſe in a different ſenſe. See 1 Tim. vi. 14. Whitby, Benſon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 13. Hold faſt the form of ſound words] Hold faſt in faith and love, &c. the form of ſound words, &c. Bengelius. Retain well the idea of ſalutary doctrine which you have learned of me, concerning Chriſtian faith and charity. Heylin. Ὑποτύπωσις, rendered form, ſignifies ſometimes the ſame with τύπος; that is, a plan, model, or pattern: In which ſenſe it may be underſtood here. See Rom. vi. 17. And ſurely, none can expreſs the mind and will of God in ſounder words, or more apt phraſes than the Apoſtles, who were under the immediate and extraordinary illumination of the Spirit. Sound words ſignify the pure Goſpel doctrine, delivered in the plain ſimple manner of the Apoſtles; and that as it leads men to a pious virtuous life, and does not lay the chief ſtreſs upon ceremonies, and external things. See Benſon, Barrington, Wetſtein, and Archbp. Tillotſon's Works, vol. ii. p. 38.

Ver. 15. That all they which are in Aſia be turned away] Hereby was the prophecy fulfilled, Acts xx. 29, 30. The Aſiaticks were infamous for their cowardice and effeminacy. St. Paul, it has been thought, alludes to their behaviour at Rome, ch. iv. 16. of which Timothy might have been informed by travellers; but the text plainly intimates, that they were perſons who were ſtill in Aſia. The Apoſtle poſſibly mentions Phygellus and Hermogenes as known to Timothy, or as having diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their profeſſion; ſo that there was particular reaſon to expect a different conduct from them. See Whitby, Benſon, and Calmet.

17 But when he was in Rome, he ſought me out very diligently, and found me.

18 The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day. And in how many things he miniſtered unto me at Epheſus, thou knoweſt very well.

CHAP. II.

He is exhorted again to conſtancy and perſeverance, and to do the duty of a faithful ſervant of the Lord, in dividing the word aright, and ſhunning profane and vain babblings. Of Hymeneus and Philetus. The foundation of the Lord is ſure. He is taught

Ver. 18. The Lord grant unto him, &c.] This is a common Hebraiſm. See Gen. i. 26, 27. ix. 6, 16. xix. 24. Iſai. viii. 18. 1 Cor. i. 7, 8. Some by the Lord firſt mentioned would underſtand our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and refer of the Lord to God the Father.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 10.

From the paſſage before us, we are naturally led as well to conſider the evidence which mankind had for the doctrine of immortality before the coming of Chriſt, and the evidence which the Goſpel now affords; as to ſhew where the former evidence failed, and how it is ſupplied by the latter.

I. Now, not to take up time in a minute examination of the ſeveral arguments for the ſoul's immortality, which are to be found in heathen writers, we may obſerve, that the doctrine hath obtained common conſent, and that common conſent is the voice and law of nature.

A belief and perſuaſion of the certainty of a future life aroſe from the common ſenſe men have of the difference of good and evil, and of every man's being accountable for the things done in this world; which account not being taken in this world,—as the leaſt degree of obſervation will enable men to ſee,—they concluded, or rather they felt from the very force of reaſon and conſcience, that there was an account to be given hereafter. Such an internal argument as this, which ſprings up in the heart, and from the heart of every man, has a weight in it greater than all the reaſonings of philoſophy put together; and will tie men down, if not to hope for, yet at leaſt to fear a future immortality; either of which is the ſilent voice of nature, teſtifying the reality of a life to come.

As to ſuch as imagine that the notion of a future life aroſe from the deſcriptions and inventions of poets,—They may juſt as well ſuppoſe that eating and drinking had the ſame original; and that men had never thought of it, but for the fine feaſts and entertainments which are deſcribed in ſuch writers. The poets were the papiſts of antiquity, who corrupted the genuine ſentiments of nature, and obſcured the light of reaſon, by introducing the wild conceits of folly and ſuperſtition; and when once they had grafted the ſlips of ſuperſtition upon the ſtock of nature, they throve ſo faſt, and grew ſo rank, that the natural branches were even ſtarved by the luxuriancy of this wild olive.—But ſtill the root was natural, though the fruit was wild. All that nature teaches is, "that there is a future life, diſtinguiſhed into different ſtates of happineſs and miſery, in which men will be rewarded or puniſhed, according as they have purſued or neglected the rules of virtue and honour." And this notion prevailed where the fables of Greece had never been heard of; and wicked men felt in themſelves the fear of the wrath which is to come, though they had never ſo much as learned the name of Tantalus, or Siſyphus, or any other ſufferer in the poet's ſcene of hell.

The natural evidence then of life and immortality ſtands equally clear of the inventions of poetry, and the ſubtilties and refinements of philoſophy; and though it be allied to both, yet it aroſe from neither. The poets found men in poſſeſſion of the doctrine of a future ſtate of rewards and puniſhments: Upon this foundation they went to work, and the plain draught of nature was almoſt hid under the ſhades and colours with which they endeavoured to beautify and adorn it. The philoſophers found the ſame perſuaſion in themſelves and others; and,—as their profeſſion led them,—ſought out for phyſical reaſons to ſupport the cauſe. How far any or all of theſe inquiries into nature have ſucceeded, is another queſtion. As to the preſent point, it is plain that the natural evidence is not concerned in their ſucceſs, whatever it is: for the natural evidence is prior to their inquiries, and ſtands upon another footing,—upon the common ſenſe and apprehenſion of mankind: and though the ſchools may determine the ſoul to be fire, or air, or harmony, or whatever elſe they pleaſe;—yet ſtill nature will make every man feel, that the grave cannot ſecure him from appearing before the great tribunal, to which he is accountable.

The ſenſe of nature alone would have directed all men aright; but philoſophy has miſguided many. Cicero, one of the beſt judges of antiquity, tells us plainly, "that the reaſon why many rejected the belief of the ſoul's immortality was, becauſe they could not form a conception of an unbodied ſoul." So that infidelity is of no older a date than philoſophy; and a future ſtate was not doubted of, till men had puzzled and confounded themſelves in their ſearch after the phyſical reaſon of the ſoul's immortality; and, profeſſing themſelves wiſe, became fools.

The vulgar of ancient times ſpoke of men after death juſt in the ſame manner as they did of men on earth; and the great philoſopher juſt mentioned obſerves, that the "common error," as he calls it, ſo far prevailed, that "they ſuppoſed ſuch things could not be tranſacted in the future world, which could neither be done, nor conceived to be done, without bodies." So great was the force of nature,—ever ſuggeſting to them that men ſhould live again,—that they continued to imagine men with bodies in another life, having no other notion or conception of men.

But with the learned nothing was held to be more abſurd, than to think of having bodies again in another ſtate:—and yet they knew that the true foundation of immortality was laid in this point, That the ſame individuals ſhould continue. The natural conſequence, therefore, from theſe principles was, to exclude the body from being any part of the man: and all who aſſerted an immortality, it is thought, agreed in this notion. The Platoniſts undoubtedly did, and Cicero has every where declared it to be his opinion: Tu habeto, ſays he, Te non eſſe mortalem, ſed Corpus: nec enim is es quem forma iſta declarat; ſed mens cujuſque is eſt quiſque. "It is not you, but your body, which is mortal: for you are not what you appear to be; but it is the mind which is the man."—And hence the Corporealiſts rejected the opinion of immortality; for ſince it was univerſally agreed among the learned, that all that was corporeal in man died, they, who had no notion of any thing elſe, neceſſarily concluded that the whole man died.

From this view we may judge how the cauſe of immortality ſtood, and what difficulties attended it, upon the foot of natural religion;—But it may be worth inquiry, how nature comes to be thus defective in this material point. Did not God intend men originally for religious creatures?—And if he did, is it not reaſonable to expect an original and conſiſtent ſcheme of religion?—which yet, in the point now before us ſeems to be wanting. The account of this we cannot learn from reaſon or nature; but in the Sacred Hiſtory the fact is cleared beyond diſpute.

The abſurdity, upon the common notion of immortality, ariſes from the diſſolution of the body at death; and the great difficulty upon the foot of nature is, how to preſerve the individuals for judgement, which are evidently deſtroyed by death. Now if this death was really a breach of the ſtate of nature, it is no wonder it ſhould be a difficulty in the religion of nature; for the religion of nature was moſt certainly adapted to the ſtate of nature: And the wiſe man tells us, (Wiſd. i. 13—16.) that God made not death: for he created all things that they might have being; and the generations of the world were healthful, and there is no poiſon of deſtruction in them, nor the kingdom of death upon earth; For righteouſneſs is immortal: But ungodly men, with their works and words, called it to them. If immortality was the condition of the creation; if death came in as a ſurpriſe upon nature; no wonder if ſhe ſtands mute and aſtoniſhed at the fatal change, and ſeems neither willing to part with her hopes of immortality, nor yet able to maintain them. God made man immortal, and gave him conſiſtent hopes and fears: man made himſelf mortal by ſin. Muſt not then thoſe hopes, which were conſiſtent hopes upon the foot of immortality, become very abſurd, when joined to a ſtate of mortality?—And thus the coming in of death obſcured the hopes of immortality.

II. If we conſider how our Saviour has enlightened this doctrine, it will appear that he has removed the difficulty at which nature ſtumbled. As death was no part of the ſtate of nature, ſo the difficulties ariſing from it were not provided for in the religion of nature. To remove theſe was the proper work of revelation: Theſe our Lord has effectually cleared by his Goſpel, and ſhewn us, that the body may and ſhall be united to the ſpirit, in the day of the Lord, ſo that the complete man ſhall ſtand before the great tribunal, to receive a juſt recompence of reward for the things done in the body. This account is given us in the paſſage now under conſideration. If the aboliſhing of death was the bringing to light of life and immortality, it is plain that the coming in of death was that which darkened nature in this great point of religion.

There are two things (as we learn from our Saviour's anſwer to the Sadduces, Matth. xxii. 29.) neceſſary to confirm us in the belief of a reſurrection to come; namely, the knowledge of the power of God, and of the will of God: Do ye not err, ſays our Lord, becauſe ye know not the Scriptures, neither the power of God? The Scriptures contain the revelation of the will of God; and therefore it ſhould ſeem that the words are to be underſtood as if he had ſaid, "Ye err, not knowing the will of God, and the power of God." If we are ſatisfied in theſe two points,—that God both can and will raiſe from the dead, we ſhall want nothing to aſſure us of the certainty of a reſurrection. The power of God we may learn from reaſon and nature:—for what ſhould make us doubt but that He, who at the firſt formed man out of duſt and aſhes into a living ſoul, ſhould be able to call him into life again, out of the ſame ſtate? But the Goſpel has declared both his will and his power, which he confirmed in the raiſing his own Son from the grave; and better evidence we could not have for the poſſibility and certainty of a reſurrection.

This evidence of the Goſpel has reinſtated nature in all her hopes, confirmed her right to immortality, and taught her to triumph over death and the grave, which ſeemed before to be unmoveable bars to all her expectations. This has reſtored religion, which had before hardly one ſound foot to ſtand on; and made our faith and our reaſon conſiſtent, which were before at too great a diſtance. Nature indeed taught us to hope for immortality; but it was in ſpite of ſenſe and experience,—till the great Prince of our peace appeared, who brought light and immortality to light through his Goſpel.

whereof to beware, and what to follow after; and in what ſort the ſervant of the Lord ought to behave himſelf.

THOU, therefore, my ſon, be ſtrong in the grace that is in Chriſt Jeſus.

2 And the things that thou haſt heard of me among many witneſſes, the ſame commit thou to faithful men, who ſhall be able to teach others alſo.

3 Thou therefore endure hardneſs, as a good ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt.

4 No man that warreth entangleth himſelf with the affairs of this life; that he may pleaſe him who hath choſen him to be a ſoldier.

5 And if a man alſo ſtrive for maſteries, yet is he not crowned, except he ſtrive lawfully.

6 The huſbandman that laboureth, muſt be firſt partaker of the fruits.

7 Conſider what I ſay; and the Lord give thee underſtanding in all things.

8 Remember that Jeſus Chriſt, of the ſeed of David, was raiſed from the dead, according to my goſpel:

9 Wherein I ſuffer trouble as an evil-doer, even unto bonds; but the word of God is not bound.

10 Therefore I endure all things for the elect's ſakes, that they may alſo obtain the ſalvation which is in Chriſt Jeſus, with eternal glory.

11 It is a faithful ſaying: For if we be dead with him, we ſhall alſo live with him:

12 If we ſuffer, we ſhall alſo reign with him: if we deny him, he alſo will deny us:

13 If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himſelf.

14 Of theſe things put them in remembrance; charging them before the Lord, that they ſtrive not about words, to no profit, but to the ſubverting of the hearers.

15 Study to ſhew thyſelf approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be aſhamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.

Chap. II. Ver. 2. And the things that thou haſt heard of me] The Apoſtles alone had the whole ſcheme of the Chriſtian revelation from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. The Prophets, Evangeliſts, and Elders, as well as other Chriſtians, learned it from the Apoſtles; who, it is plain from hence, as well as from ch. i. 14. and the Revelation of St. John, expected that Chriſtianity would continue in the world after their deceaſe, and deſired and ordered that there ſhould be a ſucceſſion of men to teach it. See Benſon, and Clement's Epiſt. ad Cor. ſect. 44.

Ver. 4. No man that warreth entangleth himſelf, &c.] The Roman ſoldiers were not ſuffered to be tutors to any perſon, curators of another man's eſtate, proctors for other men's cauſes, or to undertake huſbandry or merchandize. See Grotius.

Ver. 5. If a man alſo ſtrive for maſteries] And if a man combat in the publick games, he is not crowned, unleſs he has obſerved the rules preſcribed. Heylin. If in the Grecian games they contended according to the rules preſcribed, and came off conquerors, they were honoured with a crown of parſley, laurel, or bays: In like manner, if Timothy diveſted himſelf of the inordinate love of temporal things, and contended according to the Chriſtian rules, he was at laſt to attain an incorruptible crown of glory. See Benſon, and Weſt's Diſſertation.

Ver. 6. The huſbandman that laboureth, &c.] The huſbandman muſt firſt labour, to partake of the fruits. See Heylin, and Bowyer's Conjectures.

Ver. 7. Give thee underſtanding in all things] Grant you induſtry in all things. Caſtalio. Some read, Conſider what I ſay, for [if you do ſo] the Lord will give you underſtanding in all things. Others connect all things with the next verſe;—In all things remember Jeſus Chriſt,—raiſed from the dead, &c. See Battier, Muſ. Brem. ii. p. 186.

Ver. 8. According to my Goſpel] That is, "The Goſpel which I have preached." St. Paul ſeems to ſay, My Goſpel, by way of emphaſis, in oppoſition to the falſe goſpel, delivered by Hymeneus and Philetus; who perhaps preached, That the reſurrection was paſt: Therefore the Apoſtle calls upon Timothy, To remember Jeſus Chriſt, of the ſeed of David, raiſed from the dead:—The true Meſſiah, lineally deſcended from David; who, like David, endured a variety of ſufferings; but, being raiſed from the dead, affords a thouſand arguments to his followers to ſupport their ſufferings like him, in confident hope of the ſame reſurrection. See Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 9. Wherein] For which. Heylin, and Whitby.

Ver. 10. For the elects ſake] By the elect, St. Paul here ſeems more particularly to mean the Gentile converts; for He ſuffered as the Apoſtle of the Gentiles; and he often intimates, that unleſs he had ſo laboured and ſuffered, and they perſevered in virtue and piety, both he and they would have miſſed of ſalvation and eternal glory. See 1 Theſſ. iii. 5. Comp. with 1 Theſſ. xiv. and Hallet's Notes, page 142.

Ver. 11. It is a faithful ſaying] Some refer theſe words to the concluding clauſe of the former verſe; but it ſeems much more reaſonable to connect them with what follows; as, generally ſpeaking, this phraſe is introductory to the weighty ſentence it is intended to confirm. Heylin reads, This is a certain truth; if we die with him, &c. Archbp. Tillotſon thinks, that this was a celebrated ſaying among Chriſtians, which was either derived by tradition from Chriſt, or ſome of his Apoſtles: And it had ſo powerful a tendency to keep them ſteady to their religion, that it is no wonder it was in frequent uſe. See his works, vol. ii. p. 175.

Ver. 13. If we believe not] If we are unfaithful,—yet he continues faithful; [as well in his threatnings as in his promiſes] he cannot contradict himſelf. Heylin. A man may be unfaithful, by denying the Chriſtian religion, or rejecting it; by corrupting it, or mingling another doctrine with it; or, by living unworthy of it. If we ſhould prove unfaithful any of theſe ways, yet Chriſt is faithful, and muſt diſown us, as being none of his diſciples. The unfaithfulneſs here ſpoken of, ſeems to have been, denying the Chriſtian religion in time of perſecution, in order to avoid ſuffering. See Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 14. Charging them before the Lord] There is a moſt aweful ſolemnity in this charge; which plainly ſhews the great folly and miſchief of ſtriving about little controverſies: And it would be well if all the miniſters of Chriſt were deeply affected with a ſenſe of this, "leſt what they profeſs to hold moſt ſacred, be itſelf torn in pieces, while they are ſtruggling about its fringes." Archbp. Leighton.

Ver. 15. Rightly dividing the word of truth] The Vulgate, no doubt, has given in general the true ſenſe of this expreſſion, by rendering it, Rectè tractantem verbum veritatis; "rightly handling the word of truth: But it is not ſo eaſy to determine, whence in particular the metaphorical word 'Ορθοτομοῦντα, cutting aright, or ſtraight, is taken. Some ſuppoſe it alludes to the cutting up, and dividing the ſacrifices by the Levitical prieſts; others, to the dividing and diſpenſing food at a table, or to the diſtribution made by a ſteward, in delivering out to each perſon under his care ſuch things, as his office and their neceſſities required. Comp. Luke xii. 42. Price refers it to the exact cutting, or poliſhing of ſtone or marble. Chryſoſtom, Theophylact, and Œcumenius explain it of cutting off all ſuperfluous and uſeleſs matter in preaching God's word, (as curriers do, in ſkins they are preparing for uſe; comp. ver. 16.) but Theodoret thinks it is a metaphor taken from huſbandmen. "We commend, ſays he, even thoſe huſbandmen who cut ſtraight furrows: So, that preacher is worthy of praiſe, who follows the rule of the divine oracles." And to this laſt interpretation I muſt confeſs myſelf moſt inclined,—becauſe our bleſſed Lord himſelf illuſtrates the duty of a miniſter of his Goſpel by a ſimilar alluſion, Luke ix. 62.—becauſe St. Paul had juſt before called Timothy Εργατην; which, though applied to other workmen, properly ſignifies an huſbandman;—and alſo becauſe ορθοτομειν in the LXX ſignifies to cut, or make ſtraight, in the only two paſſages of that verſion where it occurs; namely, Prov. iii. 6. xi. 5. To all which we may add, that though it may be doubted whether the verb ορθοτομειν be ever in the Greek writers applied to huſbandmen's plowing, yet in Theocritus, Idyll. x. l. 2. we have ωγμον αγειν ορθον, —to draw, or make a ſtraight furrow." See Parkhurſt on the verb Ορθοτομεω.

16 But ſhun profane and vain babblings: for they will increaſe unto more ungodlineſs.

17 And their word will eat as doth a canker: of whom is Hymeneus and Philetus;

18 Who concerning the truth have erred, ſaying, that the reſurrection is paſt already; and overthrow the faith of ſome.

19 Nevertheleſs, the foundation of God ſtandeth ſure, having this ſeal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. And, Let every one that nameth the name of Chriſt depart from iniquity.

20 But in a great houſe there are not only veſſels of gold, and of ſilver, but alſo of wood, and of earth; and ſome to honour, and ſome to diſhonour.

21 If a man therefore purge himſelf from theſe, he ſhall be a veſſel unto honour, ſanctified and meet for the maſter's uſe, and prepared unto every good work.

22 Flee alſo youthful luſts: but follow righteouſneſs, faith, charity, peace, with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart.

23 But fooliſh and unlearned queſtions avoid, knowing that they do gender ſtrifes.

24 And the ſervant of the Lord muſt not ſtrive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient,

25 In meekneſs inſtructing thoſe that oppoſe themſelves; if God peradventure will give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth;

26 And that they may recover themſelves out of the ſnare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will.

Ver. 17, 18. Of whom is Hymeneus and Philetus] Among the various conjectures concerning the opinion of Hymeneus and Philetus, it ſeems moſt probable that they had ſo far contended about words, as to aſſert that the reſurrection was to be underſtood in a ſpiritual or figurative ſenſe; or that it was the ſame with regeneration,—being born of God, or proſelytiſm, and ſo paſt at baptiſm. We do not ſuppoſe that Marcion, or the Gnoſtics, were ſo early as this; but perhaps they received their opinions from the Judaizers, and therefore, it may illuſtrate what is here ſaid, to mention what is aſcribed to them. Marcion's opinion was, "We muſt not believe a reſurrection of the fleſh, but of the ſoul." The Gnoſtics underſtood both death and the reſurrection in the ſpiritual or figurative ſenſe, and therefore their dogma was, that the reſurrection from the dead is nothing more than acknowledging the truth which they delivered. See Benſon, and Div. Leg. b. iii. ſect. 4. Inſtead of overthrow, Dr. Waterland reads overthrown.

Ver. 19. Nevertheleſs, the foundation, &c.] The word עיקר, oiker, which originally ſignifies a foundation, has ſometimes been applied by the Hebrews to an article of faith; ſometimes to a covenant, bill of contract, bond or obligation. St. Paul has more than once uſed Greek words in the ſame latitude with the Hebrew, as he ſeems to have done here. Indeed Grotius, who took θεμέλιος for "the foundation of a building," interprets, "the ſeal of an inſcription upon the foundation-ſtone," and refers to Zech. iii. 9. iv. 10. Upon which Archbp. Tillotſon has very juſtly obſerved, that in the words of this text the Apoſtle declares to us the terms of the covenant between God and man; for the word θεμέλιος, which is here tranſlated foundation, according to the uſual ſignification, is likewiſe (as learned men have obſerved) ſometimes uſed for an inſtrument of contract, whereby two parties obliged themſelves mutually to each other: and this notion of the word agrees very well with what follows, concerning the ſeal affixed to it, which is very ſuitable to a covenant, but not at all to a foundation. It is true, indeed, as Grotius has obſerved, there uſed anciently to be inſcriptions on foundation-ſtones; and the word σφραγις, which we render a ſeal, may likewiſe ſignify an inſcription;—and then the ſenſe will be very current, thus: The foundation of God ſtandeth ſure, having this inſcription. But it is to be conſidered, that though σφραγις may ſignify an inſcription, yet it is only an inſcription upon a ſeal; which has no relation to a foundation, but is very proper to a covenant, or mutual obligation; and accordingly, the ſeal affixed to this inſtrument or covenant between God and man, is, in alluſion to the cuſtom of thoſe countries, ſaid to have an inſcription on both ſides: On God's part there is this impreſs or inſcription, The Lord knoweth them that are his; that is, "God will own and reward thoſe that are faithful to him:" And on our part,—Let every one that nameth the name of Chriſt depart from iniquity. See 1 Tim. vi. 19. Numb. xvi. 5, 27. Mede's Works, p. 82. Whitby, Tillotſon's Works, vol. i. ſerm. 7. at the beginning, and the Obſervations on Sacred Scripture, p. 427. Dr. Waterland reads and points the verſe thus: But a firm foundation of God ſtandeth, having this ſeal: The Lord knoweth them that are his, and let every one, &c.

Ver. 21. If a man therefore purge himſelf from theſe, &c.] The meaning ſeems to be, that Timothy and other Chriſtians were carefully to avoid the faults of the Judaizers, keeping themſelves pure and clean from their corrupt doctrines and practices, and exerting themſelves to promote the true Goſpel of Chriſt; and then, inſtead of being veſſels merely uſeful in ſome capacity, they would be veſſels unto honour, fitted for the uſe of the maſter of the family, the greateſt and moſt honourable perſon there. God is the great maſter of this large houſe, ver. 20. and good men who exert themſelves are, like the conſecrated veſſels in the temple, fitted for his uſe and ſervice. See Benſon, and Clarke's Sermons, vol. x. ſerm. 4.

Ver. 22. Flee alſo youthful luſts] "Flee from all occaſions of exciting or gratifying the paſſions of youth; whether, on the one hand, the love of ſenſual pleaſure; or, on the other, raſhneſs, contention, pride, and vain-glory, to which young perſons are peculiarly obnoxious." Theſe are youthful paſſions, of the danger of which ſome heady young men, who may value themſelves for their freedom from other ſcandals, ſeem to think but little; yet it is plain from the oppoſition between this and the latter part of the verſe, that they were particularly in St. Paul's mind, when he gave this caution. See Doddridge.

Ver. 26. And that they may recover themſelves] And that they may awaken out of the ſnare of the devil, who have been taken captive by him at his pleaſure. In order to underſtand the beautiful image before us, it is proper to obſerve, that the word Ἀνανήψωσιν properly ſignifies, "to awake from a deep ſleep, or from a fit of intoxication;" and refers to an artifice of fowlers, to ſcatter ſeeds impregnated with ſome drugs, intended to lay birds aſleep, that they might draw the net over them with the greater ſecurity. See Doddridge and Elſner. Some, however, read and connect this verſe with the foregoing: God, peradventure, will give them repentance,—that they may recover themſelves to his will, out of the ſnare of the devil, having being taken captive by him. See Piſcator, Bengelius, Benſon, &c.

Chap. III. Ver. 1. This know alſo] What follows is thought by ſome to contain part of the prophecy concerning the grand apoſtaſy which was to happen in the latter times. If we keep our eye too cloſely upon the place, and conſider what is here ſaid alone, and without comparing it with what St. Paul had ſaid and written to Timothy before, we ſhall perhaps doubt whether this refers to any other time than that in which the Apoſtle wrote; or at the furtheſt, to the time which was immediately to ſucceed. But if we enlarge our view, and take in the whole compaſs of what he hath ſaid about the great apoſtaſy, and endeavour to put ourſelves in the ſituation in which the Apoſtle and the Evangeliſt then were, we ſhall poſſibly ſee things in a very different light: See 2 Theſſ. ii. 7. 1 Tim. iv. 1, &c. From a compariſon of which places it will appear, that he is here propheſying of the ſame grand apoſtaſy as there foretold. Beſides, he never ſays that this prophecy concerning the dreadful times which were to come, was then fulfilled; but on the contrary, ver. 13. he ſhews that the myſtery of iniquity was then only beginning to work, and that wicked men and impoſtors would grow ſtill worſe, deceiving others as well as themſelves: and in ch. iv. 3, 4. after he had bid Timothy uſe his utmoſt diligence, he intimates, that there was ſtill a future time, when men would not endure ſound doctrine; and charges Timothy to do what he could to prevent any ſteps towards that amazing ſcene of wickedneſs. See Benſon, Whitby, and Vitring. Obſerv. Sacr. lib. iv. c. 7.

Ver. 3. Without natural affection] Στοργη is that natural affection which even the brute creatures as well as men manifeſt, in cheriſhing, feeding, and taking care of their young ones; and ἄστοργοι ſignifies perſons diveſted of that natural tenderneſs. The Apoſtle does not mean that God would not implant ſuch a principle in thoſe apoſtates, as well as in other men; but that they would, by their cruelty and other wickedneſs, do all they could to root out ſuch a good diſpoſition, though naturally implanted in them; or at leaſt they would refuſe to act as ſuch a principle would dictate. The word ἄσπονδοι, rendered truce-breakers, ſignifies not only implacable, but treacherous perſons; and may be applied to men, who, when once offended, will come to no treaty of reconciliation;—and alſo to thoſe, who will not think themſelves bound by ſuch treaties, when they may anſwer any purpoſes of their own by a violation of them. See Benſon, Doddridge, and Parkhurſt on the word Ἄσπονδος.

Ver. 4. Traitors] Treacherous. Wat.

Ver. 6. For of this ſort are they, &c.] Some begin this verſe with the laſt clauſe of the preceding. The word rendered creep, ἐνδύνοντες, ſignifies to inſinuate, or ſlide in, like ſnakes. Dr. Waterland reads, who dive into families. This and the next verſe contain a lively deſcription of the practices of the monks and friars, and other religious orders in the church of Rome, who creep into houſes, and by auricular confeſſion, and many other wicked arts, not only dive into the ſecrets of families, but, under the form and pretence of extraordinary ſanctity, delude and corrupt their votaries. See Benſon and Doddridge.

Ver. 8. As Jannes and Jambres] Jannes and Jambres are not mentioned Exod. vii. nor any where elſe in the Old Teſtament; but their names are ſaid to be mentioned, though with ſome variety as to the ſpelling, in both the Talmuds, and in the Targum of Jonathan on Exod. vii. 11. It is remarkable that the former of them is mentioned together with Moſes by Pliny, and both of them by Numenius the philoſopher, (quoted by Euſebius) as celebrated magicians. The Jews affirmed them to have been princes of Pharaoh's magicians, and greatly to have reſiſted Moſes. See Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 30. c. 1. and Euſeb. lib. ix. c. 8.

Ver. 9. But they ſhall proceed no further] Some MSS and printed copies read, not very much further, or not to the furtheſt; which will eaſily reconcile this with what is afterwards ſaid of their growing worſe and worſe; ver. 13. and of their word eating as a gangrene, ch. ii. 17. Mill, Wetſtein, and Diodati.

Ver. 10. But thou haſt fully known] Having in the preceding verſes deſcribed the apoſtates of the laſt days, and ſhewn how much the wicked Judaizers made way for that apoſtaſy, the Apoſtle here, by way of oppoſition, propoſes his own example and doctrine, that Timothy might obſerve and follow them: To incite him to which, he appeals to his many and great ſufferings, as proofs of his ſincerity; and he not only intimates that Timothy had been inſtructed by one who had ſufficient atteſtations to his apoſtolic character, but that the true Chriſtian revelation was agreeable to the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament, with which Timothy had been acquainted from his infancy, and which might ſtill be profitably read, if carefully compared with, and made ſubſervient to the true Chriſtian revelation. In this view the ſtudy of them would not lead him aſide, as it did the Judaizers, but would help to make him a more proper and perfect inſtructor of mankind in the Chriſtian religion. Benſon.

Ver. 12. Yea, and all that will live godly, &c.] This may import ſomething peculiar in the godlineſs to be exerciſed by Chriſtians, as being agreeable to the revelation of Chriſt, animated by his example, and dependant on his Spirit for aſſiſtance, and his atonement for acceptance with God:—Important topics, upon which all who deſire to obtain and promote godlineſs ought to dwell much. See Evans's "Chriſtian Temper," vol. i. p. 192.

Ver. 13. Seducers] Γόητες properly ſignifies ſorcerers, magicians, jugglers, witches, or enchanters. Jannes and Jambres were evidently ſuch; impoſtors, who endeavoured to vend a falſe religion for a true one, and to ſupport it by their incantations. This ſeems to confirm Dr. Clarke's account of the ſorcery and witchcraft mentioned in Scripture; namely, that they ſignify the ſubſtituting unrighteous tricks, and counterfeit goodneſs, inſtead of real virtue and true piety. See his Sermons, vol. vi. p. 352.

Ver. 14. Knowing of whom thou haſt learned] Meaning himſelf, but modeſtly declining to ſay ſo. Timothy was to continue in theſe things, becauſe he knew of whom he had learned them,—namely of a true Apoſtle; and that they were agreeable to the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament, with which he had been acquainted from his infancy, through the inſtructions of his grandmother and mother, who were both Jeweſſes. See ch. i. 5. and Benſon.

Ver. 16. All Scripture is given by inſpiration of God] The Scriptures with which Timothy had been acquainted from his infancy were evidently thoſe of the Old Teſtament; for none of the books of the New Teſtament were then committed to writing. The ſame thing ſeems plainly to be intended here by all Scripture, which, in the preceding verſe, is called the Sacred Scripture, and which St. Paul aſſerts to be divinely inſpired. The Old Teſtament revelations were not final, but preparatory to the New Teſtament; and therefore the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament are here repreſented as able to make Timothy wiſe unto ſalvation, through faith which is in Chriſt Jeſus. There is, however, no reaſon to confine St. Paul's aſſertion, that all Scripture is given by inſpiration of God, to the Old Teſtament. Bp. Warburton well obſerves, that if in the Moſaic diſpenſation the written rule was given by inſpiration of God, where the church was conducted in every ſtep at firſt by oracular reſponſes, and afterwards by a long ſeries and continued ſucceſſion of prophets; and all this under an extraordinary adminiſtration of Providence, ſuch as might well ſeem to ſuperſede the neceſſity of ſcriptural inſpiration; how confidently may we conclude that the ſame divine goodneſs would give the infallible guide of an inſpired Scripture to the Chriſtian church,

17 That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furniſhed unto all good works.

CHAP. IV.

He exhorteth him to do his duty with all care and diligence; certifieth him of the nearneſs of his death; willeth him to come ſpeedily unto him, and to bring Marcus with him, and certain things which he wrote for; warneth him to beware of Alexander the ſmith; informeth him what had befallen at his firſt anſwering; and ſoon after concludeth.

I Charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who ſhall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing, and his kingdom;

2 Preach the word; be inſtant in ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-ſuffering and doctrine.

3 For the time will come when they will not endure ſound doctrine; but after their own luſts ſhall they heap to themſelves teachers, having itching ears;

4 And they ſhall turn away their ears from the truth, and ſhall be turned unto fables.

5 But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions, do the work of an evangeliſt, make full proof of thy miniſtry.

6 For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand.

7 I have fought a good fight, I have finiſhed my courſe, I have kept the faith:

8 Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteouſneſs, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, ſhall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them alſo that love his appearing.

church, where the miraculous influence of the Holy Spirit is ſuppoſed to have ceaſed with the apoſtolic ages, and where the adminiſtration of Providence is only ordinary? Nor can it be ſaid that what Paul predicates of Scripture muſt be confined to the law, (whoſe very name indeed implies inſpiration) and what is prefatory to it; ſince the largeneſs of his term, all Scripture, extends to the whole canon of the Old Teſtament, as then received by the two churches. And this general expreſſion was the more expedient, as the hiſtoric writings did not, either by their nature, like the prophetic, or by their name, like the legal, neceſſarily imply their coming immediately from God. The canonical books of the Old Teſtament therefore being inſpired, reaſon directs us to expect the ſame quality in the New: And as in the Old, amongſt ſeveral occaſional writings, there was the fundamental record, or the great charter of the Pentateuch; and in the volumes of the prophets, the oracular predictions of the future fortunes of the church, to the firſt coming of the Meſſiah; ſo, in the New, there is, beſides the occaſional Epiſtles, the authentic record or great charter of the Goſpel-covenant; and in the Revelations of St. John, the ſame divine predictions continued, to the ſecond coming of the Saviour of the world. We may venture to ſay, that the general propoſition which affirms that all Scripture is given by inſpiration of God, neceſſarily includes the Scriptures in queſtion; what it predicates of all Scripture taking in the New as well as the Old; as well that which was to be written, as that which was already collected into a canon. For the term Scripture, as the context leads us to underſtand it, is general, and means a religious rule, perfect in its direction for the conduct of human life in belief and practice, it being under this idea that St. Paul recommends the Scripture to Timothy. The aſſertion therefore is univerſal, and amounts to this, "That divine inſpiration is an eſſential quality of every Scripture, which conſtitutes the law or rule of a religion coming from God." On the whole then we conclude, that all the Scriptures of the New Teſtament were given by the inſpiration of God. And thus the prophetic promiſe of our bleſſed Maſter, that the Comforter ſhould abide with us for ever, was eminently fulfilled. The Scriptures are fitted for doctrine, as laying down the moſt fundamental rules of religion, and every neceſſary truth; for reproof or conviction, as guarding us from all pernicious errors, and ſhewing us the turpitude of vice; for correction, as affording the ſtrongeſt arguments for amendment; and for inſtruction in righteouſneſs, as not only recommending virtue in general, but likewiſe exciting us to a continual progreſs in virtuous habits. See Warburton's Doctrine of the Spirit, b. i. ch. 5. ſect. 24. p. 24, 25, 27, 28. Clarke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 17. That the man of God may be perfect] "That every Chriſtian, but eſpecially every Chriſtian miniſter, may be fully inſtructed how, from his own opinions, to regulate his own practice, and how to perſuade others to do the ſame." See Clarke and Benſon.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1.] In the preceding chapter the Apoſtle had been comparing his own life, doctrines, labours, and ſufferings with thoſe of the Judaizers, and putting Timothy in mind what advantages he had enjoyed, in order to qualify him for the work of an Evangeliſt. He here goes on to charge him to be faithful, in proportion to his opportunities and abilities, as he hoped for mercy at the great day; as he would do his utmoſt to prevent all approaches toward the grand apoſtaſy, and becauſe the Apoſtle himſelf was in ſo near a proſpect of martyrdom. As to this laſt argument, St. Paul enlarges upon it, and ſhews, that he neither repented of what he had done, nor was he afraid of what was to come; but looked back with pleaſure upon his paſt labours, and forward with joy and triumph to the reward, which he expected from his gracious and faithful Judge. ver. 1—8. and Benſon.

Ver. 2. In ſeaſon—out of ſeaſon] That is, "in the ſtated ſeaſon of religious aſſemblies; and out of that ſeaſon, when occaſional Providences may give thee an opportunity: yea, carry it into thy private converſation, in the intervals of private labour." See Doddridge and Benſon.

Ver. 3. For the time will come] This is another hint of the introduction of the grand apoſtaſy, and it has been verified to an amazing degree. That is ſound doctrine which promotes an holy life: It is the love of vice which renders men averſe to ſound doctrine, and puts them upon following ſuch teachers, as will gratify their humours and inclinations, and pleaſe their ears and fancies, without attacking or condemning their falſe opinions, or corrupt practices. See Benſon, and Slater's "Original Draught, &c." p. 126. Inſtead of ſhall, here and in the next verſe, Dr. Waterland reads will.

Ver. 5. Endure afflictions] The heathens aſcribed the patience and ſtedfaſtneſs of the Chriſtians, in the midſt of perſecution, to mere obſtinacy; but none of mankind ever had ſtronger reaſons for what they did, or better principles to go upon, when they encountered danger and death with ſuch fortitude and intrepidity of mind. Inſtead of make full proof of thy miniſtry, ſome would read Accompliſh, or fill up all the branches of thy miniſtry. See Grotius, and Gataker in Marc. Antonin. p. 319.

Ver. 6. I am ready to be offered] The original is very emphatical: —For I am already poured out as a libation. So St. Peter foreſaw his approaching martyrdom, 2 Ep. i. 14. St. Paul uſes the word σπένδομαι in the ſame ſenſe, Philip. ii. 17. It ſeems to be an alluſion to the cuſtom of pouring wine upon the head of the victim, juſt before it was offered up to God; and that wine ſo poured out was uſually called a libation. The Apoſtle here intimates, that his blood was as it were already like one of thoſe libations, which, when it was poured out, could not be gathered up again. Thus he ſpeaks of his approaching martyrdom as of a thing ſure and already done, and paſt recalling; intimating, that it would certainly happen, whenever he ſhould come to make his ſecond apology. His miniſtry was a ſacrifice, and when the wine was poured out, the ſacrifice was finiſhed. In this manner he hints that his miniſtry was juſt come to an end, and he could no more aſſiſt Timothy in ſpreading and ſupporting the true Goſpel of Chriſt. See Gataker's Adverſaria, p. 322. Benſon, Blackwall, and Parkhurſt on the verb Σπένδομαι.

Ver. 7. I have fought a good fight, &c.] I have maintained the good combat, I have finiſhed my race, &c. The Apoſtle here again alludes to the Agoniſtic games. See 1 Tim. vi. 12. Two of the expreſſions in this verſe are Agoniſtic terms, and the third is perhaps an alluſion to the citizen who was faithful as a magiſtrate, or in any public ſtation, upon whom the Greeks uſed to beſtow a crown for his fidelity and public uſefulneſs. Unleſs this be admitted, the Apoſtle ſtarts from his figurative and beautiful repreſentation in that expreſſion, I have kept the faith; to which nevertheleſs he returns in the next verſe, and carries it on throughout: But if this ſenſe be admitted, the 8th verſe follows with great propriety; for then the Apoſtle does in effect ſay, that he expected a crown upon both accounts,—as a victor in the Agoniſtic games, and as a citizen who had been faithful in a public ſtation, and eminently uſeful to mankind. See Benſon, Weſt's Diſſertation, and Calmet.

Ver. 8. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown, &c.] St. Paul here repreſents the great Judge, who had been witneſs to all his behaviour, 9 Do thy diligence to come ſhortly unto me:

10 For Demas hath forſaken me, having loved this preſent world, and is departed unto Theſſalonica; Creſcens to Galatia, Titus unto Dalmatia.

11 Only Luke is with me. Take Mark, and bring him with thee; for he is profitable to me for the miniſtry.

viour, with a crown in his hand, which he will beſtow upon him as the reward of his faithfulneſs, and of his coming off victor: and that the time of his beſtowing it will be in that day; that is, the great day of judgement; when he will reward all the faithful and victorious; for ſo the phraſe that day generally ſignifies throughout the New Teſtament. See 1 Theſſ. iv. 14.

Ver. 9.] After Timothy had ſettled affairs where he was, the Apoſtle orders him to repair to him with all ſpeed; for all his other companions, except Luke, were gone away from him. Timothy was to make Troas in his way to Rome, and to receive from Carpus ſeveral things which the Apoſtle had left behind him; and he was to beware of Alexander, as one of the moſt dangerous Judaizers. ver. 9—15. He then acquaints Timothy, that he had made one apology, probably before Nero, or his præfect, and was in proſpect of a ſecond: That when he made his firſt apology, all his companions had forſaken him; notwithſtanding which he undauntedly made known what he had ſo long preached, and eſcaped with his life for that time, though he did not expect to eſcape when he ſhould be called to make another apology. However, he was perſuaded that he ſhould do nothing unbecoming his character. ver. 16—18. He then ſends ſalutations, repeats his injunctions to Timothy to come to him with all ſpeed, and concludes with his uſual benediction. ver. 19—22. Benſon.

Ver. 10. Having loved this preſent world] If we conſider St. Paul's preſent ſituation, we ſhall be inclined to believe that Demas was influenced to this conduct by a love to the preſent life, or world, not to any principles of the Judaizers; by a dread of perſecution, and the fear of a violent death:—Such as the Apoſtle himſelf was in danger of, and ſuch as he ſhortly after actually ſuffered. So eminent was the danger of ſtanding by the Apoſtle, or appearing with or for him, that when he made his firſt apology all the Chriſtians forſook him: About that time it was that Demas, out of a ſenſe of the impending danger, and an exceſſive love of this preſent life, or from an unwillingneſs to die a martyr with the Apoſtle, left Rome, and went to Theſſalonica, where he might be out of danger, when the Apoſtle thought he ſhould have gone elſewhere; or rather, perhaps, have ſtayed and run all hazards with him, in defence of the glorious Goſpel of Chriſt. However, though Demas forſook the Apoſtle, it does not appear that he forſook the Chriſtian religion. See Philem. ver. 24. Col. iv. 14. Benſon, and Grotius.

Ver. 11. Take Mark, and bring him with thee] This is a proof that St. Paul and St. Mark were reconciled again, though the behaviour of the latter had formerly occaſioned their ſeparation: Acts xv. 39. The great value which St. Paul retained for St. Mark, even till the laſt, is here expreſſed in clear and ſtrong terms; for this was written not long before the Apoſtle's martyrdom, when almoſt all his companions had forſaken him, and yet he ſpeaks moſt affectionately of St. Mark, as one who would not deſert him, but be peculiarly ſerviceable to him in his preſent ſituation, and greatly promote the Goſpel. See Philem. ver. 24. and Benſon.

Ver. 13. The cloak that I left at Troas, &c.] Τὸν φαιλόνην. This word is variouſly ſpelled, and has various meanings. Gataker looks upon it to be a Latin word græciſed. Some underſtand it to ſignify a bag, or book-caſe; and the joining books and parchments with it, ſay they, makes it probable that this was the ſenſe in which St. Paul here uſed it: And, in confirmation hereof, it is obſerved that the Syriac, which is accounted one of the moſt ancient verſions, has rendered the word an houſe, or repoſitory for writings; meaning, that it is either a box, bag, or portmanteau, wherein books and writings were depoſited. Chryſoſtom, however, Œcumenius, and others, interpret it ενδυμα, a garment; "And this, ſays Parkhurſt, ſeems the moſt probable ſenſe of the word, becauſe the Apoſtle, in the ſame ſentence, diſtinctly mentions both his books and parchments. Heſychius remarks that φελλωνης, or φελλονης, is a Cretan word, ſignifying a waiſtcoat, or under garment; and it ſeems ultimately deducible from the Hebrew פלה, peleh, to ſever, or ſeparate our bodies; namely, from the ſurrounding air; whence alſo the Greek φελλος, the bark of a tree, for a like reaſon." Βιβλια, rendered books, is a diminutive, and may denote leſſer books. Μεμβρανας is a Latin word, and ſignifies, as we have rendered it, parchment, or vellum, which is ſaid to have been invented at Pergamos; whence it is called in Latin Pergamenum: And hence the French name parchemin, and our Engliſh parchment. The books of the ancients were of two forms; one ſort they rolled up, and called volumina, volumes, à volvendo. Theſe were uſually, perhaps, of parchment; the other ſort do not appear to have been rolled up; and were probably made of the papyrus, or great Egyptian ruſh. See Benſon, Wetſtein, Parkhurſt, and the Reflections.

Ver. 14. Alexander the copper-ſmith, &c.] Dr. Lightfoot obſerves, that delivering a perſon over to Satan was a phraſe well known among the Jews, and that it meant more than excommunication; even the delivering men over by miracle to diſeaſes or death. The Apoſtle, ſome years before this, had delivered over Alexander unto Satan; 1 Tim. i. 20. But the puniſhment ſo inflicted had not reclaimed him; and if Alexander was incorrigible, the Apoſtle might juſtly denounce ſome greater curſe upon him, or rather foretel his future and final puniſhment; for the Alexandrian MS reads ἀποδωσει, will reward him; which reading is very probably genuine, as it is confirmed by ſix other MSS, with the Syriac, the Vulgate, and ſome of the Fathers. Theophylact ſays, "That ἀποδωη is put for ἀποδωσει; for it is rather a prophecy, than an imprecation." But, whether this be conſidered as a prediction or a petition, there is not in it the leaſt degree of revenge: For the Apoſtle leaves it to the great ſearcher of hearts, to determine what Alexander's works had been, and what the principle was from which they had proceeded; and then he foretels, or petitions, that God would reward him, according as God himſelf knew his works had been: Which was really no other than foretelling, that the God and Judge of the earth will do right, or praying him to do ſo. See on the next verſe, Benſon, Wetſtein, Morris's Sermons, i. iv. vii. and Hallett's notes, vol. ii. p. 267.

Ver. 16. At my firſt anſwer] Apology, or defence. Heylin, Waterland, Doddridge, &c. Upon our Lord's being apprehended, all his diſciples forſook him, and fled;—and yet he forgave, and interceded for them. When St. Paul became a Chriſtian, he put off his fierce and perſecuting ſpirit; and after that, the charitable and benign Spirit of our Lord manifeſted itſelf in him to the very laſt;—as appears among other inſtances from the benevolent prayer in this verſe; which, it is remarkable, was the very prayer of the dying Stephen, Acts vii. 60. We may alſo further obſerve, that this Apoſtle had, upon ſome occaſions, the gift of diſcerning the ſpirits of men; and could perhaps thereby know, that what Alexander did was out of malice; but that what his companions had done was out of fear of ſuffering, rather than averſion to the truth;—a thing, to which human frailty often hath expoſed, and may again expoſe good men: He therefore ſpeaks very differently of them. But this will not warrant any man, who is deſtitute of apoſtolic authority, and of the gift of diſcerning ſpirits, to denounce or foretel the like evil to any man whatever. Many circumſtances make it extraordinary that St. Paul ſhould have been deſerted by the Chriſtians at Rome in this extremity: When he wrote his Epiſtle to the church there,—which muſt have been ten years before this,—he ſpeaks of their faith as celebrated through the world: He ſalutes a vaſt number of illuſtrious perſons by name, and mentions many of them as his particular friends; and we may be aſſured, that during the two years he ſpent there, in his own hired houſe, the number, and probably the zeal of Chriſtian converts, would be greatly increaſed. See Philip. i. 12—14. iv. 22. We are ready then to ſay, How was it poſſible he ſhould be thus forſaken?—But there is a material circumſtance, ſeldom taken notice of in this connection, which accounts in a great meaſure for what might otherwiſe appear ſo ſtrange. Clement, the companion of St. Paul, informs us, that he ſuffered martyrdom under the governors; i. e. when Nero was gone into Greece, and had left the government of the city to Tigellinus and Sabinus, præfects of the prætorian guard, and that monſter Helius Cæſarianus. If this be allowed, it fixes the death of Paul to A. D. 66 or 67. But the cruel perſecution which Nero had raiſed againſt the Chriſtians at Rome, was at leaſt two years before this. It is poſſible, therefore, that many of the excellent perſons referred to above, might have ſuffered death for their religion, or, according to our Lord's advice, Matth. x. 23. have retired to a diſtance from Rome. The Aſiatic Chriſtians, who came with St. Paul, acted a mean part in deſerting him as the other Chriſtians of the place did. See Benſon, L'Enfant, Doddridge, and Pearſon.

Ver. 17. Might be fully known] Πληροφορηθῆ,—might be carried on with confidence. It was a glorious teſtimony to the honour of Chriſtianity, preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion.

18 And the Lord ſhall deliver me from every evil work, and will preſerve me unto his heavenly kingdom: to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

tianity, that the Apoſtle could thus courageouſly maintain it, when all his friends forſook him, and his enemies were ſo fiercely raging againſt him. By the lion, the Apoſtle (according to many commentators) means the emperor Nero; whom, it is remarkable, Seneca calls by the ſame name. But, ſince Clement ſays that he ſuffered martyrdom under the governors, (ſee on ver. 16.) ſome think it more probable, that by the lion the Apoſtle intended Helius; who was, if poſſible, more ſavage than his maſter, and whom Nero had at this time left with an abſolute authority in Rome during his abſence in Greece. The Sacred Scriptures frequently repreſent idolatrous, bigoted, and cruel princes, under this image. Comp. Amos v. 19. Jer. ii. 30. Joel i. 6. Nahum ii. 12. The Apoſtle may allude here to the circumſtance in Dan. vi. 22. See apocryphal Eſther, ch. xiv. 13. Pſ. xxxv. 17. lvi. 5. Benſon, Doddridge, Calmet, Wetſtein, Parkhurſt on Λέων, and Echard's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, A. D. 67 and 68.

Ver. 18. And the Lord ſhall deliver me] "I do not indeed expect to be delivered, when I am called upon to make my ſecond apology: But I am perſuaded that the Lord will deliver me from every evil work; from all miſbehaviour unworthy his ſacred miniſtry; and that he will bring me ſafe unto his heavenly kingdom." See Benſon and Heylin.

Ver. 19. Salute Priſca and Aquila] She is called Priſcilla, Acts xviii. 2, 26. Rom. xvi. 3. and many MSS read Priſcilla here.

Ver. 20. Trophimus—left at Miletum ſick] It has been very juſtly argued from this text, that a power of working miracles did not always reſide in the Apoſtles; and indeed if it had, one can hardly imagine, that any good or uſeful man would have been ſick, and have died under their notice, which would have been quite inconſiſtent with the ſcheme of Providence. Timothy's frequent infirmities afford a farther argument to the ſame purpoſe. Comp. Acts viii. 21.—But ſuch good men as theſe did not need the miraculous cure of their own diſtempers, to confirm their faith in the Goſpel. See Doddridge and Grotius.

Ver. 21. Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia] What ſome have ſaid concerning Pudens's being of the ſenatorial order, and Claudia's being a Britiſh lady who was converted by St. Paul, and ſent the Goſpel firſt into England, does not ſeem ſufficiently ſupported. Martial ſpeaks of them as young perſons at that time. lib. xiv. epigr. 13. Linus is ſaid by the ancients to have been afterwards the firſt biſhop of Rome. When the Apoſtle ſays, ver. 11. that Luke only was with him, he muſt be underſtood to ſpeak of his companions and fellow-labourers in the Goſpel: For here is an intimation that there were Chriſtian brethren ſtill at Rome, and that the whole church there was not intirely diſperſed and broken up; and when he ſays, ver. 16. that at his firſt apology they all forſook him, we are not to ſuppoſe that all the Chriſtians then left the city, but that none of them ſtood by him, or appeared with him before the præfect. See Benſon and Calmet.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 13.

The Sacred Writings being penned by holy perſons, either intirely and immediately inſpired, or directed and aſſiſted by the divine Spirit in what they wrote, have nothing in them frivolous or uſeleſs; nothing but what may yield us profitable matter of inſtruction, if rightly underſtood: ſo that the ſeemingly very little things in them are many times, upon farther ſearch and conſideration, found to be of no little uſe.

Such is the portion of Scripture now before us; from whence we may naturally deduce the following obſervations, no leſs pleaſing than edifying to the attentive reader.

1. And firſt we may remark the poverty and mean eſtate of the Apoſtle St. Paul. "Behold, ſays Eraſmus on the place, behold the Apoſtle's goods and moveables;—a poor cloak to keep him from the weather, and a few books;" Hence he himſelf often takes notice of his own poverty, as 1 Cor. iv. 11, 12. Acts xx. 34. and in various other places. This was a ſingular deſign of Providence towards the Apoſtles in general, who are all of them kept in a poor and mean, yea, in a moſt afflicted and miſerable condition, as St. Paul obſerves, 1 Cor. iv. 9—13. hereby fully to convince the world of their ſincerity in preaching the Goſpel; that they ſought not themſelves, or their own eaſe or advantage, but were content, for the propagation of the ſacred miniſtry, to endure the greateſt extremities; and that their only aim was the advancement of that truth, which with ſo great a loſs and hazard to themſelves they conſtantly publiſhed to the world.

2. From the paſſage in queſtion we may obſerve, ſecondly, "that even the inſpired miniſters of God did not ſo wholly depend upon divine inſpiration, but that they made uſe alſo of the ordinary helps and means,—ſuch as reading of books, with ſtudy and meditation on them, for their aſſiſtance in the diſcharge of their office."

St. Paul, the pupil of Gamaliel, had his books, which he had read, and his manuſcripts too,—his collections of notes, moſt probably,—which he found to be uſeful to him, and therefore gives Timothy a ſpecial charge to convey them ſafely to him. Nay, and he elſewhere exhorts this his ſon Timothy to the ſame courſe of reading and ſtudy: Till I come, ſays he, give attention to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine: neglect not the gift which is in thee, &c.—meditate on theſe things; give thyſelf wholly to them, that thy profiting may appear unto all. 1 Tim. iv. 13—15. Whence it is very remarkable, 1. That the exhortation is to Timothy;—a man placed by the Apoſtles biſhop at Epheſus, the metropolis of Aſia Minor;—a man eſpecially beloved of the great Apoſtle;—a man marked out long before by prophecy, as one who ſhould prove a very eminent and excellent perſon; (1 Tim. i. 18.)—nay more,—a man endowed with extraordinary gifts and abilities, conferred on him in his ordination. This man St. Paul exhorts to reading and meditation, for the better diſcharge of his office. 2. The order of the Apoſtle's admonition is obſerveable: Give attendance to reading, &c. To reading, before exhortation or doctrine: He is adviſed to be himſelf firſt a well read and learned divine, that he might be the better able to inſtruct others. 3. The emphatical words uſed by the Apoſtle are very ſtriking; he adviſeth Timothy not only to read and ſtudy, that he might be able to exhort and teach with effect, but preſſeth him to give attendance to reading;—not to neglect the ſupernatural gift beſtowed on him; to meditate on what he read and learned, and to give himſelf wholly to theſe things. All which phraſes plainly ſignify the greateſt induſtry and diligence to be uſed by him in reading and ſtudy, and the other exerciſes there mentioned.

The ſame thing is evidently intended by our Apoſtle, 2 Tim. i. 6. where he admoniſheth Timothy to ſtir up the gift of God within him;—to rekindle and cheriſh that divine fire, which would otherwiſe go out and die in its own aſhes, unleſs blown up and animated by a ſupply of fewel.

And thus the gifts of God in men,—even the extraordinary gifts, ſuch as Timothy had, will ſoon decay, and be extinguiſhed in the aſhes as it were of their ſloth and negligence, unleſs they receive continual refreſhment and repair from diligent reading, ſtudy, and prayer; and (we may add) a charitable uſe and exerciſe of thoſe gifts for the good of others. Accordingly, it has been judiciouſly ſuppoſed, that the Apoſtle, ſpeaking of gifts more immediately communicated from above, alludes to the fire of the altar under the law, which firſt came down from heaven, but was afterwards to be preſerved and maintained by the prieſts with a conſtant ſupply of wood, and their continual care in cheriſhing it. Comp. Lev. vi. 12, 13. with ch. ix. 24.

This is ſufficient to ſhew us the practice of the divinely-inſpired perſons under the New Teſtament; and we may further remark, that the holy prophets under the Old Teſtament took the ſame courſe: not depending ſo wholly upon immediate revelation and inſpiration from God, as to think all endeavour on their own part needleſs; for we read of colleges and incorporated ſocieties, conſiſting of prophets and their ſons, ſcholars, and diſciples; the one receiving inſtructions from the other, juſt as in the colleges of our univerſities. See 1 Sam. x. 10. xix. 20. 2 Kings ii. 3, 7, 15. iv. 38. and comp. Deut. xxxiii. 3. with Acts xxii. 3. and Dan. ix. 2.

3. Theſe conſiderations may amply ſerve to expoſe their folly, who renounce all books and book learning, as needleſs and of no uſe to them, and bid defiance to ſtudy and reading; ſuch would do well to conſider, that the Spirit of God, even in the times of extraordinary diſpenſation, was never given to any but the diligent and induſtrious, and ſuch as did their beſt to attain divine wiſdom, not only by praying for it, but alſo by reading and ſtudying the books and writings of the wiſe men who were before them. Let them conſider, that the Spirit of God never dwelt with the ſlothful or lazy, or with thoſe who, preſuming on its inſpiration, neglected the uſe of thoſe ordinary means of obtaining knowledge which Providence afforded them. The divine aſſiſtance and human induſtry always went together hand in hand; and the doctrine that aims to ſeparate and divide them, merits the ſevereſt cenſure: And yet thus many of the people are deceived, and love to be ſo; running often they know not whither, to hear they know not who, and to learn they know not what.

Till the minds of men are better informed, and poſſeſſed with a righter notion of things, it is hardly poſſible they ſhould ever be brought to any regular ſober religion, or arrive at any ſtability in principle. Popery, it is well known, was born and bred in ignorant and unlearned ages: as ſoon as learning revived, popery began to decline; till at laſt the happy reformation enſued which we now enjoy: and if ever learning run to decay again, we muſt expect to relapſe into popery, or ſomething elſe as bad, or worſe.

4. Hence likewiſe all miniſters of the Goſpel may learn their duty,—diligently to read and ſtudy the Holy Scriptures in the firſt place, and next to them the books of learned and good men, who have exerted their abilities in explaining them; and whatever other books they can procure, that may be any way uſeful to them in their miniſtry. The learned and judicious Eſtius has a note upon the text in queſtion very applicable to this purpoſe: "Let biſhops and prieſts, ſays he, learn from hence, what great need they have of continual reading and ſtudy, how great ſoever their proficiency may already be; ſeeing St. Paul, who had been taught the myſteries of religion by our Lord Chriſt himſelf, and had now for a long time exerciſed the office of an Apoſtle, had ſtill occaſion to make uſe of books."—And indeed, when we conſider how ſtrict a charge he here gives Timothy, and that the inſpired prophets under the Old Teſtament thought the ſame exerciſes neceſſary for themſelves, how can we venture (weak and feeble, the beſt of us, compared with them) either through pride to ſcorn and reject, or out of ſloth and indolence to wave and neglect thoſe helps? No ſenſible ſerious man will ever regard the clamours of fanatics, ſhould they exclaim never ſo loudly, "that if we ſtudy for what we do, we do it not by the Spirit;"—unleſs it could be ſhewn that the aſſiſtance of the Spirit and human induſtry were inconſiſtent with, and repugnant to each other. On the contrary, we may reſt aſſured, from what has been ſaid, that the Spirit of God will help none but the ſtudious and induſtrious. Let us therefore give all attention to reading and ſtudy, and addict ourſelves aſſiduouſly to theſe exerciſes, with daily prayer to God for his bleſſing on them, that our proficiency may appear unto all men, to his glory and the general good.

Laſtly, This may ſerve alſo to inſtruct Lay-Chriſtians of every rank in their duty, diligently to conſult the Sacred Scriptures, and thoſe other good books with which the Providence of God hath furniſhed them, in order to their inſtruction in matters of religion. It is the peculiar happineſs of our nation to be amply ſupplied with theſe helps to divine knowledge: and if the prophets of old, if the miniſters of Chriſt,—nay, if the Apoſtles themſelves have thought reading and ſtudy uſeful to them, can any ſerious private Chriſtian conceive, that he has no need at all of it? It is true, more time and pains in thoſe exerciſes is required of the miniſters of religion than of others; but none are exempted and excuſed from the duty, becauſe all men are bound to be wiſe unto ſalvation, and to be ſo requires no ſmall pains and induſtry. Miniſters are to read, that they may be able to teach; and the people are to read, that they may be capable of learning, or being taught; for unleſs there be a concurrent induſtry in the teacher and the diſciple, the one teacheth in vain, becauſe the other will never learn.

It becomes the part therefore of every good man daily to read the Holy Scriptures, and thoſe other good books which he has, or can procure, that may help him to underſtand the volumes of truth; and if any cannot read himſelf, to get ſome relation, friend, or neighbour to read to him; and they muſt be very uncharitable indeed who will deny that aſſiſtance. They who cannot read, are concerned to double their diligence in hearing; in a more careful attendance on all the means and opportunities of inſtruction that ſhall be offered them in public; and in aſking and ſeeking after inſtruction from their miniſters in private; adding their daily and moſt earneſt prayers to God for the aſſiſtance of his Holy Spirit in the uſe of thoſe means, and encouraging themſelves with that divine promiſe, James i. 5. If any of you lack wiſdom, let him aſk of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it ſhall be given him.

In a word, let none think or imagine divine wiſdom or knowledge ſo cheap a thing, as to be obtained without labour and diligence: The fruits of the tree of life are not to be plucked by indolent and careleſs hands. What can be a ſtronger call to application and induſtry! Let us remember, that it is worth all our while and pains to learn the right way to heaven: for if we miſs it, we are undone for ever!

TITUS.] This may be called "An Epiſtle to the Cretans;" for the Apoſtle meant not ſo much to inſtruct Titus, as to furniſh him with a rule to lay before the Cretans, to which he might appeal, whenever unworthy and unqualified perſons attempted to intrude into the epiſcopal office. Titus was a Greek, and probably owed his converſion to St. Paul; who, fourteen years after, took him with him to Jeruſalem, to the great council held there, in the year 49. And as Titus was of Gentile parents, St. Paul would not ſuffer him to be circumciſed, that he might not abridge the liberty of the Gentile converts. Some years after St. Paul diſpatched him to Corinth, to bring him an account of the ſtate of that church, and afterwards ſent him thither again, to haſten the collection for the poor Chriſtians in Judea. After this, we hear no more of him till he is mentioned in this Epiſtle, as having been with St. Paul in Crete. This Epiſtle, according to Dr. Lardner, was written towards the end of the year 56, while St. Paul was in Macedonia, or near it. But Michaelis and others think it was more probably written in St. Paul's laſt progreſs through the Aſiatic churches, between his firſt and ſecond impriſonment at Rome; though they are not able to determine the preciſe year. Titus had been left at Crete, to ſettle the church which St. Paul had probably eſtabliſhed there in his firſt journey to Rome, and afterwards: Acts xxvii. 8. Titus i. 5. The churches in Crete had not hitherto any biſhops and miniſters; Titus was to appoint them; but he was to be upon his guard againſt ſome of the circumciſion, who aſpired to eccleſiaſtical offices. The iſland of Crete was the parent of Roman and Greek idolatry; and the Cretans ſo far excelled other nations in inventing gods, that they were called the LIARS. They were alſo diſtinguiſhed for unnatural vices, and a ſpirit of ſedition. The Cretan converts to Chriſtianity were indeed obliged to forſake idolatry, and the worſhip of images; but as the Cretans were Egyptians by deſcent, and had long intermixed the whims of Egyptian philoſophy with Judaiſm, and embraced Chriſtianity very early, no church was in greater danger of adopting the abſurd and heathen genealogies of God, of his only-begotten Son, and of the Eones: Hence St. Paul warns them againſt theſe errors, as well as againſt thoſe of the judaizing teachers, who endeavoured to corrupt the purity of the Goſpel. See Lardner, Michaelis, Benſon, and Calmet.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. Paul, a ſervant of God] This is the only Epiſtle of St. Paul, wherein he begins with calling himſelf a ſervant, or ſlave, devoted for ever to the ſervice of God: And as it was not written to Titus alone, but for the benefit of all who profeſſed Chriſtianity in Crete; (more eſpecially of all the Gentile Chriſtians there) by calling himſelf ſo, he might perhaps intend to oppoſe the Judaizers; they thought thoſe two characters, of a ſervant of God, and an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt to the Gentiles, were inconſiſtent, and repreſented St. Paul as no better than an apoſtate from the true God, on account of his receiving into the church the uncircumciſed Gentiles. He therefore lets them know, that though he was an Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and declared their entire freedom from the law of Moſes; yet he ſtill adhered to the true God, the God of the Jews, as much as any of them, or of the unbelieving Jews; and that he had been accounted ſo faithful, as that our Lord Jeſus Chriſt had illuminated him with the Goſpel doctrine, and honoured him with the apoſtolate of the Gentile world. According to the faith, would be rendered more properly, for the faith; i. e. for promoting the faith of Chriſtians; who, under the Meſſiah, are the elect people of God. Dr. Heylin well expreſſes the meaning of the paſſage,—To preach the faith of God's elect, and make known the truth, as it promotes piety.

Ver. 2. Before the world began] Πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων, before the ſecular ages; or before the giving of the law of Moſes. God had promiſed the Goſpel, in an obſcure manner, to the patriarchs before Abraham; but to him it was promiſed more explicitly. Now that promiſe to Abraham, was before the ſecular times;—the jubilees under the law, and conſequently, before the diſtinction of the world into Jews and Gentiles. But what the God, who cannot lie or break his word, had promiſed ſo long before to Abraham, the law of Moſes, which intervened, could not diſannul. See on Rom. xvi. 25. Gal. iii. 17, 20. Locke, Benſon, and Rymer's Revealed Religion, p. 49. Others underſtand this expreſſion, before the world began, as referring to God's covenant and engagements with his Son, for the redemption of mankind, under the character of their Surety and Redeemer. See Grotius, Hammond, and Doddridge. Dr. Waterland reads, before ancient times.

Ver. 3. In due times] In his own proper times. See 1 Tim. ii. 6. Gal. iv. 4. Epheſ. i. 10. ii. 7. In this the Apoſtle might probably allude to the prophecies, and particularly to the celebrated prophecy of Daniel, concerning the ſeventy weeks; ch. ix. 24. Inſtead of commandment, Dr. Waterland reads appointment. Dr. Benſon, upon the 4th verſe, obſerving that the words mercy and the Lord are omitted in ſome MSS, makes this remark, which deſerves much attention. "It is not very material, ſays he, as to the ſenſe, whether theſe words be left out or retained; and indeed, I have found this obſervation to hold good concerning moſt of the various readings: That is, it is of little or no moment, as to the ſenſe and connection, whether you receive or reject them." See Dr. Bentley's Phileleutherus Lipſienſis.

Ver. 5.] Before he proceeds to the principal deſign of this Epiſtle, the Apoſtle briefly reminds Titus of his leaving him in Crete, to ſettle the churches which he had planted there, and to ordain elders in every city, to be biſhops over the ſeveral churches. After this he deſcribes the characters of ſuch as he was to ordain; namely, that they ſhould be men of integrity, and of an unſpotted reputation; and particularly ſuch as underſtood the liberty of the Gentile Chriſtians, and that would oppoſe the Judaizers; who were bad men, and very induſtrious in making proſelytes. ver. 5—16. It is well known that the word πόλις, rendered city, frequently ſignifies a coun- are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee.

6 If any be blameleſs, the huſband of one wife, having faithful children, not accuſed of riot, or unruly:

7 For a biſhop muſt be blameleſs, as the ſteward of God; not ſelf-willed, not ſoon angry, not given to wine, no ſtriker, not given to filthy lucre;

8 But a lover of hoſpitality, a lover of good men, ſober, juſt, holy, temperate;

9 Holding faſt the faithful word, as he hath been taught, that he may be able by ſound doctrine, both to exhort and to convince the gain-ſayers.

10 For there are many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, eſpecially they of the circumciſion:

11 Whoſe mouths muſt be ſtopped, who ſubvert whole houſes, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's ſake.

12 One of themſelves, even a prophet of their own, ſaid, The Cretans are alway liars, evil beaſts, ſlow bellies.

13 This witneſs is true. Wherefore rebuke them ſharply, that they may be ſound in the faith;

14 Not giving heed to Jewiſh fables, and commandments of men, that turn from the truth.

15 Unto the pure all things are pure: but unto them that are defiled, and unbelieving, is nothing pure; but even their mind and conſcience is defiled.

16 They profeſs that they know God; but in works they deny him, being abominable, and diſobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.

try town only, and ſometimes a village. Crete had formerly been famous for having an hundred cities; but Pliny, who wrote not long after the ſending this Epiſtle to Titus, found only forty cities there, and the bare memory of ſixty more; and moſt of theſe forty called cities, were little better than villages. Strabo ſays, that Crete had many cities, but only three of any great note. Whence we may conclude, that thoſe cities or towns, in which the Apoſtle had planted churches, and in which Titus was to ordain biſhops, were poſſibly moſt of them no bigger than our country towns; and that ſome of them did not exceed our larger villages. See Benſon, and Lightfoot's Works, p. 333.

Ver. 6. Having faithful children] Having believing children This is mentioned with great propriety; for if a man were not careful to inſtruct his children in the principles of Chriſtianity, there would be great reaſon to doubt whether he were hearty in the belief of it himſelf; and if a man had only unbelieving children in his houſe, i. e. ſuch as were ſo obſtinate, that they could not be brought to embrace Chriſtianity, by any of the arguments which could be laid before them, in that age of miracles, it would be a great diſcouragement, and in ſome circumſtances a great hindrance to him, from purſuing the duties of a Chriſtian elder, or biſhop;—and thoſe evils into which ſuch obſtinate infidel children might fall, would very probably bring a reproach upon the family, which might in a degree hurt the character of him who preſided in it. See Doddridge, 2 Tim. ii. 24, 26. and 1 Tim. iii. 1, &c.

Ver. 7. Not ſelf-willed] 'Αυθάδη: Pleaſed with himſelf, and deſpiſing others; ſupercilious, haughty, inſolent, ſurly. This vice, in our ordinary converſation, is directly oppoſed to affability, courteſy. See Raphelius, Wetſtein, and Parkhurſt on the word.

Ver. 8. Sober] Prudent. Wat.

Ver. 10. For there are many unruly, &c.] St. Paul had his eye from the beginning of the Epiſtle all along, upon the perſons whom he deſcribes in this, and the following verſes. This cloſe and excellent writer never loſes ſight of his ſubject; but he proceeds ſo gradually to ſpeak plainly, that we may loſe ſight of it, if we do not attend very carefully. See 1 Tim. i. 6, 7.

Ver. 12. One of themſelves—a prophet of their own] Epimenides, whoſe words St. Paul here quotes, is ſaid by Diogenes Laertius to have been a great favourite of the gods; but Ariſtotle ſays, he never foretold any future event: Which is a plain argument, that the word prophet is ſometimes uſed in a large ſenſe for one, who is ſuppoſed by the perſon applying the title to him, to be an inſtructor of men in divine things, from whom the will of the deity may be learned. Indeed the words poet and prophet were often uſed promiſcuouſly by the Greeks and Romans; perhaps, becauſe their poets pretended to be inſpired, and were by ſome believed to be ſo: See Acts xvii. 28. From this, as well as other places, it appears, that St. Paul had read the Greek poets; probably in his younger days he was brought up in the ſchools of Tarſus, before he went to Jeruſalem, to ſit at the feet of Gamaliel; and even after he was an inſpired Apoſtle, he did not think that he acted out of character, when, as Apoſtle of the Gentiles, he quoted their poets. Perhaps it might have been, in ſome views, more proper to have tranſlated the Greek verſe before us in ſuch a manner, that it might have read as a verſe in Engliſh:

"Falſe Cretans! ſavage beaſts, with bellies ſlow."

The poet here ſeems to ſuggeſt a remarkable contraſt, to ſhew what a mixture there was of fierceneſs and luxury in the character of the Cretans. Savage beaſts are generally active and nimble; but theſe men, while they had the fury of lions and tygers, indulged themſelves ſo much in the moſt ſordid idleneſs and intemperance, that they grew all belly as it were, and, like a breed of ſwine, common in the eaſtern countries, which were often ſo burdened with fat, that they could hardly move. As for their proneneſs to falſhood, it is well known, that Κρητίζειν, "to talk like a Cretan," was a proverb for lying; as Κορινθιάζειν, "to live like a Corinthian," was for a luxurious and debauched life; and it is remarkable, that Polybius ſcarce ever mentions the Cretans without ſome ſevere cenſure. Bp. Warburton accounts for the origin of this character of the Cretans in the following manner: "I ſuppoſe the view was enlarged, and the Cretans were called liars upon more accounts in St. Paul's time; but the riſe of this proverb ſeems to have been this: While the other Greeks, in their leſſer myſteries, concealed the origin of the gods, who were dead mortals raiſed to divine honour, for public benefits done to their country, or to mankind; the Cretans proclaimed this to all the world, by ſhewing the tomb of Jupiter himſelf, and boaſting that "the father of gods and men" was a native of that country. This ſo exaſperated all Greece againſt them, that they called them as here, eternal liars. Thus Lucan, (lib. 8.)

Tam mendax, magni tumulo, quam Creta Tonantis;

And ſo Callimachus, in his hymn to Jupiter, with a variety of other authors. The reaſon why they were ſo exaſperated at the Cretans for publiſhing this, ſeems to have been the affront it gave to the worſhippers of idols, or the publiſhing what the politic protectors of the myſteries would have kept ſecret." See Div. Leg. vol. i. p. 159. my notes on Callimachus's Hymn to Jupiter, p. 3. and Spanheim; Eraſmus's Proverbs, p. 642. Hammond, and Raphelius.

Ver. 13. Sharply] 'Αποτόμως;—with a cutting ſeverity. The word is an alluſion to a ſurgeon's cutting away the dead fleſh, and that even to the quick. We are to obſerve, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks here of reproving vice, not error. Timothy is exhorted to rebuke with all long-ſuffering; 2 Tim. iv. 2. and we may remark, that there is a degree of long-ſuffering and gentleneſs, very conſiſtent with all that ſeverity which faithfulneſs requires: which is not that of boiſterous paſſion, ill-nature, and ſcurrility, but of meek, though reſolute zeal for God, and friendſhip to the offender; which yet will not be ſilenced by trifling excuſes, nor fail ſeriouſly to repreſent the fatal conſequences which may attend the evil reproved. See Benſon, Doddridge, and Beza.

Ver. 15. Unto the pure all things are pure] "I know theſe judaizing teachers value themſelves highly upon the diſtinctions of food, which they inculcate as of ſo great importance to purity: but they are much miſtaken. Unto Chriſtians who are pure and upright, all ſorts of meat are clean and pure; but unto thoſe who are polluted with vice, and who, though they underſtand the liberty of Chriſtians, are unfaithful,—ἀπίστοις,—and would impoſe upon Chriſtians the rituals of the Jewiſh law;—unto ſuch, I ſay, nothing is clean and pure; but even their underſtanding and conſcience is defiled, which ought to be their guide and director." See Doddridge, Benſon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 16. They profeſs that they know God] This was their grand pretence,

CHAP. II.

Directions given unto Titus, both for his doctrine and life. Of the duty of ſervants, and in general of all Chriſtians.

BUT ſpeak thou the things which become ſound doctrine;

2 That the aged men be ſober, grave, temperate, ſound in faith, in charity, in patience.

3 The aged women likewiſe, that they be in behaviour as becometh holineſs; not falſe accuſers, not given to much wine, teachers of good things;

4 That they may teach the young women to be ſober, to love their huſbands, to love their children,

5 To be diſcreet, chaſte, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own huſbands, that the word of God be not blaſphemed.

6 Young men, likewiſe, exhort to be ſober-minded.

7 In all things ſhewing thyſelf a pattern of good works: in doctrine ſhewing uncorruptneſs, gravity, ſincerity,

8 Sound ſpeech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be aſhamed, having no evil thing to ſay of you.

9 Exhort ſervants to be obedient unto their own maſters, and to pleaſe them well in all things; not anſwering again;

10 Not purloining, but ſhewing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.

11 For the grace of God that bringeth ſalvation, hath appeared to all men,

12 Teaching us, that denying ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, we ſhould live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly in this preſent world;

tence for teaching Chriſtianity, and oppoſing St. Paul; namely, that they beſt underſtood the true God, and the revelation of his mind and will in the Goſpel, as well as under the law; but at the ſame time pride and covetouſneſs, and other vices animated and influenced them. See Rom. ii. 17, &c. iii. 10—19. 2 Cor. xi. 13—15. Jude 4, 16, and Benſon. Inſtead of reprobate, Dr. Waterland reads infatuated, undiſcerning, inexpert, inſenſible.

Chap. II. Ver. 1.] In this chapter the Apoſtle ſhews Titus what he himſelf was to teach, as he had ſhewn him in the preceding chapter, what the biſhops ſhould teach, whom he was to ordain; and it will throw a great deal of light on this, as well as on the laſt chapter, to conſider his inſtructions as oppoſed to the doctrines of the judaizing Chriſtians. Firſt, inſtead of laying the chief ſtreſs upon the obſervation of the Jewiſh ceremonies, fables, genealogies, and traditions, Titus was to teach perſons of all ages, and both ſexes, to lay the greateſt ſtreſs upon real virtue and ſubſtantial piety; and to animate them to the practice of ſuch things by his own example. Secondly, in oppoſition to the Judaizers, who would have ſet ſlaves at liberty upon their embracing the Chriſtian religion, Titus was to preſs ſlaves to continue with their maſters, and to ſerve them more faithfully than ever, that they might not bring ſcandal but honour to their religion. Thirdly, the judaizing Chriſtians appear to have inſinuated, that ſuch as continued uncircumciſed, and perhaps ſuch alſo as continued in perpetual ſlavery, were not, could not be the people of God, even under the Meſſiah; whereſore, they were not ſo intent upon bringing them to obſerve the moral and the Chriſtian law. Titus, on the contrary, was to teach them that the Goſpel is equally offered to all, Gentiles or Jews, bondmen or free; and that ſo great a light appeared, not to make men punctual in the obſervation of ceremonies, but of things that are of eternal unalterable obligation;—ſobriety, juſtice, and piety: and that it doth not, like the law of Moſes, promiſe temporal bleſſings to the obedient, as the greateſt rewards, but glory and happineſs, when Chriſt ſhall appear as univerſal judge; who died, not that men might live in ſin, or neglect the duties of life, but to redeem us from all iniquity, &c. ver. 14. Theſe were the things which Titus was to teach the Chriſtians. See Benſon and Michaelis.

Ver. 2. Sober] Prudent. Wat.

Ver. 3. In behaviour as becometh holineſs] That they behave with ſanctity of manners. Heylin. [Exhort] to that ſteadineſs which becometh ſaints. Doddridge. See 1 Tim. ii. 9. 1 Pet. iii. 3—5. and the Obſervations, p. 396.

Ver. 5. Keepers at home] Careful of the houſe. Wat. Οἰκουργούς, according to Elſner, ſignifies not only keeping at home, but an attentive looker after domeſtic affairs. Heſychius explains it by "one who takes care of the things belonging to the houſe, and keeps them." Some would join the next epithet with this, and read good houſekeepers. Phidias, the famous Grecian ſtatuary, is ſaid to have made Venus treading upon a tortoiſe, the emblem of a good houſewife, becauſe a tortoiſe never leaves its houſe. That the word of God be not blaſphemed, means, "that they may give no occaſion by their behaviour for any reproach to be caſt upon that Chriſtianity which they profeſs." Heylin reads it, So that religion may not be reproached on their account. See Elſner, Wetſtein, Benſon, and Plutarch in Precept. Commun.

Ver. 7. In doctrine ſhewing uncorruptneſs, &c.] The ſenſe would be more emphatical, if inſtead of ἀδιαφθορίαν, we read δι' ἀφθορίαν, in doctrine, by integrity. See Camerius, Mills, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 10. Not purloining] Not privately defrauding or embezzling,—Μη νοσφιζομενους: which properly ſignifies keeping back part of the worth of any thing, and is uſed in the caſe of Ananias's ſecreting a part, where the whole was pretended to be returned, Acts v. 2, 3. Servants, at leaſt among the heathens, might probably do this, when employed by their maſters to vend commodities; and indeed fraudulent practices were ſo common among perſons of their rank, that fur, in the Latin language, is uſed both for a ſervant and a thief. See Doddridge and Wetſtein.

Ver. 11, 12. For the grace of God—hath appeared, &c.] Χαρις properly ſignifies favour, and in the Sacred Writings expreſſes the free and unmerited goodneſs of God, in ſending his only begotten Son to declare his will, and to redeem us from our iniquities by his death. Sometimes the effects of this wonderful kindneſs of God,—as the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt,—are called grace; and ſometimes the Goſpel itſelf is expreſſed by this ſame word; (Col. i. 6.) in which ſenſe it is to be underſtood in the paſſage before us: When the Apoſtle ſays that the Goſpel, or the grace of God manifeſted in the Goſpel, hath appeared, hath riſen, or ſhined out to all men, he alludes to the appearance of the heavenly bodies, and the brightneſs and glory with which they ſhine upon the world. Our bleſſed Lord is himſelf compared to a light ſhining in darkneſs, John i. 5. and the Apoſtles are ſpoken of under the ſame image, Matth. v. 14. The original of the 11th verſe appeared ambiguous to our tranſlators; for though they render it in the text the grace of God—hath appeared to all men, (according to which they may be underſtood of the Goſpel's being preached not only unto Jews, but to men of all nations, and of all ranks and orders in life;) yet they have given a different turn to the words in their marginal reading, which is,—the grace of God that bringeth ſalvation to all men, hath appeared: and as the original will very well admit of this ſenſe, ſo it is certainly agreeable to the other Scriptures, and to the gracious purpoſe of God, which is well expreſſed by St. Paul, 1 Tim. ii. 4. This grace of God, which offers ſalvation to all men, of every rank and degree, does not however diſengage any from the obligations they are under to live well; but teaches us that denying ungodlineſs, &c. which words contain a brief ſummary of the whole Chriſtian practice. By ungodlineſs, we may underſtand atheiſm and irreligion, blaſphemy, perjury, profane curſing and ſwearing, contempt of God, a want of due reverence to him, neglect of his worſhip, judging hardly, or ſpeaking diſreſpectfully of his providence,—diſobedience to his will. By worldly luſts may be underſtood thoſe other vices of mankind, which are called the works of the fleſh; (Gal. v. 19, &c.)—Every thing contrary to the ſobriety and righteouſneſs recommended in the next ſentence; the former of which conſiſts in the right government of our natural appetites and paſſions, while the latter comprehends all the duties which we owe to our neighbours. Godlineſs or piety conſiſts in that high veneration, and thoſe juſt conceptions we ſhould entertain of the Supreme Being, expreſſed by prayer and thankſgiving, by loving and fearing him, putting our truſt in him, and ſubmitting to him in all events. See Benſon, Wetſtein, and Morris's Sermons, vol. i. p. 294, &c.

Ver. 13. And the glorious appearing] Even the glorious appearing of our great God and Saviour. Wat. We may obſerve, in ſupport of this verſion, which is perfectly agreeable to the original, that we never 14 Who gave himſelf for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himſelf a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

15 Theſe things ſpeak and exhort, and rebuke with all authority. Let no man deſpiſe thee.

CHAP. III.

Titus is yet further directed by Paul, both concerning the things he ſhould teach, and not teach: he is willed alſo to reject obſtinate hereticks: which done, he appointeth him both time and place, wherein he ſhould come unto him; and ſo concludeth.

PUT them in mind to be ſubject to principalities and powers, to obey magiſtrates, to be ready to every good work,

2 To ſpeak evil of no man, to be no brawlers, but gentle, ſhewing all meekneſs unto all men.

3 For we ourſelves alſo were ſometimes fooliſh, diſobedient, deceived, ſerving divers luſts and pleaſures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another.

4 But after that the kindneſs and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared,

5 Not by works of righteouſneſs which we have done, but according to his mercy he ſaved us by the waſhing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghoſt;

ver read in Scripture of the appearance of God the Father; and conſequently we have in this text as ſtrong a proof as poſſible of the true divinity of Jeſus Chriſt. See 2 Pet. i. 1. and Jones's Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity, c. i. 13.

Ver. 14. A peculiar people] The word περιȣσιον, rendered peculiar, does not appear to have been uſed by any of the ancient profane writers. The LXX ſeem firſt to have framed it, in order to expreſs the Hebrew סגלה, Segleh, a peculium, a peculiar treaſure or property. "Λαὸς περιȣσιος ſignifies a ſupernumerary people, a people wherein God had a ſuperlative property and intereſt, above and beſides his common intereſt in all the nations of the world," ſays the learned Joſ. Mede, p. 125. The Jews were formerly God's peculiar people; his peculiar people under the Goſpel are the Chriſtians: they are diſtinguiſhed or ſeparated from the world by their being devoted to Chriſt, who died as well as lived to render them holy, in order to their being finally and perfectly happy. All Chriſtians are the peculiar people of God under the Goſpel; but perhaps the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, in writing to a Gentile Evangeliſt, among Gentile churches, might have here a more particular reference to the Gentile Chriſtians, who had not formerly been the people of God, and whom the Judaizers would ſtill have excluded from that number, unleſs they would ſubmit to their impoſitions. It ſhould be obſerved particularly with what ſtrength and emphaſis the Apoſtle ſpeaks throughout theſe verſes of the abſolute neceſſity of good works, of a life of holineſs and purity; and when our Lord and his Apoſtles have laid ſuch a ſtreſs upon good works, and have frequently declared them indiſpenſably neceſſary to ſalvation, none who profeſs Chriſtianity can neglect the practice of them, without the extreme peril of their ſouls; and none who profeſs to be teachers of that Chriſtianity can ſpeak of them with contempt or indifference, without bringing a grievous offence upon the faith of Chriſt: and woe be to them by whom ſuch offence cometh! See 1 Pet. ii. 9. Benſon, Wolfius, Suicer, and Parkhurſt on the word περιȣσιος.

Chap. III. Ver. 1. The Jews were commonly of a ſeditious, rebellious ſpirit, eſpecially about the time when this Epiſtle was written; and it was with great reluctance that they obeyed any civil governors, but thoſe of their own nation. The Judaizing Chriſtians were too apt to imitate them, and to retain this factious ſpirit; which they would have infuſed into the Gentile Chriſtians, and have taught them to have had as ſovereign a contempt for men of other religions, as they had themſelves. In oppoſition to which, Titus was to teach the Chriſtians to pay the moſt ſtrict obedience to their civil governors, and to be of a benign ſpirit to all men; even to men of different nations, ſects, and religion: And to enforce this, St. Paul is thought to have urged his own example, ver. 3. He had been formerly as furious a perſecutor of the Chriſtians, and as bigotted a Jew, as any of the unbelieving Jews, or Judaizing Chriſtians could be; but ſince he had embraced Chriſtianity, he had enlarged his charity, and ſaw clearly the reaſonableneſs of loving, and doing good to all men, of whatever faith or profeſſion. Titus was to be perpetually inculcating upon the Chriſtians this temper and behaviour, as infinitely preferable to a regard for Jewiſh genealogies, traditions, and ceremonies: And he was not only to teach this himſelf, but was alſo informed, that ſuch of the Jewiſh Chriſtians as made factions and parties, and propagated their impoſitions, were hereticks; and as ſuch the Chriſtians were to regard them, and to hold no familiar ſociety with them. See 1 Tim. ii. 1—4. Rom. xiii. 1, 7. Locke, Benſon, and Sherlock's Diſcourſes, vol. iv. ſerm. 13.

Ver. 2. To ſpeak evil, &c.] To revile, or calumniate no man; not to be quarrelſome, or contentious. Wat. Heylin, Doddridge, and MS. See Barrow's Works, vol. i. p. 162.

Ver. 3. For we ourſelves alſo] That St. Paul, like many other authors, frequently ſpeaks of himſelf in the firſt perſon plural, is well known to all who have attended to his phraſeology, and to the courſe of theſe annotations. That he is ſpeaking here of himſelf among others, has been the opinion of many commentators, both ancient and modern; nor does there ſeem to be any reaſon in the world, why St. Paul ſhould exclude himſelf from the number of thoſe, who were by nature ſinners; on the contrary, he is at all times ready to avow the dark and ſinful ſtate he was in, before his converſion by the grace of Chriſt; and there are thoſe who think that what is ſaid in the 6th verſe particularly marks out St. Paul. "I have no doubt, ſays Dr. Doddridge, that when the Apoſtle wrote this, he had ſuch ſublime views of the purity of God's law, and the imperfection of his own beſt obedience, how capable ſoever of being juſtified before men, that he could apply what he here wrote to much of his own character, while an enemy to Chriſtianity." We may obſerve, that the words rendered luſts and pleaſures, often ſignify only an intenſe deſire, and any thing that is grateful or agreeable: In which view they more ſtrongly mark out Saul's character before his converſion. He had been guilty of following his own pleaſure or inclination, and gratifying his intenſe deſires in perſecuting the Chriſtians, for which he reckoned himſelf as a great ſinner before his converſion, and the leaſt of all ſaints after his converſion. Inſtead of αλληλȣς, one another, the Ethiopic verſion reads αδελφȣς, the brethren, that is, the Chriſtians; which, if this reading could be allowed, ſtrongly expreſſes Saul's temper of mind before his converſion. See Benſon, Doddridge, Lardner, and Gataker on Antonin. p. 286.

Ver. 4. God our Saviour] It is obſervable that God the Father is here called our Saviour; to intimate, that it was his paternal love to us, which engaged him to appoint his Son to redeem us, and to perform for us all thoſe important offices, by which he accompliſhes our ſalvation. See Doddridge, Wolfius, and Calmet.

Ver. 5. By the waſhing of regeneration] The word λȣτρον, rendered waſhing, is interpreted by many, of a laver, or veſſel to waſh in; though λȣτηρ is the word more commonly uſed in that ſenſe: and therefore ſome prefer our tranſlation of waſhing; by which is meant the water in which one is waſhed. Παλίγγενεσία, regeneration, or new birth, is uſed only here and Matth. xix. 28. where ſee the note. In the preſent text, by regeneration Chriſtian baptiſm appears to be meant; hence it is called the waſhing of regeneration: In which expreſſion the Apoſtle ſeems to allude to what Ananias had ſaid to him upon his converſion to Chriſtianity; And now, why tarrieſt thou? Ariſe, and be baptized, and waſh away thy ſins, calling on the name of the Lord. Acts xxii. 16. comp. Epheſ. v. 26. Ezek. xxxvi. 25. In the Scripture we never read of an unregenerate Chriſtian, nor could they have been called ſo, in any other ſenſe than we ſay, a covetous, drunken, or lewd Chriſtian, and the like: But, when we interpret regeneration of Chriſtian baptiſm, we do not mean that every Chriſtian by baptiſm was, or is, actually rendered pure and holy; but that they were thereby ſet apart for purity and holineſs, and were obliged in future to be pure and holy. So he that was circumciſed was not thereby made holy, but was ſet apart to be holy; and obliged to keep the whole Jewiſh law. Baptized Chriſtians were to conſider themſelves, like perſons dead to all their old relations, and born into a new family: As ſuch, they were to quit their former irreligions and bad habits; all their ſins and vices whatever; and to live in conformity to the laws of the new family, into which they had lately come. See Coloſſ. iii. 9—11. 1 Pet. iii. 21. The Apoſtle adds, And the renewing, or renovation of the Holy Spirit; by his ſanctifying influences purifying our ſouls, and perfecting the new life in us. We may obſerve, that the miraculous or extraordinary gifts were alſo ſanctifying influences of the Spirit; for no knowledge or evidence was imparted, but with a view to render men holy. St. Paul was to improve the inward illumination which he received from the Spirit, not only to the inſtructing and converting others, but alſo to the renewing of his own mind and life. Thoſe who received the knowledge and evidence of Chriſtianity from him or his writings, were to improve that knowledge to the renewing of their minds; Rom. xii. 2. Col. iii. 10. As all that knowledge and evidence proceeded from the Spirit, they might either of them, in a large ſenſe of the phraſe, be called, The renovation of the Holy Spirit. See Mede, Benſon, Taylor's Key to the Apoſtolic Writings, ſect. 81. and in Waterland's Sermons, "The Summary View of Juſtification."—vol. i. p. 23.

8 This is a faithful ſaying, and theſe things I will that thou affirm conſtantly, that they which have believed in God, might be careful to maintain good works. Theſe things are good and profitable unto men.

9 But avoid fooliſh queſtions, and genealogies, and contentions, and ſtrivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain.

10 A man that is an heretick, after the firſt and ſecond admonition, reject;

Ver. 6. Which he ſhed on us abundantly] We obſerved on ver. 3. that theſe words have been explained as referring to St. Paul alone, and the effuſion of the Holy Spirit upon him, to qualify him for his extraordinary office; but as there is no kind of need to exclude others from this text, ſo we may obſerve, that thus underſtood, it would make the text quite foreign to the purpoſe for which it is introduced; namely, of diſſuading from ſevere and uncharitable cenſures. See Doddridge, and Benſon.

Ver. 7. That, being juſtified by his grace] Upon men's firſt believing, or embracing the profeſſion of the Chriſtian faith by baptiſm, they were juſtified by grace, or free favour, from all their paſt ſins; and put into a ſtate, in which if they perſevered, they might hope for eternal life. This was the initial, or firſt juſtification, which was and could be only by faith;—the ſecond, or final juſtification at the laſt day, muſt be by good works built upon the foundation of this faith, and not by faith only. See Taylor's Key, the next note, Hallet's Notes, vol. iii. p. 304. and 1 Theſſ. i. 5, 6. 1 Pet. iv. 14.

Ver. 8. This is a faithful ſaying] "But, though we are put into a ſtate of juſtification, merely by grace, or through the divine favour, this is a matter of certain truth and great importance; and concerning theſe things, I order that you ſtrenuouſly inſiſt upon it, that they who have believed in God, as he has revealed himſelf in the Goſpel, ſhould be very careful to ſtand up for good works:"—That is, all actions that are good in their own nature, or enjoined by the Chriſtian law; our duty towards God, our neighbour, and ourſelves. Theſe good and excellent works the Chriſtians were to maintain and ſtand up for; to defend them, as it were, from whatever might tend to make themſelves remiſs in the performance of them. Nothing can more exactly ſuit the connection: The Judaizers made no account of good works; they repreſented them as of little or no moment, compared with believing, as they ſaid, about Jewiſh fables, the endleſs genealogies, or generations of the Eons; the perpetuity of the Moſaic law, and its being obligatory upon the Gentiles, as well as Jewiſh Chriſtians. (See ver. 9.) Hence the Apoſtle, in contradiction to ſuch vain and unprofitable jargon, enjoins Titus, ch. ii. 1, &c. to teach things which became ſound doctrine; namely, that all perſons ſhould practiſe good works; (ſee alſo ver. 14.) And here again he ſtrongly inculcates the ſame important truths. It deſerves great regard, that St. Paul accounted this a matter of the utmoſt moment; and ordered Titus not to urge good works now and then, or as a thing by the bye; but to be conſtantly, or with all his might, affirming, that Chriſtians ought to maintain good works. See on ch. ii. 14. Good works, elſewhere repreſented as neceſſary to ſalvation, are here repreſented as amiable and excellent in themſelves, and greatly uſeful and profitable unto mankind; ſo they are called καλα εργα, beautiful works. Theſe, therefore, are the things which the miniſters of Chriſt are to affirm conſtantly, or ſtrenuouſly, and to inculcate above all things. Surely the preachers of the Chriſtian doctrine now-a-days cannot form themſelves upon a better model than that of St. Paul; and how much would it conduce to make the practice of virtue and piety univerſal, and promote all rational and ſocial happineſs, if this were their conſtant, their prevailing purſuit! How great a bleſſing would the miniſters of the Goſpel then be to the world, and what infinitely ſuperior ſatisfaction would they experience in their own conſciences, than thoſe who preach Chriſt of contention, or make the Goſpel a ſtalking-horſe for baſe, worldly, and political deſigns! See Benſon, Doddridge, Whitby, and Parkhurſt on the word προϊστημι.

Ver. 10. A man that is an heretic, &c.] The word Αἱρεσις, from αἱρεω, to chooſe, ſignifies a ſect; i. e. a form, or mode of religious worſhip, diſcipline, or opinion, which any one chooſes, follows, and profeſſes; or, the perſons who follow ſuch form or mode. See Acts v. 17. xv. 5. xxiv. 5. xxvi. 5. xxviii. 22. Joſephus calls the ſeveral ſects of the Phariſees, Sadducees, &c. Αἱρεσεις, in the ſame manner as St. Luke; (See Antiq. lib. xiii. c. v. ſect. 9.) and ſo it is applied by St. Paul (1 Cor. xi. 19. Gal. v. 20.) for a ſect among Chriſtians, reſembling thoſe among the Jews and heathens;—a ſeparation from the communion of other Chriſtians: And by St. Peter it ſeems to be uſed in the ſenſe of electing, eſpouſing, or defending ſome fundamental error, concerning Chriſtian doctrine, whether of faith or practice. 2 Pet. ii. 1. "For I define hereſy, ſays Dr. Waterland, not merely a miſtake of judgement, though in fundamentals, but eſpouſing ſuch erroneous judgement: either teaching or diſſeminating it, or openly ſupporting or aſſiſting thoſe who do." Hence Αἱρετικος, an heretic, is a man who chooſes and eſpouſes ſome fundamental error, concerning the Chriſtian doctrine; "Not every one that miſtakes in judgement,—though in matters of great importance, in points fundamental;—but he who openly eſpouſes ſuch fundamental errors, I take to be an heretic, ſays Dr. Waterland, in the true and full Scripture notion of the word;"—A definition, very agreeable to that excellent ſaying of St. Auſtin, Errare poſſum, hæreticus eſſe nolo. St. Paul orders Timothy, after the firſt and ſecond admonition, to reject, or, as Dr. Heylin well expreſſes it, to have nothing to do with, to refuſe all kind of notice or concern, with reſpect to a perſon of this character; knowing that he who is ſuch, that is, continues ſuch after two admonitions, is now without excuſe;—αυτοκατακριτος;—and, as it were, paſſes ſentence upon himſelf; either as voluntarily cutting himſelf off from the church by an open revolt, or, as rendering himſelf incapable of the privileges and bleſſings belonging to it, by renouncing its faith: Which, in a juſt conſtruction, is judging or declaring himſelf unworthy of the bleſſings tendered. See Acts xiii. 49. and Waterland's "Importance of the doctrine of the Trinity," p. 114 to 120. Thoſe who are not ſatisfied with the preſent interpretation of this much-controverted paſſage, will find abundant matter to employ their ſpeculations, in the writings of Foſter, Stebbing, Hallet, and others on the ſubject. Dr. Benſon obſerves well, that St. Paul does not ſay to Timothy, "After the firſt and ſecond admonition, impriſon the heretic; teize him with artful, ſly, inſinuating examinations; or put him to the torture, to make him confeſs; and then, if he will not recant, roaſt him in a ſlow and lingering fire, as an heretic convict:" Such rules never proceeded from the Apoſtles of our Lord, but from the ſynagogue of Satan; who themſelves anſwer to the apoſtolic deſcription of heretics, whilſt many of thoſe whom they condemn as heretics, have the marks of being the faithful followers of Chriſt, and members of his true church. "Exciting the rage of the populace, or awakening the zeal of the civil magiſtrate; inflicting bodily pains and penalties, confiſcating poſſeſſions, or uſing men's names and perſons ill, becauſe of their thinking for themſelves, or chooſing to worſhip God according to their own conſciences,—has never yet been found the way to enlighten men's underſtandings, or to make them better Chriſtians, or honeſter men."

Ver. 12.] The Apoſtle proceeds to order Titus to come to him, when the perſon ſhould arrive, whom he would ſend to releaſe him; and in the mean time to ſend Zenas or Apollos to him; but, as full of the grand ſubject of the Epiſtle, he bids Titus put the Gentile Chriſtians in Crete upon providing what was proper for their journey, as a proof of the influence which true Chriſtianity had upon them; and which was to be ſhewn, not by idle notions, or empty ceremonies, but by works ſubſtantially beneficial and good. ver. 12. to the end. There were towns in ſeveral countries, of the name of Nicopolis; but this was moſt probably in Epirus. It was called Nicopolis, or, "the city of victory," becauſe it was built in memory of the victory which Auguſtus obtained over Anthony at Actium. It appears from the laſt clauſe of this verſe, that St. Paul was now at liberty; and from all circumſtances it ſeems moſt probable that this Epiſtle was written between his firſt and ſecond impriſonment. See Benſon, L'Enfant, and Craddock.

Ver. 13. Bring Zenas, &c.] St. Paul, moſt likely, knew that Zenas and Apollos were to paſs through, or touch upon the iſland; and therefore he ordered Titus, σπουδαιως προπεμψαι, to conduct them along with all care; or, to furniſh them with proviſions, to help them to proceed comfortably in their journey. See on 3 John, ver. 6. As Νομικος is the word made uſe of, Matth. xxii. 35. and as Zenas is here mentioned with Apollos; it ſeems more probable that he was a Jewiſh, than a Roman lawyer. See Benſon, Heylin, and Wolfius.

Ver. 14. And let ours alſo learn, &c.] "Let our brethren learn (as I

ſaid

15 All that are with me ſalute thee. Greet them that love us in the faith. Grace be with you all. Amen.

It was written to Titus, ordained the firſt biſhop of the church of the Cretans, from Nicopolis of Macedonia.

ſaid ver. 8.) to be foremoſt in the practice of good works upon needful occaſions; particularly to aſſiſt ſuch Chriſtian brethren, who travel about to preach the pure Goſpel of Chriſt; that they may not be unfruitful, and act as if they had learned nothing but barren ſpeculations from that religion, which is ſo well calculated to inſpire and animate every ſentiment of benevolence and generoſity." See Heylin, Doddridge, and Benſon.

Ver. 15. Grace be with you all. Amen.] This ſalutation ſhews, that though the Epiſtle was directed and ſent to Titus, it was intended for the benefit of all the true Chriſtians in Crete. See the introductory note to this Epiſtle, and on 2 Pet. iii. 18.

REFLECTIONS ON THE EPISTLE TO TITUS.

Never let it be forgotten, by any who call themſelves Chriſtians, that the faith of God's elect is the acknowledgement of the truth which is after godlineſs, ch. i. 1. Never let the great deſign of Chriſtianity be loſt, in an eager contention for any of its appendages, or any of its parts: Yet, alas! how often has it, in particular inſtances, been wounded almoſt to death, in a furious attempt to reſcue it, and that ſometimes perhaps from only an imaginary danger! That we may be more ſenſible of its vital influence, may we ever retain the hope of that eternal life, which it propoſes, as the great end of all our purſuits; even of that life which God, who cannot lie, hath promiſed; (ver. 2.) and rejoice to think, that ſo immenſe a ſuperſtructure has ſo firm, ſo divine a foundation; nor let us ever give it up for any thing that a flattering world, always ready to engage, and ſlow to perform, can promiſe.

How very thankful ſhould we be for the proviſion God hath made for the manifeſtation of his word through preaching, and for his goodneſs, in raiſing up faithful paſtors to his church: overſeers in every age, who have been blameleſs, ſober, juſt, holy, and temperate. Such may all be, who appear under that ſacred character! able by their doctrine to inſtruct, by their reaſoning to convince, by their practice to edify; ever ſolicitous that they may not neglect their paſtoral ſervices; that they may not lord it proudly over their brethren; that they may not be tranſported by furious paſſions, or miſguided by raſh concluſions, or perverted by low intereſts, and the greedineſs of filthy lucre; but that they may approve themſelves the faithful ſtewards of God, and promote the good order of his houſe; and, far as their influence can reach, the happineſs of every member of his family. ver. 3—9.

In order to this, let them look well to their own houſes, that nothing may be wanting on their part to make their children tractable, faithful, and ſober, ver. 6. And let the children of miniſters conſider the obligations they are under, to cultivate a teachable ſpirit, and to maintain the ſtricteſt decency in their whole deportment; as remembering the ſuperior advantages they may be ſuppoſed to enjoy for religious improvement, and how much a miniſter's reputation and uſefulneſs depend upon the regularity of his family.

While we are reading the word of God, we ſhould attentively obſerve what characters are adorned with honour, and what are branded with infamy. It is melancholy to think, that any nation, though ever ſo ſmall, ever ſo remote, ever ſo deſtitute of cultivation and inſtruction, ſhould deſerve the characters which Epimenides gives of the Cretans, and which St. Paul found reaſon to confirm; (ver. 12.) and that luxury and fraud, ideneſs and fury, diſſonant as they may ſeem, ſhould be their governing inclinations. Sad diſtempers in the minds of men! but how peculiarly lamentable, when they prevail among profeſſing Chriſtians!—for among thoſe that are Chriſtians indeed, they cannot poſſibly prevail. Yet ſurely, there are not a few, even in Britain, with all its advantages, who, while profeſſing to know God, and Chriſt Jeſus his Son, in works deny them. ver. 16. Such are abominable in proportion to the degree in which they are diſobedient; and, as they are reprobate to every good work now, muſt expect to be rejected with abhorrence at laſt by that God, whoſe name they have blaſphemed, and whoſe Son they have diſhonoured.

To remedy, and if poſſible to prevent ſuch evils, the miniſters of Chriſt ſhould be conſtantly applying themſelves in ſuitable exhortations and charges to all with whom they are concerned. Let them apply to the aged and the young, and let the aged of both ſexes uſe that authority which their further progreſs in life may give, to enforce upon the riſing generation ſuitable leſſons of wiſdom and piety; that ſo prudence and charity, œconomy and ſweetneſs of temper, and a ſubjection to their huſbands, formed on love and on religion, may be the character of young wives; and that they may join to it that very important duty, of a pious care in the education of thoſe children whom God may give them. May the ſobriety of young men encourage a hope that they will preſide over their families in the fear of God, and repay the goodneſs of ſuch amiable conſorts: And may the teachers, whether in public or private life, be themſelves examples of the virtues they inculcate; that they who ſtudy to aſperſe Chriſtianity may find themſelves ſilenced, till their ſhame turns into a worthier affection, till their ſilence breaks forth into praiſe, and, imbibing the like principles, they feel them productive of the like virtues. ch. ii. 2—6.

The word of God hardly affords a more inſtructive and comprehenſive ſummary of the Goſpel, than that which is contained ver. 11—14. It gives us a view of the nature of the diſpenſation, as a doctrine of Grace, and at the ſame time, a doctrine according to Godlineſs. It hath appeared to all men, and it bringeth them ſalvation, by inculcating the moſt ſalutary leſſons which man can receive; teaching us to deny ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, how preſſing ſoever their ſolicitations may be; and to live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly in this preſent tranſitory world. It inſtructs us in all the branches of our duty, to God, ourſelves, and our fellow Chriſtians, and guides us to uniform and complete goodneſs. As we are ſlow of heart to attend to ſuch inſtructions, it inforces them with motives the moſt generous and the moſt animating: It repreſents to us, as it were in a prophetic union, that bleſſed hope, even the glorious appearance of the great God and our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; when he ſhall come with everlaſting bleſſings in his hands, to reward all his faithful people; and with all the terrors of divine vengeance, to be poured forth upon all who have rejected the authority of his Goſpel. And ſurely, if this view cannot prevail upon us, as his peculiar people, zealous of good works, to conſecrate ourſelves to God, and to engage with vigour in his ſervice, we muſt be utterly inſenſible, and worthy of the ſevereſt puniſhment.

Let theſe leſſons therefore every where be taught with all authority, (ver. 15.) and addreſſed at once to the meaneſt, and to the greateſt of mankind; that they may join in a pious care to adorn in all things the doctrine of ſuch a Saviour, and to ſecure their ſhare in ſuch a ſalvation. See ver. 10.

The remembrance of the irregularities with which we ourſelves were once chargeable, of that ſinful and miſerable ſtate in which we once were, ſhould make us candid to others, and ſilence our ſevere cenſures againſt them. ch. iii. 2. Let us rather, with the Apoſtle, humbly adore that grace, which has now made a difference between us and thoſe who are ſtill fooliſh and diſobedient, wandering in the paths of vice, and enſlaved to divers luſts and paſſions. Let the kindneſs, the philanthropy of God, be daily celebrated and adored by us; of God, who hath ſaved us, not by the righteouſneſs of our works, but by his own rich and overflowing mercy; who hath juſtified us by his free grace in Chriſt, and thereby made us heirs, according to the hope of eternal life. Nor let us ever forget how much we are indebted to the regenerating and renewing influences of the Holy Ghoſt, ſhed abroad upon us richly by Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour. May it waſh and purify our ſouls more and more from every ſtain of ſin, and inſpire us with a pious ardour to honour our profeſſion by a holy life! Having profeſſed our belief in God, may we carefully practiſe all the virtues of the Chriſtian character; for theſe things are indeed good and profitable to men:—guarding at the ſame time againſt all thoſe airy curioſities, and abſtruſe ſpeculations, which on the contrary are unprofitable and vain. ver. 3—9.

How greatly is it to be wiſhed, that all the churches of Chriſt were delivered from ſuch factious members and teachers, as would depart from the infallible rule of truth laid down in the word of God, and ſubvert the faith once delivered to the ſaints;—introducing, inſtead of it, the doctrines of men, and teaching things which tend to alienate the minds of Chriſtians from the Goſpel, and from each other, in order to ſet up their own authority, and promote a private ſecular intereſt! We ought undoubtedly to be cautious how we paſs ſuch a cenſure on particular perſons, without clear and evident proof; but when ſuch proof ariſes, and the perſons in queſtion appear to be the turbulent and pernicious heretics that St. Paul deſcribes, ver. 10. it were to be wiſhed they might always meet with the treatment which he recommends. They ought firſt to be plainly and ſeriouſly admoniſhed; and if repeated admonitions are rejected, it is the duty of the wiſer and ſounder parts of Chriſtian churches to expel them; that ſo they may be leſs capable of doing miſchief, and that the gangrene of ſuch pernicious principles may not ſpread to the diſgrace and ruin of the churches to which they belong.

But, let us ever remember, this is all the remedy which the ſacred Scriptures ſuggeſt or furniſh out to us: and they who, to the ſolemn cenſure of diſturbed and injured churches, add any corporal ſeverities, or civil penalties whatſoever,—or take up weapons which Chriſt hath never put into their hands, may very probably do more miſchief in the church, and in the world, than the moſt erroneous of thoſe againſt whom they would arm their terrors.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO PHILEMON.

He rejoiceth to hear of the faith and love of Philemon: whom he deſireth to forgive his ſervant Oneſimus, and lovingly to receive him again.

PAUL, a priſoner of Jeſus Chriſt, and Timothy our brother, unto Philemon our dearly beloved, and fellow-labourer,

2 And to our beloved Apphia, and Ar-

Ver. 1. Epheſ. iii. 1. iv. 1. ver. 9. 2 Tim. i. 8. Phil. ii. 25.—V. 2. Col. iv. 17. Phil. ii. 25. Rom. xvi. 5.

PHILEMON] Seems to have been a ſubſtantial man at Coloſſe, who had a ſpacious houſe, in which a part of the Chriſtian church aſſembled, and in which travelling Chriſtians were entertained. The want of public inns among the ancients made this hoſpitality needful, and it was particularly enjoined upon Chriſtians to receive one another hoſpitably; but, as every individual was not in a condition to entertain Chriſtian ſtrangers, the churches ſeem to have appointed one or more of their principal members for this purpoſe; Rom. xvi. 22. This was the office of deacons; ſo that Philemon had an office in the church, and indeed he is by ſome of the ancients intitled, "Biſhop of Coloſſe." Whatever his miniſterial office was, St. Paul calls him his fellow-labourer. His ſon Archippus, to whom this Epiſtle is alſo addreſſed, had juſt before been deacon in the church of Coloſſe, Col. iv. 17. He is accordingly mentioned with honour by St. Paul, who not only ſtiles him his fellow-labourer, like his father, but alſo his fellow-ſoldier. Philemon is thought to have been one of St. Paul's firſt fruits of the church of Epheſus, and not to have been converted, like the reſt, by Epaphras, but by St. Paul himſelf; having probably come to Epheſus while St. Paul was there, ver. 19. This Epiſtle was written from Rome at the ſame time with the Epiſtles to the Coloſſians, Philippians, &c. about A. D. 62 or 63. The occaſion of it was this: Oneſimus, Philemon's ſlave, had robbed him, and fled to Rome; there St. Paul meeting with him, converted him to the Chriſtian faith; and having kept him ſome time, to be ſatisfied of his reformation, ſends him back to his maſter with this letter; which has always been admired for its delicacy of ſentiment and maſterly addreſs, and may be conſidered as a fine model of epiſtolary writing. Some have called this a private letter, and would not have it inſerted among the apoſtolic Epiſtles; but, ſuppoſe this was only a private letter, nothing gives one a better idea of a man's character, than his letters to his private friends; and in this letter we have the picture of a wiſe and good man, and a zealous, generous friend; who knew how to condeſcend to men of low eſtate, and promote their temporal and ſpiritual welfare. But there is no reaſon for looking at this as a mere private letter; for it was all written with the Apoſtle's own hand, (ver. 19.) which was much more than that which he called the token in all his Epiſtles, 2 Theſſ. iii. 17. It was received by the primitive Chriſtians as a part of Sacred Scripture, and accordingly read in the churches: Beſides, the argument is not mean, nor any part of the Epiſtle unworthy the great Apoſtle of the Gentiles. Whoever carefully reads it, will diſcern a great number of the doctrines and precepts of Chriſtianity expreſſed or inſinuated: For inſtance, firſt, in the religious view, or upon a ſpiritual account, all Chriſtians are upon a level: Oneſimus the ſlave, upon becoming a Chriſtian, is the Apoſtle's dear ſon, and Philemon's brother. Secondly, Chriſtianity makes no alteration in men's civil affairs: By Chriſtian baptiſm a ſlave did not become a freed-man: His temporal eſtate and condition was ſtill the ſame. Thirdly, Servants ſhould not be taken or retained from their own maſters, without their maſter's conſent: ver. 13, 14. Fourthly, We ſhould love, and do good unto all men; we ſhould not contemn perſons of low eſtate, nor diſdain to help the meaneſt ſlave, when it is in our power. Fifthly, We ſhould not utterly deſpair of thoſe who are wicked, but ſhould uſe our beſt endeavours to reclaim them: Though Oneſimus had wronged his maſter, and run away from him, the Apoſtle attempted his converſion, among others, and ſucceeded. Sixthly, Reſtitution is due, where an injury has been done, unleſs the injured party freely forgive; ver. 18. Seventhly, We ſhould be grateful to our benefactors: This St. Paul touches upon very gently; ver. 19. Eighthly, We ſhould forgive the penitent, and be heartily reconciled to them. Ninthly, The Apoſtle's example teacheth us, to do all we can to make up quarrels and differences, and reconcile thoſe who are at variance. Tenthly, A wiſe man chooſes ſometimes to addreſs in a ſoft and obliging manner, even in caſes where there is an authority to command: ver. 8, 9. Eleventhly, The biſhops and paſtors of the Chriſtian church, and all teachers of religion, have here the moſt animating example ſet before them, to induce them to have a moſt tender regard to the ſouls of men, of all ranks and conditions; and to endeavour to convert a ſlave, as well as the rich, and great, and honourable of the earth. He who diſdained to teach a ſlave, a fugitive, and a thief, but preached the doctrine of ſalvation to him, and took pains with him, till he had reſtored him to his maſter an honeſt worthy man; How diſintereſted muſt he have been? To whom would not he condeſcend?—Or whoſe ſalvation and happineſs would he not endeavour to promote?—Would to God there was the ſame ſpirit in all the teachers of Chriſtianity, at all times, and in all places! Twelfthly, Here is a moſt glorious proof of the good effects of Chriſtianity, where it is rightly underſtood, and ſincerely embraced: It transforms a worthleſs ſlave and thief, into a pious, virtuous, amiable, and uſeful man; makes him not only happier and better in himſelf, but a better ſervant, and better in all relations and circumſtances whatſoever.—Shall an Epiſtle, ſo full of uſeful and excellent inſtructions, be rejected for its brevity; or becauſe the occaſion required that it ſhould be written concerning one particular perſon, or addreſſed to a private man?—Men would do well to examine it carefully, before they reject it, or ſpeak of it ſlightly. See on ver. 25. and the Reflections, Lardner, Benſon, Michaelis, and Bp. Smallridge's Sermons.

Ver. 1. Paul, a priſoner, &c.] St. Paul intimates, ver. 8, 9. that he choſe to lay aſide all his apoſtolic authority, and to beg it as a favour of Philemon to be reconciled to Oneſimus; and, in order to touch and melt the heart of Philemon, he begins with ſtiling himſelf a priſoner of Jeſus Chriſt. This affable and condeſcending manner of addreſs muſt be owned to be more agreeable and engaging than that of authority and command. The Apoſtle might here call Timothy the brother, and not his ſon, as he does elſewhere, to add weight and dignity to his character, and thereby render his name of more moment in behalf of Oneſimus. Whoever contributed any way towards helping forward the Goſpel, were called the Apoſtle's fellow-labourers, whether men or women. See ver. 24. Benſon, Locke, and on 2 Cor. i. 1.

Ver. 2. Apphia] This was a Roman name. St. Paul writes it Apphia, after the Hebrew manner; the Romans wrote it Appia. She is conjectured by ſome of the fathers, and aſſerted by others, to have been the wife of Philemon; and as ſhe is mentioned next to Philemon, and before Archippus, who was a miniſter in the church at Coloſſe, the conjecture ſeems not improbable. By the Apoſtle's ſtiling her ſiſter (according to the ſeveral ancient copies and verſions) or the beloved, according to the common reading, ſhe appears to have been a Chriſtian; and it is moſt likely that ſhe was addreſſed, in order to engage her intereſt in behalf of Oneſimus, with a view to whoſe affair the whole Epiſtle was evidently written. Archippus has been generally thought to be Philemon's ſon; probably he was one of St. Paul's aſſiſtants, who had ſome gifts of the Spirit, and had devoted himſelf very much to the work of the miniſtry in Coloſſe. They might have been called fellow-ſoldiers with the Apoſtles, who with them fought the good fight of faith; for the Chriſtian life is a warfare; But the Apoſtle ſeems to have uſed the phraſe for "ſuch as in thoſe times of perſecution took pains to preach and ſpread the Chriſtian religion," Philip. ii. 25. 1 Tim. i. 18. 2 Tim. ii. 3, 4. By the church in Philemon's houſe, the Apoſtle ſeems to have meant his whole family, who were Chriſtians, and united together in Chriſt's worſhip. See Rom. xvi. 5. 1 Cor. xvi. 19.

chippus our fellow-ſoldier, and to the church in thy houſe:

3 Grace to you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

4 I thank my God, making mention of thee always in my prayers,

5 Hearing of thy love and faith, which thou haſt toward the Lord Jeſus, and toward all ſaints;

6 That the communication of thy faith may become effectual, by the acknowledging of every good thing, which is in you in Chriſt Jeſus.

7 For we have great joy and conſolation in thy love, becauſe the bowels of the ſaints are refreſhed by thee, brother,

8 Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Chriſt, to enjoin thee that which is convenient,

9 Yet for love's ſake, I rather beſeech thee, being ſuch an one as Paul the aged, and now alſo a priſoner of Jeſus Chriſt.

10 I beſeech thee for my ſon Oneſimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds:

11 Which in time paſt was to thee unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and to me:

12 Whom I have ſent again: thou

Ver. 4. Epheſ. i. 16. 1 Theſſ. i. 2. 2 Theſſ. i. 3.—V. 5. Epheſ. i. 15. Col. i. 4.—V. 6. Phil. i. 9.—V. 7. 2 Tim. i. 16.—V. 8. 1 Theſſ. ii. 6.—V. 9. Ver. 1.—V. 10. Col. iv. 9. 1 Cor. iv. 15. Gal. iv. 19.

Ver. 4.] The Apoſtle does not proceed immediately to the main ſubject of the Epiſtle; but, after the uſual ſalutations, comes nearer to the point; with the moſt admirable addreſs thanking God that Philemon had been as generous and kind already, and had done as much in other inſtances, as he was now going to requeſt of him. He urges the benevolent and good man by his own paſt example; as if he had ſaid, "Only continue to act like yourſelf, and then you will do all that I am now going to deſire of you." This was certainly a moſt grateful and inſinuating way of pointing out to Philemon his duty, and the moſt proper and beautiful introduction to this particular requeſt: ver. 4—7. and Benſon.

Ver. 5. Hearing of thy love and faith] St. Paul had only heard of Philemon's faith, and conſequently had not converted him himſelf. The words in the original ſtand as they are placed in our verſion; but their proper rendering is, Hearing of the faith which thou haſt towards the Lord Jeſus, and of thy love to all the ſaints,—all Chriſtians. There are many inſtances of ſuch tranſpoſitions in the New Teſtament. See particularly Whitby on the place, and Blackwall's Sacred Claſſ. vol. i. p. 87.

Ver. 6. That the communication of thy faith] How that—is become—good thing, which is in us. Wat. Ver. 5, according to Bengelius, &c. would be clearer in a parentheſis, that this verſe might connect with ver. 4. Inſtead of ενεργης, effectual, ſome propoſe to read εναργης: That the participation of thy faith may become evident—towards or to the glory of Chriſt Jeſus. Dr. Benſon underſtands and paraphraſes the verſe thus, "So that your partaking of the faith has been efficacious, by the acknowledgment of every good man among you who believes in Chriſt Jeſus;" and he obſerves, "what greatly confirms this interpretation is, that it preſerves the connection not only between ver. 5, 6. but alſo between ver. 6, 7. for if St. Paul commended Philemon for making his faith known by his works, ver. 6. it very naturally follows, For we have much joy and conſolation in your love, becauſe, &c which would not ſo naturally follow a prayer or petition that Philemon's faith might be made manifeſt by his works."

Ver. 8.] After this preparation, the Apoſtle comes to the main ſubject of his Epiſtle, which was to requeſt Philemon to take Oneſimus into his favour, family, and ſervice again. The main argument which he urges is, that he had converted Oneſimus to the Chriſtian religion, who having ſincerely repented, would prove another ſort of ſervant than he had formerly been: Such ſoftneſs of expreſſion, warmth of affection, and elegance of addreſs are here made uſe of, as deſerve the higheſt approbation. See Benſon and Smallridge.

Ver. 9. Paul the aged] The ambaſſador. Wat. It is generally agreed that this Epiſtle was written about the year of Chriſt 63; and if we ſuppoſe Paul to have been twenty-four years old when Stephen was ſtoned, which is conſiſtent with his being called a young man;—that being about the year 34, (for we have not data ſufficient abſolutely to determine the exact time,) he would be now fifty-three; and conſidering how much his conſtitution would probably be impaired by his fatigues and ſufferings, before that time he might properly enough call himſelf πρεσβυτης,—one advanced in age, though not an old man. Dr. Whitby indeed ſays, we are young till forty, and not properly aged till after ſixty; and concludes that he might be about thirty-four at the death of Stephen, and ſixty-three at the date of this Epiſtle. However, as St. Paul never calls himſelf the aged, or refers to his age, upon any account elſewhere; as he uſes the phraſe an ambaſſador in bonds, Epheſ. vi. 20.—an Epiſtle written about the ſame time with this,—the conjecture of Dr. Bentley, approved by many learned expoſitors, and followed by Dr. Waterland in his interpretation, ſeems the moſt probable; reading πρεσβευτης an ambaſſador. See alſo 2 Cor. v. 20. Upon this interpretation let us attend a little to the force of the argument contained in the preſent verſe. It is as if the Apoſtle had ſaid, "I am become an humble petitioner;—and conſider with yourſelf who it is that begs this favour: It is Paul;—a name which once ſounded pleaſing in your ears, and a perſon for whom you profeſſed an high regard; that very perſon, who has travelled many a hundred miles by ſea and by land, through numberleſs difficulties, and much ill treatment for his attempts, to make men wiſe and good: To whom you, Philemon, as well as many thouſands, owe the ſalvation of their ſouls, and whoſe very name might carry in it the force of many arguments. The perſon who now humbly petitions you, is one who might addreſs you in a different manner: He has been illuminated with abundance of revelations from heaven, favoured with the power of working numerous, great, and beneficial miracles, and by the laying on of his hands is able to communicate ſpiritual gifts, or miraculous powers unto others. He has been ſent out among the nations, has baffled the wiſdom of the world, has prevailed againſt the eloquence of the orators, and has overturned the ſchemes of the heathen philoſophers, and Jewiſh Scribes and Rabbis: He has made numerous converts, both among Jews and Gentiles, turning men from ignorance, ſuperſtition, idolatry, and vice, to knowledge, piety, virtue, and happineſs. He bears a commiſſion of a ſublime nature, and of the utmoſt importance to the welfare of mankind, and he carries his credentials along with him: He is an ambaſſador for Chriſt, as though God did beſeech you by him; and he prays you, in Chriſt's ſtead, be you reconciled to Oneſimus again. Permit me alſo to add another circumſtance, which with all human perſons, and more eſpecially with all good Chriſtians, muſt have great weight; The ambaſſador is now alſo the priſoner of Jeſus Chriſt. I have been almoſt two years in the cuſtody of a ſoldier, and often chained to him; confined to a diſagreeable companion, and very much in his power, and at his mercy. Inquire now at Rome for tbe ambaſſador of Jeſus Chriſt,—you will find him in cuſtody, like a criminal; though really wearing that chain only for preaching the Goſpel, eſpecially among you Gentiles. And finally, conſider Him whoſe ambaſſador and priſoner I am; my commiſſion is from a perſon of higheſt dignity, for whoſe ſake I can endure a priſon, and joyfully wear this chain; and I am perſuaded that your regard to him is not ſmall, nor will you ſuffer an ambaſſador and priſoner of Chriſt to petition in vain." Almoſt every word carries in it the force of an argument; Philemon's love to the perſon of Paul,—his regard for his high office and dignity, as the ambaſſador of Chriſt,—his love and chearful obedience to the Lord Jeſus himſelf, are all touched upon in this ſhort ſentence. See Benſon, Whitby, Doddridge, Ward, Bentley, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 10. I beſeech thee for my ſon Oneſimus] The order of the original words is this: I intreat thee for a ſon of mine, whom I have begotten in my bonds,—Oneſimus. Thus the mind is kept in an agreeable ſuſpenſe; and it muſt have affected Philemon in ſuch a manner, as to render it impoſſible for him to withſtand an intreaty, propoſed with ſo much delicacy and modeſty. See Doddridge and Benſon.

Ver. 11. To thee unprofitable, but now profitable, &c.] It has been often and juſtly obſerved, that it was ſtrange Oneſimus, who had been ſo wicked in the pious family of Philemon, amidſt all the religious opportunities he enjoyed there, ſhould meet with converſion in his rambles at Rome. Inſtances have often happened, ſomewhat of a ſimilar nature; but it is very unjuſtifiable, and may probably be fatal, for any to preſume on the like extraordinary interpoſitions of Providence and grace in their favour. The word Oneſimus is generally known to ſignify profitable, and Oneſiphorus is much of the ſame import: they were names which might perhaps have been given to ſlaves by way of good omen, expreſſing expectation that they would bring advantage to their maſters; and it is very evident that St. Paul refers to the etymology of the word. See Doddridge, Benſon, and Wolfius.

Ver. 12. Mine own bowels] There are a number of paſſages in th ancient Greek and Latin writers, where children are called the bow of their parents. Obſerve how the Apoſtle riſes in his expreſſions In ver. 10. it was, my ſon Oneſimus: here it is mine own bowels, o "my moſt dearly and tenderly-beloved ſon;" and ver. 17. it is, my ſelf, or my very ſelf. There is that in Chriſtianity which ſo far throw down diſtinctions, as to ſet all good men upon a level; for they a equally intitled to the privileges of the Chriſtian church here, and t ſalvation hereafter. A ſlave, upon becoming a good Chriſtian, is th ſon, the friend, the brother, the bowels, and the very ſoul or ſelf of th great Apoſtle of the Gentiles: Such an alteration does the Goſp make in ſpirituals, while it deſtroys not the civil diſtinctions among men. How graceful is the Apoſtle's manner of condeſcenſion! H had before laid aſide all his Apoſtolic authority, and intreated Philemon as a ſuppliant: He now humbles himſelf to a level wi Oneſimu therefore receive him, that is mine own bowels:

13 Whom I would have retained with me, that in thy ſtead he might have miniſtered unto me in the bonds of the goſpel.

14 But without thy mind would I do nothing; that thy benefit ſhould not be as it were of neceſſity, but willingly.

15 For perhaps he therefore departed for a ſeaſon, that thou ſhouldeſt receive him for ever;

16 Not now as a ſervant, but above a ſervant, a brother beloved, ſpecially to me, but how much more unto thee, both in the fleſh, and in the Lord?

17 If thou count me therefore a partner, receive him as myſelf.

18 If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee aught, put that on mine account;

19 I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it: albeit, I do not ſay to thee how thou oweſt unto me even thine own ſelf beſides.

20 Yea, brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord: refreſh my bowels in the Lord.

21 Having confidence in thy obedience, I wrote unto thee, knowing that thou wilt alſo do more than I ſay.

22 But withal prepare me alſo a lodging:

Ver. 13. 1 Cor. xvi. 17. Phil. ii. 30.—V. 14. 2 Cor. ix. 7.—V. 16. Col. iii. 22.—V. 17. 2 Cor. viii. 23.—V. 21. 2 Cor. vii. 16.

Oneſimus, to exalt Oneſimus's character, and to intimate the worthineſs of the perſon for whom he was petitioning. With what zeal and ardent affection doth he ſerve his friend! How ſkilfully and ſtrenuouſly doth he plead his cauſe! adding motive to motive, though in the moſt conciſe and elegant manner, like one who was unwilling to take a denial. Scipio Gentilis has endeavoured to ſhew, that this Epiſtle has ſeveral of the beauties which ſhine in Demoſthenes and Tully, and which Ariſtotle and Longinus have admired and celebrated in the ancient poets and orators. See Benſon, Pricæus, and Le Clerc.

Ver. 13. In the bonds of the Goſpel] This is the fourth time that Paul has, in this ſhort Epiſtle, put Philemon in mind of his bonds; He touches them a fifth time, ver. 23. And whoever will be at the pains to compare the places in which he has mentioned thoſe bonds, and other afflictions, will find that he hath always done ſo with a propriety, which marks out his great penetration and judgement. See particularly Acts xxvi. 29. 2 Cor. xi. 23. Epheſ. iv. 1. vi. 20. Philip. i. 7. 2 Tim. ii. 8, &c.

Ver. 14. That thy benefit] That is, "Thy goodneſs to Oneſimus, in readily pardoning him, and treating him kindly for the future."

Ver. 15. For perhaps he therefore departed] As ver. 13, 14. were thrown in by way of parentheſis, this 15th verſe ought to be connected with ver. 12. As the event had been ſo happy, St. Paul aſcribes it to God: Oneſimus deſigned no ſuch thing by his flight; Philemon did not ſend him to Rome for that purpoſe, and Paul had not ſent to Coloſſe for him: There was no human contrivance to accompliſh ſo great and good an event; but God, in the courſe of his wiſe providence, had ſo ordered it, that Oneſimus's going to Rome had been the happy occaſion of his becoming a Chriſtian. Philemon, therefore, could not be angry at ſuch an event, unleſs he had a mind to quarrel with Divine Providence, the progreſs of the Goſpel, the repentance and welfare of Oneſimus, and what would in the end prove his own advantage. Thus the patriarch Joſeph aſcribed his going into Egypt to Divine Providence, though it had been occaſioned by the treachery and malice of his brethren. See Gen. xlv. 5. l. 20. It may not be improper to attend to the Apoſtle's ſoft and tender manner of expreſſing this: Perhaps—he ſpeaks a little dubiouſly: He was unwilling to pry into the ſecret views of Providence; but the event ſeemed to juſtify ſuch a conſtruction. Ἐχωρίσθη we have tranſlated he departed;—which is ſofter than to have ſaid, he abſconded, or run away, like a criminal; but the Greek word ſignifies he was ſeparated; which is much ſofter, and transfers the action to another; as if it had not been Oneſimus's own act and deed, but he had been paſſive therein. The over-ruling Providence of God had ſeparated him from his maſter, for great and good purpoſes, as the event had already manifeſted, and would further make appear. Again, that ſeparation had been but of very ſhort continuance; πρὸς ὥραν, for an hour; for ſo ſhort a ſpace, that he could ſcarcely be accounted a fugitive; eſpecially as he had returned voluntarily, and ſo much improved. He was ſeparated from his maſter for an hour, that he might receive him again for ever. In which words St. Paul promiſes, in effect, that Oneſimus would not run away any more: He was fully perſuaded of the ſincerity of his repentance, and that he would behave well for the time to come. See Exod. xxi. 2, 6. Deut. xv. 17. Lev. xxv. 46. and Benſon.

Ver. 16 Not now as a ſervant] Δοῦλον ſhould have been tranſlated a ſlave. Slaves were then bought and ſold, like cattle, in the market; and the deſcendants of ſuch ſlaves were born ſlaves: they did not receive wages, nor could they at their pleaſure hire themſelves to other maſters, but were looked upon as their maſters goods and poſſeſſions. Chriſtianity, as we have often obſerved, does not alter mens civil obligations or privileges; but it ſhould be obſerved, that the buying and ſelling men for ſlaves is quite another matter, and one which much concerns thoſe who are engaged in it, very ſeriouſly to conſider: and it is with great pleaſure, that on this occaſion I refer to Mr. Granville Sharpe's late humane and benevolent treatiſe on the ſubject, intitled, "A Repreſentation of the Injuſtice and dangerous Tendency of tolerating Slavery."

Ver. 17. If thou count me therefore a partner] "If, therefore, thou eſteemeſt me as a friend and companion in Chriſt." L'Enfant tranſlates it, "I conjure thee, therefore, by all that is common between us, receive him as myſelf." But the main thought which prevailed in the Apoſtle's mind, ſeems to have been the participation they both had in the bleſſings of the Goſpel, which was the deareſt bond of their friendſhip. The Apoſtle petitions like one quite in earneſt. See on ver. 12. Chriſtian friendſhip is not like the friendſhips of this world, which are often confederacies in vice, or leagues in pleaſure: It is founded on truth, piety, and extenſive virtue, and is therefore the warmeſt, ſinccreſt, and moſt durable friendſhip; not inconſiſtent, but accompanied with benevolence to all mankind. How unjuſtly the Chriſtian religion has been repreſented as defective, in no where recommending friendſhip, ſee (among other writers) Foſter's Sermons, vol. i. ſerm. 3.

Ver. 18. If he hath wronged thee] Here is a plain confirmation of the doctrine of reſtitution. Where any perſon has injured another, he is obliged by the laws of God and conſcience to make reparation as far as he is able, even where the law of the land may not compel him to do ſo; unleſs the injured party freely forgive him. We may here again obſerve how cautiouſly the Apoſtle proceeds: He would not mention the theſt, or robbery, till he had prepared the way by ſaying a number of kind things of Oneſimus; and then, when he comes to touch upon it, how ſoft is his language! He does not call it theſt, or robbery, but wronging or injuring him in ſome reſpect; or, owing him ſome money; which laſt is the language in caſe of a debt honourably contracted. Obſerve further, the Apoſtle does not abſolutely aſſert, that Oneſimus had done Philemon any injury, or owed him money; but if it was ſo: And finally, we may compare the Apoſtle's circumſtances with thoſe of Philemon. The Apoſtle was a priſoner; Philemon at full eaſe and liberty: The Apoſtle poor; Philemon moſt probably maſter of a plentiful eſtate; who was much more likely to have beſtowed ſomething upon the Apoſtle, than to have taken any thing from him. But St. Paul would ſave ſomething out of the kindneſs and charity of his friends, while he was a priſoner, or work with his own hands when he was ſet at liberty, to raiſe the money, rather than reſtitution ſhould not be made, if Philemon ſhould inſiſt upon it. See Benſon, and Smallridge.

Ver. 19. I Paul have written it with mine own hand] The Apoſtle ſeems commonly to have dictated, and another perſon to have wrote down what he ſaid; or to have written a copy, and another tranſcribed it; (ſee 2 Theſſ. iii. 17. 2 Pet. iii. 1.) but he probably wrote all this letter with his own hand; not only to engage to make reſtitution, if demanded, but to let Philemon ſee how much he intereſted himſelf in this affair. He directly promiſes to make reſtitution; but in an oblique manner only inſinuates his own claim upon Philemon. It is probable St. Paul did not convert Philemon immediately, but by ſome of his aſſiſtants; but, as the Apoſtle had brought the Goſpel into Aſia Minor, Philemon's converſion to Chriſtianity was owing to him; and therefore he might juſtly ſay, that Philemon owed to him even his own ſelf, or his very ſoul. How great an obligation has he expreſſed in theſe few words! See Benſon, and Raphelius.

Ver. 20. Yea, brother] I pray thee, brother. Wat. The word Ἀναπαυσόν, rendered refreſh, is very emphatical; it literally ſignifies to appeaſe, or quiet; which ſtrongly intimates the emotion which the Apoſtle felt, through the ardour of his concern for Oneſimus, and ſeems to repreſent the eagerneſs of his deſire for his re-eſtabliſhment in Philemon's family, by the appetite of hunger. Comp. ver. 7. where the ſame word is uſed, and ſeems to be referred to here with peculiar beauty and propriety. See Doddridge, Stockius, Matth. x. 40, &c. and xxv. 40, 45.

Ver. 21. In thy obedience] Ὑπακοῇ frequently ſignifies obedience. Here it muſt be underſtood for compliance, inaſmuch as the Apoſtle had declared, ver. 8, 9. he could have commanded, but choſe rather to intreat.

Ver. 22. But withal prepare me, &c.] The Apoſtle's deſiring Philemon to prepare him a lodging, ſhews that he had expectations of being for I truſt that through your prayers I ſhall be given unto you.

23 There ſalute thee Epaphras, my fellow-priſoner in Chriſt Jeſus;

24 Marcus, Ariſtarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow-labourers.

25 The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with your ſpirit. Amen.

Written from Rome to Philemon, by Oneſimus, a ſervant.

Ver. 22. Phil. i. 25. ii. 24. 2 Cor. i. 11.—V. 23. Col. i. 7. iv. 12.—V. 24. Acts xii. 12. Acts xix. 29. Col. iv. 14.—V. 25. 2 Tim. iv. 22.

being ſet at liberty, and that then he deſigned them a viſit at Coloſſe: It may alſo lead us to conclude, that this Epiſtle was written not long before the Apoſtle was ſet at liberty from his firſt confinement at Rome, mentioned Acts xxviii. 30. See alſo Philip. ii. 24. We have obſerved in the introductory note, that as Philemon was a rich man, his houſe appears to have been a place of entertainment for the Chriſtians who travelled that way; and therefore St. Paul deſired to have a lodging among the reſt: But the principal view ſeems to have been, not only to tell Philemon the agreeable news, that he was likely to have ſuch a gueſt, but to put him upon conſidering how he could ſee the Apoſtle's face, if he denied his reaſonable and earneſt requeſt for Oneſimus. See Theodoret, Acts xii. 5, &c. and Benſon's "Letter on Prayer."

Ver. 25. Be with your ſpirit] Ὑμων, your, is in the plural number, and denotes not Philemon's ſpirit only, but that of his whole family alſo, or all the perſons addreſſed in the beginning of the Epiſtle. See 1 Theſſ. v. 28. We have frequently hinted at the excellence of this Epiſtle; which muſt be allowed a maſter-piece in its kind, conſidered as a merely human compoſition: But, fully to confirm our remark, we could wiſh the reader to compare it with an Epiſtle of Pliny, which ſeems to have been written on a ſimilar occaſion:—lib. ix. ep. 21. which, though penned by one, univerſally allowed to excel in the epiſtolary ſtile, and though it has undoubtedly many beauties, yet muſt be acknowledged by every impartial reader to be greatly inferior to this animated compoſition of our Apoſtle. See Benſon, Doddridge, and Bp. Smallridge.

REFLECTIONS ON ST. PAUL'S CHARACTER, MORE PARTICULARLY AS DEDUCED FROM THIS EPISTLE.

That any antient writing was written by the author to whom it is commonly aſcribed, can be known no other way than by the internal marks and characters, or by external ceremonies. The internal characters muſt be deduced from the authentick hiſtory of the perſon, or his authentick writings. That the Acts of the Apoſtles were written by St. Luke, and contain a true hiſtory, is univerſally allowed: That moſt, or all of the other Epiſtles which are aſcribed to St. Paul, are his true and genuine writings, may be fully proved from the hiſtory of him in the Acts, and from the teſtimonies of the ancient fathers;—the only arguments by which ſuch a fact is capable of being proved: Indeed the authenticity of moſt of them is not called in queſtion. And, ſuppoſing the Acts of the Apoſtles, and St. Paul's other Epiſtles to be genuine, we may obſerve internal marks of the genuineneſs of this Epiſtle to Philemon; for, every circumſtance agrees with the ſtate of things when that Apoſtle was under his firſt confinement at Rome; and the thoughts, ſtyle, and manner of this Epiſtle, are very much the ſame with thoſe of his other Epiſtles.

This being premiſed, we may obſerve,

I. That if this Epiſtle be St. Paul's, and he was of ſuch ſagacity and addreſs, as the author of this Epiſtle muſt have evidently been; then every candid and unprejudiced perſon will readily allow, that he was no looſe, incoherent writer, nor any wild and enthuſiaſtic viſionary; but will rather be apt to think, that if the language in which St. Paul wrote, the circumſtances and cuſtoms to which he alludes, the ſcope of his diſcourſe, and the ſubject which he is purſuing, were thoroughly underſtood, we ſhould ſee as much beauty, aptneſs, and propriety, in all his Epiſtles, as are viſible in this ſhort Epiſtle to Philemon.

A man of ſo much ſenſe and ſagacity, addreſs and penetration, was not, could not poſſibly be deluded; eſpecially as to plain facts, to which he often appeals, as clear proofs of his divine miſſion; and that even in Epiſtles written to churches, where he had many and malicious enemies. Could not a man of capacity much inferior to St. Paul's, know certainly whether he was able to work miracles or no? Whether he could, or could not, ſpeak a variety of languages, which he had never ſtudied to acquire; or interpret what others ſpoke in ſuch languages? Whether he had, or had not the power of puniſhing bold and daring offenders? Whether he could, or could not communicate ſome ſpiritual gifts and miraculous powers unto other Chriſtians, by the laying on of his hands?—Could a man write ſuch an Epiſtle as this before us, and at the ſame time be ſo groſly and palpably impoſed upon, as to plain and notorious facts?—This would be a caſe without parallel; and is contrary to all common ſenſe, reaſon, and experience.

Amidſt all the warmth and affection wherewith he addreſſes Philemon, and all the pious and devout ſentiments which are intermingled with the addreſs, are there any traces of enthuſiaſtic ravings? Any thing that would in the leaſt betray him to have been a fanciful, weak, and credulous perſon? From the more cloſe conſideration of his ſkilful and inſinuating manner of addreſs, and the propriety of his language and behaviour towards the perſons with whom he had to do, it would ſeem, that the anti-revelationiſts have been apt to look upon the Apoſtle St. Paul, as an artful, cunning man, who knew the world, and could make the beſt of any cauſe; and that, in one word, he was much more likely to deceive others, than to be impoſed on himſelf, ſo notoriouſly, and in ſuch plain and obvious facts.

II. But, to take away all jealouſy and ſuſpicion of his having had any intention to impoſe upon mankind, let us obſerve, ſecondly, that the great Apoſtle of the Gentiles gave many clear and unqueſtionable proofs of his honeſty and integrity; and that as he was not an enthuſiaſt, ſo neither was he an impoſtor.

The religion which he ſpread recommends the pureſt virtue; and one would not readily ſuſpect a man of any ſiniſter view, in taking pains to inculcate principles which promote virtue and righteouſneſs in the earth: By the doctrine which he taught, he was doomed to durable and moſt exquiſite puniſhment in another world, if he was an impoſtor. Mahomet calculated his doctrine to ſuit his own practice; and it would be a ſtrange thing for any man to condemn himſelf by an impoſture of his own contriving and publiſhing.

Again; how diſintereſted were the Apoſtle's views! What had he to expect in this world. He ſays very juſtly, concerning himſelf, and other perſecuted Chriſtians, If in this life only we have hope in Chriſt, we are of all men moſt miſerable. An artful, cunning deceiver, has ſome temporal advantage in view; but what could St. Paul propoſe to himſelf? Or what had he for all his travels and fatigues, his long labours and unwearied endeavours to inſtruct and reform mankind? He was converted, from one of the moſt fierce and active enemies of Chriſtianity, to become one of its warmeſt advocates. What end could he propoſe in ſo great a change?—He knew very well that the leading men of the Jewiſh people would look upon him as a vile apoſtate: He had been educated under one of their greateſt rabbis, and ſtood fair for advancement among them, whilſt he continued a zealous Jew, and perſecuted the Chriſtans. But from the moment he became a Chriſtian, he expoſed himſelf to the enmity and malice of his countrymen and former friends; who, from that time, perſecuted him with the moſt bitter, unrelenting zeal, and often attempted to take away his life.

Though the Romans, who then governed the world, were as moderate towards perſons of different ſects and religions as moſt nations, yet their governors were commonly jealous of all changes and innovations in matters of religion, and were in particular for diſcouraging the authors of new ſects, and the ringleaders of any new religion. And what could a man propoſe to himſelf, by preaching the Goſpel of a crucified Jeſus in ſuch a ſtate of things?—The heathen prieſts, and all that belonged to the temples of their idols, or were any way employed about them, would zealouſly oppoſe every attempt to overthrow their idolatry. The philoſophers would argue againſt the man who ſhould ſet up a ſyſtem in oppoſition to theirs; or, with inſolence and the utmoſt contempt, enquire, What will this babbler ſay?—The poets would uſe all their wit and ſatire againſt ſuch an attempt to reform the world. The orators would harangue, and make uſe of their perſuaſive arts, to oppoſe the man, who ſhould endeavour to do what, with all their eloquence, they had hitherto been unable to effect.

The Judaizers alſo (a numerous, powerful, zealous, and active body among the Chriſtians) looked upon St. Paul's attempt with jealouſy and diſlike, and ran about from place to place, fiercely to oppoſe him, and overturn all his labours. The men of vice, who were determined to go on in their evil ways, would all in general malign ſo zealous and potent a reformer, and be very apt to ſpeak againſt and perſecute him: So that if the Apoſtle of the Gentiles ſought the friendſhip of this world, he took a very wrong method to attain it. The ſame may be ſaid as to his purſuit of riches or temporal pleaſures. And ſuppoſe he had not foreſeen the hunger and cold, the nakedneſs and buffetings, the ſlights and affronts, the chains and impriſonments, the ſcourgings and ſtonings, and other diſagreeable and cruel treatment, to which ſuch an attempt did actually expoſe him; yet one would have thought, that ten or twelve years might have been ſufficient to have convinced him, and that he could have had no great heart to have proceeded forward about twenty years more, after ſo many diſcouragements, and ſuch fierce oppoſition from almoſt every quarter.

Or, can we ſuppoſe that vain-glory, and an affectation of ſingularity could carry him ſo great a length, in propagating what he knew to be an impoſture?—Do but read the brief accounts which he himſelf has given of his own ſufferings, 1 Cor. iv. 9, 13. 2 Cor. xi. 23, &c. and you muſt ſuppoſe the man to have had a ſtrange and unaccountable love of vain-glory, who having already experienced ſuch treatment, and foreſeen that it was the treatment to which ſuch an attempt was every where likely to expoſe him, (comp. Acts xx. 22—24.) would yet ſtill go on to publiſh what he himſelf knew to be falſe; yea, ſteadily to perſevere, and even triumph in his proſpects, though he ſaw nothing before him in this world but dangers and death. Had not the Apoſtles of our Lord and Saviour the principle of ſelf-preſervation? or were they of a different make from the reſt of mankind? Would not a man of ſenſe and virtue, and of ſuch benevolence as the author of the above Epiſtle appears to have been, either never have engaged in any impoſture; or, if by any means he had been drawn in, would he not eaſily have diſcovered, and honeſtly have confeſſed ſuch a notorious cheat; and rather have ſought glory from his ſingular integrity, and concern for truth and the general good?—But ſuppoſe that St. Paul's doctrine was true, that it was revealed to him, and he had a commiſſion from heaven to publiſh it; then the attempt to ſpread it in ſuch a way ought not to be deemed vain-glory, or any criminal ſingularity.

When our Apoſtle was ſcourged, or ſtoned till he was left for dead in one place, he went to another with all his bruiſes and ſores upon him, and there began again to preach the Chriſtian doctrine as zealouſly, as if he had every where met with all poſſible encouragement. See Acts xiv. 19, &c. xvi. 22, &c. 1 Theſſ. ii. 2. From the cloſe conſideration of his zeal and unwearied diligence amidſt ſuch fierce oppoſition, and ſo much cruel treatment, (without duly conſidering at the ſame time the reſt of his character and conduct) the anti-revelationiſts have been led to ſuppoſe him a weak zealot, a warm enthuſiaſtic viſionary, who needleſly expoſed himſelf, as not knowing the world, or having ſtudied mankind. So natural it is for men to run into extremes, when they conſider things only in one view! Accordingly, they have played between theſe two hypotheſes: Sometimes repreſenting the Apoſtles of our Lord as artful impoſtors, and at other times as honeſt enthuſiaſts. Theſe are certainly very different and inconſiſtent repreſentations. For a man who is really an enthuſiaſt, and believes himſelf illuminated or inſpired without his being ſo, is not an impoſtor for declaring that he believes ſo: And whoever pretends to inſpiration, when he knows very well that he is not inſpired, cannot be an enthuſiaſt, but muſt be a downright impoſtor.

It were to be wiſhed, that the enemies of revelation would fairly debate with us one or both of theſe hypotheſes, and ſtand or fall by the ſuperior evidence; but to ſhift from the one to the other, when they are pinched with an argument, is an unfair and ſhameful method of proceeding, and not acting like the lovers of truth and of virtue.

From the firſt of theſe obſervations then it appears very evident, that St. Paul was not, could not poſſibly be, deluded himſelf; and from the ſecond, that he cannot be ſuppoſed to have attempted to delude others. And if theſe things be true, Chriſtianity is doubtleſs a revelation of the mind and will of God, deſigned to promote the perfection and happineſs of men, and, as ſuch, ought to be embraced, and relied, and acted upon: nor is it every objection which may be ſtarted, though it may have ſome ſubtilty or difficulty in it, that ſhould or can ſhake our foundations, when ſuch poſitive and direct proof is laid before us.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

CHAP. I.

Chriſt, in theſe laſt times coming to us from the Father, is preferred above the angels, both in perſon and office.

GOD, who at ſundry times, and in divers manners, ſpake in time paſt unto the fathers by the prophets,

2 Hath in theſe laſt days ſpoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom alſo he made the worlds;

3 Who, being the brightneſs of his glory, and the expreſs image of his perſon, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himſelf purged our ſins, ſat down on the right hand of the Majeſty on high;

HEBREWS] This Apoſtolic letter is now, after the point has been fully diſcuſſed by ancients and moderns, generally allowed to be the genuine work of St. Paul. Some of the ancients thought, that he wrote it originally in the Hebrew or Syriac language, out of which it was tranſlated by ſome apoſtolical perſon; but ſeveral eminent critics among the moderns ſeem clearly to have confuted this notion, and to have proved that our preſent Greek copy is the original. St. Paul, contrary to his uſual cuſtom, did not prefix his name to this Epiſtle, for this obvious reaſon, that he might not too early awaken the prejudices which the Jewiſh converts had conceived againſt him, and which might have led them to throw it aſide unperuſed. Beſides, as he was peculiarly the Apoſtle of the uncircumciſion, he could not properly addreſs the Hebrews as their Apoſtle. It is generally thought to have been written towards the end, or ſoon after St. Paul's impriſonment at Rome, A. D. 63. to the converted Jews of Paleſtine, here called Hebrews, as diſtinguiſhed from the Helleniſts, or foreign Jews. A ſevere perſecution had deprived them of the Apoſtle St. James, and rendered many wavering in the faith: To recover ſome, and confirm others, appears to have been the great purport of this Epiſtle. As the zealous defenders of the Moſaic law would naturally inſiſt on the divine authority of Moſes, on the majeſty and glory attending the promulgation of his law by the miniſtry of angels, and on the great privileges it afforded thoſe who adhered to it; the Apoſtle ſhews, firſt, that in all thoſe ſeveral articles, the Goſpel had an infinite ſuperiority over the law. This topic he purſues from ch. i to xi. and the reader will find a proper analyſis in the following obſervations, which there is no need to inſert here. The Apoſtle having, in the firſt place, obviated the inſinuations and objections of the Jews, proceeds, for the ſatisfaction and eſtabliſhment of the believing Hebrews, ſecondly, to prepare and fortify their minds againſt the ſtorm of perſecution, which in part had already befallen them, and was likely to continue, and be often renewed. He reminds them of thoſe extremities they had endured, and of the fatal effects which would attend their apoſtaſy; (ch. x. 26, &c. to the end:) calling to their remembrance the eminent examples of faith and fortitude exhibited by holy men of old: ch. xi, to xii. 2. Having thus finiſhed the argumentative part of the Epiſtle, he applies the whole, by exhorting the Hebrew Chriſtians to patience, peace, and holineſs: Cautioning them againſt ſecular views, and ſenſual gratifications, by laying before them the incomprehenſible excellence of the bleſſings introduced by the Goſpel, which even the Jewiſh œconomy, glorious and magnificent as it was, did by no means equal; exhorting them to brotherly affection, purity, compaſſion, dependance on the divine care, ſteadfaſtneſs in the profeſſion of the truth, a life of thankfulneſs to God, and benevolence to man. He concludes with recommending their pious miniſters to their particular regard, intreating their prayers, ſaluting them, and pronouncing on them a ſolemn benediction. The reader will find a full deſcription of every thing reſpecting this Epiſtle in Lardner's Credibility, Michaelis, the Introductions of Owen, Pierce, Sykes, Whitby, &c. and in Bp. Gibſon's Paſtoral Letters, p. 210, &c.

Ver. 1.] The deſign of the author of this Epiſtle being, as we have obſerved, to ſhew the excellence of the Chriſtian covenant above that of the Jews in every reſpect; and that the Jews had no other advantage in or by their law, which Chriſtians had not equally, if not ſuperior, by the law of Chriſt.—He begins by giving an account of the dignity of the perſon of Chriſt; and intending to ſhew how vaſtly he was to be preferred to any of thoſe meſſengers from God whom they moſt highly valued, He here looks back to his original character, which was antecedent to his incarnation; and then inſenſibly proceeds to conſider his advancement above the angels at his reſurrection. ver. 1—14. See Peirce, Doddridge, and Sykes.

At ſundry times, and in divers manners] Πολυμερῶς ſignifies in many parts, or parcels, and refers to the parcels by which God's will was delivered, in oppoſition to a complete revelation: and this was done in various manners; namely, by dreams, viſions, urim, prophets, voices, ſigns.

Ver. 2. Hath in theſe laſt days] The days of the Meſſiah; ſo called, becauſe they are foretold as to be under the fourth or laſt kingdom, mentioned by Daniel, ch. ii. 44. By his Son, muſt here mean emphatically, "By his Son, as incarnate, and appearing in the human nature;" nor can any argument be gathered from hence, that God ſpoke not by the miniſtration of the Logos, or ſecond perſon, before; but only, that he ſpoke not in ſo clear and expreſs a manner. The word heir ſignifies properly "one who hath a right to ſucceed to what another has in poſſeſſion, after his death;" but this cannot be the meaning of the word in this place, as it is impoſſible for the God and Father of all to die; and therefore it is uſed in the ſenſe of poſſeſſor or lord, as the ancient claſſics and lawyers uſe it: And thus it implies the ſame with what our Saviour ſays, Matth. xxviii. 18. All power is given to me in heaven and earth. See Gal. iv. 1. Acts ii. 36. Our author here lays down the aſſertion he undertakes to prove, namely, that God had conſtituted his Son Jeſus Heir or Lord of all things. Having mentioned this, he juſt gives a hint or two of the greatneſs of his character, and then returns to his main aſſertion, purſuing it cloſely in the latter part of the chapter, and ſhewing that the angels themſelves, the higheſt order of beings, are not only greatly inferior to him, but ſubject to his juriſdiction. The word αἰῶνας, rendered worlds, ſignifies ages; and, ſo underſtood, the paſſage may be read, By whom alſo he conſtituted or appointed the ages;—the ſeveral diſpenſations of his church, and providential kingdom. See Epheſ. iii. 11. However, the ſenſe in which our tranſlators have rendered it, is not only literally true, but perfectly agreeable to St. Paul's doctrine. See ch. xi. 3. and comp. Col. i. 15—17. which bears a great reſemblance with the preſent place. See Locke, Peirce, Sykes, and Owen.

Ver. 3. Who being the brightneſs, &c.] Who being a beam of his gl

4 Being made ſo much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they.

5 For unto which of the angels ſaid he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? And again, I will be to him a Father, and he ſhall be to me a Son?

6 And again, when he bringeth in the Firſt-begotten into the world, he ſaith, And let all the angels of God worſhip him.

7 And of the angels he ſaith, Who maketh his angels ſpirits, and his miniſters a flame of fire.

8 But unto the Son he ſaith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a ſceptre of righteouſneſs is the ſceptre of thy kingdom.

9 Thou haſt loved righteouſneſs, and hated iniquity; therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladneſs above thy fellows.

10 And, Thou, Lord, in the beginning haſt laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens are the works of thine hands.

11 They ſhall periſh: but thou remaineſt: and they all ſhall wax old as doth a garment;

12 And as a veſture ſhalt thou fold them up, and they ſhall be changed: but thou art the ſame, and thy years ſhall not fail.

13 But to which of the angels ſaid he at any time, Sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footſtool?

14 Are they not all miniſtering ſpirits, and the expreſs image of his ſubſtance. Wat. Απαύγασμὰ, which we render brightneſs, ſignifies that ſplendor or ray which proceeds from a luminous body. The words therefore repreſent the Father as Light, which is agreeable to other places of Scripture: See 1 John i. 5. But, to raiſe their thoughts of the matter, the Apoſtle ſets forth this Light, by which he deſcribes the Father, under the title of Glory; the deſign of which is, to expreſs the purity, perfection, and luſtre of all his attributes. Suitably to this account of God the Father, he repreſents the Son, as a ſplendor or ray derived or proceeding from the Father: And as the beams or rays cannot be ſeparated from the ſun, that great fund of light, ſo neither can the nature and the glory of the divine Son be ſeparated from that of the Father: He is "Light of light, very God of very God." The word χαρακτὴρ, rendered expreſs image, ſignifies an engraved or impreſſed mark,—an impreſs, and is a moſt emphatical word, ſince nothing can be more exactly and minutely repreſented, than by its impreſs on wax or metal. "Chriſt (ſays Leigh) anſwers to the divine perfections, as the impreſſion of the wax does to the engraving of the ſeal." It is obſervable that Philo calls the Logos χαρακτὴρ και εικων Θεȣ. The word Ὑποστάσις ſignifies ſubſiſtence, exiſtence; or, as the Greek fathers, even before the council of Nice, frequently applied the word, "a diſtinct perſon in the Godhead." Comp. Col. i. 15. Upholding all things by the word of his power ſeems plainly to expreſs, that as the Son gave being to all the creatures, ſo he maintains them all in being. The ſame thing ſeems deſigned, Col. i. 17,—By him all things conſiſt. In both places the ſame works are attributed to him. See Matth. xi. 27. xxviii. 18. John iii. 35. xiii. 3. His power is generally ſuppoſed to refer to the power of his Father.—When he had by himſelf purged our ſins, refers to the expiation of our ſins by his death; nor can there be any queſtion that our author refers to the death of Chriſt, conſidering what is here ſaid to have followed immediately upon his purging our ſins,—that he ſat down at the right-hand of the Majeſty on high. The words by himſelf are very expreſſive: For, as (ch. ix. 12, 26.) Chriſt is ſpoken of as making expiation by himſelf, and his own blood, and not by the blood of bulls and of goats, ſo here it ſeems to be intended, that Chriſt alone, without any aſſiſtance or concurrence of angels, or any other beings, made a perfect expiation of our ſins. See Iſai. lxiii. 3. 1 Pet. iii. 22. Epheſ. i. 20. Parkhurſt on the word Απαυγασμα, and Sherlock's Diſc. vol. iv. p. 11, &c.

Ver. 4. Being made ſo much better than the angels] Being ſo much better. Wat. Being made ſo much ſuperior to, or more excellent than the angels, by how much he hath obtained a more excellent name than they. Κεκληρονόμηκεν, ſignifies to obtain, or be in poſſeſſion of; without taking in the notion of inheritance. See ver. 2. Chriſt is called the Son of God; a name, which implies peculiar love and affection in the parent, and ſuperiority over the family in which he is. Chriſt, therefore, as being the Son of God, is ſuperior to angels, and is veſted with an authority which they have not; and has a right and title to dominion, to which they have no pretenſion; nor is any one of them ever dignified with that name. Some conſider this as immediately referring to Chriſt's authority and dignity, as Mediator; with which he was inveſted, when he ſat down on the right hand of glory after his reſurrection. See Sykes, Heylin, and Peirce.

Ver. 5. For to which of the angels ſaid he, &c.] The word for, ſhews that the ſacred writer is here proceeding to his proofs. All the texts that are alledged by him, are to be conſidered as brought upon this deſign; to ſhew that Chriſt at his reſurrection was conſtituted ſuperior to the angels. This amounted to a full proof, both according to the nature of things, and the notions which the Jews entertained of the angels: For, it being certainly true, and believed to be ſo by the Hebrews, that the angels are greatly ſuperior in their nature to other creatures; it muſt of neceſſity follow, that as he is ſuperior to them, he muſt be ſuperior to all below them: And ſince the higheſt order of creatures was made ſubject to him, it might reaſonably be ſuppoſed that the others were ſo too. Beſides, as the Hebrews gloried in the revelations which had been made to them by angels, and were apt, upon that account, to ſet light by Chriſt; nothing could be more pertinent to the general deſign of the Epiſtle, than the diſcourſe here upon this argument. Thus far Mr. Peirce; whom ſee. We may obſerve, that the paſſages quoted in this chapter muſt refer to Chriſt in their original ſenſe, and in the ſtricteſt propriety of interpretation; otherwiſe the argument will be entirely inconcluſive: For, it might be replied, that ſuppoſing theſe paſſages to be applicable to Chriſt, they will not prove him to be ſuperior to the angels, ſince they originally relate to David and others, confeſſedly inferior to thoſe celeſtial ſpirits. We refer to the paſſages in the margin, and our notes upon them in the former part of this commentary; and alſo to the note on Acts xiii. 33.

Ver. 6. And let all the angels of God worſhip him] In proof of the ſuperiority of Chriſt over the angels, the Apoſtle ſhews, that he was not only the Son of God, while even the higheſt of them were but ſervants; but that he was the object of their adoration and worſhip. It is matter of doubt, whence the quotation in this verſe is taken; Some apprehending from Deut. 32. 43. and others from Pſ. xcvii. 7. which ſeems the moſt probable. See the notes on that pſalm. Inſtead of Spirits, in the next verſe, Doddridge, Waterland, and others, read winds. "He who rules the winds and the lightnings, has his angels under equal command; and employs them with the ſtrength of winds, and the rapidity of lightning in his ſervice." However noble and lofty this deſcription of the angels is, it falls very ſhort of what was before ſaid, and what is immediately added in the next verſes, concerning the Son: And in this view, the quotation was very much to our author's purpoſe. See Sherlock, vol. iv. p. 31. and Peirce.

Ver. 9. Thou haſt loved righteouſneſs, &c.] This refers to that unparalleled inſtance of the love of moral rectitude, which Chriſt hath given in becoming a ſacrifice for ſin; by his atonement doing more, than hath ever been done by any other intelligent and rational agent, towards diſplaying his love of righteouſneſs, and his hatred of iniquity. See Philip. ii. 8, 9. Inſtead of fellows, the MS reads aſſociates. The correſpondent Hebrew word to Μετόχοι, ſays Parkhurſt, ſignifies aſſociates; by whom are meant, "all men who believe on Chriſt." The word properly expreſſes "thoſe who partake together;" brethren,—joint-heirs. See ch. ii. 11, &c. Rom. viii. 17. The force of this quotation lies in proving, that while the angels are but miniſtering ſpirits, (ver. 7, 14.) the Son is inveſted with regal power, and ſovereign authority. Inſtead of, Therefore God, even thy God, it has been propoſed to read, Therefore, O God, thy God hath, &c. See the preceding verſe.

Ver. 11. Thou remaineſt] Dr. Waterland reads, Thou ſhalt remain. But our tranſlation is evidently right; not only as correſponding with thou art the ſame, in the next verſe, but as finely and emphatically expreſſing the unchangeableneſs of Chriſt's divine nature.

Ver. 12. Shalt thou fold them up] Shalt thou change them; Waterland; reading αλλαξεις, with many MSS. In this verſe, and the two preceding, the Apoſtle quotes the paſſages here found, to prove the immutability of Chriſt's nature, and conſequently his ſuperiority over the angels.

Ver. 13. But to which of the angels] And further, to which; Heylin; Which appears a very juſt interpretation, as this quotation from the 110th pſalm does not appear to have any connection with, or dependance upon thoſe in the preceding verſes.

Ver. 14. Are they not all miniſtering ſpirits] "I aſked, To which of the angels ſaid God at any time, Sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footſtool?"—And I am well ſatisfied that no paſſage can be alledged, wherein God is ever repreſented as uſing ſuch lanſent forth to miniſter for them who ſhall be heirs of ſalvation?

CHAP. II.

We ought to be obedient to Chriſt Jeſus, and that becauſe he vouchſafed to take our nature upon him, as it was neceſſary.

THerefore we ought to give the more earneſt heed to the things which we have heard, leſt at any time we ſhould let them ſlip.

2 For if the word ſpoken by angels was ſtedfaſt, and every tranſgreſſion and diſobedience received a juſt recompence of reward;

3 How ſhall we eſcape, if we neglect ſo great ſalvation, which at the firſt began to be ſpoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him;

4 God alſo bearing them witneſs, both with ſigns and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, according to his own will?

5 For unto the angels hath he not put in ſubjection the world to come, whereof we ſpeak.

guage to, or concerning any of them. The deſcription given of them is of a very different nature; and, inſtead of being ſet out as exalted to ſuch an high ſtate of dignity and authority, as ſitting at God's right hand; they are repreſented as miniſtering ſpirits, whoſe proper poſture is ſtanding, and not ſitting." See 1 Kings xxii. 19. Zach. iii. 5, 7. iv. 14. vi. 5. and ch. ii. 5. Bp. Sherlock obſerves, that the image which the writer ſeems to have before him in this chapter, is that of a great houſhold. He conſiders God as the Pater-familias, the Father of Chriſt, and the Lord and Maker of the univerſe. Chriſt is conſidered as the Filius-familias, the Son, the Heir of all things, as he ſtiles him. Other beings are the ſervants and attendants of different orders belonging to the family; and thoſe of the higheſt order, are ſo far from being inveſted with extraordinary dominion over men, that they are ſent forth by the command of their great ſovereign to ſerve and aſſiſt them. All which differences here pointed out, between the Son of God and angels, ſhew us the high regard which is to be paid to one, who has power, dignity, and dominion ſo much ſuperior to the others. By the phraſe, Who ſhall be heirs of ſalvation, ſeveral commentators ſuppoſe that the ſacred writer has a particular reference to the Gentiles, who were to be made fellow-heirs with the Jews, and partakers of the promiſe in Chriſt by the Goſpel. See Epheſ. iii. 6, Peirce, Sykes, and Sherlock as above, p. 31.

Chap. II. Ver. 1.] Having eſtabliſhed the ſuperiority of Chriſt to the angels, in the foregoing chapter, the ſacred writer here makes a digreſſion; practically applying what he had ſaid, to the great deſign of this Epiſtle; namely, to preſs upon the Hebrews a ſtedfaſt adherence to Chriſt, and a continuance in the religion which he had taught: ver. 1—4. Bengelius very properly joins theſe four verſes to the former chapter. The things which we have heard, means the Goſpel; the great ſalvation publiſhed by Chriſt; ver. 3. Nothing can be more evidently weak, than the argument drawn from hence to prove that St. Paul was not the author of this Epiſtle, becauſe it was not by hearing only that he received the Goſpel. It is to be conſidered that he ſpeaks in the name of all to whom he was writing, as well as in his own, to render his inſtruction the more unexceptionable, and the more forcible;—a method not unuſual with him. See Epheſ. ii. 3. Tit. iii. 3. Beſides, to hear any thing, ſignifies in general to be inſtructed in it. Παραῤῥυῶμεν, rendered, we ſhould let them ſlip, ſignifies properly, we ſhould fall off, or fall away; namely, from the true religion, and ſaving grace. In the LXX this verb anſwers to the Hebrew לז, lez, to decline,—depart, Prov. iii. 21. where what in the Hebrew is, let them not depart from thine eyes, that verſion renders, Μη παραῤῥύῃς, decline not, or fall not off from them; the tranſlators applying that to the perſon, which the original does to the thing. Our tranſlators read in the margin, Leſt at any time we ſhould run out, as leaky veſſels; referring to the metaphorical etymology of the word. See Peirce, Wolfius, Elſner, and Parkhurſt on the word Παραῤῥεω.

Ver. 2. For, if the word ſpoken by angels] See Acts vii. 53. Gal. iii. 19. Mr. Mede conjectures, with great probability, that the notion of the Jewiſh doctors, followed by St. Stephen and our Apoſtle,—"That the law was given by angels," had its beginning from a paſſage in Deut. xxxiii. 2. which ſee: And if the law was given by angels to Moſes, (though the Logos might preſide amongſt them on that ſolemn occaſion) but what was delivered to us, was given by the Son himſelf; If in the one caſe, he made uſe of his miniſters to give his commands, but in the other, he acts himſelf in perſon; The argument of the Apoſtle is ſtrictly juſt, that we ought to give the greater heed to what is delivered by the greateſt perſonage. Inſtead of, was ſtedfaſt, Dr. Heylin reads, was fully executed. The threats denounced in the law were all put in execution exactly and rigidly, and every tranſgreſſion, and every act of diſobedience, (even ſuch ſeemingly trifling crimes as gathering a few ſticks on the ſabbath, &c.) were puniſhed with death: Numb. xv. 35. See Mede's works, p. 344. Whitby, Sykes, and Owen.

Ver. 3. How ſhall we eſcape, &c!] "We Jews, who, if we neglect the offer made by Chriſt, muſt continue ſtill under the law, and in courſe under the curſe of it;" Gal. iii. 10. v. 2, 4. The Jews had no reaſon to imagine that God would remit the puniſhments threatened in the law, if they reſolved to adhere to it, and would not embrace the condition of faith offered: For the law had never been repealed, but continued in its original force; nor would deſuetude make it of no force, if the law-maker would put it into execution. By ſalvation here is underſtood, the doctrine of ſalvation;—the Goſpel; and as this ſtands oppoſed to the word ſpoken by angels, it ſeems natural to underſtand it of the word or doctrine publiſhed by Chriſt: and all the expreſſions here uſed, of Chriſt's beginning to ſpeak it,—of men's hearing it,—of its being confirmed, and that God atteſted it,—lead us to underſtand the place in the ſenſe given. This doctrine of ſalvation, is ſaid to be begun to be ſpoken by Chriſt, becauſe there were ſome things which belonged to the Goſpel,—as the reſurrection and aſcenſion of Chriſt, and the pouring out of the Spirit,—which were to be more fully publiſhed by his Apoſtles after his death. Confirmed to us, ſignifies properly, to our times; to the times in which the Apoſtle lived: And the ſenſe appears to be, "They who heard Chriſt himſelf preaching, have continued confirming the truth of what he preached to us Hebrews, even to this time; having the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, various in their kinds, as God has been pleaſed to grant them to them. It would have been, not εἰς ἡμᾶς, but ἡμῖν, had the author of this Epiſtle intended to ſay, That he himſelf learned the Goſpel from thoſe who had heard Chriſt; nor would St. Paul have ſaid, that the Goſpel was confirmed to him by them that heard Chriſt; ſince elſewhere he declares, he had it not of men, neither by man, but by Jeſus Chriſt. Gal. i. 1. Suppoſing now St. Paul to have written this Epiſtle A. D. 67. he then ſays, that thoſe who had heard Chriſt continued uniformly and conſtantly to atteſt what he had ſaid, from that time to this; that is, for upwards of thirty years. They who from this expreſſion would argue, that St. Paul was not the author of this Epiſtle, miſtake the meaning of the phraſe here uſed; which does not relate to the perſon writing, but to the time when he wrote. They who had heard Chriſt himſelf, had confirmed, even to this time, ſteadily and conſiſtently, what they had heard from our Lord himſelf. See Whitby, Sykes, and Peirce.

Ver. 5.] Two things were eſpecially matter of offence and ſcandal to the Hebrews, with reſpect to our bleſſed Saviour and his Goſpel. Firſt, The mean and ſuffering condition in which he appeared here in the world; which did not ſeem to conſiſt with the account before given, of his being ſo far above the angels. Second, The undertaking of Chriſt for the Gentiles, and the receiving them upon equal terms with the Jews; an intimation of which, it is thought, we have in the laſt verſe of the foregoing chapter, with which the preſent verſe ſtands connected,—the four firſt verſes of this chapter being a practical digreſſion. To take off both theſe objections is thought to be the principal deſign of what follows in this chapter: Wherein our author ſhews, that the Jews had no reaſon to be offended upon either account; the ſuffering condition of our Lord, for only a little time, being ordered for wiſe and important reaſons, and for the general good of the ſeed of Abraham: And the Gentiles being now by faith become the ſeed of Abraham, it was but reaſonable they ſhould ſhare in the ſame advantages with the Meſſiah, as the Jews themſelves did. To avoid, as much as poſſible, the irritating or giving offence to the Jews, he forbears expreſly to mention the Gentiles, and ſpeaks of them only in a covert manner; which however carries in it a ſufficient vindication of the method which God had taken, under the diſpenſation of the Goſpel: And having given a noble deſcription of the Meſſiah, he recommends him to the conſideration of the Hebrews, ch. iii. 2. Peirce.

For unto the angels] "Angels, as I told you, are only miniſtering ſpirits; and though the law was given by them, yet in the preſent diſpenſation they have nothing to do: For it is the Son of God, the appointed Lord of all things, who has the dominion over, and the direction of the preſent diſpenſation; and who is the giver of that ſalvation of which we ſpeak, and not angels, to whom we are not ſubjected."—The Meſſiah was propheſied of as the Father of the age to come, according to the Alexandrian copy of Iſai. ix. 6. Chriſt then, being the Father of the age, or Father of the future age, the Apoſtle tells us, that God had not put the world to come, (i. e. the age of the Meſſiah, comprehending the preſent ſtate of his kingdom, and the time of recompence of reward) under the Διαταγην, the diſpoſition of angels, but under the direction and dominion of the Son himſelf. See Epheſ. i. 10. Sykes, Owen, and Barrow's Works, vol. ii. page 202.

6 But one in a certain place teſtified, ſaying, What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the ſon of man, that thou viſiteſt him?

7 Thou madeſt him a little lower than the angels; thou crownedſt him with glory and honour, and didſt ſet him over the works of thy hands:

8 Thou haſt put all things in ſubjection under his feet. For in that he put all in ſubjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we ſee not yet all things put under him.

9 But we ſee Jeſus, who was made a little lower than the angels, for the ſuffering of death crowned with glory and honour; that he by the grace of God ſhould taſte death for every man.

10 For it became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many ſons unto glory, to make the captain of their ſalvation perfect through ſufferings.

11 For both he that ſanctifieth, and they who are ſanctified, are all of one. For which cauſe he is not aſhamed to call them brethren, 12 Saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midſt of the church will I ſing praiſe unto thee.

13 And again, I will put my truſt in him. And again, Behold, I, and the children which God hath given me.

14 Foraſmuch then as the children are partakers of fleſh and blood, he alſo himſelf likewiſe took part of the ſame; that through death he might deſtroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil;

15 And deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their life-time ſubject to bondage.

Ver. 6—9. But one, in a certain place, &c.] "Nor think it ſtrange, that a man ſhould be inveſted with ſuch extraordinary power; for, as the Pſalmiſt ſays of man in general, that he is Lord of all the creation; that, low and mean, and helpleſs in ten thouſand inſtances, as he ſeems to be, yet all things are in general ſubject to him: This, I ſay, is now literally and eminently true in the caſe of Jeſus Chriſt. What is man, ſays the Pſalmiſt, that thou art mindful of him; or the ſon of man, that thou viſiteſt him?—Thou madeſt him lower than angels, and yet thou haſt crowned him with great glory, in that thou haſt given him dominion over the works of thine hands. But then, when the Pſalmiſt ſaid, that God had put all things in ſubjection under man, it is plain theſe words are not to be taken too rigidly: for the moon and the ſtars, and many others things, the work of God's hands, are not in ſubjection to man. You are not therefore to underſtand theſe words abſolutely and ſtrictly of man in the general; but we ſee how all this is literally verified in Jeſus, ver. 9. who, by becoming man, that he might ſuffer death, was, for a ſhort time, made lower and meaner than the angels; and becauſe he ſuffered death, he was crowned with glory and honour, and obtained all power in heaven and earth. He was made man, I ſay, and thus for a ſhort time lower than the angels, that by the grace of God, and to ſhew his exceeding kindneſs for us, he might taſte death for every man." See 1 Cor. xv. 25—27. Gen. i, 26. A little,—βραχυ τι,—may ſignify either littleneſs of the thing, or ſhortneſs of the time; and in both theſe reſpects Chriſt, while upon earth, was inferior to the angels. The Pſalmiſt ſpeaks of man's being inferior to the angels, as certainly man is a creature of a lower rank or claſs than angels are; and whilſt our Saviour was incarnate, he was ſo much inferior to them, that they were ſent to ſtrengthen him: But then Chriſt was inferior to them only for a ſhort time, during only his incarnate ſtate. He had a glory with his Father, of which he emptied himſelf to become man; and then, as the reward of his ſufferings, he received his kingdom, all things being ſubjected to him. So that it was properly but a little while, or for ſome ſhort time, that he was as other men are, made lower than the angels. See John xvii. 5. Philip. ii. 6—10. Heb. xii. 2. To taſte death, is to die: and to taſte death for all, or every man, is to die for the benefit of all mankind, both Jew and Gentile. Now our Lord condeſcended to taſte death for all, and the grace and kindneſs of God was by that means diſplayed to mankind in a moſt extraordinary manner, as the Apoſtle explains it in the following verſes. See Sykes and Owen.

Ver. 10—15. For it became him, &c.] Very different are the explanations given of this paſſage; that which appears to me the plaineſt and leaſt exceptionable is as follows: ver. 10. "Such has been the conduct of God in the great affair of our redemption, and the beauty and harmony of it will be apparent in proportion to the degree in which it is examined: For though the Jews dream of a temporal Meſſiah, as a ſcheme conducive to the divine glory, it well became him,—it was expedient that, in order to act worthy of himſelf, he ſhould take this method; He, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things; that glorious Being, who is the firſt cauſe and laſt end of all,—in purſuit of the great and important deſign he had formed, of conducting many, whom he is pleaſed to adopt as his ſons, to the poſſeſſion of that inheritance of glory intended for them;—to make and conſtitute Jeſus, his firſt-begotten and beſt-beloved Son, the leader and prince of their ſalvation, and to make him perfect, or completely fit for the full execution of his office, by a long train of various and extreme ſufferings, whereby he was as it were ſolemnly conſecrated to it.—ver. 11. Now, in conſequence of this appointment, Jeſus, the great ſanctifier, who engages and conſecrates men to the ſervice of God, and they who are ſanctified (i. e. conſecrated and introduced to God with ſuch acceptance) are all of one family, all the deſcendants of Adam, and in a ſenſe the ſeed of Abraham; for which cauſe he is not aſhamed to call them, whom he thus redeems, and preſents to the divine favour, his brethren: ver. 12. Saying,—in the perſon of David, who repreſented the Meſſiah in his ſufferings and exaltation,—I will declare thy name to my brethren, in the midſt of the church will I praiſe thee. ver. 13. And again, ſpeaking as a mortal man, expoſed to ſuch exerciſes of faith in trials and difficulties, as others were, he ſays in a pſalm which ſets forth his triumph over his enemies, I will truſt in him, as other good men have done in all ages; and again elſewhere, in the perſon of Iſaiah, Behold I, and the children which my God hath given me, are for ſigns and for wonders. ver. 14. Seeing then thoſe whom he repreſents in one place and another, as the children of the ſame family with himſelf, were partakers of fleſh and blood, he himſelf in like manner participated of them, that thereby becoming capable of thoſe ſufferings, to which, without ſuch an union with fleſh, this divine ſanctifier could not have been obnoxious, he might by his own voluntary and meritorious death aboliſh and depoſe him, who by divine permiſſion had the empire of death, and led it in his train, when he made his firſt invaſion on mankind;—that is, the devil, the great artificer of miſchief and deſtruction; at the beginning the murderer of the human race; who ſtill ſeems to triumph in the ſpread of mortality, which is his work, and who may often, by God's righteous permiſſion, be the executioner of it. ver. 15. But Chriſt, the great prince of mercy and life, graciouſly interpoſed, that he might deliver thoſe miſerable captives of Satan,—mankind in general, and the dark and idolatrous Gentiles in particular, who, through fear of death, were, or juſtly might have been, all their life-time obnoxious to bondage: Having nothing to expect, in conſequence of it,—if they rightly underſtood their ſtate,—but future miſery; whereas now, changing their Lord, they have happily changed their condition; and are, as many as have believed in him, the heirs of eternal life." See Doddridge, Peirce, &c. and a full confirmation of the great truths advanced in theſe verſes, in Owen's large and practical Expoſition of them.

Ver. 16. For verily he took not on him, &c.] The verſion of the margin is here to be preferred, wherewith the Vulg. agrees. The word ἐπιλαμβάνεται is uſed ſeveral times in the New Teſtament with a genitive caſe, as in this place, and always in the ſenſe of taking hold. See ch. viii. 9. Matth. xiv. 31. Mark viii. 23. Luke ix. 47. 1 Tim. vi. 12, 19. The Apoſtle's reaſoning ſtands thus: "Chriſt took part in fleſh and blood, becauſe his deſign was to lay hold of, that is, to ſave, the ſeed of Abraham, and not the angels; and upon that account it was highly requiſite, that he ſhould be made like unto the ſeed of Abraham, his brethren in ſufferings; in order to which, it was neceſſary for him to take part with them in fleſh and blood; ver. 17." It may be here aſked, why the Apoſtle ſhould ſay, that Chriſt came to help the ſeed of Abraham, and not the ſeed of Adam? The reaſon is, he was writing to perſons zealous of the law, and who could not bear the notion of the Gentiles being admitted to equal privileges with themſelves. Therefore, under the words the ſeed of Abraham, (which, in St. Paul's language, implied all that were of faith, ture of angels; but he took on him the ſeed of Abraham.

17 Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren; that he might be a merciful and faithful high-prieſt, in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the ſins of the people.

18 For in that he himſelf hath ſuffered, being tempted, he is able to ſuccour them that are tempted.

CHAP. III.

Chriſt is more worthy than Moſes: therefore if we believe not in him, we ſhall be more worthy of puniſhment than hard hearted Iſrael.

WHerefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, conſider the Apoſtle and High-prieſt of our profeſſion, Chriſt Jeſus;

2 Who was faithful to him that appointed him, as alſo Moſes was faithful in all his houſe.

3 For this man was counted worthy of more glory than Moſes, inaſmuch as he who hath builded the houſe, hath more honour than the houſe.

4 For every houſe is builded by ſome man; but he that built all things is God.

5 And Moſes verily was faithful in all his houſe as a ſervant, for a teſtimony of thoſe things which were to be ſpoken after;

6 But Chriſt as a Son over his own houſe; whoſe houſe are we, if we hold faſt the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.

faith, be they of what nation ſoever,) he artfully, and without giving offence to the Hebrews, expreſſes the full truth. Abraham was the father of all them that believe, Rom. iv. 11. and in this ſenſe is the expreſſion here uſed, to take in all that were helped by Chriſt, whether they were Jews or Gentiles. See Peirce, Hammond, Sykes, and Owen.

Ver. 17. Wherefore in all things, &c.] In taking fleſh and blood, in ſufferings, in death; for the next clauſe, ſee Rom. viii. 3. Philip. ii. 7. The following words may be rendered, that he might be merciful, and a faithful high-prieſt;—merciful, in that being tempted, he is able to ſuccour them that are tempted; and a faithful high-prieſt in things relative to God;—in doing all ſuch things as God had appointed him; particularly in doing the office of a prieſt, by making a full atonement for the ſins of the people. Concerning his fidelity, ſee ch. iii. 1, 2, &c. 1 John ii. 2. Rom. iii. 25.

Ver. 18. For in that he himſelf hath ſuffered, &c.] "For whereinſoever he himſelf ſuffered when he was tried, he muſt be the more inclined and willing to help thoſe who are tried." This verſe perhaps might be better tranſlated, and give a fuller view of the connection of the diſcourſe, thus: For wherein [or, in that which] he himſelf hath ſuffered, being tried, he is able, &c. Our author ſeems to have his eye upon what he had ſaid in the verſe before, that it behoved him to be made like to his brethren in all things. And why in all things?—Becauſe in whatever trials and ſufferings he was made like unto them, he would be more effectually engaged to pity and ſuccour them, and ſo to act the part of a merciful and faithful high-prieſt for them. It is plain, from the whole tenor of the diſcourſe, that the Apoſtle does not ſpeak barely of a power and ſtrength to ſuccour, but of an inclination and readineſs to do it; andtherefore δυναται ſhould not be rendered he is able, but he can, or is inclined. Sufferings naturally diſpoſe perſons to be compaſſionate, and it is of that our author here ſpeaks, as may be further confirmed by what he adds on his reſuming the ſubject, after a long digreſſion: See ch. iv. 15. v. 2. and Peirce.

Chap. III. Ver. 1.] The ſacred writer having compared Chriſt with the angels, in whom, as the meſſengers of God to their anceſtors, the Jews uſed to boaſt, and that not without cauſe; and having argued how much ſuperior Chriſt is to them, he takes occaſion from the mention made of Moſes, ver. 2. in a long digreſſion, to make a compariſon between Chriſt and Moſes, in being whoſe diſciples the Jews exceedingly truſted, and highly valued themſelves on that account. He had given a hint before, that Chriſt was ſuperior to all the old prophets who had been ſent to the Jews, inaſmuch as God had reſerved the laſt, fulleſt, and moſt noble diſcoveries of his will to be made known by him; and he who had ſpoken to the fathers by the prophets, had now, in theſe laſt days, ſpoken unto us by his Son. ch. i. 1. Now none of the old prophets were equal to Moſes, (Deut. xxxiv. 10, 12.) nor was any one of them in ſo great eſteem with the Jews: If therefore he proved that Chriſt was preferable to Moſes, the neceſſary conſequence muſt be, that Chriſt excelled all the prophets. Nor could the Jews avoid this conſequence, upon their own principles. Beſides, nothing could better ſuit his deſign of eſtabliſhing the Hebrews in their Chriſtian profeſſion, in which they were very apt to waver, from the great regard they paid to the old law, than to compare together the two authors and publiſhers of thoſe two religions. Having done this from ver. 3 to 6. the author borrows an example from what befel the Iſraelites ſoon after the publication of the law by Moſes, and the ſeverity with which God puniſhed their unbelief, after he had done ſo much for them, and made them a promiſe of, and was actually conducting them to a reſt; thereby diſſuading them from a like unbelief, with reference to Chriſt: arguing at the ſame time, that in caſe of their believing and being ſteadfaſt in their profeſſion, they had as certain an aſſurance of obtaining a happy reſt, as the Iſraelites had. ch. iii. 1. to iv. 13.

Holy brethren may refer to what he ſaid of thoſe who were ſanctified in Chriſt. ch. ii. 11. Partakers of the heavenly calling ſignifies, "Partakers of the call given us in the Goſpel to purſue immortality and glory." See ver. 14. The word Apoſtle is, by way of eminence, put for "one ſent of God;" and our Saviour has frequently, in St. John's Goſpel, ſpoken of himſelf as ſent by the Father. St. Paul therefore exhorts the Hebrews to conſider Chriſt, who was higher than the angels;—who was, for our ſakes, made lower than they for a ſhort time, but has obtained a more excellent name than they: who was ſent by God into the world, and ſo ſent, as to taſte death. "Conſider him in theſe capacities, and add to them, that he was our high-prieſt, and entered into the holy of holies for us, removing all obſtacles to our eternal happineſs, and then judge if he be not ſuperior to Moſes. Moſes was ſent into Egypt, to redeem the children of Iſrael; Jeſus was ſent to redeem mankind: But then he was not only thus the Apoſtle, but he was likewiſe the high-prieſt of our profeſſion; and in conſequence, not only much ſuperior to Moſes, but to Aaron too; as will ſoon appear." See Peirce, Sykes, and Doddridge.

Ver. 2. That appointed him] Τῳ ϖοιήσαντι: "To him who made him the Apoſtle and High Prieſt of our profeſſion." In the ſame manner as who maketh his angels ſpirits, &c. ch. i. 7. The word frequently ſignifies what our tranſlators have rendered it,—appoint, or conſtitute. See Mark iii. 14. Heylin reads, who conſtituted him [in that office]. The next words are taken from Numb. xii. 7. The word houſe is uſed, not only for a building, but for ſuch as dwell in it;—a family, a people: And as God is ſaid to dwell among the children of Iſrael, hence they are called his houſe; that is, his ſervants, his people. When the Apoſtle ſays his houſe, he does not mean Moſes's, but his houſe who appointed Moſes; that is, God's houſe. See Sykes, Peirce, and Owen.

Ver. 3, 4. For this man was counted worthy, &c.] For this [Jeſus]. Wat. The word κατασκευάσας, according to ſome, ſhould be rendered, not built, but ordered, or governed, as the word houſe ſignifies not a building, but a family: And as the word man is not in the original (ver. 4.) they would render the clauſe, For every houſe or family hath ſome orderer or governor,—referring the whole to Chriſt, as planning out and directing the Moſaic diſpenſation. Dr. Calamy has inferred from hence the ſupreme Deity of Chriſt, in conſequence of his being the Creator of all things: and indeed it does not ſeem eaſy to make out the Apoſtle's concluſion, or to find any true force in his argument, if we do not underſtand the laſt clauſe of the fourth verſe, as ſpoken of Jeſus Chriſt. See Calamy on the Trinity, p. 44. Pyle, Whitby, and Hammond.

Ver. 5. And Moſes verily was faithful, &c.] Moſes did nothing but under the direction and government of a ſuperior, and acted merely as a ſervant under a maſter in the houſe, or church, or family of God: He was faithful even to his declaration of thoſe things, which were afterwards more particularly ſpoken of. He declared that one ſhould ariſe like himſelf, to whom they were to hearken. By teſtimony is meant a truth publiſhed or declared: Moſes therefore did not ſpeak of himſelf, as if he were the perſon in whom the promiſe made to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob was to be fulfilled; but he was faithful as a ſervant, to teſtify what he was told of his Maſter; namely, that Chriſt was to come, and to be obeyed, when it ſhould pleaſe God to ſend him. He faithfully delivered the will of his Maſter, ſo far as God was pleaſed to convey the knowledge of ſuch a perſon to him; but a much greater information was granted to them that came after, who deſcribed the manner, the times, and circumſtances of his appearance. See Acts xxvi. 22. Luke xxiv. 44. John v. 46, 47.

Ver. 6. But Chriſt as a Son over his own houſe, &c.] Over the church; in which, as Heir or Lord of all things, he hath not only a truſt and office,

7 Wherefore, as the Holy Ghoſt ſaith, To-day, if ye will hear his voice,

8 Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderneſs:

9 When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and ſaw my works forty years.

10 Wherefore I was grieved with that generation, and ſaid, They do alway err in their heart; and they have not known my ways.

11 So I ſware in my wrath, They ſhall not enter into my reſt.

12 Take heed, brethren, leſt there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God.

13 But exhort one another daily while it is called, To-day; leſt any of you be hardened through the deceitfulneſs of ſin.

14 For we are made partakers of Chriſt, if we hold the beginning of our confidence ſtedfaſt unto the end;

15 While it is ſaid, To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation.

16 For ſome, when they had heard, did provoke: howbeit, not all that came out of Egypt by Moſes.

17 But with whom was he grieved forty years? was it not with them that had ſinned, whoſe carcaſes fell in the wilderneſs?

Ver. 7. Ver. 15. Pſ. xcv. 7. Ch. iv. 7.—V. 11. Gr. If they ſhall enter.—V. 14. Ver. 6.—V. 15. Ver. 7.—V. 17. Numb. xiv. 22, 29, &c. xxvi. 65. Jude 5.

office, but alſo a property. See ver. 4. Some would read and underſtand this, over His houſe; that is, God's houſe. Inſtead of the confidence, ſome read, our freedom of profeſſion; and others, the liberty, i. e. of acceſs to God. See ch. iv. 16. ch. x. 19, 35. In all which places the word παῤῥησίαν, ſays Sykes, ſhould be rendered liberty. The Jews were all abſolutely prohibited from entering into the holy of holies, (the high-prieſt only excepted, and he having this reſtraint laid upon him, that he could enter it but once a year,) and therefore they could have no acceſs to the throne of Grace: But now the true holy of holies was opened to all, through Chriſt, and all Chriſtians might have free acceſs to the throne of God. And this freedom, without any reſtraint, was the παῤῥησία, the liberty, which they might uſe without any fear of death or harm for entering within the veil. In this place then of this Epiſtle παῤῥησία is the liberty of acceſs to the throne of God;—an advantage which no Chriſtian is to give up. It is an acceſs to the Lord and Maſter of his houſe; not by any others, as mediators in the family, but by and through the Son alone. The rejoicing of the hope, means the open avowal of the hope which we have of a future reward. This is the thing openly to be profeſſed, and ſteadily to be adhered to, even to the end. See ch. x. 23, 26, 27, 31.

Ver. 7—9. Wherefore, &c.] "We are the people of God, if we continue ſtedfaſt: wherefore, let me adviſe you, and exhort you, in the words of the inſpired Pſalmiſt, To day if ye will hear his voice harden not your hearts, and be not ſtubborn and diſobedient, as were our fathers at Maſſah and Meribah in the wilderneſs; (Exod. xvii. 2—7.) when they tempted God, and tried how far his power and goodneſs would extend." The reaſoning throughout this Epiſtle is in general taken from the ſtate of the children of Iſrael in the wilderneſs, and from what was done and ſaid there; and the compariſon is run betwixt Chriſt and Moſes;—Chriſt and the high-prieſt;—the ſacrifice of Chriſt, and the ſacrifices then and there appointed;—the wilderneſs in which the Jews wandered, and the preſent life of Chriſtians;—the land of Canaan, and the ſtate of happineſs or reſt, to which we are called by Chriſt. The people of God are called out of the world, as the Iſraelites were out of Egypt: The people of God at preſent are going as it were through the wilderneſs, towards their reſt in heaven, juſt as the children of Iſrael were marching through the wilderneſs to Canaan.—As this was the plan of the Apoſtle, he ſpeaks about the tabernacle, and the Jewiſh worſhip, as at that time; and does not ſo much as mention the temple, except poſſibly in one place; or the ſtate of things at the time when he was writing. His deſign was to ſhew that Jeſus Chriſt, and what he did, were much more excellent, and much more advantageous, than what Moſes was and did. The ſuperior dignity of the perſon of Chriſt was ſhewn in ch. i. The reaſon of his condeſcenſion to become incarnate in ch. ii. His ſuperiority to Moſes, in the preſent chapter: In further proof of which he proceeds to ſhew, that the reſt promiſed by Chriſt to his people, is much ſuperior, and more excellent than that which Moſes propoſed to the children of Iſrael; from whence his inference is as ſtrong as poſſible, that the Hebrews ought to adhere ſtedfaſtly to the word preached by Chriſt, if they deſired to obtain that more excellent and glorious reſt. Mr. Peirce obſerves, that the wherefore, at the beginning of ver. 7. connects with the beginning of ver. 12. Wherefore, take heed, brethren, leſt, &c. and that the citation from the 95th pſalm, which comes between, is to be read in a parentheſis.—Having cited that pſalm, the author dilates upon it, and applies it to his purpoſe, in the following part of this, and the beginning of the next chapter. Inſtead of when, ver. 9. Dr. Waterland reads where.

Ver. 11. My reſt] Canaan is ſo called, as they repoſed there, after the labours of a long war, as well as the fatigues of a tedious march; and perhaps, as entering upon a courſe of ſtated worſhip, it might appear as a kind of ſabbath-keeping. The word my is here added, both becauſe God was the cauſe of this reſt, and becauſe the ark, which was ſuppoſed to be the place of his reſidence, ceaſed to be carried about. Under theſe images, David Kimchi ſuppoſed that the ſigns of the Meſſiah were adumbrated. See Doddridge, and Grotius.

Ver. 12. From the living God] Whoſe houſe they are ſaid to be, ver. 6. He is called living, as being ever one and the ſame; and therefore he muſt be always equally offended with the ſame ſins.

Ver. 13. While it is called To-day] That is, "As long as you can uſe this expreſſion;—every day.—Exhort and encourage one another every day, to a ſteady perſeverance in duty; and do this as often as the day comes, leſt any of you grow careleſs, &c." Sykes. Dr. Doddridge explains it, "While you are under this diſpenſation of grace." Perhaps the meaning only may be, "While you have it in your power; while your life is ſpared;—for the night cometh, when no man can work."

Ver. 14. For we are made partakers, &c.] "For the benefits we have from Chriſt, and that eternal ſalvation, even our reſt, which he hath promiſed to us, are only to be had upon the condition, that we hold firm and unſhaken our dependance, hope, and confidence, quite through our lives." To be partakers of Chriſt, is to be made ſharers with others, either of the doctrines taught by Chriſt in the Goſpel, or of the benefits and advantages which are promiſed by, and to be obtained through him. See ver. 1. ch. vi. 4. Col. i. 12. Epheſ. iii. 6. Upon comparing the latter part of this verſe with the laſt clauſe of ver. 6. the ſenſe ſeems to be the ſame. So that here is expreſſed the condition of our being made partakers of Chriſt: As though he had ſaid, "It is with good reaſon I urge ye to uſe ſuch care every day; for the exhortation in the pſalm, in effect, does the ſame: There being no day, in which it is not to be underſtood as ſpeaking to men in this manner, To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. It will not ſuffice us, that at our firſt converſion to Chriſtianity we made a good profeſſion of our confidence in Chriſt; but this confidence muſt be maintained every day, to the end of our lives. The neglect of it any day may have a ſad conſequence, beginning ſuch an hardneſs of heart, as through the deceitfulneſs of ſin may ſo increaſe, that we may loſe our part in Chriſt." What the Apoſtle juſt mentions here, he proſecutes at large, ch. x. 23—39. and ch. xi. throughout. See Sykes, Peirce, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 15. While it is ſaid To-day] Foraſmuch, &c. MS. The 14th verſe ſeems to be a parentheſis, and the 15th is thus to be joined to the 13th: Exhort one another daily, while it is called To-day, leſt any of you ſhould be hardened, &c.—"Exhort one another, I adviſe, by or from its being ſaid, To-day if ye will hear, &c." Thus, as in ver. 13. he had expreſſed the time when this mutual exhortation ſhould be uſed,—while it is called to-day; and the end of it,—leſt any ſhould be hardened, &c. ſo in this verſe he declares the ground upon which their mutual exhortation was to be built; namely, its being ſaid, To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. Thus underſtood, the preſent verſe agrees with the 13th: For, as there he cautions them againſt being hardened, ſo here he ſets down the words of the text, which ſhews the danger there was of it; by which conſideration they were to excite and ſtir up each other. See Pſ. xlii. 3. Ezek. xxxvi. 20. in the LXX; Peirce, Bengelius, and Doddridge.

Ver. 16. For ſome, when they had heard, did provoke] The reaſoning is thus: "Do you every day exhort one another to ſtedfaſtneſs in the faith; omit no opportunity of doing ſo: Do not delay, or put it off; for you ſee in fact, that ſome when they had heard, yet obſtinately provoked: Take care that you be not like them, either in ſinning, or in ſuffering." The author ſpeaks of this tranſaction with tenderneſs, ſaying only, that ſome of them did provoke, but not all; although among the adult there were only two exceptions, Caleb and Joſhua; who, in ſuch a vaſt multitude, were next to none at all. Nor was it neceſſary for our author to ſet forth a caſe ſo well known in the harſheſt manner: Their own reflection would ſupply what might ſeem wanting, and bring the matter home upon them; who might learn by this example, that the vaſtneſs of the multitude of unbelievers would be no excuſe for thoſe who now believed not in Chriſt; nor would the ſmallneſs of the number of thoſe who now believed in him, cauſe them to be overlooked, or to fail of obtaining the promiſed reſt. See Sykes, Peirce, and Bp. Fell.

18 And to whom ſware he that they ſhould not enter into his reſt, but to them that believed not?

19 So we ſee that they could not enter in, becauſe of unbelief.

CHAP. IV.

The reſt of Chriſtians is attained by faith. The power of God's word. By our High-prieſt Jeſus, the Son of God, ſubject to infirmities, but not to ſin, we muſt and may go boldly to the throne of grace.

LET us therefore fear, leſt, a promiſe being left us of entering into his reſt, any of you ſhould ſeem to come ſhort of it.

2 For unto us was the goſpel preached, as well as unto them: but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it.

3 For we which have believed do enter into reſt, as he ſaid, As I have ſworn in my wrath, If they ſhall enter into my reſt: although the works were finiſhed from the foundation of the world.

4 For he ſpake in a certain place of the ſeventh day on this wiſe, And God did reſt the ſeventh day from all his works.

5 And in this place again, If they ſhall enter into my reſt.

6 Seeing therefore it remaineth that ſome muſt enter therein, and they to whom it was firſt preached, entered not in, becauſe of unbelief:

7 Again, he limiteth a certain day, ſaying in David, To-day, after ſo long a time; as it is ſaid, To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts.

8 For if Jeſus had given them reſt, then would he not afterward have ſpoken of another day.

9 There remaineth therefore a reſt to the people of God.

10 For he that is entered into his reſt, he alſo hath ceaſed from his own works, as God did from his.

Ver. 18. Who believed not?] Who obeyed not? Wat.

Ver. 19. So then we ſee, &c.] "And thus we ſee, and it is as clear as poſſible, that the reaſon why they could not enter into the place deſigned for their reſt, after their wandering in the wilderneſs, was becauſe of their unbelief and diſobedience. See Sykes," and Whitby.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1. Let us therefore fear, &c.] The promiſe of God's reſt, ſignifies ſuch a reſt as his is; namely, a ſtate of peace and enjoyment, and freedom from labour. When a reſt was promiſed to the children of Iſrael, it was a freedom from the uneaſineſſes and dangers of the wilderneſs; God's reſt, when promiſed to Chriſtians, is a freedom from troubles, in a ſtate of eternal happineſs. A promiſe then of this ſort being made to us, we are to take care, not to neglect or deſpiſe, but to pay all due regard to it. Inſtead of any of you, υμῶν, ſome copies read any of us; and their authority ſeems evidently confirmed by the connection. See Sykes, Mill, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 2. Unto us was the Goſpel preached, &c.] For we are made partakers of the good tidings, as they alſo were: But the word which they heard, did not profit them, &c. The children of Iſrael had a promiſe of reſt made to them; and ſo have we, as well as they. The word Goſpel, ſignifies properly, as we have often obſerved, good news, or good tidings; which is the meaning of the word εὐηγγελισμένοι here: But as that term is now appropriated by cuſtom to the particular good tidings of Chriſt, it renders this paſſage very obſcure, to call the good tidings of a reſt, the Goſpel. The meaning is, "We Chriſtians have had the joyful tidings of God's reſt, or a ſtate of happineſs, in a ceſſation from all our labours, preached to us, as well as the children of Iſrael had to them." The laſt clauſe might be rendered more properly, Being not through faith mixed with (i. e. digeſted and turned into nouriſhment, as it were, by) thoſe who heard it. Faith is here conſidered as the means by which the word of God is thus incorporated in the hearers. See ch. iii. 16. Sykes, Peirce, and Wolſius.

Ver. 3. For we who have believed, &c.] This ſtands connected with the former part of the preceding verſe: "Unto us was the good tidings of a reſt preached, as well as unto them: For all we who have believed,—or, all who do believe, do enter into reſt." Faith is the way by which men muſt expect to enter into whatever reſt God promiſes in one age or another. The reſt which was preached to them of old, they, for want of faith, and for acting diſobediently, did not enter into; as appears from the declaration of God,—So I ſware in my wrath, they ſhall not enter into my reſt: But that reſt which is preached to us, is a far ſuperior and advantageous reſt; even ſuch a reſt as God himſelf entered into, when his works were finiſhed at the creation of the world; and conſequently it is quite different from that which was ſpoken of the children of Iſrael in the wilderneſs. It is not therefore the land of Canaan which is eminently called my reſt, but a ſtate where there is to be no more labour, nor ſorrow; Rev. vii. 16, 17. Καὶ τοι does not in this place ſignify although, but for indeed, or for; and the true meaning is, "All we that believe are to enter into God's reſt; not that which the children of Iſrael entered into, and was then called my reſt, but that which was eminently ſo called; that which was ſo called when the world was made." There are then two different things ſpoken of under the terms of my reſt: the one, that at the end of the creation, when God's works were finiſhed; the other, when the Iſraelites entered Canaan. This latter is but a trifle, compared with the former: for that of which we have the good news, ſignifies a ſtate of perfect happineſs and repoſe from all labour and burdenſome fatigue; and this is the ſtate into which all who believe and obey are to enter. See Sykes and Owen.

Ver. 4. For he ſpake in a certain place, &c.] The ſupplemental nominative caſe here is Γραφη, the Scripture, not he: or it is to be underſtood imperſonally, as in other citations in this Epiſtle,—It is ſaid concerning the ſeventh day. It was not cuſtomary for the Jews, when they quoted Scripture, to mention the book or chapter; for they were ſo familiar with the ſacred writings from their infancy, that they knew where to find any paſſage as ſoon as they heard it. See Sykes and Grotius.

Ver. 6. Seeing therefore it remaineth, &c.] The difficulty here is, how does it appear, from the paſſages cited, that any were to enter into God's reſt? That the incredulous and diſobedient children of Iſrael were not to enter into Canaan, the place of their reſt, appears, becauſe God had declared that that generation ſhould not enter into it. But whence does it appear that any were to enter into that reſt eminently ſo called?—The reaſoning is this: 1. There is ſuch a reſt of God: This is proved from what the Scripture ſaith, God reſted the ſeventh day from all his works. 2. That reſt which is ſpoken of, and into which the children of Iſrael did enter, was not that reſt of God; but though it was called his reſt, yet it was not deſigned to be a ceſſation from all labour, but only from the labour in the wilderneſs. Since then the reſt of God remained unpoſſeſſed, notwithſtanding Joſhua gave the people under his charge poſſeſſion of Canaan, and we are invited ſtill to come into the reſt of God, there muſt be ſuch a ſtate to and for the people of God. Inſtead of muſt enter, Dr. Waterland reads do enter; and inſtead of they to whom it was firſt preached, Doddridge and others read, they to whom the good tidings were at firſt declared; as in ver. 2.

Ver. 7. Again, he limiteth a certain day] "The Scripture mentions God's reſt again, with a ſtrong exhortation to the people in David's days; and he gives a ſtrong encouragement to them not to harden their hearts: and even ſo many years after Moſes was dead, he uſes the expreſſion to-day; which implies preſent time, and a reſt different from that of Canaan, and what the faithful even then were to enjoy." Dr. Heylin renders this and the next verſe more clearly thus: He again determines a certain time, called To-day; ſaying by David, ſo long after the words recited, To-day, ſince you heard his voice, harden not your hearts. ver. 8. For if Joſhua had given them reſt, David would not afterwards have ſpoken of another day. "The land of Canaan cannot be the true reſt promiſed by God, becauſe David ſpeaks of a reſt as ſtill future, and to be acquired by ſuch as were ready and willing, in his time, to hearken to the voice of God."

Ver. 9. There remaineth therefore a reſt] The word hitherto uſed for reſt had been καταπαυσιν, ceſſation from labour: Here a new term is introduced σαββατισμὸς, ſuch a reſt as was proper to the ſeventh day, on which God reſted. The Apoſtle had ſaid, ver. 6. that the reſt of God was left unpoſſeſſed; that generation which Joſhua led into 11 Let us labour therefore to enter into that reſt, leſt any man fall after the ſame example of unbelief.

12 For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and ſharper than any two-edged ſword, piercing even to the dividing aſunder of ſoul and ſpirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a diſcerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

13 Neither is there any creature that is not manifeſt in his ſight: but all things are naked, and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do.

14 Seeing then that we have a great High-prieſt, that is paſſed into the heavens, Jeſus the Son of God, let us hold faſt our profeſſion.

15 For we have not an high-prieſt which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without ſin.

Ver. 11. Or, diſobedience.—V. 12. 2 Cor. x. 4, 5. Prov. v. 4. Rev. i. 16. ii. 16. 1 Cor. xiv. 24.—V. 13. Pſ. xxxiii. 13, 14. xc. 8. cxxxix. 11, 12. Job xxxiv. 21.—V. 14. Ch. iii. 1. Ch. vii. 26. ix. 12, 24. Ch. x. 23.—V. 15. Ch. ii. 18. Luke xxii. 28. 2 Cor. v. 21.

Canaan did not take poſſeſſion of God's reſt; for God, four hundred and fifty years afterwards, ſpeaks of his reſt as ſtill to be entered into; therefore his reſt ſtill remained for the people of God.—All that is here ſaid is, to urge the Hebrews to continue ſteadfaſt in their faith, by proving to them that the reſt of God preached to us by Chriſt is more advantageous, and much ſuperior to that which was promiſed by Moſes. It was a ſtate of perfect happineſs, peace, quietneſs in heaven: It was ſuch a ceſſation from labour, as God himſelf enjoyed after the creation. This reſt therefore ought to be the great object of our care, the grand point to be adhered to; and the principle by which it is to be attained, is a faith firm and ſure. See Sykes, Peirce, and Whitby.

Ver. 10. Hath ceaſed] Hath reſted. Wat.

Ver. 12, 13. For the word of God is quick, &c.] "The word of God, which promiſed to the faithful an entrance into God's reſt in David's time, and now to us, is not a thing which died, or was forgotten, as ſoon as it was uttered; but it continues one and the ſame to all generations. It is Ζῶν, quick, or living. So Iſaiah ſays, The word of our God ſhall ſtand for ever. ch. xl. 8. comp. ch. li. 6. lv. 11. 1 Eſdr. iv. 38. John iii. 34. 1 Pet. i. 23.—And powerful, ἐνεργὴς, efficacious, active; ſufficient, if it be not actually hindered, to produce its effects;—effectual: Philem. 6. See 2 Cor. x. 4. 1 Theſſ. ii. 13. —And ſharper than any two-edged ſword, τομώτερος ὑπὲρ,—more cutting than: The word of God penetrates deeper into a man than any ſword; it enters into the very ſoul and ſpirit, into all our ſenſations, paſſions, appetites; nay, to our very thoughts, and ſits as judge of the moſt ſecret intentions, contrivances, ſentiments of the heart. Phocylides has an expreſſion very ſimilar to our author, where he ſays of reaſon, "That it is a weapon which penetrates deeper into a man than a ſword." See Iſai. xl. 4. Epheſ. vi. 17. Rev. i. 16. ii. 16.—Piercing even to the dividing aſunder of ſoul and ſpirit. When the ſoul is thus diſtinguiſhed from the ſpirit, by the former is meant that inferior faculty, by which we think of and deſire what concerns the preſent being and welfare. By ſpirit is meant a ſuperior power, by which we prefer future things to preſent; by which we are directed to purſue truth and right above all things, and even to deſpiſe what is agreeable to our preſent ſtate, if it ſtands in competition with, or is prejudicial to future happineſs. See 1 Theſſ. v. 23. Some have thought, that by the expreſſion before us is implied, that the word of God is able to bring death, as in the caſe of Ananias and Sapphira: For, ſay they, if the ſoul and ſpirit, or the joints and marrow are ſeparated one from another, it is impoſſible that life can remain. But perhaps the meaning of the latter clauſe may rather be, "It can divide the joints, and divide the marrow; i. e. enter irreſiſtibly into the ſoul, and produce perhaps ſome ſentiment, which it would not willingly have received; and ſometimes diſcover and puniſh ſecret as well as open wickedneſs." Mr. Peirce obſerves, that our author has been evidently arguing from a tremendous judgement of God upon the ancient Iſraelites, the anceſtors of thoſe to whom his Epiſtle is directed; and in this verſe, to preſs upon them that care and diligence he had been recommending, he ſets before them the efficacy and virtue of the word of God, connecting this verſe with the former, by a for in the beginning of it: and therefore it is natural to ſuppoſe, that what he ſays of the word of God may have a relation to ſomewhat remarkable in that ſore puniſhment of which he had been ſpeaking; particularly to the deſtruction of the people by lightning, or fire from heaven. See Lev. x. 1—5. Numb. xi. 1—3. xvi. 35. Pſ. lxxviii. 21. All the expreſſions, in this view, will receive an additional force; for nothing is more quick and living, more powerful and irreſiſtible, ſharp and piercing than lightning. If this idea is admitted, the meaning of the laſt clauſe in this verſe will be, "That the word of God is a judge, to cenſure and puniſh the evil thoughts and intents of the heart:" And this brings the matter home to the exhortation with which our author began, ch. iii. 12, 13. For, under whatever diſguiſe they might conceal themſelves, yet, from ſuch tremendous judgements as God executed upon their fathers, they might learn to judge as Moſes did, Numb. xxxii. 23. If ye will not do ſo, ye have ſinned againſt the Lord, and be ſure your ſin will find you out. See Hammond, Whitby, Sykes, and Peirce.

Ver. 13. Nor is there any creature, &c.] It has been greatly debated amongſt commentators, whether theſe two verſes are to be underſtood of Chriſt, the divine Logos, or of the Goſpel and Scripture revelation. The interpretation given of the preceding verſe, ſhews the idea we have of it. But the ſacred writer by the preſent verſe ſeems evidently to underſtand the word as accompanied with the divine efficacy of the ſpeaker, to whom he here plainly turns his diſcourſe. In his ſight, and with whom we have to do, evidently mean the great author of that word, whoſe almighty power and univerſal knowledge gives to the word the efficacy above aſſigned to it. The words rendered naked and opened, are generally explained as metaphorical, and taken from ſacrifices. Τραχηλιζομαι, ſays Parkhurſt, ſignifies to be manifeſted and open to the eyes of the beholder, as a perſon would be whoſe neck was forcibly bent back, and his face expoſed like thoſe criminals mentioned by Pliny in his panegyric: of whom one might deſuper intueri ſupina ora retortaſque cervices; and in this view I apprehend, with Elſner, Alberti, and Wolfius, the word is to be underſtood in this only paſſage of the New Teſtament where it occurs. So Heſychius,—with his eye no doubt on the preſent text,—explains τετραχηλισμένα by πεφανερωμενα, manifeſted; and Caſtalio excellently renders it by reſupina; Eraſmus by reſupinata. Many expoſitors have, after Chryſoſtom, taken the word for a metaphorical term, referring to ſacrifical victims; and ſome have explained it as denoting not only ſtripped of the ſkin, but ſplit in two, down the neck and back-bone, ſo as to lay open the inward parts to view. But of this expoſition it ſeems ſufficient to obſerve, with Elſner, that it neither agrees with the derivation of the word, nor is confirmed by the uſe of any ancient Greek writer. The laſt clauſe πρὸς ὃν ἡμῖν ὁ λόγος, may either ſignify, as in our tranſlation, with whom we have to do, or to whom we muſt give an account, or concerning whom we are ſpeaking. The phraſe is ſomewhat unuſual, which way ſoever it be rendered. See Parkhurſt on the word Τραχηλιζομαι, Elſner, Wolfius, and Caſtalio.

Ver. 14.] The Apoſtle having finiſhed the digreſſion about the reſt of God, and having ſhewn, what he always keeps in view, the ſuperior advantage of what is to be had by Chriſt, above what was to be had in or by the law; he returns to what he had been ſaying, ch. ii. 17. iii. 1. Chriſt has been proved ſuperior to Moſes; and the reſt he promiſed ſuperior to that of Canaan: He now proceeds to treat of Chriſt as our High-prieſt, ſtill with a view of ſhewing his ſuperiority to the Jewiſh high-prieſt; and having mentioned what were the peculiar qualifications requiſite in a high-prieſt, he proceeds to ſhew that Jeſus had, in an eminent manner, all thoſe qualifications; that he was equal to Aaron, in that which was peculiar to Aaron; after which, he proves him to be ſuperior to Aaron in many reſpects, in ch. vii. See ch. iv. 14. to v. 11.

Seeing then] The expreſſions in this verſe bear a manifeſt relation to what the ſacred writer had ſaid in the two firſt chapters, and the beginning of the third, as will immediately appear to any reader who will be at the trouble of comparing them. Paſſed into the heavens, is literally, (as Dr. Waterland renders it) paſſed through the heavens; to the higheſt heavens, or the heaven of heavens, that he might ſit at the right hand of the Majeſty on high; ch. i. 3. It is ſaid of John Baptiſt, that he confeſſed and denied not, but confeſſed, I am not the Chriſt. John i. 20. That is, "He openly profeſſed this truth." Hence, becauſe at baptiſm every convert declared openly his aſſent to the truth of Chriſtianity, it was called in general Ὁμολογία, profeſſion. Hence too, when difficulties have ariſen, and good men have ſteadily perſevered in the faith, they are ſaid to profeſs a good profeſſion: 1 Tim. vi. 12. See Peirce, Sykes, and Owen.

Ver. 15. Who cannot be touched with the feeling, &c.] With a fellow-feeling, &c. Wat. See ch. x. 34. The Greek of the next clauſe is literally, but in all things tempted according to a likeneſs; i. e. with us. Comp. ch. ii. 17, 18. He underwent the trial of ſufferings, and of death itſelf, juſt as we do.—Yet without ſin;—we have added the word yet in our verſion. The temptations or trials here mentioned are of perſecutions and afflictions: Chriſt underwent all theſe, and even death itſelf; and he ſtood firm, and went through them all, without any falling away from the truth, or doing any thing amiſs: —We, therefore, ſhould act with the like reſolution. Or the meaning may be, (which ſeems more natural) that we ſhould hold faſt our profeſſion, becauſe we have an high-prieſt who knows how to ſympathize with us, and will be the more inclined to favour us, ſince, though he was without ſin, yet he was perfected through ſufferings. ch. ii. 10. One further deſign of the ſacred writer, in mentioning this circumſtance, might be, to ſhew how vaſtly preferable Chriſt, the High-prieſt of our profeſſion, is to the ancient high-prieſts; inaſmuch as they were ſubject themſelves to ſin, and therefore had occaſion to offer for their own ſins, as well as thoſe of the people. See ch. v. 3. vii. 26. 1 John ii. 1, 2. Whitby, Sykes, and Peirce.

16 Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

CHAP. V.

The authority and honour of our Saviour's prieſthood: negligence in the knowledge thereof is reproved.

FOR every high-prieſt taken from among men, is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and ſacrifices for ſins:

2 Who can have compaſſion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himſelf alſo is compaſſed with infirmity:

3 And by reaſon hereof he ought, as for the people, ſo alſo for himſelf, to offer for ſins.

4 And no man taketh this honour unto himſelf, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron:

5 So alſo Chriſt glorified not himſelf, to be made an high-prieſt; but he that ſaid unto him, Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten thee.

6 As he ſaith alſo in another place, Thou art a prieſt for ever after the order of Melchiſedec;

7 Who in the days of his fleſh, when he had offered up prayers and ſupplications, with ſtrong crying and tears, unto him that was able to ſave him from death, and was heard, in that he feared;

Ver. 16. To the throne of grace] That throne on which God, who hath ſhewn us ſo great favour through Jeſus Chriſt, ſits. "Let us come, not fearful or diſtruſtful, nor under any concern or anxiety, but with freedom and boldneſs, to this throne of God the Father, through our great High-prieſt, who ſtands ready to make interceſſion for us, that we may obtain mercy; that all our ſins,—not only thoſe committed before our converſion, but likewiſe thoſe of which we may be guilty afterwards,—may through his infinite merits be forgiven us: And that we may find favour, to have help whenever it is wanted; ſeaſonable, opportune help, if at any time we ſhould fall into ſeaſons of perſecution, or any other great difficulties and diſtreſſes." Though the rule given us in this verſe is never in any caſe improper to be obſerved, yet the ſcope of the writer ſhews at what he more eſpecially aims. He conſiders the Hebrews as compaſſed with infirmity, and as violently tempted by perſecution to apoſtatize from their holy profeſſion; in which circumſtances help was moſt neceſſary and ſeaſonable to them. Hence he encourages them to come freely to the throne of grace for it, and to expect it through this great High-prieſt, as the effect of grace and favour, and not of their own deſert. See Sykes, Peirce, and Whitby.

Chap. V. Ver. 1. For every high-prieſt] This ſtands connected with the preceding verſe, Let us come boldly to the throne of grace,—for that, or becauſe every high-prieſt—is ordained, that he may offer, &c. as that laſt verſe of the former chapter is in conſequence of what is ſaid ver. 14. Here the character and office of an high-prieſt are both mentioned;—that he is to offer gifts and ſacrifices for ſins; that he can have compaſſion on others, ver. 2. That he muſt ſacrifice for himſelf, ver. 3. That he muſt be peculiarly appointed to this dignity by God, ver. 4. Theſe are the offices of every high-prieſt taken from among men; and theſe are ſo expreſly laid down, that the Apoſtle might the more clearly ſhew the ſuperiority of Chriſt to the Jewiſh high-prieſt in each of theſe reſpects. From whence the concluſion is plain, Let us hold faſt our profeſſion.

The firſt character is, Every high-prieſt taken from among men, is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and ſacrifices for ſin. This is the office of an high-prieſt taken from among men; and in this, Chriſt, who was not taken from among men, acted as the high-prieſt did. What is meant by ordained for men in things pertaining to God, will be eaſily underſtood from Exod. xviii. 19. Be thou for the people to God-ward, or, "in things pertaining to God;" that thou mayeſt bring their cauſes unto God. See the LXX. The high-prieſt was a mediator for the people, tranſacting their affairs which had a relation to God: for example, he was, in virtue of his office, to offer gifts and ſacrifices unto God, and thus to reſtore all friendſhip which had been broken between them. How our Saviour did this, is treated more at large, ch. ix. 24—28. Here no more need be ſaid, than that our Saviour appeared in the true holy of holies, in the preſence of God for us; and there offered himſelf, having done the will of his Father in all things, for the purifying us from ſin. However ver. 4, 5. and the ſcope of the Epiſtle may ſuggeſt to us, that a principal regard is here had to the high-prieſts of the houſe of Aaron; yet the expreſſion, Every high-prieſt taken from among men, is ſo general, that it may well comprehend any others who were not of that order; ſuch as Melchiſedech, and perhaps Noah, Job, and others. Further, theſe high-prieſts who are ſaid to be taken from among men, are thereby diſtinguiſhed from our great High-prieſt Jeſus Chriſt. They were mere men; but Chriſt, though he was a man, was much more, being the Son of God. Comp. ch. vii. 28. Exod. xxviii. 1. Sykes, and Peirce.

Ver. 2. Who can have compaſſion] Due compaſſion. Wat. and Heylin. Μετριοπαθεῖν ſignifies "to treat with moderation and gentleneſs." See the margin. The ſentence is, that however thoſe high-prieſts might be offended and diſpleaſed with ſuch who were ignorant and out of the way,—who wandered or ſinned more through ignorance than wilfulneſs;—yet they had reaſon to moderate their anger, and not be rigorous towards them, conſidering their own circumſtances;—that they themſelves were compaſſed about with infirmity: as of the ſame nature, ſo liable to the ſame miſtakes and frailties. See Peirce, Doddridge, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 3. And by reaſon hereof] "By reaſon of this infirmity, common to him and all mankind, he is obliged for himſelf, as well as for the people, to offer ſacrifice for ſins." Here again is a great diſſimilitude of circumſtances between the high-prieſt taken from among men, and our High-prieſt: For, though they have ſins for which they are obliged to offer ſacrifice, yet Chriſt had none: And in this a remarkably ſuperior dignity appears in our Lord, that he was without ſin, ch. iv. 15. and conſequently did not, could not, offer for any ſins of his own. See Lev. iv. 3. xvi. 32. xxi. 10. and ch. vii. 27.

Ver. 4. But he that is called of God] Called of God means a particular deſignation or appointment to the dignity of High-prieſt; ſuch a one as Aaron had, Exod. xxx. 30. They therefore miſapply this text, who would argue from it the neceſſity of a peculiar appointment made by man to the adminiſtration of an office in the Chriſtian church. How right ſoever ſuch deſignations may be, as they certainly are, this text has no relation to ſuch matters; but is only intended to prove, that Chriſt was as eminently, and as clearly deſigned and appointed by God to be an High-prieſt as Aaron was. In this reſpect then, an equality of Chriſt to Aaron is proved: afterwards the ſuperiority of Chriſt, even in this reſpect, will be ſhewn. See Sykes, and Spencer de Leg. Heb. lib. i. ch. 8.

Ver. 5. So alſo, Chriſt glorified not himſelf] So likewiſe Chriſt did not take the honour to himſelf of being an High-prieſt. "He did not of himſelf aſſume that dignity, but was expreſly appointed to it by Him, who declared concerning him, that he was his Son." See Heylin, and Doddridge.

Ver. 6. As he ſaith alſo in another place] The explication of this follows in ch. vii. The Apoſtle had quoted from the ſecond pſalm in the preceding verſe; when therefore it follows, as he ſaith alſo in another, it ſeems more natural to ſupply the word pſalm, than place.

Ver. 7. In the days of his fleſh] During the time he was in the fleſh, or incarnate; made lower than the angels, that through death he might deſtroy him that had the power of death. ch. ii. 14. The alluſion in the next clauſe is to the prayers of our Saviour, which he made in the garden to God, to remove that cup from him. See on Matth. xxvi. 39. Luke xxii. 49. There is no mention any where of our Saviour's tears but in this place, except upon his raiſing Lazarus from the dead, John xi. 35. and on his laſt view of Jeruſalem, Luke xix. 41. See alſo Matth. xxvii. 50. The laſt clauſe is variouſly interpreted. There is the ſame difference in general, ſays Dr. Sykes, between ἀκουσθεὶς, and εἰσακουσθεὶς, the word here uſed, as between ſacrificare and litare. Ακουσθεις ſignifies, being heard; the other ſignifies being ſo heard, as to have the requeſt granted. The words ἀπὸ τῆς εὐλαβείας, mean not, in that he feared, but, as it is in the Vulgate, pro reverentiâ; by reaſon of that reverence and ſubmiſſion which was paid by the Son to his Father. So our margin has it, for his piety. The ſenſe is, "That Chriſt, when he prayed to God in the manner he did, by reaſon of that reverential regard he had to his Father in all his conduct, was heard." Thus Sykes, with whom Heylin, Bp. Fell, and many others agree. See ch. xii. 28. But Whitby, whom Doddridge and others follow, underſtands it, that he was heard in being delivered from that which he particularly feared; and which threw him into ſuch an agony in the garden, that he ſweat

8 Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience, by the things which he ſuffered;

9 And being made perfect, he became the author of eternal ſalvation unto all them that obey him;

10 Called of God an high prieſt after the order of Melchiſedec.

11 Of whom we have many things to ſay, and hard to be uttered, ſeeing ye are dull of hearing.

12 For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the firſt principles of the oracles of God; and are become ſuch as have need of milk, and not of ſtrong meat.

13 For every one that uſeth milk, is unſkilful in the word of righteouſneſs: for he is a babe.

14 But ſtrong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, even thoſe who by reaſon of uſe have their ſenſes exerciſed to diſcern both good and evil.

CHAP. VI.

He exhorteth not to fall back from the faith, but to be ſtedfaſt, diligent, and patient to wait upon God, becauſe God is moſt ſure in his promiſe.

Ver. 8. Phil. ii. 8 —V. 9. Ch. ii. 10.—V. 10. Ch. vi. 20.—V. 11. Matth. xiii. 15.—V. 12. 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2, 3.—V. 13. Gr. hath no experience. 1 Cor. xiv. 20. Epheſ. iv. 14.—V. 14. Or, perfect. Or, of an habit, or perfection. Iſai. vii. 15.

drops of blood. There is another method of interpreting this, which is that followed by the Syriac verſion; namely, by joining the words 'Απὸ τῆς ἐυλαϐειας with the 8th verſe:—and was heard [ſo as to have his requeſt granted]; ver. 8. though he were a Son, yet through his piety he learned obedience from what he ſuffered.

Ver. 8. Though he were a Son] Notwithſtanding his being a Son, he learned obedience by that ſevere diſcipline he underwent. The connection of this and the preceding verſe ſeems to ſtand thus: "Jeſus offered up prayers unto him, who was able to ſave him from death; and he was heard too, by reaſon of the reverence and regard he ſhewed to his Father in all things; and he was accordingly rewarded. Yet notwithſtanding his being a Son,—the only beloved Son,—he learned obedience by going through a ſtate of ſufferings: His patient and chearful ſubmiſſion was continually improved by every trial." See Sykes. Peirce obſerves, that it ſeems very improper that our author ſhould ſpeak of Chriſt's learning to obey by his ſufferings, as though he had been unaccuſtomed to obedience before his ſufferings: This therefore, ſays he, muſt be underſtood agreeably to the ſcope of the diſcourſe; wherein the author is deſigning to ſhew, that Chriſt acquired a ſympathy with us, and ſo was well qualified to be an high-prieſt for us. If we look back to ch. iv. 14, 15. we find he there ſpeaks of our high-prieſt as the Son of God, who could be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, being tried in all things like as we are, yet without ſin. This made a vaſt difference between him and the prieſts under the law, who might be moved to a compaſſion towards their brethren, by conſidering their own ſinful infirmities; ver. 2, 3. Now Chriſt not being capable of being moved to compaſſion by this, (being himſelf always perfectly free from ſin,) the ſacred writer ſeems here to ſuggeſt, that he was yet as effectually moved to it another way, even by his own ſufferings, in the courſe of his obedience; and eſpecially when he became obedient unto death, even the death of the croſs. The ſenſe of the place therefore I take to be this, That by his ſufferings he learned how difficult obedience was; and by this means was as effectually engaged to pity and ſuccour us, as the high-prieſts of old were to pity and act in behalf of the people, from the experience they had of their own ſtrength and infirmity.

Ver. 9. Being made perfect] Being conſecrated. MS. (See ch. ii. 10.) Conſecrated by ſufferings to his office, and fully qualified for the diſcharge of it. He became the ἄιτιος, the cauſer, the agent, by whom any thing is brought about or done: Chriſt was the agent by whom all that ſubmitted to him were brought to God, and intitled to eternal life. See Tillotſon's Works, vol. i. p. 200. Jackſon's Works, vol. ii. p. 943. Owen, Sykes, and Parkhurſt on the word Τελειοω.

Ver. 10. Called of God, &c.] Not καλέμενος, as ver. 4. but προσαγορευθεὶς, having the title of high-prieſt given him of God. He was not called to his office, as Aaron was, but he was ſomething more; and, which ſhews a ſuperior honour, he was ſaluted with that title by God himſelf. Juſt as προσαγορευειν αυτοκρατορα is "to ſalute or proclaim any one emperor." Called after the order of Melchiſedech means, that Chriſt was called to be an high-prieſt after the order of Melchiſedech, not by having a ſeries of ſucceſſors, nor by having his title founded upon any lineal deſcent; but as acting in his office, without dependance upon, or attachment to any particular family. See Sykes and Owen.

Ver. 11. Of whom] That is, Melchiſedech: "Of whom we have much to ſay, and hard to be interpreted, ſo as to make you comprehend it, ſeeing you are νωθροὶ, remiſs, careleſs;—have little or no deſire to hear, or learn, or toattend to whatyouhear." See Ecclus. iv. 29.ch. xi. 12. Dr. Heylin reads the verſe, We have many things to ſay upon this ſubject; things which it is difficult to render intelligible to you, becauſe you are not in a diſpoſition to apprehend them. The mention made of Chriſt's being an high-prieſt after the order of Melchiſedech naturally led to the ſaying ſomewhat concerning that perſon, and his order of prieſthood. This our author intended, and accordingly he hath done it, ch. vii. But before he comes to that part of his diſcourſe, he makes a large digreſſion, from hence to ch. vi. 20. At the end of which he brings in again the mention of Chriſt being made an high-prieſt after the order of Melchiſedech; and ſo both handſomely concludes his digreſſion, and introduces the account he gives of Melchiſedech in the 7th chapter. The deſign of this digreſſion ſeems to be, firſt, to reprove the Hebrews for their not attending to, and not better underſtanding the things ſpoken of in the Old Teſtament: His reproof being brought in upon occaſion of their not underſtanding what was ſpoken concerning Melchiſedech, ſeems to fix this as the ground of the reproof, and ſo may ſerve in ſome meaſure a sa key to a good part of the preſent diſcourſe. This is very pertinent to the grand aim of the Epiſtle; for a thorough acquaintance with the Old Teſtament would have been very uſeful to eſtabliſh them in their adherence to Chriſt. Secondly, another deſign of this digreſſion ſeems to be, to warn the Hebrews of that to which they were very prone,—to doat upon the legal inſtitutions; by reaſon whereof they were apt to be indifferent to Chriſt, and to quit their hope in him, and the profeſſion of his religion: For this cauſe the ſacred writer ſets before them their danger in the moſt lively and moving terms. He however qualifies his reproof by the commendation he gives of ſome of them, for their paſt behaviour, for which he encourages them to expect a reward from God. But he wiſhes the ſame might be made general, and that they would all of them guard againſt ſloth and negligence, and preſs after perfection; imitating the faith and patience of other good men, and particularly of Abraham; for whom they had the higheſt veneration, and whoſe example was therefore likely to have the greateſt effect upon them. See Peirce, Sykes, and Owen.

Ver. 12. For when for the time, &c.] The doctrines of Chriſt had been ſo long taught among the Jews, that they could not but underſtand the Scriptures of the prophets, unleſs they were extremely careleſs and negligent. What the firſt principles, or the very elements of the oracles of God were, appears from the next chapter; ver. 1, 2. namely, the plaineſt and cleareſt principles and doctrines contained in the divine revelation. "You have, ſays the Apoſtle, need even of thoſe to be laid before you, rather than the deep things of Chriſt; i. e. the doctrines which are ſuited to thoſe which are perfect:" Hereby referring to what he elſewhere calls the wiſdom of God in a myſtery;—the means uſed by God to reconcile the world to himſelf,—the forgiveneſs of ſins, and the like; all which, in the next verſe, is called the word of righteouſneſs. See on 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2.

Ver. 13. In the word of righteouſneſs] Every one who is unacquainted with the word of righteouſneſs is here called a babe. The thing intended is, that whoſoever is ignorant of the righteouſneſs of God without the law, which is witneſſed by the law and the prophets, even the righteouſneſs of God which is by faith in Chriſt Jeſus, unto all and upon all that believe, is only fit to be begun with, and to be taught the firſt elements of the oracles of God. This is ſometimes called the righteouſneſs of God, Rom. iii. 22. ſometimes the righteouſneſs which is of faith, Rom. ix. 30. The word of righteouſneſs means, the doctrine of our being treated as righteous, in conſequence of our faith in Chriſt. See Rom. iii. 24. 2 Cor. v. 19. It is called the righteouſneſs of God, as it is the method he has taken wherein to treat mankind; and as faith is the thing required, as a means of his grace, it is the righteouſneſs of faith, or by faith: And it is called abſolutely the word of righteouſneſs, as it is the great principle of the Goſpel of Chriſt. See Sykes, L'Enfant, Owen, and Peirce.

Ver. 14. Them that are of full age] Τελείων. So, we ſpeak wiſdom to them that are perfect, τοις τελειοις. See the note on 1 Cor. ii. 6. Thoſe therefore who are here called of full age, are the ſame as thoſe, who, by examination or information, are fully acquainted with the myſteries of the Goſpel, or the great deſign of God in the diſpenſation of the Meſſiah;—who have by uſe and exerciſe been able to trace out what is good or evil, true or falſe. The expreſſion of having the ſenſes exerciſed, &c. ſeems only to refer to the metaphor he had uſed before; and to mean, that they were not ſtill children, who were incapable of doing this. It ſeems plainly borrowed from the Hebrew manner of deſcribing children. See Deut. i. 39. Iſai. vii. 15, 16. Jonah iv. 11. The author might perhaps deſign, by thus enlarging, to keep them the longer attentive to the cenſure he paſſes upon them. Inſtead of by reaſon of uſe, &c. Heylin reads, by long practice and exerciſe have their ſenſes improved, for the diſcernment both of good and evil.

THerefore, leaving the principles of the doctrine of Chriſt, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith towards God,

2 Of the doctrine of baptiſms, and of laying on of hands, and of reſurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgement.

3 And this will we do, if God permit.

4 For it is impoſſible for thoſe who were once enlightened, and have taſted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghoſt,

5 And have taſted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come,

6 If they ſhall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; ſeeing they crucify to themſelves the Son of God afreſh, and put him to an open ſhame.

Ver. 1. Phil. iii. 13, 14. Ch. v. 12. Or, the word of the beginning of Chriſt. Ch. ix. 14.—V. 2. Acts xix. 4, 5. Acts viii. 14, 15, 16, 17.—V. 3. Acts xviii. 21.—V. 4. Matth. xii. 31, 32. Ch. x. 26. 2 Pet. ii. 21. 1 John v. 16. Ch. x. 32. John iv. 10.—V. 5. Ch. ii. 5.

Chap. VI. Ver. 1. Therefore, leaving the principles] "Laying aſide the doctrines which were taught you when ye were firſt initiated into Chriſtianity." The Apoſtle means what in the preceding chapter were called the elements or firſt principles of the oracles of God, ver. 12.—Let us go on to perfection, τελειότητα; "To that ſtate of knowledge and practice, to which the following doctrines are deſigned to lead; ſearching with induſtry and diligence what the word of God hath taught concerning Chriſt." The τελειοι, perfect, are expoſed to babes in Chriſt. See ch. v. 12. The foundation means, the doctrines taught men at firſt, in order to baptiſm into Chriſt. So St. Paul, As a wiſe maſter-builder, I have laid the foundation; 1 Cor. iii. 10. and in the next verſe, Other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is, Jeſus Chriſt.—Dead works are no where mentioned but in this Epiſtle, in the preſent verſe, and ch. ix. 14. St. James indeed ſpeaks of faith without works as dead, ch. ii. 17, &c. by which he means, that it is uſeleſs to him who has it; but here dead works are ſuch as are not only uſeleſs and unprofitable, but as lead to death. They are ſuch as God will puniſh with death. All ſin expoſes men to God's juſtice, and the wages of ſin is death. Rom. vi. 23. Therefore one of the firſt principles taught to all who were inſtructed in Chriſtianity was, that they were to abſtain from the violation of the rules of everlaſting righteouſneſs, in order to the enjoyment of everlaſting life. See Sykes, Whitby, and Owen. Pierce underſtands all in this and the following verſe, as referring to the Jewiſh doctrines, which might be conſidered as the elements of the Chriſtian.

Ver. 2. The doctrine of baptiſms] Dr. Sykes and many others think the reaſon why the ſacred writer ſpeaks of baptiſms in the plural number to be this: He writes to the Hebrews, who had not only ſeveral ſorts of baptiſms enjoined in and by the law, but who had had John, whom all looked upon and acknowledged, baptizing into the belief of one who was to come after him, and into a baptiſm of repentance. When a Jew was converted, he was baptized into the profeſſion of Jeſus's being the Meſſiah, he already believing in the other great preparative doctrines. When John made uſe of the rite of baptiſm to all ſuch as became believers in the Meſſiah, who was ſoon to appear, he declared repentance to be neceſſary, in order to obtain remiſſion of ſins from God: After this, our Saviour coming, declared the ſame, and baptized diſciples in his own name, as being the Meſſiah himſelf actually come. When a Jewiſh diſciple therefore was to be baptized, he was to be inſtructed in the difference between the Jewiſh and Chriſtian baptiſms; and hence the Apoſtle ſpeaks here of the doctrine of baptiſms. Lord Barrington underſtands this of the baptiſm of water, and the effuſion of the Holy Spirit, by which the firſt diſciples among the Jews, and the firſt converts among the devout and idolatrous Gentiles were initiated. He alſo explains the laying on of hands, as referring to the immediate communication of the ſpiritual gifts by means of the Apoſtles. Theſe he thinks were firſt principles, as baptiſm was the firſt entrance into the church, and laying on of hands the great evidence of it; and ſo faith and repentance are the ſubſtance of Chriſtianity, and a reſurrection and eternal judgement the great motives leading men to embrace it. Of laying on of hands muſt be underſtood as if he had ſaid, what was the uſe and purport of this practice; for anciently they were wont to lay on hands as ſoon as the perſons were baptized, to give them the holy Ghoſt; Acts viii. 17. xix. 5, 6. Sometimes they uſed this ceremony to appoint perſons to offices; Acts vi. 6. xiii. 3. ſometimes to heal, as Acts ix. 12, 17. This cuſtom then being ſo variouſly applied to ſuch different purpoſes, it was explained to the perſon to be initiated by baptiſm. See Sykes, and Barrington's Miſcel. Eſſay ii. p. 116.

Ver. 3. And this will we do, if God permit] That is, "We will go on to teach thoſe doctrines, with which a perfect Chriſtian ought to be well acquainted;" this verſe being in connection with the firſt clauſe of the firſt verſe: And accordingly, the Apoſtle goes on to repreſent Chriſtianity in its higheſt beauty, uſefulneſs, and glory. The next clauſe, If God permit, ſeems to have this force; "If God will give me an opportunity, and I am not prevented by your apoſtatizing from Chriſtianity, before my Epiſtle comes to your hands." When this verſe is thus underſtood, the connection of it with the immediately following verſes is admirably good, though otherwiſe very obſcure; for by thoſe verſes he ſhews in what caſe he thought God would not permit him, or give him an opportunity for this, or reaſon to expect ſucceſs in his attempt.

Ver. 4. For it is impoſſible, &c.] "For your apoſtaſy would put an end to my expectation of doing any good upon you; it being impoſſible for thoſe who have been once thoroughly enlightened in the faith, &c." It is thought by ſome that we ought to ſoften the term impoſſible, and underſtand no more by it than this; that it is extremely difficult. But this interpretation may well be called in queſtion, ſince, when our author ſpeaks of the ſame caſe, without uſing the word here rendered impoſſible, he deſcribes it in terms equivalent; ſetting it forth as deſperate and remedileſs; ch. x. 26, &c. Beſides, if the foregoing connection be allowed, his diſcourſe ſuppoſes that God, in ſuffering men to fall into the ſin here mentioned, did not leave room to his Apoſtles to attempt their recovery: And withal, the circumſtances of the ſin were ſo peculiar, that we need not wonder that it ſhould be as remarkably diſtinguiſhed in its dreadful conſequences. See the end of the note on ver. 6. There can be no doubt that Juſtin Martyr, and ſome other very ancient writers of the Chriſtian church, uſed to ſpeak of baptiſm, and the baptized, under the terms illumination, enlightened, and the like; whence many have thought that they took it from the age of the Apoſtles themſelves, and therefore explained the term both here and ch. x. 32. concerning baptiſm. The apoſtolical conſtitutions, lib. viii. cap. 7. and ſome later authors, uſe the word to ſignify ſuch as were preparing for baptiſm, having not yet received it; and if we ſuppoſe the term here, and ch. x. 32. to be uſed in the ſame ſenſe, it ſhould ſeem that there it does not preciſely refer to baptiſm, but is to be explained from ver. 26. to ſignify thoſe who had received the knowledge of the truth. See Epheſ. i. 18. iii. 9. 2 Cor. iv. 4, 6. The gift of God, ſays St. Paul, (Rom. vi. 23.) is eternal life, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord; and in order to that, remiſſion of our paſt ſins is given unto us by God,—δωρεὰν, gratis; Rom. iii. 24. To taſte this gift, is to perceive, to be ſenſible of the truth of ſuch gift of God. Perhaps the word taſted, both here and in the next verſe, is uſed by our author with a particular regard to the metaphor he had uſed before of food, or ſtrong meat. To be convinced of the gift of life eternal, through Jeſus Chriſt, is one of the ſtrongeſt motives that can be urged, to make any one hold faſt his profeſſion. It may ſeem by the next expreſſion as if every one who had embraced the firſt principles of Chriſt, or had been baptized into his religion, had been partaker of ſome or other gift of the Holy Ghoſt; and in a large ſenſe this may be admitted to be true: But if it be imagined that every Chriſtian enjoyed ſome or other of the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit,—ſuch as healing the ſick, caſting out devils, ſpeaking with tongues, and the like; this ſeems more than fairly can be inferred from the preſent text. For though, in ſome places, to partake of, ſignifies, to have a portion or ſhare with others in common; (ſee ch. ii. 14. iii. 1, 14.) yet, if a perſon were convinced of the truth of the Goſpel by a careful ſtudy of the Scriptures, or by ſeeing himſelf, or being fully ſatisfied of, the miraculous powers and aſſiſtances of the firſt preachers of the Goſpel, he might properly enough be ſaid to be a partaker of the Holy Ghoſt: And this, moſt probably, was the caſe of many in thoſe early days. However, if the Apoſtle be thought to ſpeak of ſuch as actually had the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, and yet, through fear of ſufferings, or any other violent temptation, fell away from Chriſtianity, his reaſoning is ſtill ſtronger; and the improbability of bringing ſuch back from the truth is ſtill the greater. See Sykes, Whitby, and Peirce. Inſtead of were once enlightened,—were made partakers, Dr. Waterland reads, have been, &c. &c.

Ver. 5. Taſted the good word of God] In general, this good or comfortable word, muſt mean the Goſpel; which they might well be ſaid to have taſted, who heard it when it began to be publiſhed, and when it was in the moſt ſatisfactory manner confirmed by unqueſtionable and glorious miracles. By the powers of the world to come, are meant, "the powerful or miraculous works of the Chriſtian age;" God bearing them witneſs both with ſigns and wonders, and with diverſe miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, ch. ii. 4. The world to come, or rather, the age to come, ſignifies the age of the Meſſiah; which was to laſt till the final conſummation of all things: It is the ſame with the world to come, ch. ii. 5. They who not only ſaw thoſe great miracles whereby Chriſtianity was confirmed, but were themſelves impowered to work them, could not deſire fuller evidence of the truth of it. See Sykes, Peirce, and Whitby.

Ver. 6. If they ſhall fall away] And are fallen away. Wat. Two things are here to be obſerved; Firſt, that he ſpeaks of ſuch only as fell away or apoſtatized from the very profeſſion of Chriſtianity. This appears from what he preſently adds, to ſet forth the aggravation of their guilt,—that they crucify to themſelves the Son of God afreſh, and put him to an open ſhame. It is therefore very unreaſonable, for perſons to give way to deſpair themſelves, or to drive others to it, by applying this text to other, and even the groſſeſt ſins, when it only and ſingly relates to the caſe of abſolute apoſtaſy. Secondly, As the 7 For the earth, which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dreſſed, receiveth bleſſing from God:

8 But that which beareth thorns and briars is rejected, and is nigh unto curſing; whoſe end is to be burned.

9 But, beloved, we are perſuaded better things of you, and things that accompany ſalvation, though we thus ſpeak.

10 For God is not unrighteous, to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have ſhewed toward his name, in that ye have miniſtered to the ſaints, and do miniſter.

11 And we deſire, that every one of you do ſhew the ſame diligence, to the full aſſurance of hope unto the end:

12 That ye be not ſlothful, but followers of them, who through faith and patience inherit the promiſes.

13 For when God made promiſe to Abraham, becauſe he could ſwear by no greater, he ſware by himſelf,

14 Saying, Surely bleſſing I will bleſs thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee.

15 And ſo after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promiſe.

16 For men verily ſwear by the greater:

Ver. 7. Or, for.—V. 10. Prov. xiv. 31. Matth. x. 42. xxv. 40. John xiii. 20. Rom. iii. 4. 2 Theſſ. i. 6, 7. 1 Theſſ. i. 3. V. 11. Ch. iii. 6, 14. Col. ii. 2.—V. 13. Gen. xxii. 16, 17.

ſame thing is ſpoken of again, ch. x. 26, &c. it cannot be improper to compare the two places together, in order to a complete underſtanding of the writer's deſign; and therefore from the other place we may explain this if: If they ſhall ἑκουσίως, WILFULLY fall away. We may obſerve further, that the word παραπεσόντας here uſed, not only ſignifies falling away, but "all ſinning;" that is, all departing from the rule which ought to have been followed: And accordingly the ſubſtantive παράπτωμα is commonly uſed for treſpaſs or lapſe. Here it ſignifies a total falling away from Chriſt; deſerting the brethren, and withdrawing from religion in times of difficulty;—crimes hinted at toward the cloſe of this Epiſtle. To renew them to repentance, means, to convince them again of the truth, and bring them afreſh to change their minds, and repent of their wickedneſs in forſaking Chriſt. See Col. iii. 10. Some would read here, If they ſhall again fall back, or relapſe to their old religion, it is impoſſible to renew them again to repentance. The Apoſtle adds, ſeeing they crucify to themſelves, &c. That is, "They treat Chriſt, as if they thought he deſerved the ſentence executed upon him; and thus they expoſe him to an open ſhame, and act as if they thought he deſerved to be treated as he was." It may be enquired, why our author ſpeaks ſo ſeverely of the condition of ſuch apoſtates. Now the reaſon of this may be taken, partly from the nature of the evidence which they rejected; The fulleſt and cleareſt evidence which God ever deſigned to give of the truth of Chriſtianity, were the miraculous operations of the Spirit; and when men were not only eye-witneſſes of theſe miracles, but were likewiſe themſelves empowered by the Spirit to work them, and yet after all rejected this evidence, they could have no further or higher evidence whereby they ſhould be convinced; ſo that their caſe muſt in that reſpect appear deſperate. This might alſo be partly owing to their putting themſelves out of the way of conviction: If they could not ſee enough to ſettle them in the Chriſtian religion, while they made a profeſſion of it, much leſs were they likely to meet with any thing new, to convince and reclaim them, when they had taken up an oppoſite profeſſion, and joined themſelves with the inveterate enemies of Chriſtianity. And finally, this may be reſolved into the righteous judgement of God againſt ſuch men, for the heinous aggravated wickedneſs of which they are guilty. If where men have not had the advantage of this higheſt evidence, (which ſeems to be the caſe referred to 2 Theſſ. ii. 10.) but barely have not received the love of the truth that they might be ſaved; God may juſtly ſend them ſtrong deluſion, that they ſhould believe a lie; and therefore there muſt certainly be much ſtronger reaſon for ſuch a judicial proceeding of God againſt thoſe who apoſtatized in the apoſtolick age, ſeeing their ſin was ſo very great: And our author grounds this ſevere ſentence upon the greatneſs of their ſin, becauſe they crucified the Son of God afreſh, and put him to an open ſhame. And in the other place, becauſe they do deſpight unto the Spirit of grace. See Peirce, Sykes, Limborch, Tillotſon, vol. ii. p. 485. Hopkins's Works, p. 520. and Parkhurſt on the word Παραπίπτω.

Ver. 7. For the earth which drinketh in the rain] By this compariſon the manner of the Apoſtle's reaſoning appears evident: Thoſe who have been once inlightened, and have taſted the heavenly gift, &c. are ſteadily to perſevere in their duties, and are juſt like good ſoils, which being well watered, conſtantly bring forth good fruit, and are very juſtly ſaid to be bleſſed by God. See Gen. xxvii. 27. On the other hand, thoſe who fall away totally, or lapſe into great ſin, are fitly compared to barren and unfruitful lands, which produce nothing, or what is worſe than nothing,—briars and thorns. This is a ſtate exceedingly bad, which is at preſent, and will finally be more ſo, curſed by God. See John xv. 6. Matth. xiii. 40—42. Iſai. xxiv. 5, 6. Jer. xvii. 5, 6. Whitby and Sykes.

Ver. 9. But, beloved, &c.] This is very like St. Paul's way of cloſing and ſoftening any thing he had ſaid which ſounded terrible and dreadful. See for examples, 2 Theſſ. ii. 13. Epheſ. iv. 20. Rom. viii 9. We may learn from Philip. i. 6. the ground of the perſuaſion which he here ſpeaks of.

Ver. 10. And labour of love] What the love was which they ſhewed, he more fully declares ch. x. 33, 34. and a very ſkilful way he takes here to commend the kindneſs they had ſhewn him, by repreſenting it as done out of reſpect to God himſelf. See Philip. iv. 18. and Wetſtein.

Ver. 11. And we deſire] "But we deſire that every one of you would ſhew the ſame diligence which many among you have done, and continue to do." By the proceeding mentioned in the former verſe, a hope was to be obtained, according to God's promiſe; and the more diligent they were in that proceeding, the more aſſured and certain would their hope be. But without this their hope was not likely to hold out unto the end, as our author was very ſolicitous it ſhould. The firmneſs and continuance of our hope depends upon our perſevering care and diligence in the diſcharge of our duty. Unto the end ſignifies to the end of our lives. See ch. iii. 6, 14. Some would underſtand ἐλπὶς here to ſignify the object rather than the virtue of hope. Thus it is uſed, ver. 18. Acts xxviii. 20. Thus Jeſus Chriſt is ſaid to be our hope, 1 Tim. i. 1. and to be the hope of glory, Col. i. 27. If this be admitted, the ſenſe will be, "That you may every one of you ſhew the ſame diligence to the end of your lives; that you may be fully perſuaded and conſtantly own Jeſus to be the Chriſt, the hope of Iſrael." See ch. x. 23. The word πληροφορία, rendered full aſſurance, whatever it is applied to, whether it be faith, hope, or underſtanding, implies ſuch a fulneſs, as leads a man to act readily and determinately upon it. See ch. x. 22. Col. ii. 2. 1 Theſſ. i. 5. Owen, Peirce, and Sykes.

Ver. 12. But followers of them, &c.] He means ſuch good Chriſtians as had perſevered in their profeſſion of Chriſt, as well as ſuch other faithful believers as had lived in a juſt expectation of his coming, and were now in poſſeſſion of the promiſes made to Abraham, which were fully accompliſhed. The Apoſtle therefore encourages the Hebrews to be imitators of thoſe who had gone before them in faith and hope, ſince they now ſaw the promiſes all made good, and thoſe who believed in Chriſt in poſſeſſion of that which had been ſo long expected. Mr. Peirce explains this of the Gentiles who were converted to Chriſtianity. If it be intended as a hint to ſtir up the Jews to emulation, as he ſuppoſes, it is certainly a very obſcure one; for, comparatively, it is a low ſenſe in which Chriſtians, in this imperfect ſtate, can be ſaid to inherit the promiſes. "I rather think, ſays Doddridge, it refers to all good men departed out of our world, whether in former or latter days, and under whatever diſpenſation they died." Taking it in this view, it will be, as ſeveral have obſerved, an argument againſt the ſoul's continuing in a ſtate of ſleep during the intermediate period between death and the reſurrection.

Ver. 13. For when God made promiſe, &c.] It is plain that ſomething is to be ſupplied, in order to connect what is here ſaid about Abraham, and the oath made to him, with what the Apoſtle is ſaying; And what that is, is ſufficiently clear from ver. 20. where he ſpeaks of our Saviour as having entered into heaven for us, and having promiſed that to us. We then that believe in Chriſt, who hath promiſed us eternal life, muſt wait with patience, and not give over acting as we ought, through apprehenſion that God will not perform his promiſe made by Chriſt, though we think it long; for what God has promiſed, he will certainly perform. As Abraham therefore, after patient waiting, did at laſt obtain what was promiſed him, ſo likewiſe ſhall we, if we faint not. The reaſoning then ſtands thus; "Imitate them, who through faith and patience inherit the promiſes; and in particular imitate Abraham, to whom God made a promiſe, which was not inſtantly to be accompliſhed. He patiently waited, and he was aſſured that what was promiſed ſhould be made good. It was indeed a promiſe made, and bound with an oath, that thoſe who were concerned in it might be the more certain that it would be made good; and they were in full hope, that all which was ſaid would be made good. So likewiſe we may be certain, that his promiſes given to us will be made good, ſince Chriſt our forerunner is gone to take poſſeſſion of heaven for us." The Apoſtle, in his Epiſtle to the Galations, has argued juſt in the ſame manner. ch. iii. 15, 16, 29. Whence we learn, that all the world was to be bleſſed through Abraham's ſeed; that is, through the Meſſiah, Jeſus Chriſt. We then who believe in Chriſt, are the perſons bleſſed through him, and are to receive what is promiſed by him. See Sykes.

and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all ſtrife.

17 Wherein God, willing more abundantly to ſhew unto the heirs of promiſe the immutability of his counſel, confirmed it by an oath:

18 That by two immutable things, in which it was impoſſible for God to lie, we might have a ſtrong conſolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope ſet before us:

19 Which hope we have as an anchor of the ſoul, both ſure and ſtedfaſt, and which entereth into that within the veil,

20 Whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jeſus, made an high prieſt for ever after the order of Melchiſedec.

CHAP. VII.

Chriſt Jeſus is a prieſt after the order of Melchiſedech, and ſo, far more excellent than the prieſts of Aaron's order.

FOR this Melchiſedec king of Salem, prieſt of the moſt high God, who met Abraham returning from the ſlaughter of the kings, and bleſſed him;

2 To whom alſo Abraham gave a tenth part of all; firſt being by interpretation King of righteouſneſs, and after that alſo King of Salem, which is King of peace;

3 Without father, without mother, without deſcent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a prieſt continually.

Ver. 16. Exod. xxii. 11.—V. 17. Gr. interpoſed himſelf by an oath.—V. 19. Ch. ix. 7.—V. 20. Ch. ix. 24. Ch. iii. 1. vii. 17. V. 1. Gen. xiv. 18, &c.—V. 3. Gr. without pedigree.

Ver. 17. Wherein] Wherefore, or therefore: on which account. Heylin, Doddridge, MS. The word rendered confirmed, ἐμεσίτευσεν, ſignifies properly, as in the margin, interpoſed; and ſo it is rendered in many verſions.

Ver. 18. That by two immutable things] Namely, a promiſe and an oath; in either of which it was impoſſible for God to fail or diſappoint; and much leſs when a matter ſtood confirmed by both. See on ver. 11. Dr. Heylin obſerves, that the word παράκλησιν, rendered conſolation, ſignifies both conſolation and incitement; and he obſerves, that the words in the next clauſe are figurative, yet clear, and highly inſtructive to thoſe whom they concerned; namely, they who have renounced the world, and its vain intereſts, and place all their happineſs in being totally conformed to the will of God. The hope that this will one day be accompliſhed in them, is the refuge to which they neceſſarily fly: For without hope the mind can have no reſt; and theſe perſons having withdrawn their hopes from ſecular intereſts, the hope of ſalvation, (i. e. conformity to the divine will) is their only refuge. A firm adherence to this hope keeps them ſteadfaſt in the boiſterous ſea of temptations wherewith they are agitated; for ſo the metaphor is continued in the next verſe: Which hope we have as an anchor of the ſoul, both ſure and ſteadfaſt, &c.

Ver. 19, 20. Which entereth into that within the veil] The Apoſtle means, that the hope ſet before us is not limited to any thing temporal or preſent, but reaches to heaven and heavenly things; which he compares to the holy of holies, that part of the tabernacle which was behind, or within the ſecond veil. Comp. ch. ix. 3. Into which (ver. 20.) Jeſus is entered. See ch. ix. 24. The ſacred writer here aſſigns a very material difference between the high-prieſt's entering within the earthly ſanctuary, and Jeſus our high-prieſt's entering within the heavenly ſanctuary. The Aaronical high-prieſts did not enter the ſanctuary as forerunners of the people, who were utterly debarred an entrance into it at any time: But Jeſus is entered for us as a forerunner, and who will take care that we ſhall come after him into it. See Sykes, Peirce, and Wolfius.

Chap. VII. Ver. 1. The Apoſtle having mentioned two or three times before, that Chriſt was a prieſt after the order of Melchiſedech, he now comes to give an account of this great perſonage, and to prove that he was greater than their foreſather Abraham. From hence he argues, that if a prieſt was to ariſe of the ſame ſort and order with Melchiſedech, he muſt be of an order ſuperior to the preſent Aaronical prieſthood, and conſequently, that the Levitical prieſthood muſt be changed. Now Chriſt being a prieſt of this ſuperior order, the Hebrews ought not any longer to adhere to the Levitical prieſthood, nor to the Moſaical diſpenſation, but to that of Chriſt, which was prior and ſuperior to it. ver. 1—10. The prieſthood of the order of Melchiſedech being ſhewn to be ſuperior, and of an higher nature than the Aaronical prieſthood, the Apoſtle ſhews further, that there ought to be a change made in the preſent, in order to obtain the advantages of that more excellent prieſthood: and accordingly, that which Chriſt has introduced and exerciſes is juſt ſuch a prieſthood as that of Melchiſedech was. It is unchangeable, and leads to perfection, and conſequently it is beſt fitted to anſwer all the ends of a prieſthood. The Apoſtle embelliſhes his diſcourſe by a great variety of inſtances and allegations, very much tending to eſtabliſh the Hebrews in their adherence to Chriſt, eſpecially after he had in ſuch tremendous terms repreſented the danger of apoſtatizing from him in the foregoing chapter, ver. 11—28.

For this Melchiſedech] The Apoſtle had ſpoken of an high-prieſt after the order of Melchiſedech thrice before, ch. v. 6, 10. vi. 20. and he had hinted, that he had many things to ſay of him, and hard to be underſtood; all therefore which has been ſaid in the preceding chapter is a digreſſion; from which he now returns, in order to explain what he meant by ſtrong meat. He had proved before that Chriſt was far more excellent than Moſes; that he was as properly called of God an high-prieſt as was Aaron; and that the Chriſtian reſt was that promiſed to the Jews: and now he undertakes to ſhew the dignity and excellence of the Chriſtian high-prieſt to be ſuperior to, and greater than that of Aaron, or the Levitical high-prieſts. The topics by which he proves this are, that the ſame prieſt now abideth always, and does not die, as the Aaronical prieſts do; and that he has no ſins of his own to offer for, as they had. Before he enters into this, Melchiſedech and Chriſt are compared together, as being like each other in ſeveral circumſtances. Both were kings of peace and righteouſneſs, and neither of them deduced their right to their reſpective prieſthood for any ſucceſſion: Both of them exerciſed the office of bleſſing, as prieſts, and neither of them deriving from parentage their office, it follows, that no objection can be raiſed againſt the prieſthood of the one, which does not equally lie againſt the prieſthood of the other. See Sykes, Peirce, Burnett's Four Diſcourſes, p. 69. Taylor's Syſtem, p. 215. and the notes on Gen. xiv. 18, &c.

Ver. 2. To whom alſo Abraham gave, &c.] Great as Abraham was, yet he gave tithes to, and was bleſſed by Melchiſedech; and in conſequence this prieſt was greater than Abraham; for without diſpute, he who receiveth the bleſſing is inferior to him who giveth it. See ver. 7. Mechi ſignifies king, and Sedech, righteouſneſs. See "The Caſe of Abraham and Melchiſedech conſidered."

Ver. 3. Without father, without mother] No more is intended by this, in the opinion of many expoſitors, than to obſerve, that the father or mother of Melchiſedech are no where mentioned, nor are they pretended to be known; nor is any hint of his family taken notice of in the Scriptures which ſpeak of him. He was indeed king of Salem;—whether by that word be meant Jeruſalem, as the Jews and ancient fathers commonly underſtood it; or as St. Jerome contends, a village near Scythopolis, where the ruins of a palace, ſuppoſed to have been his, were ſhewn. But it is no where ſaid from whom he deſcended, nor who his parents were; or that he was of any line or family to which prieſthood was annexed, as was the caſe of the Aaronical prieſts. As we know nothing of his birth or death, his parentage or pedigree (for he is ſaid to be ἀγενεαλόγητος, without genealogy,—not enrolled among the prieſts) it is certain that no particular ſucceſſion was neceſſary either to conſtitute him a prieſt, or to continue him in that office: for had that been at all neceſſary, ſomething of that ſort would have been mentioned. The next clauſe [having neither beginning of days, nor end of life] is expreſſed for the ſame reaſon as the former words, in oppoſition to the Levitical prieſts, who were obliged to be of a certain age before they were admitted to miniſter, and diſmiſſed the ſervice at a certain age again. Numb. iv. 35—47. Had this been mentioned with any other view than to ſhew that ſucceſſion was unneceſſary to one who acted upon the foot that Melchiſedech did, the Apoſtle would not have ſaid, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life, but would have mentioned ſome period for beginning or ending his miniſtry; but deſigning only to ſhew that ſucceſſion was not in the prieſthood of Melchiſedech, he obſerves, that neither beginning nor end is mentioned at all; and conſequently that the Melchiſedechian prieſthood had this advantage over the Aaronical, as not being liable to change. It is ſaid further, that he was made like unto the Son of God, and the next words ſhew in what reſpect: not as without father, or without mother, but as being a prieſt, without deriving that office by way of ſucceſſion. Liſts of genealogies were always kept among the Jews, that it might appear how every one was deſcended: nor could any one be admitted to act as a prieſt, unleſs he could prove his deſcent, not only from the tribe of Levi, but from the family of Aaron: But Melchiſedech was a prieſt of God, like the Son of God in this reſpect, who had no genealogy from which his privilege of acting in the ſacerdotal office was derived. Nor is there any mention of any alteration or change of his office by death, nor any ſucceſſors to him ſpecified; therefore thoſe that are prieſts as he was, abide prieſts for ever. Some would read this laſt clauſe, like unto the Son of God, who abideth a prieſt continually;

4 Now conſider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the ſpoils.

5 And verily, they that are of the ſons of Levi, who receive the office of the prieſthood, have a commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they came out of the loins of Abraham:

6 But he whoſe deſcent is not counted from them, received tithes of Abraham, and bleſſed him that had the promiſes.

7 And without all contradiction, the leſs is bleſſed of the better.

8 And here men that die receive tithes; but there he receiveth them, of whom it is witneſſed that he liveth.

9 And as I may ſo ſay, Levi alſo who receiveth tithes, payed tithes in Abraham.

10 For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchiſedec met him.

11 If therefore perfection were by the Levitical prieſthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what further need was there that another prieſt ſhould riſe after the order of Melchiſedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron?

12 For the prieſthood being changed, there is made of neceſſity a change alſo of the law.

13 For he of whom theſe things are ſpoken pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar.

and Bp. Burnet would tranſpoſe it thus: But he was a prieſt of God, for ever made like unto the Son of God. See his Four Diſcourſes, p. 69, &c. and for a further defence of the interpretation above given, Sykes, Peirce, Elſner, Harris on the Meſſiah, p. 269. Calmet, Whitby, &c. It is but juſt, however, to obſerve, that other interpretations are given; many ſuppoſing that by Melchiſedech Chriſt himſelf is meant: and therefore, as ſome verb muſt be underſtood in the firſt ſentence of the firſt verſe, they propoſe to read, For this perſon [namely Jeſus] is Melchiſedech, &c. The ingenious author of "The Doctrine of the Trinity, deduced by the Light of reaſon, &c." makes uſe of this paſſage to prove, that the divine Word is underived, and urges it as a ſtrong teſtimony againſt the doctrine of the eternal generation of the Word. "It is undoubtedly, ſays he, the Apoſtle's deſign in this place to draw a parallel between Melchiſedech and the Word, as far as he could do it in any, though in a different ſenſe of the expreſſion; So that, becauſe in the book of Geneſis there is no mention of Melchiſedech's father, or mother, or pedigree, or birth, he compares him to the Son of God, who before his incarnation really had no father, nor mother, nor deſcent, nor beginning of days, nor will for the future have any end of life. Foraſmuch as the Word is here ſaid to be without father, this text overthrows to the very foundation the doctrine of eternal generation, or of any generation prior to the incarnation. Indeed, had it only been ſaid that he had no beginning of days, that alone would have been abundantly ſufficient, as implying the other; and becauſe he is called the Son of God, and at the ſame time ſaid to be without father; this ſhews that the appellation of Son is to be taken, proleptically at leaſt, in reſpect of all the particulars except the laſt; and the paſſage affords a ſtrong additional proof, that the Word became the Son of God by virtue of his incarnation only." The reader will find much more on the ſame ſubject, well deſerving a very ſerious attention, in the 71ſt and following pages of the ſame pamphlet.

Ver. 4. Now conſider how great this man was] How great he,—this perſon, was. Wat. and Heylin. "He was ſuperior to Abraham, for he bleſſed him; and he was ſuperior to Levi, or any ſon of his, ſince, (if I may be allowed ſo to ſay) they paid tythes in Abraham;" ver. 9. This is a ſevere ſtroke upon the Jews, not only as it proves the ſuperior dignity of Chriſt above the Aaronical prieſthood, but ſhews alſo that God had of old a people among the Gentiles, and that there was a perſon among them ſuperior to Abraham himſelf. See Sykes, and Doddridge.

Ver. 5. To take tythes, &c.] According to the law, to take tythes of the people, that is, of their brethren. Wat. Our author's deſign is to magnify the prieſthood of Melchiſedech; in order whereto he magnifies the dignity of the Levitical prieſthood, and then ſhews that the other of Melchiſedech was to be preferred to it. Thus ſtands his argument: "It was a great honour conferred on the Levitical prieſthood, that they were empowered to receive tythes of the whole nation who were their brethren; and this honour appears yet the greater, when it is conſidered that theſe their brethren came out of the loins of Abraham, the friend of God; for whom, and whoſe poſterity, God had a particular regard, as appears by his promiſes; and who, therefore, it might be expected, ſhould be exempted from ſuch a burden. But Melchiſedech appears to have had a yet much more honourable prieſthood, becauſe he received tythes of one who was not of his brethren, even of Abraham himſelf,—which ſhews him to be greater than Abraham,—and with a prieſtly authority bleſſed him: And hereby, in effect, he received tythes of Abraham's poſterity, even of Levi, and that tribe which deſcended from him. This gives a ſatisfactory account of the word although, which at the firſt reading ſeems obſcure. See Peirce.

Ver. 6. But he whoſe deſcent is not counted from them] This ſufficiently explains what is meant in the preceding verſes by Melchiſedech's being ſaid to be without father or mother: His deſcent or genealogy was not derived either from Abraham's line, or from any other; but, ſuch as he was, he exerciſed the prieſtly office, and bleſſed him that had the promiſes. Sykes.

Ver. 7. The leſs is bleſſed of the better] The inferior is bleſſed of the ſuperior. MS.

Ver. 8. And here men that die, &c.] Here, [according to the law] men that die take tythes; but there, [in the caſe of Melchiſedech] he, of whom it is witneſſed that he liveth. As to the ſingle point of taking tythes, the caſe was the ſame both with the Levitical prieſts and with Melchiſedech: But the difference here conſidered is that of men who die, and of one of whom it is witneſſed that he liveth. Men that die have their ſucceſſors, to whom tythes are regularly and conſtantly paid; but Melchiſedech is not ſaid to have any ſucceſſor, but himſelf to continue a prieſt for ever. So much then as a prieſthood for ever is ſuperior to a ſucceſſive prieſthood, ſo much muſt that of Melchiſedech excel that of Aaron. See Sykes, and Peirce.

Ver. 9. And as I may ſay] Elſner is of opinion, that this ſhould be tranſlated, to ſay the truth; alledging that it is not agreeable to the reſpect we owe to the Apoſtle's character, to ſuppoſe that he inſerted thoſe words as an apology for an aſſertion, in itſelf not ſtrictly juſt and exact; and he produces ſome paſſages out of the claſſicks to vindicate this verſion. But ſee Grotius, and Raphelius. Inſtead of Levi alſo, Dr. Waterland reads, Even Levi.

Ver. 11. If therefore perfection, &c.] Now if perfection had been. MS. The Levitical prieſthood was appointed, when the law was given to the Jews; and it was of uſe, as by it remiſſion of ſuch ſins was obtained, as were obſtructive to the happineſs which was promiſed to that people. But, could perfection have been had by the prieſthood appointed under the law, or had that been the deſign of it, the Scriptures would have had no occaſion to mention another prieſt: And yet we find in David's time, 400 years after the giving of that law, which was received under the Levitical prieſthood, mention is made of a prieſt after the order of Melchiſedech, who was to continue for ever. Why ſhould this new prieſt be mentioned at all? Or why be ſaid to be after the order of Melchiſedech? or why not after the order eſtabliſhed, if that had been intended to bring men to perfection? The truth is, the prieſthood of the law was deſigned for a particular purpoſe during the law, and not to give remiſſion of all ſins, or to bring men to perfect happineſs. See ch. ix. 9. x. 1. Sykes, Peirce, and Elſner.

Ver. 12. For the prieſthood being changed] Another prieſt ariſing, there muſt be a change of the prieſthood; but how does it follow that there muſt be a change of the law? For though the prieſthood admitted an alteration, might not the law, as to other points, have continued the ſame? The truth is, ſo much of the law concerns the prieſthood immediately,—all their ſacrifices, oblations, purifications, their great day of atonement, and in ſhort all their temple ſervice,—that, ſuppoſing theſe to have been aboliſhed or ſet aſide, their law itſelf might properly be ſaid to be changed. But there is a ſtill juſter reaſon for this inference of the Apoſtle: The law had promiſed temporal bleſſings to its obſervers, and had denounced as ſevere curſes on ſuch as diſobeyed it; and as there could not, in the nature of things, but be frequent lapſes and deviations from obedience, a prieſthood was appointed, and a method of expiation by means thereof, to reſtore the offenders to what they had no right to, but by obedience. If therefore the prieſthood was changed, the means of atonement were taken away; and the promiſes annexed only to obedience, or to propitiation, were void, or of no effect at all; and in conſequence, the law itſelf was inſignificant and uſeleſs, and muſt be either changed or aboliſhed quite, the end of it in this reſpect being wholly loſt. See Sykes, the next note, and on ver. 16.

Ver. 13. For he of whom theſe things are ſpoken] Namely, the Chriſt, who was to be of the order of Melchiſedech. This is another reaſon why the law was to be changed; for the prieſthood being deſigned, not to be in the tribe of Levi, to which the law of Moſes had abſolutely and entirely fixed it, the change of the prieſthood to 14 For it is evident that our Lord ſprang out of Judah; of which tribe Moſes ſpake nothing concerning prieſthood,

15 And it is yet far more evident: for that after the ſimilitude of Melchiſedec there ariſeth another prieſt,

16 Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endleſs life.

17 For he teſtifieth, Thou art a prieſt for ever after the order of Melchiſedec.

18 For there is verily a diſannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakneſs and unprofitableneſs thereof.

19 For the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God.

20 And inaſmuch as not without an oath he was made prieſt:

21 (For thoſe prieſts were made without an oath; but this with an oath, by him that ſaid unto him, The Lord ſware and will not repent, Thou art a prieſt for ever after the order of Melchiſedec:)

22 By ſo much was Jeſus made a ſurety of a better teſtament.

23 And they truly were many prieſts, becauſe they were not ſuffered to continue, by reaſon of death:

24 But this man, becauſe he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable prieſthood.

25 Wherefore he is able alſo to ſave them to the uttermoſt, that come unto God by him, ſeeing he ever liveth to make interceſſion for them.

26 For ſuch an high prieſt became us, who is holy, harmleſs, undefiled, ſeparate from ſinners, and made higher than the heavens;

27 Who needeth not daily, as thoſe high one of another tribe muſt neceſſarily make a change in the law. Now Chriſt being the perſon all along deſigned to be this new prieſt, and he deſcending from Judah, the law itſelf, confining all its precepts to prieſts of the family of Abraham, muſt of conſequence be changed. See Sykes, and Doddridge.

Ver. 14. That our Lord ſprang out of Judah] It may be worth remembering here that Juſtin Martyr, Tertullian, and Chryſoſtom, refer to the table made at the taxation in proof of this; and it may be conſidered whether the Apoſtle does not inſinuate the ſame reference. Undoubtedly he would not have ſpoken with ſuch confidence, if it had not been generally allowed. Moſes ſpake nothing concerning prieſthood, as belonging or relating to that tribe of Judah. See Barrow's Works, vol. ii. p. 188. Doddridge, and Sykes.

Ver. 15—17. And it is yet far more evident] "And, independant on all genealogical controverſy which the moſt ingenious malice could urge concerning Mary's family, it is yet more abundantly manifeſt that the law muſt be changed, from the leaſt attention to that Scripture alone, ſo frequently mentioned, That, or Inaſmuch as another prieſt ariſeth, according to the ſimilitude of Melchiſedech. For, let the prieſthood be in any tribe, it can continue according to the legal eſtabliſhment only for the natural life of a man; and then proviſion is made for a ſucceſſor: But the prieſthood, according to the ſimilitude of Melchiſedech, admits of no ſuch thing as ſucceſſion, but is for an indiſſoluble life. A carnal commandment here is oppoſed to a power of living for ever; a carnal commandment therefore is a law that concerneth the fleſh which dies; whereas a prieſthood for ever does not depend upon fleſh, which, in the common courſe of things, ſoon comes to an end. The Apoſtle, therefore, is not ſpeaking of the law as enjoining ſacrifices, or any other external worſhip; but of the neceſſity of the law of Moſes being changed, ſince a prieſt was to ariſe of a quite different ſort, who was to live for ever;—as he infers from the words of the Pſalmiſt, Thou art a prieſt FOR EVER, &c. See Sykes, Whitby, and Peirce. Dr. Heylin renders the 16th and 17th verſes thus: Who is not eſtabliſhed according to the law of a carnal ſucceſſion, but according to the power he has to live for ever: As the Scripture teſtifieth in theſe words, Thou art a prieſt for ever, &c.

Ver. 18, 19. For there is verily a diſannulling] "For there is an abrogation of the former commandment, concerning the Levitical prieſthood, upon account of the weakneſs and unprofitableneſs of it: For the law made nothing perfect, and conſequently could not make the prieſthood ſo, or confer thoſe advantages which were to be expected by that office; but there is the bringing-in of a better hope, by a more perfect prieſt, through which we Chriſtians draw nigh to God." See ver. 25. Eſtius, Peirce, and Bengelius.
